While James was so desirous for peace abroad, a wild, mysterious conspiracy was got up against him at home. This affair has never been clearly understood; but it seems there were two plots: the object of those engaged in the first being, to seize the king, and keep him in confinement until he promised to change his ministers, grant a toleration of the Catholics, and a pardon for the conspirators. Those engaged in the second plot had the still more serious intention of attempting to depose James, and place the Lady Arabella Stuart on the throne in his stead. This Lady Arabella had a distant claim to the crown, being descended from Henry VII.; and some desperate men who had forfeited the favour of James, wished to exalt her to the royalty of England.

Two Catholic priests, named Watson and Clarke, and George Brooke, a gentleman, were put to death as traitors for being concerned in the first; and the accomplished Sir Walter Raleigh, together with the Lords Cobham, Grey, and other persons, were arrested and tried for the second conspiracy. When Raleigh was placed on his trial, he defended himself with wonderful learning and eloquence. Sir Edward Coke, the famous lawyer, who was then attorney-general, was the prosecutor on behalf of the king, and he abused the prisoner in a very gross and savage manner. He called him an atheist, a spider of hell, and a vile and most execrable traitor. Raleigh interrupted him by saying, "You speak indiscreetly, barbarously, and uncivilly."—"I want words," continued Coke, in a flaming passion; "I want words to express thy viperous treasons."—"That is true," replied the witty prisoner; "for you have spoken the same thing half-a-dozen times over already." In the end, Raleigh was found guilty, and sentenced to death as a traitor. But the time of that great, but unprincipled, wit and scholar had not yet come. James granted him a reprieve, and sent him back to the Tower, where he remained a prisoner for thirteen years. Lords Cobham and Grey, and a gentleman named Sir Griffin Markham, who had shared in Raleigh's treasons, were taken to the block, and pardoned after they had laid their heads upon it. But this dilatory mercy was little better than death; for the king seized their property, and committed them to close confinement. Grey died in the Tower; Cobham escaped, and perished from want in a miserable garret in the Minories.

The cause of these conspiracies was, that James declared he would not tolerate any religion except that of the established church of England, or the Episcopalian, as it was called; that is, a church governed by bishops, in imitation of the one founded by the apostles. The Catholics had been kept down, in the previous reign, by a cruel persecution; but the Puritans had been gaining in power and in numbers. Before James had been a year on the throne, they petitioned him to reform the ceremonies and abuses of the church, and to grant them a conference with the bishops. The king, who loved discussion and making speeches, granted their request; and a meeting was held at Hampton Court, between the bishops and the Puritans, he himself presiding as moderator.

The object of this conference was to decide which form of religion was the best—that of the Anglican church, or Puritanism. Such a meeting seemed very fair and just; but James had made up his mind which party to decide for before he heard the arguments; for he had long entertained a bitter dislike to the Puritans. It was very natural that he should; for the Puritans of Scotland had constantly thwarted and vexed him in his own country; and they had cruelly persecuted his unfortunate mother. He knew, also, that they cherished the principles of liberty, and were even suspected of thinking that the nation could get on very well without a king at all. This was sufficient; and James made up his mind to decide in favour of the bishops.

The conference began on the 14th of January, 1604: on one side were about twenty bishops; but James would only permit four Puritan divines on the other. The latter demanded, amongst other things, that the Book of Common Prayer should be revised; that the sign of the cross in baptism should be abolished, together with the ceremony of confirmation; the use of the ring in marriage; the reading of the Apocrypha; and the bowing at the name of Jesus. The bishops rested the dispute principally upon the Prayer Book, which they earnestly contended for; and then James himself wound up a long speech in their favour by saying—"No bishop, no king." Afterwards he said—"If you aim at a Scottish presbytery, it agrees as well with monarchy as God with the devil. The Jack and Tom, and Will and Dick shall meet, and, at their pleasure, censure me and my council, and all our proceedings." He then dismissed the Puritan divines in an insulting manner, and decided in favour of the bishops. The latter flattered the king in a very gross fashion; one of them declaring, upon his knees, that his majesty spoke by the special assistance of the Almighty Spirit.

James, however, made a few trifling alterations in the Prayer Book; and then he issued a proclamation, commanding a strict conformity to the established Protestant church. In consequence of this, 300 preachers, attached to the Puritan principles, were driven from their livings, and thrown upon the world to labour or to starve. The Catholics, also, were hunted about like wild beasts; and, in a little time, the prisons were full of persons, whose only crime was, that they practised a different form of religion to that sanctioned by the king, and which was now followed by the majority of the people. While men were thus pining in dungeons for professing what they believed to be truth, James spent almost the whole of his time in hunting, of which amusement he was immoderately fond.

On the 19th of March the king met his first parliament. He had given an indirect command that neither Catholics nor Puritans should be elected members of it; but there were many of the latter in the new House of Commons. Before proceeding to business, a dispute arose between the members and the king about the legal election of one of their number. James, assuming that he was an absolute king, sent a command to the Commons, which they declined to obey, and, in the end, he was compelled to give up the point. Having voted the king a small supply of money, the Commons set zealously to work to reform the abuses of government. Monopolies were not yet put down; and the parliament wisely saw that these abuses were ruining the commerce of the country. They turned their attention, also, to the abolition of wardship and purveyance. Wardship was the right to become guardian to all rich young people who had lost their parents, and to receive the rents of their estates until they came of age, without giving any account of the money. Purveyance was the right which the English kings had long exercised, of taking anybody's corn, cattle, or horses, and paying what price for them they pleased—which was never a price that satisfied the lawful owner. It was proposed to buy these privileges of the king; but so many difficulties were found in the way of doing a just action, that, for the present, it was abandoned. The parliament, however, showed such a disposition towards improvements, and the assertion of its own liberties, that when they had sat scarcely four months, James prorogued or put off their meeting until the February of the next year. Before they parted they begged the king to put into rigid practice all the severe laws against the Catholics.

That the Protestant form of the Christian religion is more pure, more simple, and more in unison with the teachings of its Divine Founder than the Catholic one, was conscientiously believed by most people. But that is no reason why those who preferred the Catholic form should have been hated, persecuted, and driven about like so many wild beasts. Elizabeth treated them with severity because she thought they were not loyal subjects; but a little lenity and consideration would, no doubt, have won them at least to a respectful submission to their sovereign. When James ascended the throne, they expected more favour than they had lately enjoyed; and it is even asserted that he had secretly promised to tolerate their mode of worship. They were extremely irritated on finding that they were deceived, and many were rendered desperate by the heavy fines inflicted upon them—fines so enormous as to reduce them and their families to beggary.

One of the sufferers was a Catholic gentleman, named Robert Catesby: he was of an ancient family, wealthy, accomplished, and exceedingly brave. Added to this, he was a religious fanatic, who thought, as many others of that day did, that to destroy all heretics was to do service to the Almighty, and win his eternal favour. This man, after brooding for a length of time upon the wrongs of his church, conceived the horrible idea of destroying the King, Lords, and Commons at one blow. His design was, to dig a mine beneath the parliament-house, and, having filled it with gunpowder and other combustibles, to set fire to them when the king in person re-opened the parliament. By this atrocious scheme, he intended that the king, the nobles, bishops, and all the members of parliament should be involved in one hideous and instantaneous destruction.

Revolting as this plan of wholesale murder was, Catesby had the courage to mention it to several other persons. Amongst them was Thomas Percy, a relation of the Earl of Northumberland; John Wright, Percy's brother-in-law; Thomas Winter, a gentleman of Worcestershire; and Guido (commonly called Guy) Fawkes, a dare-devil Englishman and zealous Catholic, who had lately been an officer in the Spanish service. These men swore a solemn oath to be true to each other; never to reveal the project they had undertaken; and never to give it up until it was accomplished. After this, they attended mass, and took the sacrament, which was administered to them by Gerard, a Jesuit, who, there is no doubt, was well acquainted with their intention.

Percy held some office about the king's person, which obliged him to live near the court; he therefore hired a house, the back of which leaned against the wall of that in which the parliament met. One dark night in December, 1604, the conspirators entered, and, having laid in a stock of provisions, descended to the cellar, and began digging through the wall which led to the vaults of the parliament-house. The wall was three yards thick, and the labour of boring through it was immense; but they were urged on to exertion by the cruel execution of six Jesuits, or seminary priests, who were put to death at that time for remaining in England in opposition to an act of parliament, which had prohibited them from staying in the country. Such atrocious severity gave fresh strength to the conspirators; but still they got on very slowly with their work.

Suddenly the king determined to put off the meeting of parliament from the 7th of February till the 3rd of October, in consequence of which the traitors separated until after Christmas. Before they met again at Westminster, their number was increased to ten. The new desperadoes were—Robert Kay, a poor gentleman; Christopher Wright, a brother of Thomas Wright, who was already in the plot; Robert Winter, the brother of Thomas; John Grant, a melancholy, discontented gentleman of Warwickshire; and Thomas Bates, Catesby's servant, who was admitted because it was found that he suspected what was going on. In the February of 1605, they again met at Westminster, and resumed their labour of boring through the wall. They worked watchfully, and in fear; their guilty souls being awe-struck at the slightest sound. Hardened as they were against remorse, thirsting for blood, and toiling stealthily at midnight in the cause of murder, yet they felt something, at times, of superstitious dread as they stopped occasionally, and peered into the gloom of the cellar, almost fearing to behold some strange and watchful face gazing from the darkness. Once they fancied they heard the solemn tolling of a bell, deep in the earth; and it smote upon their ears like a supernatural death-knell for the crowd of lords and senators whom they intended soon to hasten, bruised and blackened, to their graves. So distinct and real did this strange sound seem to be, that they thought it was the work of the arch-enemy of man, and sprinkled holy water upon the earth to drive it away.

One morning a strange rumbling noise was heard almost over their heads, which proved to be no delusion. They feared they were discovered, and Fawkes undertook to go and see what it was. He soon returned with a cheerful face, and the news that it was only a man named Bright, removing his stock of coals from a cellar beneath the parliament-house to some other place. The cellar was to let; and, as the conspirators had not yet bored through the wall, they at once resolved to take it. Percy hired the cellar; and thirty-six barrels of gunpowder were rowed over, at night, from a house he had engaged on the opposite bank of the river, and hid in the vault. Large stones and bars of iron were thrown in between the barrels, to make the explosion more destructive, and the whole was then covered over with faggots of wood.

Everything being ready, the conspirators once more separated, confident of success when the day set apart for the massacre should arrive. In the meantime, three other Catholic gentlemen were admitted to the plot. These were, Sir Everard Digby, Ambrose Rokewood, and Francis Tresham. The latter was a wealthy man, but of a weak, uncertain nature; and Catesby was afterwards very sorry that the secret had been confided to him. The day was near at hand; and the king, the queen, and their eldest son (Prince Henry) were all expected to be present at the opening of parliament. As to Prince Charles, he was to be seized, or made away with; and the young Princess Elizabeth was to be proclaimed queen, because, being the youngest of the royal family, she could the more easily be converted to the restored Catholic religion.

From the first the conspirators had been trying to invent some scheme to keep the Catholic nobles and members away from the parliament-house on that dark day of slaughter. Several of them had friends or relatives whom they were anxious to save; but Catesby told them that most of the Catholics would be absent in disgust, because they could not prevent the passing of new laws against their religion. "But," he added, "with all that, rather than the project should not take effect, if they were as dear unto me as mine own son, they also must be blown up." Francis Tresham was particularly anxious to warn Lord Monteagle, who had married his sister. Catesby, Fawkes, and the others refused; for they feared that, if any warning were given, their plot would be discovered, and themselves lost. Tresham went gloomily away; and, ten days before the meeting of parliament, Lord Monteagle received the following letter, delivered by a stranger, who instantly departed:—"My lord, out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I have a care of your preservation; therefore I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some excuse to shift off your attendance at this parliament; for God and man have concurred to punish the wickedness of this time. And think not slightly of this advertisement; but retire yourself into your country, where you may expect the event in safety. For though there be no appearance of any stir, yet, I say, they shall receive a terrible blow this parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This counsel is not to be contemned, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm; for the danger is passed as soon as you have burned the letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it; unto whose holy protection I commend you."

At first, Lord Monteagle was inclined to think this letter a foolish hoax; but, on second thoughts, he took it to Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of State. That statesman laid it before the king; and either one or the other of them came to the conclusion that it seemed to threaten some danger from gunpowder. It was accordingly thought proper to search the vaults beneath the houses of parliament. But this search was not made until the day before parliament opened, so that the plot might ripen, and the conspirators be arrested.

On the afternoon of the 4th of November, Suffolk (the Lord Chamberlain) and Lord Monteagle went on a visit of discovery to the parliament-house. On descending to the vaults and cellar beneath it, they threw open the one in which the powder was concealed. There they noticed the great piles of wood, and beheld Fawkes (who had undertaken to watch) standing in a dark corner. Lord Suffolk put on an easy, careless manner, and asked him who he was. Fawkes answered, that he was Mr. Percy's servant, and engaged in looking after his master's coals. "Ah!" observed the chamberlain, "your master has laid in a good stock of fuel." The two noblemen then left the vault; but they had seen enough to arouse suspicion: they felt sure, from the soldier-like manner and keen glance of the conspirator, that he was not what he described himself; and they resolved to obtain assistance, and pay another visit to the place before the next day. When they were gone, Fawkes hurried to his comrades, and, putting them on their guard, had the desperate courage again to return to this now dangerous spot.

It was past midnight when Sir Thomas Knevet (a magistrate of Westminster) and a party of soldiers descended to the vaults, and there they seized Fawkes, who had just finished his preparations, and was about to leave for the last time. Fortunately they contrived to seize him suddenly; for if he had only had sufficient time to light a match, he would have fired the train, and blown them and himself to atoms together. Having bound him hand and foot, they searched his pockets, and found some touchwood, tinder, and slow matches. A dark lantern, with a light burning in it, was also found behind the door. Turning over the logs of wood, they saw the barrels of gunpowder; and the nature of this fierce and savage plot was disclosed.

Bound as he was, Fawkes was at once carried to Whitehall, and questioned before the king and his council. Still bold and defiant, he declared that his name was John Johnson, and that he was a servant of Mr. Percy; though he admitted that his purpose was to have destroyed the king and his parliament. James inquired how he could have the heart to destroy his children, and so many innocent persons as must have suffered. "Dangerous diseases require desperate remedies," replied the undaunted conspirator. When told to reveal the names of his accomplices, he refused to mention any one, and he was then taken to the Tower.

As soon as the danger from which the king and parliament had so narrowly escaped was known in London, horror and rage were pictured upon every face, and a cry arose for vengeance upon the traitors. Percy, Rokewood, and the other conspirators who were in London, mounted their horses, and rode with furious speed to the house of Sir Everard Digby, at Dunchurch, in Warwickshire, where a party of Catholic gentlemen had assembled, in expectation of some great event which was to take place in favour of their party, though only a few of them knew exactly what it was. When it was understood that the plot had failed, most of these gentlemen stole quietly away, and left the conspirators to their fate. Sir Everard, Catesby, Percy, Rokewood, and a few others were left alone; and these desperate men, still hoping that they might at least raise an insurrection in favour of the Catholics, again mounted their horses, and rode through Warwickshire and Worcestershire, calling upon all of their religion to rise and join. The appeal was in vain; men looked on in fear and amazement; but no one joined in the little band of would-be assassins. Thus disappointed, they took refuge in a house at Holbeach, on the borders of Staffordshire. By this time the alarm was spread throughout the country, and the house was soon surrounded by the sheriff and an armed force. Here some damp gunpowder, which had been set to dry, blew up, and injured Catesby and several others so much, that they were no longer capable of defending themselves. Then they began to think (as well they might) that their plot was so savage, that the hand of God was against them; and Rokewood and others knelt before a picture of the Virgin, and prayed for forgiveness.

As the conspirators still refused to surrender, the sheriff and his men made an attack upon the house. Catesby and Thomas Winter stood back to back, resolved to fight to the last, and, in that position, both of them were killed with one shot. Percy and the two Wrights also perished, and the rest were made prisoners. Francis Tresham, who is supposed to have sent the letter to Lord Monteagle, never left London; but he was arrested, and sent to the Tower a few days afterwards.

In the meantime, Guido Fawkes had been placed upon the rack, and tortured in such a shocking manner to make him confess, that when at last he did so, he was unable to sign his name to the document. To the credit of this desperate man, it must be said that he would reveal nothing until his comrades discovered themselves by their flight, and then he told scarcely anything more than the king and his council knew already. Fawkes and his fellow-traitors were condemned to be hanged and quartered—a sentence which was executed upon them in all its repulsive details. Tresham, who was suspected of other treachery besides having written the letter which led to the discovery, died suddenly in the Tower; but not before he had accused Father Garnet, and some other Jesuits, of being acquainted with the particulars of the conspiracy. These wretched men were first racked to make them confess, and afterwards put to death as traitors. A few Catholic nobles were arrested on a charge of knowing of the existence of the plot, and heavily fined or imprisoned, although nothing was really proved against them.—Thus ended one of the wildest, most savage, and remarkable conspiracies ever recorded in the startling pages of history.

CHAPTER LXVII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF JAMES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1606—1618.

THE parliament which was to have been blown into the air on the famous 5th of November, met on the 21st of January in the following year (1606). The members longed to revenge on the Catholics the wicked intentions of a few men belonging to that party. To the credit of King James, it must be said, that he tried to appease this angry spirit. In a speech to the parliament, he remarked, that though religion had induced the conspirators to attempt so dark a crime, they were not to suppose all Roman Catholics equally guilty, or disposed to commit such enormous barbarities. Many holy men had been seduced to concur with that church in her religious doctrines, who had never approved her seditious principles; that nothing could be more hateful than to condemn alike the guilty and the guiltless; and that while he would always punish the one, he would uphold and protect the other. But these generous sentiments were not shared by the parliament; and several severe and most oppressive laws were passed against the Catholics. Indeed, these laws were so bitterly vindictive and irritating, that it seemed as if the parliament actually wished to drive the Roman Catholics into a rebellion, so that an excuse might be found for altogether extirpating them.

Amid all this excitement, the Commons did not forget the liberties of the Protestant part of the nation; and they would not vote the king a grant of money until he took a long list of grievances into consideration. James had a strong objection to listen to anything of the kind; and, about this time, a report was spread that he had been assassinated while hunting in Berkshire. Some people said that he had been shot; others, that he had been stabbed with a poisoned knife; and a third party, that he had been smothered in his bed. There was a great deal of alarm; but James soon arrived in London; and when the people found that he was neither stabbed, shot, or smothered, they received him with enthusiastic cheers, and the Commons granted the money without saying anything more about the grievances. It has been suspected that the report about the assassination was a trick of James's own.

On the 18th of November the parliament met again; and the king submitted to the members a plan for a perfect union between England and Scotland. James was very anxious for this union; but the two nations were not yet prepared for it. They had battled with and hated each other too long to become good friends so suddenly. The Scots feared that they should lose their national independence; and the English, who were the more numerous and wealthy people, objected to admit the Scots on an equality with them as their fellow-subjects. After a great deal of ill-feeling had been shown, the English parliament refused to naturalise all Scots born before James became sovereign of the two kingdoms. James was offended, and told the Commons that he objected to their great freedom of speech; but they answered in a high tone, and he was obliged to give way.

During the spring of 1607, an insurrection broke out among the peasantry of Northamptonshire, and some neighbouring counties. The discontented people chose for their leader one John Reynolds, to whom they gave the surname of Captain Pouch. He seems to have been a madman; for he declared that he was sent from heaven to be the saviour of poor men: he also told them that his skin was bullet-proof, and he would protect them against harm so long as they kept from swearing, and other bad language. James feared it was a rebellion of the papists; but it turned out to be only the rising of a number of peasants, who were determined to level the fences with which many of the gentry in those parts had lately enclosed their lands. An army was sent against those poor mistaken men; and after a good deal of bloodshed, the insurrection was put down, and the crazy Captain Pouch hanged as an example. A few other executions took place, but not many; for James did not often behave with cruelty.

The king disliked business, and spent most of his time in hunting and drinking; but though he carried both of these pleasures to excess, neither of them gave his subjects so much offence as his constant favouritism. He had always some one near him on whom he showered favours; and, about this time, he conceived an extraordinary attachment for a Scottish youth, named Robert Carr. Though of good family, Carr was extremely poor; but he was very handsome and graceful, and dressed expensively. At a tilting-match, held at Westminster, he had to present a shield to the king. As he was advancing to do so, his horse accidentally threw him almost at the feet of his sovereign, and his leg was broken on the spot. James pitied him, commanded that he should be taken care of, and afterwards paid a visit in person to the suffering page. His appearance had made a strange impression upon the monarch; and, shortly after his recovery, James took him into favour, conferred on him the dignity of knighthood, and made him a gentleman of the bedchamber. Soon, James was never happy unless Carr was with him; and every one who had a suit to beg of the king, was obliged first to win the favour of the fortunate Scottish youth by presents and compliments. This fancy of the king's was the more remarkable as Carr was very ignorant; but he had a most able counsellor in his friend, Sir Thomas Overbury, to whom he constantly applied for advice.

James seldom met his parliaments without quarrelling with them, so he thought he would try if he could not raise money without their assistance. Accordingly, he laid a duty (amongst other things) upon currants; and a merchant, named Bates, refused to pay it, saying that it was illegal; as it certainly was. Bates was accordingly proceeded against; and the barons of the Court of Exchequer impudently decided, much to the delight of James, that the king had a right to levy taxes without the consent of his parliament.

The following year (1610) the parliament met on the 9th of February; and Cecil, now Earl of Salisbury, and Lord Treasurer, explained the wants of the king, and urged the necessity of granting a large supply of money. The parliament had no intention of doing so before it had grappled with the new grievance, and it proceeded to declare the decision of the barons of the Exchequer to be unlawful. The Commons laid down the principle, that the king could not impose taxes on his people without the consent of the lower house; and, although James sent them a message to say that they must not talk upon such subjects, they would not give up the point. He then called them before him, and made an arrogant and impious speech, in which he likened himself to the Almighty, and told them that it was sedition in subjects to dispute what a king might do; that kings were before laws; and that all laws were granted by them as a matter of favour to the people.

To this assertion of the "rights of kings," in which James confidently believed, the Commons replied, that it was their ancient and undoubted right freely to debate upon all subjects that concerned the people; and that the kings of England could make laws and impose taxes with the consent of their parliament, but not without it; and they passed an act abolishing the duties James had lately imposed. As he was very much in debt, his treasurer proposed to the Commons that they should at once allow the king a liberal income for his life; and that he, in return, should redress their grievances, and abandon all other means of raising money. To this they consented, and immediately made a list of the wrongs of the people of England. The chief of them were the Ecclesiastical High Commission Court, which was constantly interfering, in a very tyrannical way, with the liberties of the nation; and the incessant proclamations of the king. James issued his royal commands, in the shape of proclamations, so frequently, that the parliament said, there was a general fear that, in the course of time, they would grow to have as much power as laws, by which means the ancient freedom of the nation would be much blemished, if not quite taken away. To these were added the old grievances of wardship and purveyance. But the king and his parliament could not agree as to how much a year he should have for reforming those abuses: he wanted too much, and they offered too little; so on the 9th of February, 1611, he dissolved his first parliament, after it had been in existence nearly seven years.

At this time, the Lady Arabella Stuart was again, unfortunately, brought into notice. The king entertained a jealous fear of that accomplished young lady, because she was of royal descent. Accordingly, he gave her a small pension, and kept her about the court, that she might be under constant surveillance; for he was resolved she should live and die single, that she might have no children to dispute the crown with his own. Arabella was quite contented, for a long time, and had no wish to marry; but at length an attachment sprung up between her and a young courtier named William Seymour, a son of Lord Beauchamp. This was discovered by the king, who sternly reprimanded them both; but love is more powerful than the dictates of a monarch, and it was soon discovered that they were privately married. James, on learning this, sent them both to separate places of confinement, from whence they escaped, with an intention of proceeding to France. Before Arabella had got fairly out to sea her flight was discovered, and vessels sent after her in all directions. Unhappily, she was captured, and being sent to the Tower, fell into such a despairing state, that after languishing for a few years she went mad, and so died on the 27th of September, 1615. Seymour was fortunate enough to escape; but he never saw his accomplished and wretched wife again. Soon after the imprisonment of this unfortunate lady, James's chief adviser, the Earl of Salisbury, went to his grave, to the great joy of the people. He was heartless and unprincipled, but possessed of considerable talents as a statesman.

The year in which Salisbury died (1612) was the last in which any one was burnt to death in England on account of religion. Bartholomew Legate expired in the flames during the month of March; and, in the following month, one Edward Wightman (who seems to have been a lunatic, for he declared that he was the Holy Spirit spoken of in the Scriptures) was also put to death in the same barbarous manner. Soon afterwards, another victim was condemned; but the people of England had grown more merciful than either their king or their laws. An ominous murmur of disgust and horror arose throughout the land; James and the persecuting part of the church were startled; the "heretic" was sent back to prison to live and die in captivity; and the fires of Smithfield were never lighted again for the purpose of religious persecution.

The king's eldest son, Prince Henry, was the idol of the nation, and deservedly so. Though scarcely eighteen, he possessed more dignity, and commanded more respect, than his father. He was handsome in his appearance; graceful and active in his demeanour; sincere and open in his manners. His education had been a military one; he loved horses and martial sports; and it was supposed that, when he became king, he would be a famous warrior. Though not very fond of books and learning, he had a great admiration for the captive Sir Walter Raleigh, of whom he said, that no other king than his father would keep such a bird in such a cage. Swearing was a fashionable vice at that time. James used to swear in a very gross manner; but the prince never swore at all, nor permitted any one about him to do so. On one occasion, he said all the pleasure in the world was not worth an oath. Notwithstanding his warlike fancies, he was very religious; and the Puritans thought he favoured their principles. They were so confident of this, that they regarded him as sent by heaven to complete the Reformation, by purging it of all the Catholic ceremonics that yet remained. In this hope, they used often to repeat the following quaint rhyme:—

> "Henry VIII. pulled down the abbeys and cells,
> But Henry IX. shall pull down bishops and bells."

The expectations of men, however, often burst like bubbles in the sunbeams, and dissolve away like the wild fancied forms we sometimes see in the gold and crimson-tinted clouds on a summer's evening. The prince was seized with a sudden and dangerous illness, under which he sank rapidly, and died on the 6th of November, 1612. His premature death threw the whole nation into sadness and mourning.

James had been an indulgent father; but still he frequently felt a little jealous of the great popularity of his son, and did not lament him much. He was, at the time, thinking of his daughter Elizabeth's marriage; who, it had been arranged, should be united to the Elector Palatine. This marriage was planned by Salisbury before he died. The princess was a cheerful, handsome girl, only sixteen; and the marriage was celebrated on the 14th of February, 1613.

James's favourite (Robert Carr) continued to win upon the attachment of the king, who, in March, 1611, had created him Viscount Rochester, and gave him a princely fortune. But he did not deserve this royal favour; for he was an unprincipled profligate. In a little time he contrived to seduce the young and beautiful wife of the Earl of Essex. This lady, though scarcely more than a mere girl, and so graceful and lovely that she looked like an angel, possessed the evil passions of a demon. Rochester's affection was so great for this guilty creature, that, not content with their stolen interviews, he desired that she should be divorced from her husband (whom she disliked, and had already refused to live with), and then married to him. When he told his wish to his friend, Sir Thomas Overbury, that gentleman strongly dissuaded him from the idea of such an adulterous marriage. This came to the ears of the countess, who fell into a fit of violent passion, and vowed she would cause the death of Sir Thomas. The ungrateful Rochester entered into her views. He first induced the king to offer Overbury the post of ambassador to Russia; then persuaded his friend to refuse it; and the king, for his disobedience, sent Sir Thomas to the Tower, where he was treated with great severity.

The Countess of Essex then sued for a divorce from her husband, and, having obtained it, was married to Rochester. The ceremony was performed, with great magnificence, on the 26th of December, 1613; the king himself attending it, having previously created Rochester Earl of Somerset, that he might be equal in rank to his bride. This marriage gave rise to a feeling of disgust and anger in the minds of the people, who thought it a very disgraceful affair; and this feeling was turned to horror when it was discovered that Sir Thomas Overbury had, on the 14th of September, died in a sudden and mysterious manner in his prison. No examination was permitted: he was hurriedly buried; but people scrupled not to report that he had been poisoned by Somerset and his vindictive wife. This report was true, although the crime was not proved against them until some years afterwards. The remorseless countess, wicked as she was beautiful, unable to forget the opposition of Sir Thomas to her marriage, had induced her equally guilty husband to send his early friend to a frightful death.

James was so displeased at the manly spirit shown by his late parliament, that he again tried the experiment of seeing how he could get on without one. His difficulty was, to get money enough to support his state and household; and to do this, he sold baronetcies —the only hereditary order of knighthood, first created, at the suggestion of Salisbury, in 1611—and other titles, to whoever would be simple enough to buy them; —simple, because titles that are bought for money, and not earned by some public service or noble conduct, are valueless in the eyes of all sensible men. Many of James's subjects entertained this opinion, and were not willing to part with their solid cash for a few empty-sounding words. But some wealthy men were actually forced to buy titles, even against their will. The king tried other indirect means of raising money, and, among them, revived the scandalous imposition of benevolences: but all would not do, and he was, ultimately, obliged to summon another parliament.

The legislature met on the 5th of April, 1614. During the elections, Sir Francis Bacon, and some other courtiers, had promised the king that they would undertake so to manage them, as to secure a majority for the court in the new House of Commons. This became publicly known, and Bacon and his associates were contemptuously called undertakers. Wise as the great philosopher was, his confidence in this instance was far above his skill. Directly the Commons met, they demanded a meeting with the Lords, to consider whether the king had any right to tax his people without the consent of parliament. The Lords asked the opinion of the judges; and the judges, who did not like to decide against the king, refused to give any opinion. The peers, thus left to their own guidance, declined to have any meeting with the Commons on the subject. The king also sent a message to the lower house to say, that if it did not at once vote the money he wanted, he should dissolve the parliament; but the Commons bravely refused to vote away the money of the nation until the public grievances should be redressed. Upon this, the king, on the 7th of June passionately dissolved the parliament after it had sa for only two months, and before it had passed a single bill. In consequence of this, it was called the "Addled Parliament"—a term of contempt which the spirited Englishmen composing it by no means deserved. No satisfied with showing his ill-temper in the dissolution James committed four of the members to the Tower for speaking too freely. Three of them were liberated almost immediately; the fourth was kept in prison twelve months.

Ever since Somerset's marriage with the beautifu Countess of Essex, and the murder of his friend, Sir Thomas Overbury, the earl had become a sullen, melancholy man. The endearments of his wicked wife could not make him forget the crime he had committed; and he became morose in his temper, careless in his dress and no longer anxious to please the king. Accordingly, the fickle James got tired of his favourite, and began to seek for another. Perceiving this, his courtiers placed in his way a handsome young man of good family, named George Villiers, a younger son of Sir Edward Villiers, of Brooksby, Lincolnshire. Of the age of one-and-twenty, tall, graceful, and always elegantly dressed, he soon attracted the king's favour, and was made his cup-bearer. The two favourites are said to have quarrelled violently; but the fall of Somerset was at hand.

That courtier had many enemies; and they now took courage to accuse him of the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury—a crime of which he had long been suspected. James, who wished to get rid of a man he was tired of, commanded the strictest investigation to be made; and, after long preliminary proceedings, during which 300 examinations were taken, several persons were arrested on a charge of being implicated in the murder. These were—Sir Gervase Elwes, the lieutenant of the Tower; Weston, the warder of that prison; Franklin, the apothecary, who supplied the poison; and Mrs. Turner, a widow, who had some hand in this mysterious crime, and was also accused of obtaining from Dr. Forman, of Lambeth, a professor of sorcery, charms and love-potions for her friend, the Countess of Somerset. They were tried on the 7th of November, 1615; condemned, and hanged at Tyburn. Mrs. Turner rode to the scaffold dressed as if for a ball, and with her cheeks highly rouged. Immense crowds of people, including many ladies of fashion, assembled to see her die.

Somerset, and his beautiful but vindictive wife, were not tried until the 24th of May, 1616. The trembling countess wept and pleaded guilty, but the earl vehemently protested that he was innocent. The proceedings, in his case, extended to the 11th of July, when the peers before whom the earl and countess had been arraigned, returned a verdict of guilty. He was sentenced to be beheaded, but offered his pardon if he would confess his guilt, and acknowledge the justice of his sentence; which he refused to do, declaring that he was an innocent man. The countess was liberated; but the earl was retained in prison till October, 1624; when, tired of his confinement, he consented to do what he had so long refused, and was liberated on the 7th of that month. He was promised the restoration of his property, but he never received it. The countess died in 1632; the earl survived her till 1645.—The year after the disgrace and trial of Somerset, George Villiers, the new favourite of whom the king had become ridiculously fond, was created, first Earl, then Marquis, and finally Duke of Buckingham; made Master of the Horse, and Lord High Admiral of England, besides receiving other profitable places. His younger brother, also, was created Viscount Purbeck, and honourable positions given to a number of his poor relations.

After having worn the English crown for fourteen years, James paid a visit to Edinburgh to see his Scottish subjects. He had been unable to do so before, on account of his poverty—the result of his extravagance; but having received a large sum of money from the Dutch, in recompense for some towns he abandoned to them, he started on his journey in the summer of 1617. His chief object in going there was to compel the Scottish preachers to adopt the doctrines and customs of the English or episcopalian church. For this purpose he summoned a parliament to settle the affairs of religion, which met in June. On the 13th of that month, he caused an act to be brought forward, which declared, that whatever the king determined respecting the external government of the church, should, if the archbishops, bishops, and a competent number of the clergy approved of it, immediately become law. The bold Scottish people had no idea of submitting to this ecclesiastical tyranny; and they raised such an outcry against it, that James was frightened, and ordered the bill to be quietly withdrawn. Soon after, the parliament was dissolved; but James could not persuade himself to abandon the subject. On the 10th of July, he called a great meeting of the bishops and clergy of Scotland at St. Andrew's, and told them he was resolved that they should adopt the ceremonies of the English church, whether they liked them or not. He said that it was his prerogative, as a Christian king, to command obedience in such matters, and that he did not regard heir disapprobation. The bishops begged him to refer his wishes to the consideration of a general assembly of he whole church, to which he consented, and summoned hat body to meet on the 25th of November. He did not remain till the assembly met. Following the example f the parliament, it evaded, rather than rejected, his propositions; but, in the following year, he obtained a favourable vote.

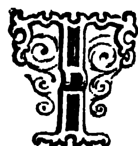
On his return to England, James was much annoyed to see the Puritanical strictness with which the Lord's Day was observed in many places. It was kept more like a Jewish Sabbath than a Christian Sunday. It was not a day of rest, thanksgiving, and cheerfulness, but one of silence, humiliation, and gloom. Such was the severity with which the Puritans observed that hallowed day, that it might have been supposed it was a time of grief and mourning, rather than one of gratitude and joy. James wished to change this way of passing the Sunday, partly because he thought it was wrong, and partly because he hated the Puritans, who were the cause of it. Accordingly, he and some of the bishops wrote and published a little volume, called The Book of Sports, in which they said that running, dancing, archery, May-poles, and other innocent pleasures, might and ought to be indulged in after divine service on Sundays. This was, perhaps, going to the other extreme: not that such games are wrong in themselves, but because they are likely to lead to more levity and boisterousness than is proper on such a day.



Sir Walter Raleigh, the famous scholar, soldier, and discoverer, had now been a prisoner in the Tower for thirteen years. During his captivity, he had written his History of the World, a book full of learning and elegance, although necessarily very imperfect, from his not being able to obtain all the information he wanted. At last he hit on a plan to obtain his liberty: he wrote to the king's secretary, and told him that, in his former visit to Guiana, in South America, he had discovered a gold mine, which he believed to be inexhaustible, on the banks of the great river Orinoco, and prayed to be permitted to go and work it. James did not place much faith in this story; but he thought it might be true: he longed to clutch some of the promised gold; and as Raleigh promised to give him a portion of all that was obtained, and to pay the expenses of the expedition himself, the greedy king ordered him to be set at liberty. Many of Raleigh's friends subscribed large sums towards the expedition, for there was a great talk and excitement about this famous gold mine; and on the 28th of March, 1617, the ill-fated scholar set sail with a fleet of fourteen vessels. Strangely enough, his own ship was called the Destiny!

At that time the Spaniards laid claim to the greatest part of America, and were extremely anxious to prevent any other nation from having anything to do with it. James, who feared and hated war, would not, therefore, grant Raleigh permission to go, until he had promised in no way to interfere with the Spanish possessions. Raleigh had assured the king he had no such intention; but he was led into a fierce attack upon the Spanish colony of St. Thomas, on the banks of the river Orinoco. A scene of horror followed; the town was fired, and the people massacred. The great gold mine was not to be found; the disappointed sailors mutinied, and returned, in disgrace and mortification, to England.

In the meantime, the Spanish ambassador had complained to James of the violence committed by Raleigh; and when Sir Walter reached England he was immediately arrested, and sent back to his old prison, the Tower. The Spanish court demanded that he should be punished; and James, fearful of a war, promised that the daring adventurer should be put to death. He might have been tried for disobeying the king's orders in attacking the Spanish colony; but James chose rather to have the old sentence, which had been hanging over Raleigh's head for so many years, put into execution. This was ungenerous and cruel, if not strictly unlawful; but James had no noble, manly feelings. Sir Walter was beheaded on Tower Hill, on the 29th of October, 1618. He died with a calm resignation almost heroic. Having spoken an eloquent prayer, he raised the axe, and, feeling its edge, said with a smile—"This is sharp medicine, but it will cure all diseases." When he had laid his neck across the block, the executioner hesitated. "What dost thou fear?" exclaimed the victim; "strike, man!" The axe fell; and the accomplished Raleigh perished in his sixty-seventh year.

CHAPTER LXVIII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF JAMES THE FIRST.—A D. 1618—1625.

HE year after Sir Walter Raleigh's execution, James lost his wife, Queen Anne, who died on the 2nd of March, 1619. She was not a very important personage; very fond of dancing and finery; but not remarkable either for virtues or vices.

About this time James got dragged into a war against his will, though he managed it in a petty and contemptible manner. The people of Bohemia were governed by the emperors of Germany; but a religious insurrection having arisen in the former country, its inhabitants cast off the yoke of the emperors, and offered the crown to the Elector Palatine, Frederick V., who had married James's daughter, Elizabeth. That prince immediately accepted it, and led an army into Bohemia to protect the Protestant cause from the House of Austria, as the family of the emperor was called. The people of England applauded his conduct; and Frederick naturally looked to his father-in-law for assistance. A cry for war ran through the country; and this cry became quite furious when it was known in England that the emperor had, on the 8th of November, 1620, defeated Frederick at the great battle of Prague, and then fallen upon and seized his hereditary dominions. James, who did not like to see his daughter and her husband ruined, sent a little army of 4,000 men; but it was too small to be of much service.

Before James could do anything more for his son-in-law, he was compelled to summon a parliament to grant him a supply of money, though he dreaded taking this step almost as much as a war. It met on the 30th of January, 1621, and the Commons readily voted him a supply; but they complained of the abuses of the government, and of the oppression of the people. Sir Giles Mompesson and Sir Francis Mitchell were severely punished for making an extortionate use of a monopoly in their possession. Several distinguished men, amongst whom were a judge and a bishop, were impeached for taking bribes to pervert justice; and dishonesty seems to have been the general vice of public men. It was in this session that the profound philosopher, Lord Bacon, was accused of, and condemned for, accepting bribes in his office of chancellor, as already related. As the Commons positively refused to grant any more money, but insisted, instead, on proceeding with their reformation of abuses, James prorogued them till the month of November in the same year. To pacify the nation, he then issued a proclamation abolishing thirty-six of the monopolies: he thought by this means to gain the good-will of the Commons, but his tyranny and obstinacy had irritated them too deeply for that. At the very time, also, that he was trying to conciliate his parliament, he committed two nobles and several gentlemen to prison without any trial, merely for the offence of differing with him in opinion.

On the 4th of November the parliament met again, and went to work directly on the question of grievances. The Commons wrote out a strong remonstrance, which they intended to send to the king; but he heard what they were about, and sent a sharp letter, commanding them not to meddle with anything concerning his government, which, he said, was a subject far above their understanding. He added, that he should do as he pleased about imprisoning any man whose bold language in parliament offended him. To this insulting letter, they replied, on the 7th of December, that they could not understand how his honour and safety, and the state of his kingdom, could be matters unfit for their consideration in parliament, and that an undoubted liberty of free speech was an inheritance which they had received from their ancestors. James, who was at Newmarket, then wrote another letter to the Commons, dated the 14th of December, in which he repeated his former arguments; and ended by saying, that he could not allow them to claim freedom of speech as a right inherited by their ancestors, as their privileges were derived from the grace and permission of himself, and the kings who had reigned before him.

This was literally saying that the liberty of the nation depended wholly upon the whims of the king; and such an arrogant and absurd assertion put the Commons into a downright fury. After a vehement debate, on the 18th of December, they entered a protestation on the journals—asserting their right to freedom of speech, and their unbounded authority to give the king their advice when they thought proper to do so. In it they declared, "that the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England!" When James heard of this, he was in a fury too: he had no idea about liberty being the birthright of his people; and, hurrying up to London, he summoned his council for the 30th of December. When it met, he ordered the journals of the House of Commons to be brought to him, and tore out the protestation with his own hand. On the 4th of January, 1622, he prorogued the parliament, which, two days after, he dissolved. Shortly afterwards, he sent five more of the most distinguished members of the Commons to prison, for their freedom of speech. This tyranny began that great struggle between the king and parliament which, in the next reign, plunged the nation into a civil war, and led to a violent death upon the scaffold.

While James was thus at enmity with his parliament, of course he could not obtain money to assist his son-in-law (the Palatine) to recover his dominions. He tried what he could do by negotiations, and sent so many ambassadors to the emperor, that he became quite a laughing-stock; but matters remained just as they were, and the Palatine was still a fugitive. Indeed, James's position was a difficult one. He had long been in treaty with Spain for his eldest son Charles to marry the daughter of the king of that country: he was very anxious that this match should take place; but the King of Spain was in close alliance with the Emperor of Germany, and he could not be friends with one, if he made war on the other. The Spanish princess was, of course, a Catholic, like the rest of her nation, and that made the proposed match very much disliked in England, where the people, who remembered what their fathers had told them of the fearful burnings and persecutions in Queen Mary's time, feared and hated every one connected with the church of Rome. This added to the great unpopularity of James; for, to please the Spanish court, he released all the English Catholics who were in prison on account of their religion. It was only an act of justice; but people did not think it so in those times; and they suspected that the king wished to bring back popery to the country.

The Duke of Buckingham, who was as great a favourite with Prince Charles as he was with the king, persuaded him to undertake a journey in disguise to Spain, where he might see his intended bride, the Spanish Infanta. He told Charles that princes were generally very unhappy in their marriages, because they were contracted to strangers for whom they had no sympathy, and whom they had never even seen before. The Infanta, he said, could not but think of herself as a state sacrifice; but if he paid her a secret visit, the romance of the affair would attract her affection; and the marriage, instead of being an affair of state only, would also be an union dictated by mutual love. Charles was delighted, and begged his father's permission for Buckingham and him to undertake the journey. James gave a reluctant consent; for he thought the plan a dangerous one, as indeed it was, as he had no surety that the Spaniards would not detain Prince Charles a prisoner, and not release him until all their demands were granted. James afterwards regretted that he had given his consent, and calling Sir Francis Cottington, the prince's secretary, before him, he asked him what he thought of the journey. Cottington answered, that it was unwise and unsafe. "There!" cried the king, "I told you so—I told you so before; I shall be undone, and lose baby Charles"—that being the epithet he applied to the prince; while he called Buckingham Steenie.

But, in spite of James's repentance, Prince Charles and Buckingham got their way: on the 17th of February, 1623, they took leave of his majesty; and, on the 18th, started on their journey to the court of Spain. Having disguised themselves as private gentlemen, and taken two attendants only, the prince assumed the name of John Smith, and the marquis that of Thomas Smith. In passing through France, they obtained admission to a court ball at Paris, and there Charles beheld the beautiful Princess Henrietta Maria. The impression of her grace, cheerfulness, and fascination sank deep into his mind, and it is not improbable that he pursued his journey to see his Spanish mistress with a preoccupied heart.

Prince Charles and Buckingham were but poor actors; and their rank was discovered directly they arrived at the Spanish court. There the prince was treated with the greatest hospitality; the Spanish king loading him with presents, and giving him a golden key which unlocked all his apartments. Buckingham, however, conducted himself in such a manner as to cause general offence and disgust. During their stay at Madrid, the marriage articles were arranged; and to those made public, secret ones were attached, in which toleration to the professors of the Catholic religion was promised. While these articles were under discussion, the pope, Gregory XV., wrote to Prince Charles, expressing a hope that, as he was about to marry a Catholic lady, he would return to the religion of his ancestors. Charles, in his reply, is reported to have held out an intimation that the pontiff's hope would be realised. However this might be, Gregory granted a dispensation for the marriage: but he died before it was delivered; and the nuncio at Madrid, to whom it had been sent, refused to part with it till it was ratified by the fresh pope, Urban VIII.; who delayed doing so, in the hope that the conversion of Charles might be first effected. The prince and Buckingham left Madrid before the dispensation was renewed; the latter, on account of his treatment there—treatment entirely the result of his own behaviour—resolved that the marriage should not take [place]. He had acquired such an ascendency over Charles, that the prince agreed to break off the Spanish alliance; and it is not unlikely that a remembrance of the lovely Henrietta Maria had some influence in causing him thus to commit a breach of faith. The prince and Buckingham returned to England on the 5th of October; and from that time the former sought means for effecting his purpose. The question of the palatine led to a rupture. James considered the restitution of that territory to his son-in-law a necessary consequence of the Spanish alliance; but he was willing to leave that restitution to be effected by future arrangements. When Buckingham returned from Madrid, however, he induced the king to demand from Philip of Spain ample security for its immediate and complete accomplishment. Philip gave the Earl of Bristol, then ambassador from England at Madrid, a written undertaking to procure the restitution of Frederick's dominions by persuasion; and if that failed, to use other means. This was not considered sufficient; and Philip then broke off the marriage; ordered the Infanta to drop the title of Princess of Wales, which she had borne since Gregory had granted the dispensation, and to cease the study of the English language. He then began to prepare for war. Disappointed of the sum of money the Spaniards were to pay as the dowry of the princess, and in danger of war with so powerful a nation, King James was compelled once more to summon a parliament to assist him.

When it assembled on the 19th of February, 1624, James addressed the members in a very different style to that which he had used towards them before. He said he remembered and regretted the former misunderstandings that had occurred; and that he earnestly desired to do his duty, and show the love he bore to his people. He declared that he never had an idea of favouring the Catholics; and that he wished, above all things, to exalt the Protestant religion. The king, in his speech, and Buckingham subsequently, gave a deceitful account of the quarrel with Spain, in which all the blame was thrown on the king of that country. Prince Charles stood by, and confirmed all the duke's impudent untruths; having been induced, by his representations, the delay in the issue of the papal dispensation, and some other causes, to believe in the insincerity of the Spanish king. In the end, James asked for an enormous sum to commence a war with Spain, and the Commons voted him £300,000—about half what he desired. James, in reality, only wanted the money: he did not wish to go to war: he dreaded the very name; and there was no war with Spain so long as he lived. Indeed, the Spaniards so despised his cowardice, that they laughed at the idea of his making war upon them. Having voted the king a supply of money, the Commons presented a petition, begging him to put into strict execution all the severe laws against the Catholics. James was displeased; but he said he would do so, and declared with an oath, that he had never intended to grant the smallest indulgence to the Catholics. This was a deliberate perjury; for he had certainly promised the King of Spain that he would give a liberal toleration to all Catholics in England.—After a fresh declaration against monopolies, and the impeachment and disgrace of the Earl of Middlesex, Lord Treasurer of England, for receiving bribes, the parliament was prorogued on the 29th of May, and did not meet again during James's life.

Though the Spaniards ridiculed the timid King James, they had not forgotten that Englishmen could fight, and they were by no means anxious for war. There were two ambassadors from Madrid then at the English court—the Marquis Ynoiosa and Don Carlos Colonna. They were unable, through the artifices of Buckingham, to obtain a private interview with James; and Ynoiosa slipped a note into his hand, and gave him a sign to read it by himself. It declared that the king was no better than a prisoner; that the chief power of the state was usurped by Buckingham; and urged upon him the necessity of cutting off so dangerous a subject. For a time James seemed angry with the duke; but the favourite soon contrived to make his peace, though he never entirely recovered the old king's favour.

While preparations were being made for a war with Spain, it was proposed to the French king, Louis XIII., that Prince Charles should marry his sister, the attractive Henrietta Maria—the lady whose winning looks had induced Charles to act so badly to the Spanish princess. The French were very willing to enter into an alliance with England, and the negotiations were soon concluded. The only difficulty consisted in the fact that the lady was a Catholic; and the people were much opposed to their future king marrying a princess of that faith. The French insisted, not only that she should be allowed freely to follow her own religion, but that English Catholics should be permitted perfect liberty of worship so long as they remained true and faithful subjects. Both the king and his son had solemnly sworn that they would not tolerate popery in England; but they assented to this condition, and also to the insertion of an article in the treaty, providing that the princess should have charge of the education of her children till they were ten years old—a condition which formed one of the articles in the marriage treaty with Spain. This would have caused a violent outcry from the Puritans if it had been known; but these promises to the French were secret ones.

King James did not live to see the completion of this marriage. His health had been long feeble, and was rendered still more so by gluttonous eating and drinking, which brought on severe attacks of gout. On returning one day from a hunting match, to his seat at Theobald, he was seized with a tertian ague. His physicians were summoned, and encouraged him with hopes of a speedy recovery; but he himself feared that death was at hand. He was right, for his last hour was rapidly approaching. As his regular medical attendants were unable to arrest the progress of the disorder, he took some quack medicine given to him by the mother of the Duke of Buckingham. It was not likely that, where regularly educated medical men had failed, mere pretenders should succeed; and, as might be expected, the king got rapidly worse. He died, after fourteen days' illness, on Sunday, the 27th of March, 1625. He was in his fifty-ninth year, and had been king of Scotland from his infancy. His reign over England had lasted for twenty-two years and some days.

James's character was as unkingly and undignified as his personal appearance: the latter he could not alter; for the former, the courtiers by whom he was surrounded in early years, were greatly responsible. He had received an excellent education, and was a good scholar; but his extreme pedantry frequently made him ridiculous: still, he occasionally showed much shrewdness and talent. His character was tainted with insincerity; he sometimes even committed perjury; and he frequently resorted to Machiavelian tricks, which he called kingcraft. Like others who resort to deceit, he was frequently deceived himself. Though not generally cruel, and certainly of a much milder temper than Elizabeth, he did some cruel things. As Henry IV. had the infamy of being the first English king who sanctioned the atrocity of burning people to death for their errors in religion, so James was the last who did so. He was despotic in his notions, and would have been a tyrant, had he dared. His ideas of the authority of a king were so arrogant, that they would have been ridiculous if free from blasphemy. Wise monarchs, who have wished to exercise despotic power, have generally tried to persuade the people that they were free; but James made such a foolish parade of his authority, that he roused the parliament, and, very much against his own wishes, actually forwarded the cause of liberty. Six children were the issue of his marriage with Anne of Denmark; but only two survived him—his son, Charles, who succeeded him, and his daughter Elizabeth, the wife of the ruined Palatine Frederick.

CHAPTER LXIX.

THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1625—1628.

JAMES died on a Sunday; and on the following Monday, the 28th of March, his son Charles was proclaimed King of England, though he was not crowned until the February of the next year. He was a handsome man, of dignified and serious manners, and five-and-twenty years of age. His reign began gloomily enough, for the plague broke out in London a few days after his proclamation; but the people had great expectations of the abilities and good intentions of their new sovereign.

On the 1st of May, Charles was married, by proxy, to the French princess, Henrietta Maria. The Duke of Buckingham, who was now a greater favourite than ever, went over to Paris, and brought the lady home. She arrived in England in the month of June, and Charles hastened to Dover to meet her. Being witty, graceful, and interesting in her appearance, the people were at first delighted with her; but she was accompanied by a train of thirty Catholic priests, and that circumstance soon turned the joy of the nation into suspicion and dislike. Charles allowed the mass to be celebrated privately in the queen's chamber at Whitehall: but the priests were not satisfied with that: they wanted a large and handsome chapel built for them; and, in a very short time, proved themselves to be meddling, troublesome people.

Charles summoned a parliament to meet on the 7th of May, for he was greatly in want of money to pay his debts, and carry on the war with Spain. It did not, however, assemble till the 18th of June. The members of the House of Commons were loyally disposed; but they were careful of the people's money, and they desired to curb the pretensions and power of their kings, which had lately gone beyond all limits. Besides this, they were jealous of the great influence of the Duke of Buckingham, and they resolved not to make the king independent of them by granting too much money at a time; therefore they voted him a most insignificant sum—only £110,000—and the duties called tonnage and poundage for one year only, instead of during his life, as had been usual for a very long period. There were many Puritans in this parliament, and they thought Charles was too lenient towards the Catholics. The sight of the queen's priests about the palace filled them with fears, lest popery should be brought back to England: they even doubted Charles's sincerity in the Protestant cause, and presented a petition to him, imploring that all the severe laws against the Catholics might be put into execution. Charles was in a difficult position. He had promised the French court, on his marriage, that the Catholics should be allowed to follow their religion in peace; but he was now obliged to promise the Commons that he would put into practice all the cruel laws which existed against those who still clung to the ancient faith. A coldness soon arose between Charles and his parliament, caused by the inadequacy of the supplies, and the Catholic question. It was increased by Dr. Montague, one of his chaplains. The doctor had published a book, suspected of leaning towards the doctrines and customs of the Roman church, and the Commons directed him to be taken into custody, and commanded him to appear at the bar of their house, to answer for what he had written. Charles had very high notions about the dignity of a king: his flatterers told him that a king was something more than human—a being second only to the Deity himself; and Charles was vain and foolish enough to believe them. Accordingly, he was angry with the Commons, and said that it was for him, and not them, to reprove his chaplain, if it should be necessary. They replied, they had a right to punish dangerous opinions in any servant of the court; and they would not set the chaplain at liberty until he had given heavy bail for his reappearance, whenever they chose to question him further. At this time the plague, which had lately broken out in London, became so alarming, that it was found necessary to adjourn the parliament on the 11th of July; to reassemble on the 1st of August, at the ancient city of Oxford.

Before the parliament reassembled, a little episode occurred, which has been much misrepresented by Charles's enemies. When James deserted the Spanish alliance, he promised to supply Louis XIII., who was entirely destitute of a naval force, with eight armed vessels, to be employed, according to the French negotiators, against the Genoese. Charles carried out this promise by sending over eight ships to Dieppe as soon as his marriage was concluded. When the vessels arrived at that port, the officers and seamen learnt that they were to be employed against the Huguenots at Rochelle. They refused to fight against their brethren in the faith; and Pennington, the commander, brought the whole fleet back to the Downs. Buckingham, the Lord High Admiral, immediately ordered them to sail again to Dieppe; and a rumour was spread that Louis had concluded a peace with the Huguenots. On reaching Dieppe, the sailors found they had been deceived; and although only one commander, Sir Ferdinando Gorge, succeeded in bringing off his ship—the French getting possession of the others—all the crews, except one gunner, left their vessels, and got home as soon as they could. Some writers say these vessels were sent to France in consequence of a secret treaty between Charles and Louis, in which the former undertook to assist the latter to put down the Huguenots. The transaction, however, originated in the promise of James; which we do not believe he would have made, if he had entertained any idea that the vessels were to have been sent against Rochelle; nor do we think Charles would have carried out the promise, had he been aware of their destination. Buckingham was decidedly wrong in sending the vessels back; but for that act he alone appears to have been responsible.

The parliament met at Oxford in a bad temper. Both the people and former parliaments had been anxious for that war in which Charles was now engaged; but when he explained the alliances into which he had entered, detailed the measures that were to be taken for the recovery of the palatinate, and asked the Commons for more money to enable him to carry on the war, they told him they hardly knew who they were at war with. Though pressed very much, they would not grant any more money, or alter the vote which gave Charles the duties of tonnage and poundage for a single year only. They were resolved to have a reform of grievances; to have the laws put in force against the papists; and to inquire into the conduct of the Duke of Buckingham, who was severely censured for sending the vessels back to Rochelle. After the Commons had sat for nine days, Charles sent them a rude and haughty message, threatening a dissolution unless they voted him further supplies at once. The Commons were no longer such obedient servants of the crown as they were in the time of Henry VIII.: since his death they had been gradually becoming bolder and more powerful. The talented and crafty Elizabeth was compelled several times to submit to their demands, and Charles's conduct only made them less inclined to serve him. They drew up a spirited but loyal answer; but before they had time to present it, the king suddenly summoned them before him on the 12th of August, and abruptly announced their dissolution.

Charles soon found that to dissolve the parliament was not the way to fill his empty pockets; but he fancied that he should obtain immense wealth by attacking and capturing the rich treasure-ships of Spain. Accordingly, he adopted several very illegal and tyrannous means of collecting money, to enable him to fit out a fleet. Amongst other ways, he compelled his nobles, gentry, and clergy to lend him large sums, whether they wished to do so or not, which procured him as much dislike as assistance. However, he got money enough by these improper ways to collect a fleet of eighty vessels, and to put an army of 10,000 men on board of them. Both fleet and army were placed under the command of Sir Edward Cecil (Viscount Wimbleton)—a gentleman who knew nothing about sea affairs, and who was therefore despised by the sailors. The expedition was extremely unfortunate. It sailed on the 4th of October; and was first overtaken by a storm in the Bay of Biscay, and much injured: then the incompetent commander permitted many rich Spanish ships to escape him; and, after having done nothing more than take a paltry fort near Cadiz, the plague broke out among the sailors: a great number of the men perished; and Sir Edward led his dishonoured fleet and army home again. So annoyed were the English people at this disgraceful affair, that they hooted him through the streets of Plymouth, where he arrived on the 8th of December.

Charles had made himself almost a beggar to provide this fleet against Spain; and its utter failure reduced him to such distress, that he actually sent Buckingham to Holland to raise money on his plate and crown jewels; but the cash he got by this proceeding—£300,000—did not last him long; and he was compelled, against his will, to call another parliament. Before doing so, he endeavoured to win the favour of that body by issuing an order, that all Catholics should be disarmed, although there was no fear of any insurrection or disturbance among them; and, at the same time, he enforced the laws inflicting harassing and oppressive fines upon them.

The new parliament met on the 6th of February, 1626; but it was just as resolved upon a redress of grievances as the old one. The Commons, also, were irritated by the absence of several popular members of former parliaments, through an act of the king's. Sheriffs were not allowed to be elected to sit in parliament; so when a list of those officers for the year to come was presented to Charles, he struck out seven names, and filled up the places with the names of seven of the most talented, patriotic men who had sat in the late parliament, whom he compelled to accept the office, and thus kept them out of the new one. This injudicious exercise of his prerogative disgusted the country, and did the king more harm than good.

The Commons immediately appointed a committee to draw up a list of grievances, and very justly resolved to make the supplies they would vote depend upon the redress they obtained. The committee named sixteen grievances, which were considered fatal to the liberties of Englishmen; and all those evils, they said, were caused by that "great delinquent," the Duke of Buckingham. Charles expected that they intended to impeach his favourite; and he sent word to the Commons that he would not allow them to question the conduct of any of his servants; adding an implied threat in the words, "I wish you would hasten my supply, or else it will be worse for yourselves." This roused the spirit of the Commons: they replied, that it was "the ancient, constant, and undoubted right and usage of parliaments to question and complain of all persons found dangerous to the commonwealth, in abusing the power and trust committed to them by the sovereign;" and they proceeded more vehemently than before against the duke.

Buckingham was first impeached, in the House of Lords, by the Earl of Bristol; and shortly afterwards, on the 22nd of April, by a committee of the House of Commons. They accused him of having grasped many of the highest offices of the state, and of having purchased two of them—those of the Lord High Admiral, and Warden of the Cinque Ports; of culpably neglecting to guard the seas, so that many merchant ships had, in consequence, fallen into the hands of the enemies of England; of having extorted £10,000 from the East India Company; of putting an English fleet into the hands of the French king, to fight against the Protestants of Rochelle; of selling honourable situations; and of other serious offences. The duke treated these accusations with contempt; and the king was so incensed, that, on the 1st of May, he caused Sir John Eliot and Sir Dudley Digges (two of the members who had impeached Buckingham) to be arrested and sent to the Tower. The Commons resented this infringement of their liberties with so much spirit, that, in a few days, Charles was compelled to release the gentlemen he had so unlawfully imprisoned.

So contemptuously did the king treat his parliament, that even while the two impeachments were proceeding against Buckingham, he exerted his influence to secure, on the death of the Duke of Suffolk, the election of his favourite as chancellor of the university of Cambridge—an office to which he was elected on the 1st of June, by the members of that university. A week afterwards the duke commenced his defence in the House of Lords; but Charles, who feared for the result, wished to obtain the supply of money he required, and then dissolve the parliament, to prevent any further proceeding against his friend. In consequence of this, he sent a message to the Commons, saying, that if they did not grant him a subsidy without any delay or conditions, it would force him to take other measures. This threat did not improve the temper of that body: they determined that they would not vote any money unless Buckingham was dismissed, and the abuses of the state reformed; and they drew up a declaration to that effect, which they intended to present to the king. Before it was finished, they were summoned to meet their sovereign in the House of Lords; for that obstinate man had made up his mind to pronounce a dissolution. Many of his nobles, fearing that such arbitrary conduct would provoke serious results, begged him for a short delay. "No," said Charles, "not for a minute;" and thus, on the 15th of June, 1626, his second parliament was dissolved. It had not voted him a sixpence; and he was now poorer and more perplexed than ever.

It was necessary for Charles to obtain money by some means; and he adopted the most arbitrary and tyrannous methods. He issued a warrant, of his own authority, for levying duties on all imports and exports; he wrung large sums, by way of fines, from the Catholics; he extorted loans from his nobles and merchants; and insisted that the citizens of London should lend him £120,000. Besides this, all seaport towns were commanded to supply ships for the protection of the English shores, and the lords-lieutenants of counties to collect troops to put down insurrection at home, or meet invasion from abroad.

This was irritating and tyrannical enough; but it soon became worse. News arrived in England, that his uncle and Protestant ally, the King of Denmark, had been totally defeated, on the 27th of August, by the troops of the emperor; and that the affairs of his brother-in-law, the Palatine, and even the Protestant cause in Europe, seemed desperate. Charles was bound to assist his allies; and he urged forward the work of illegal extortion in England with increased vigour. His council, on the 7th of October, issued a proclamation, announcing that there was no time to call a parliament, and that the nation must consent to a universal loan, to which every person should pay according as he was rated in the last subsidy. Many persons refused to lend money or pay any tax that had not been properly voted to the king by the parliament. They were, in consequence, harassed by commissioners, who compelled them, upon their oaths, to answer the most inquisitorial questions. Those who still refused were sent to prison; and amongst them were Sir Thomas Wentworth, Sir John Eliot, and Mr. John Hampden, who all of them became afterwards famous for their talents and patriotism; though the first, when he found that something more than redress of grievances was wanted, joined the friends of the king.

Some of these gentlemen had the spirit to demand their liberty, as due to them by the laws of their country. No reason had been given for their confinement, except the command of the king; and it was justly said, that no Englishman could be lawfully imprisoned in such a manner. This important question was brought to trial before the King's Bench, and the whole nation awaited the result with a feverish anxiety. But Charles did not permit the trial to proceed without an attempt to gain a decision in his own favour. Early in 1627, he caused the chief justice, Sir Randolph Carew, to be deprived of his office, and appointed Sir Nicholas Hyde in his place, because the latter was ready to become a supple tool of royalty, and an instrument of injustice. Even then the judges would not proceed further against the patriots than by refusing bail, and, on the 28th of November, remanding them to prison.

Many of the bishops and clergy were extremely active in supporting those proceedings of the king, by which he endeavoured to assert his prerogative as paramount over the law. This never was so by the terms of the English constitution; though several of Charles's predecessors had made it so, and the parliaments had sanctioned the innovation. William Laud (who, though the son of a clothier, had, by his talents and acquirements, risen to the episcopal bench) was employed by the king to draw up a set of instructions to the clergy, by which they were directed to preach that his authority was from God; and that the duty of his subjects was, to yield a passive obedience to all his commands, and pay their money freely whenever he required it. Two clergymen in particular (Dr. Mainwaring and Robert Sibthorp) made themselves conspicuous by the extreme lengths to which they went in support of the doctrine of passive obedience. The first declared that the king was not bound to observe the laws of the realm; that the parliament was only an inferior sort of council; that the king had a right to impose what taxes he pleased on his people; and that if they refused to pay money for his use in this world, they would certainly be punished for it in the next. The second contended, that even if the prince should command a thing contrary to the laws of God or of nature, still the subjects were bound to submit to the punishment, only praying secretly that heaven might turn him from the error of his ways, but offering no resistance or railing—nothing but a passive obedience.—Sibthorp wished to publish this sermon; but the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Abbott, refused to grant the necessary license. For this he was deprived of his office, which was put in commission. Laud was one of the commissioners, and they granted the required license.

Although Charles was exceedingly poor—engaged with a powerful enemy in a war which he had no means of carrying on, and on the worst terms with his people—yet at this very time he actually permitted the Duke of Buckingham to engage him in a war with France! The secret cause of this war was very disgraceful. Buckingham, when in France, had dared to make dishonourable professions of love to the queen o that country, at which, it was said, she was not so displeased as she ought to have been. The affair was observed by the French king; and when Buckingham announced his intention of again visiting Paris, that monarch forbade him to do so. In a fit of passion, the duke declared, "that he would see the queen, in spite of all the power of France;" and from that moment he exerted himself to cause a quarrel between the two nations.

At that time Soubize, the brother of the Duke de Rohan (both leaders of the Huguenots), was in London, soliciting Charles to become the protector of that persecuted and distressed class of the French people; and Buckingham induced the king to give them some effective aid. This Charles was further prompted to do by intelligence he received from the Venetian ambassador, that at the instigation of the pope, a treaty between France and Spain had been signed at Paris, on the 10th of April, 1627. By that agreement, those two powers bound themselves to make war on England, because the secret articles of the treaty of marriage between Charles and Henrietta Maria had not been carried out. Having determined to send a force to Rochelle, 100 ships and 1,000 men were fitted out for that purpose, and placed under the command of Buckingham; who, though personally brave, knew nothing of war. This force sailed from Portsmouth on the 27th of June, 1627, and appeared before Rochelle on the 9th of July. The inhabitants closed their gates against the troops, though they were sent for their relief, probably mistrusting Buckingham. He then attacked the Isle of Rhé; but so mismanaged the siege, and took such ineffective measures for the protection of his troops, that after remaining on the isle till the 29th of October, he was compelled to re-embark, in the presence of a large French army which attacked the retreating force, occasioning great loss, notwithstanding the bravery displayed by all—Buckingham being conspicuous for his gallant bearing. This unlucky affair is generally called the expedition to the Isle of Rhé.

Though Buckingham returned in disgrace to England, Charles received him with open arms; and when the whole country evinced indignation at the misconduct of the expedition, he declared that Buckingham was not responsible, as the failure arose from his not receiving supplies.

It now became a serious question what was to be done to carry on the government. Charles was penniless, and the people were so incensed against the illegal modes of extortion used to collect money, that to repeat them was felt to be dangerous. Although the king hated the very name of a parliament, still he was obliged to call one to vote money to help him out of his difficulties. To prevent the members, when they met, from again impeaching Buckingham, it was arranged that the favourite himself should be the first person to propose in council that a parliament should be called. The writs were issued on the 29th of January, 1628; but before the houses of legislature could meet, the king, not knowing what to do for an immediate supply of money, arbitrarily appointed commissioners to collect it from the people, whom they were to tell that, if they dutifully paid what was required of them, he would meet the parliament; but if not, he would think of some quicker way of obtaining what he wanted. This dishonest equivocation produced such a loud cry of anger from the nation, that Charles was frightened, and recalled his commissioners.

Before parliament met, on the 17th of March, Archbishop Abbott had been restored to his see; and seventy-five persons who had been imprisoned for refusing to contribute to a forced loan, were liberated. On assembling, the Commons were found to be more resolved than ever upon a reform of abuses, and the establishment of English liberty. They were not, however, a restless body of men, who opposed the king from a quarrelsome spirit, or who wanted change only for the sake of change. Far from that: they were most of them wise, prudent, wealthy, and religious men, who saw that it was necessary to restrain the tyrannical proceedings of Charles, to preserve the honour, independence, and prosperity of the nation. Unprincipled people, who have nothing to lose, frequently like to see confusion and revolution in states, because they think they may gain something in the struggle; but there was nothing of this kind in Charles's parliament; and the patriotic statesmen who composed this one were so wealthy, that their property was considered to be three times as great as that of the whole House of Peers.

On opening parliament the king again addressed the members in a most imprudent speech, which lost him all the popularity he had tried to win by liberating so many prisoners. "I have called you together," he said, "judging a parliament to be the ancient, the speediest, and the best way to give such supply as to secure ourselves and save our friends from imminent ruin. Every man must now do according to his conscience; wherefore if you—which God forbid!—should not do your duties in contributing what this state at this time needs, I must, in discharge of my conscience, use those other means which God has put into my hands to save that which the follies of other men may otherwise hazard to lose. Take not this as a threatening (I scorn to threaten any but my equals), but as an admonition from him that, both out of nature and duty, hath most care of your preservation and prosperities."

Perhaps Charles thought, by this language, to frighten the Commons into a passive submission to his will; but the effect of it was to rouse them to a more resolute defence of the rights of the nation. They voted the king a liberal supply of money, but resolved that he should not have it until he admitted the venerable and sacred liberties of the people, and gave a solemn pledge to redress their grievances. During the debate, bolder and nobler language was spoken than had been uttered in an English parliament for ages. Sir Francis Seymour said—"This is the great council of the kingdom, and here with certainty—if not here only—his majesty may see, as in a true glass, the state of the kingdom. We are called hither by his writs, in order to give him faithful counsel, such as may stand with his honour; and this we must do without flattery. We are also sent hither by the people, in order to deliver their just grievances; and this we must do without fear. Let us not act like Cambyses' judges, who, when their approbation was demanded by the prince to some illegal measure, said, 'that though there was a written law, the Persian kings might follow their own will and pleasure.' This was base flattery, fitter for our reproof than our imitation; and as fear, so flattery taketh away the judgment. For my part, I shall shun both, and speak my mind with as much duty as any man to his majesty, without neglecting the public." In the course of his speech, this gentleman alluded to the many people who had been sent to prison for refusing to lend money to the king, and inquired—"To countenance these proceedings, hath it not been preached in the pulpit, or rather prated, that all we have is the king's by divine right? But when preachers forsake their own calling, and turn ignorant statesmen, we see how willing they are to exchange a good conscience for a bishopric." * * * "That man is not a good subject: he is a slave who will allow his goods to be taken from him against his will, and his liberty against the laws of the kingdom."

Before the act voting the money to the king was actually confirmed, the Commons passed several resolutions against forced loans, taxes without consent of parliament, and arbitrary imprisonments of the people merely at the will of the king. That house still distrusted Charles: he had prevaricated so much, and so often broken the laws of the country, that they wished for some security for his better government in future. Therefore they framed a bill, to which they desired the assent of the king, and called it THE PETITION OF RIGHT. This document has become celebrated in the annals of history as being next to the famous Magna Charta, the foundation of English liberty. After alluding to the liberties enjoyed by Englishmen during times past, and the manner in which those liberties had been violated by the king, this petition declared that no taxes could be levied by the sovereign without the authority of his parliament; and that no Englishman should be fined, imprisoned, or in any other way punished, except according to the judgment of his peers, and the law of the land. It then mentioned several other abuses of justice, and ended by begging that they should cease for ever, as being inconsistent with the laws of the land and the liberties of the people.

Charles did not recognise the extensive liberty the Commons claimed, and intended to keep his royal prerogative—that is, his peculiar and exclusive privilege as a king—unfettered. He appeared, at times, not to understand that a king owed any duties to his people, or that subjects possessed any rights. Instead of reflecting that a monarch is the first magistrate of his kingdom, and should be the father and protector of his people, he looked upon the country as a property of his own, and his people as living merely for the purpose of paying taxes. Still, he was terribly in want of the five subsidies the Commons had voted him; and he knew that he should not get them without giving his consent to the Petition of Right. He therefore promised to do so; but, to enable him to evade that promise, should circumstances require it, he gave his sanction, not in the usual manner, but in the following words:—"The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that the statutes be put in due execution, that his subjects may have no cause to complain of any wrongs or oppressions contrary to their just rights and liberties; to the preservation whereof he holds himself in conscience as well obliged as of his own prerogative."

The king gave this qualified assent to the petition on the 2nd of June. It did not, of course, satisfy the Commons; who, instead of granting the five subsidies, complained of Dr. Mainwaring (the king's chaplain) and the Duke of Buckingham, whom they declared to be the grievance of grievances, and the cause of all the evils from which the country was suffering. This brought Charles to his reason; and when he received a new petition from both Lords and Commons, desiring him to give a more direct answer to the Petition of Right, he confirmed it in the usual form. A shout of joy rang through the house; the whole nation was delighted; and Charles obtained the large supply of money that had been voted him.

This famous act was passed on the 7th of June, 1628: it was obtained by a sort of bargain between the king and his parliament. The members of that body gave him gold for an assurance that he would respect the laws of the land and the liberties of his subjects; and happy would it have been, for him and his people, if he had rigidly kept his engagement. He had many irritations, many crosses, of which the English monarchs, in this age, know nothing; and there is one great fact which ought always to be remembered—that the party which contended so strenuously for liberty, was ignorant of its true principles. That party denied civil and religious liberty to a large class of his majesty's subjects; and one cause of their quarrel with the king was, his disposition, frequently shown, to relax the penal laws against the Catholics. But that does not justify the Machiavelian policy of Charles; which, however he might conceive himself justified in adopting it, and however that policy might be brought in operation (as it undoubtedly was at times) against him, all lovers of honourable, straightforward dealing must condemn.

Charles's consent to the Petition of Right had been given so grudgingly that it did not procure him the affection of the Commons; and they immediately afterwards proceeded against Dr. Mainwaring and the Duke of Buckingham. The king left the clergyman to his fate, who was fined £1,000, suspended for three years, and his sermon ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. Charles, however, resolved that nothing should be done against his favourite. The Commons agreed to present a remonstrance, in which they mentioned many grievances and infringements of the liberties of the nation, and said that all these things arose from the bad conduct of the duke. They also declared that levying the duties of tonnage and poundage without their consent, was a violation of the ancient liberties of the people, and an infringement of the petition so lately granted. Charles heard what they were about; and to prevent them from presenting their remonstrance to him, or proceeding against the duke, he had again recourse to a dissolution. Hurrying down to the parliament-house on the 20th of June, he told the members that he did not intend to give up his right to tonnage and poundage, which it was a part of his prerogative to collect, without any permission from them. He then abruptly prorogued them, and thus showed how little he intended to observe the Petition of Right, to which he had just given his assent.

All this time the poor Protestants of Rochelle were besieged by the army of the French king, and they made an urgent appeal to the English for assistance. Another fleet was accordingly fitted out, and Buckingham himself intended to sail with it to Rochelle, to see if he could not wipe away the shame he had before acquired there. But he was never again to bring disgrace upon the national character. The hatred borne to him by the whole people was so great, that Dr. Lambe, his physician, was, on the 13th of June, set upon by a mob, and beaten so cruelly, that he died shortly afterwards. The following savage rhyme was then shouted by the excited murderers, and soon muttered all over London:—

"Let Charles and George do what they can,
The duke shall die like Dr. Lambe."

Buckingham's name was George; and this wicked threat was soon fulfilled.

In the August of 1628, the duke went down to Portsmouth to embark for Rochelle. On the morning of the 23rd, he got up in excellent spirits, and cut a caper with the lightness and frolicsome spirit of a boy. After breakfast, he had a little dispute with some French gentlemen who had come to him from Rochelle; and as he proceeded to his carriage, several of them followed, gesticulating with much violence, according to the custom of their countrymen when they are excited. As he passed through the hall, he stopped for a moment to speak to Sir Thomas Fryar, one of his officers. At that moment a clenched hand reached over Sir Thomas's shoulder—a bright weapon gleamed in the light, and was buried, as swift as lightning, in the left breast of the duke. He staggered, and fell, and after exclaiming, "The villain has killed me!" instantly expired.

There was great alarm and confusion: no one had seen the assassin; suspicion, therefore, fell upon the Frenchmen who had been talking to the duke, and it was with some difficulty that they were saved from the fury of his attendants. While this was proceeding, a hat was picked up, in which was sewn a paper, containing the following words:—"That man is cowardly, base, and deserveth not the name of a soldier, that is not willing to sacrifice his life for the honour of his God, his king, and his country! Let no man commend me for the doing it, but rather discommend themselves as the cause of it; for if God had not taken our hearts for our sins, he had not gone so long unpunished.—JOHN FELTON."

When this paper was read, many soldiers and gentlemen rushed into the house, exclaiming, "Where is the villain?—where is the butcher?" A stern-looking man, in the garb of a Puritan, calmly advanced, and said, "I am he! here I am!" Drawing their swords, they would have killed him on the spot, but some persons of authority interfered, and caused him to be placed in a private room under a guard. To endeavour to ascertain his motives, they soon afterwards told him that the duke was not dead, and that there were hopes of his recovery. The enthusiastic assassin smiled contemptuously as he replied, "It is impossible; I had the strength of forty men, assisted by Him who guided my hand."

John Felton was a gentleman of education and good family, but of a melancholy disposition, and a zealot in religion. He had served as a lieutenant in the army which Buckingham had led to the Isle of Rhé, but had thrown up his commission in disgust, because he could not obtain his pay, and because a promotion due to him had been bestowed on another man. The feelings of anger which, on these accounts, he felt towards the duke, were increased by the complaints he everywhere heard of the conduct of that courtier, and the assertion of the Commons, that he was the cause of all the evils that afflicted the country. Long brooding on this subject almost turned Felton's brain; and at length he fancied that his duty, both to God and his fellow-creatures, demanded that he should offer up the duke as an acceptable sacrifice to heaven. These were the feelings that induced the unhappy man to stain his hand in blood. He was sent from Portsmouth, under a strong guard, to the Tower of London; but on his road the people blessed him, and prayed for him as their deliverer: one woman even hailed him with the title of David.

At first, Felton gloried in the deed; and when asked his motives, answered, "I killed him for the cause of God and my country." He persisted that he had no accomplices; and when Lord Dorset threatened him with the rack, he replied firmly, "I am ready; yet must I tell you, my lord of Dorset, that I will accuse you, and no one but yourself." The exhortations, however, of the clergy brought him to consider himself as a murderer. He was tried on the 27th of November; condemned for his crime; and hanged, on the 29th, at Tyburn.—The king was much grieved at the death of Buckingham, whom he called his martyr. Indeed, Charles was very anxious to have Felton tortured before being put to death, in order to induce him to disclose his accomplices; but the judges declared, that although such shocking practices had been common, they were against the law. The duke was buried secretly in Westminster Abbey, in the night of the 18th of September; for he was hated so much by the people, that it was feared they might stop the funeral procession, and tear the dead body out of the coffin, if the ceremony took place during the day.

Buckingham being no more, the English expedition was put under the command of the Earl of Lindsay. It sailed on the 10th of September, and appeared before Rochelle on the 18th. A gallant attempt was made to force an entrance into the port, but it failed, and on the 23rd the fleet returned to England. On the 18th of October, Rochelle surrendered to the French army; and the cause of the reformed religion was, for the time, crushed in France.

CHAPTER LXX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1629—1631.

THE parliament reassembled on the 20th of January, 1629. The Commons were very ill-disposed towards the king, who had, since their last meeting, in defiance of the Petition of Right, gone on collecting tonnage and poundage without its having been granted to him; permitted that infamous court, the Star-Chamber, illegally to sentence a man to have his ears cut off; and had circulated copies of the petition through the country with his first equivocal answer attached to it. Besides this, he had favoured and promoted all those clergymen who had been most forward in preaching slavish doctrines, and who were suspected, without any just grounds, of only watching a safe opportunity to restore popery in England.

But what most incensed the Commons was, the case of Mr. Rolles, a merchant and a member of their house, who complained that his goods had been seized because he had refused to pay the illegal dues of tonnage and poundage. "Cast your eyes which way you please," said one gentleman, "and you see violations of the liberty of the subject. Look on the privileges of this house: they knew the party was a parliament man; nay, they said if all the parliament was with him, or concerned in the goods, they would seize them just the same." During the debate which took place on this subject, Charles sent a command to the Commons not to proceed with it until after they had an interview with him the next day at Whitehall. There he told them that he wished to do away with all cause of misunderstanding between him and them; that if they would at once pass the bill, making the payment of tonnage and poundage legal, that source of dissension would be removed; and that he had not taken those duties as his right, but that it was his intention to receive them as the gift of his people.

This partial submission of the king to the laws of the land and the wishes of the people came too late; for both nation and parliament had, at last, come to suspect him of insincerity in everything he said or did. The Commons were resolved not to vote tonnage and poundage to him, either for life or for a single year, unless he gave some pledge that he would govern, for the future, in a more straightforward and less arbitrary manner. They were, also, very dissatisfied with the conduct and doctrines of the chief ministers of religion in the country, and resolved on a strict inquiry into both before they said a word about tonnage and poundage; for they declared that the business of the kings of this world should give place to the business of the King of Heaven. Though William Laud was not yet Archbishop of Canterbury, yet Charles had trusted him with the chief authority in the church. Laud entertained the opinions of Arminius, a celebrated professor of divinity at Leyden. These opinions were not in themselves objectionable; but, on the contrary, both probable and charitable. Still they were much disliked by the Puritans, who held a sterner and stricter doctrine; and they were the more disliked because Bishop Laud adhered to those forms and ceremonies which the church had always observed, but which the Puritans condemned. They deemed them relics of popery; and accused Laud—who, whatever his faults, was a sincere member of the Anglican church—with being more than half a papist in his heart. Thus, though Arminianism had, in reality, nothing to do with popery, it came to be connected with it in the minds of the people.—Charles was very anxious to get the vote which should sanction his collection of tonnage and poundage, and he sent several messages to the Commons, desiring them to pass that before they did any other business. But they were resolute; for they did not like this interference, and therefore kept to their debates about popery and Arminianism. However, they sent the king an apology for delaying the bill granting the supplies; but, at the same time, gave him to understand that they regarded his repeated messages as inconsistent with their dignity and privileges.

In the course of this debate, a singular-looking man, of about thirty years of age, rose to speak. It was the first time he had ever addressed that solemn assembly, and all eyes were immediately turned upon him. He was dressed in a plain cloth suit, which seemed to have been made by an awkward country tailor; his linen was scarcely so white as it should have been; his ruffles were old-fashioned; his hat was without a band; he wore his sword ungracefully; his features were coarse and red; and his voice thick and harsh. Such a figure might have provoked contempt, if it had not been for his serious, manly air, his meaning eye, and an indescribable manner that inspired respect. In the course of his speech he said—"I have heard that Dr. Alabaster hath preached flat popery at St. Paul's Cross, and that the Bishop of Winchester commanded him, as his diocesan, to preach nothing to the contrary; and Dr. Mainwaring, so justly censured for his sermons, has been preferred to a rich living. If these are the steps to church preferment, what may we not expect?" The name of this speaker was Oliver Cromwell, the son of a brewer of Huntingdon—a man who, some years afterwards, rose to be the "Protector" and governor of England.

The result of the debate, which continued from the 14th to the 23rd of February, was, that the Commons appointed a committee to draw up a report concerning the abuses in the church; and the house adjourned, on the last-named day, to the 25th, when Mr. Pym, as chairman of the committee, presented a report, in which the members denounced the innovations of Laud, and the doctrines of Arminianism: they desired that candlesticks should be removed from the communion-tables, and pictures and images from the churches; they required that slavish books, written by clergymen, inculcating the wicked doctrine of the divine right of kings to do as they pleased, and the duty of the subject always passively to submit, should be publicly burnt; and they desired the king to take the advice of his council in appointing pious and learned men to vacant bishoprics.

In the midst of their attention to religion, the Commons did not forget the illegal collection of taxes. They compelled the sheriff of London, who had seized Mr. Rolles' goods for tonnage and poundage, to beg pardon on his knees at the bar of their house, and then sent him to the Tower. They also summoned the officers of the customs to the bar of the house; who urged, as an excuse, that they had made the seizure in consequence of their having had a warrant to do so from the king. Sir John Eliot, one of the patriotic members, on the 25th of February, produced a remonstrance to his majesty against the illegal collection of tonnage and poundage, and other oppressions which injured the trade of the country. Before it was read, an order was received from the king that the Commons should adjourn till Monday, the 2nd of March. It was fully understood that a prorogation was to take place on that day, to be followed by a dissolution; and the leaders of the opposition—Denzil Holles, Benjamin Valentine, Walter Long, William Strode, John Selden, William Coryton, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir Peter Hayman, and Sir John Eliot—had previously concerted that the Speaker should not leave the chair till the reports and resolutions prepared on the subject of religion, and tonnage and poundage, had been adopted. As soon as the house met, therefore, and the Speaker took his seat, Holles and Valentine placed themselves on either side of his chair. Sir John Eliot was the first to rise immediately after prayers; but, before he could utter a word, the Speaker rose, and said he had the king's command to adjourn the house till the 10th of March. He was about to step from the chair, but he was held in it by Holles and Valentine, and Sir John Eliot proceeded with his address, and then presented the report, which both the Speaker and the clerk refused to take. The former was leaving the chair; but he was again forced back by Valentine and Holles; and as he refused to read the report or declaration, after Selden and Sir Peter Hayman had reproached him for his obstinacy, Sir John Eliot read it himself.—In the meantime, the sergeant-at-arms attempted to remove the mace, which would have put an end to the sitting; but that, and the key of the house, were taken from him, and, the Speaker being still held in the chair, Sir Miles Hobart locked the door.—Sir John Eliot then proceeded with the report. When he had finished, resolutions founded upon it were also read, put to the house by Holles, and carried by vast majorities.

Charles, in the meantime, had gone to the House of Lords, and he sent the Usher of the Black Rod to summon the Commons to attend. But Sir Miles Hobart kept possession of the key till the business before them was concluded, paying no attention to the repeated knocks, and summons to open, of the king's officer. The resolutions being carried, the Speaker was released, who immediately left the chair, and the key being returned to the sergeant-at-arms, he opened the door. The members simultaneously adjourned the house to the 10th of March, and began to disperse. They were just in time; for the king had sent for the captain of his guard, who, with a band of pensioners, was found at the door, just about to force an entrance. —The next day, the 3rd of March, a proclamation appeared, declaring the House of Commons dissolved, but as no date was given, his majesty went to the House of Peers, which assembled on the 10th. After a brief speech, in which he placed the conduct of the peers in favourable contrast with that of the lower house—applying, some reports say, the term "vipers" to certain parties in the latter—he declared the parliament to be at an end.

On the 4th of March, the nine members before named, as having arranged the proceedings of the 2nd of March were summoned to appear before the privy council All obeyed, except Strode and Long, for whose apprehension a reward was offered by a proclamation issued on the 27th, when they gave themselves up. All were sent to prison; some to the King's Bench, others to the Tower, and several to the Marshalsea—a prison then existing in High Street, Southwark, but which was taken down in 1842, and the prisoners removed to the Queen's (formerly the King's) Bench.—There were long and tedious arguments before the judges, as to whether the prisoners were entitled to be admitted to bail. The law officers of the crown contended, strongly, that they were not; and some of the judges were of their opinion. On the 30th of September, it was decided that they were entitled to bail, "on giving security for their good behaviour." Seven then remained in prison; Hayman and Coryton having, by petition to the king, obtained their liberation in April. Of these seven, all, except Long, refused to give the required security; because the meaning put upon the words "good behaviour," would have prevented them from exercising the parliamentary privileges, and doing their duty to the public. When Long found that his colleagues had refused to comply with the decision of the judges, he would have withdrawn his recognizances; but he was not allowed to do so.—The term during which he was bound to good behaviour, however, expired before the trials came on, and as he refused to renew his sureties, he was sent to the Marshalsea. The trials did not take place till February, 1630. The prisoners were indicted for sedition displayed in their speeches in parliament, and their conduct to the Speaker. They refused to plead, before an inferior court, for what they had done as members of a superior one. As they persisted in refusing to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the court, they were pronounced guilty par contumace, and sentenced to be imprisoned till they made due submission to the king. Eliot, Valentine, and Holles were also sentenced to pay a fine—the former of £2,000, the two latter of £500 each. After some delay, all obtained their liberty, except Sir John Eliot, who steadily refused to submit to what he considered an unjust sentence. After he had been two years in prison, his health began to fail, and he twice petitioned Charles for his release—once in very humble terms. but as he refused to express regret for the past, and to promise better behaviour in the future, he was kept in prison, till he died on the 27th of November, 1632.

Having thus got rid of his third parliament, Charles resolved to rule without those assemblies, and to levy, by the exercise of his royal prerogative, those taxes which parliament had formerly granted to the sovereigns. This experiment he tried for a period of eleven years—a period, as may well be imagined, of excitement, confusion, and oppression. One act alone, which occurred in the beginning, was enough to rouse the anger and hatred of the nation against the king; who, though far from being tyrannous in his general administration, enforced what he really believed to be his rights, with respect to tonnage and poundage, in the most arbitrary manner. Richard Chambers, a merchant of London, refused to pay any other duty on a bale of silks than could be demanded by the law of the land. The silks were accordingly seized by the custom-house officers; and Chambers, irritated at his loss, exclaimed, "That merchants had more encouragement, and were less screwed and wrung, in Turkey than in England." For this speech he was summoned to the Star-Chamber, and sentenced to pay a fine of £2,000, and to sign a paper, declaring that he had spoken the words insolently, falsely, and maliciously. He signed the infamous document in the following manner:—"All the above contents and submission, I, Richard Chambers, do utterly abhor and detest, as most unjust and false, and never till death will acknowledge any part thereof." The judges then sentenced him to imprisonment, which he endured for twelve weary years; and though he was set at liberty by the Long Parliament, he was a ruined man, and died at last in want.

Charles found several of the patriots far less steady in adhering to their principles than Eliot had proved himself. Of the nine whose names we have given, he was the only one who remained in prison. Of those who had followed in the train of the leaders, Sir Dudley Digges deserted his principles, and accepted the situation of Master of the Rolls. Noy and Littleton (two distinguished lawyers) followed his example; the first being made attorney-general, and the second solicitor-general. But the greatest of these renegades, as they are termed, was Sir Thomas Wentworth, who afterwards became so famous under the title of the Earl of Strafford. He was a gentleman of property, a brave soldier, a brilliant orator, and a man of immense and varied abilities. His countenance, at once thoughtful, austere, and melancholy, seemed to belong to one born for command; and his overbearing will generally enabled him to trample down all opposition. He had always professed unshaken loyalty to the king, who, he said, was misled by evil counsellors. And—whether he thought the patriots and Puritans went too far, or whether he was seduced by honours and advantages held out to him—there was not, from the time of Eliot's imprisonment, a more staunch supporter of the king's prerogative. That famous patriot, Mr. Pym—a name that will ever remain illustrious in English history—had been Wentworth's friend; but when he abandoned the party opposed to the court, Pym exclaimed bitterly, "You are going to leave us, but we will never leave you while your head is on your shoulders" The time came when Pym kept his word.

For some time Charles's councils were chiefly directed by Sir Thomas Wentworth, and by Laud, then Bishop of London. Wentworth was a great and brilliant minister; Laud's talents were not equal to those of his colleague; and he devoted his attention chiefly to ecclesiastical measures. He had many private virtues; was a man of great learning and piety; and there is no reason to doubt the sincerity of his religious belief. The reports relative to his attachment to the church of Rome, led the pope twice to offer him a cardinal's hat, which was promptly refused; but, no doubt, he thought Puritanism as great a deviation from Christian truth as the Roman superstition; and he persecuted its followers without remorse. This refusal to tolerate a difference in religious opinions was Laud's great fault; but the Puritans would have been equally intolerant if they had possessed the power. Bishop Laud did not exert his influence merely to introduce superstitious mummeries in religion, and to oppress those who would not adopt them, as his enemies assert. He was equally relentless against licentiousness and immorality, sparing neither rank nor station. In this he was supported by the king; and Charles's court had a very different aspect from that of his predecessor; being, in fact, more free from abuses, and much more refined, than that of any of the other three Stuart kings.

Charles and his two ministers suffered nothing to interfere with their attempts to raise money for the purposes of his court—far from an expensive one—and government. The king persisted in levying tonnage and poundage, in defiance of the Petition of Right. He revived an old feudal law, by which all persons possessed of £40 per annum were summoned to receive the honour of knighthood; and if they declined accepting a title which they had no means of supporting, they were compelled to pay a considerable fine to be excused. He also revived the old forest laws, and expelled many people from their lands, because they had at some remote time been royal chases. Monopolies had been abolished both by Elizabeth and James; but Charles brought these harassing modes of extortion again into use, and invented some that had not before existed. Royal proclamations, also, were frequently issued, and all who disobeyed them were fined heavy sums. Indeed, Charles scarcely left any mode of extortion untried by which he might raise the money he should have received only from the grants of his parliament; and this was the great error of his life—the prominent fault of his government.

Laud was terribly active in the career of persecution. A Scotch preacher, named Alexander Leighton, had written a violent fanatical book, in which he had abused the queen and the bishops. He was summoned to the Star-Chamber on the 4th of June, 1630; and although he apologised, and endeavoured to excuse himself, he was sentenced to be degraded from the ministry, to be publicly whipped, placed in the pillory, have his ears cut off, his nostrils slit, and the letters S. S.—i. e., Sower of Sedition—burnt, with a hot iron, upon each cheek. When these shocking barbarities had been inflicted, the unhappy man was thrown into prison, there to remain a horrible and dreadful spectacle until death released him. He obtained his liberty after ten years of captivity; but that was when neither the king or bishop had any longer power to detain him. Many other honest fanatics were driven from their pulpits, imprisoned, fined, ruined, scourged, and branded, because they insisted on worshipping God in the way they believed to be the purest and best. In consequence, numbers turned their backs upon their native land—that land which they deemed no longer a fit dwelling-place for free-born men; and shaking off the dust of their feet against it, proceeded to America, where they founded a new home in the solitudes of the virgin forests of the New World. These men—some of the founders of the great American people—were long afterwards called by the honoured title of the "Pilgrim Fathers."

In 1633, Charles visited his kingdom of Scotland, to hold a parliament, and go through the ceremony of his coronation. He left London on the 12th of June, and was crowned at Edinburgh on the 18th. The ceremony, conducted with all the pomp and practices of the Catholic church, greatly shocked the rigid notions of the Scots. The parliament met on the 19th of June. It voted a liberal supply of money—which was the chief object of its being assembled. A bill was introduced for establishing the articles of the church of England, and the use of the Prayer Book and the surplice, so much hated by the Scotch Presbyterians. This bill was strenuously opposed; but it was declared to be carried, though the Presbyterian leaders averred that a majority of both estates—Lords and Commons—was against it. On the 28th of June parliament was dissolved; and Charles returned to England, leaving behind him much ill-will, that afterwards made itself painfully manifest. Soon after the king's arrival in London—on the 4th of August—Abbott, the Archbishop of Canterbury, died, and Laud became primate of England.

When he had entered upon that high office, another striking case of persecution occurred. Mr. William Prynne (a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, and a zealous Puritan) published, in 1633, a large volume, with the title of Histrio-Mastix; the Player's Scourge, or Actor's Tragedie. Its object was to cry down all plays, music, dancing, hunting, Christmas festivities, Maypoles, and village sports; and he only enforced the principles of the Puritans, who deemed these amusements sinful. He was a great man among that sect; and was, therefore, thought a fit object for prosecution; his book being illegally published, not having the required license. The queen was fond of dancing; and the king frequently had masks, and other entertainments, presented at court; Prynne was, therefore, charged with casting aspersions upon her majesty, and of stirring up the people to discontent against the king. He was prosecuted in the Star-Chamber; found guilty; and condemned to pay a fine of £5,000, to be imprisoned for life, to stand twice in the pillory, to have his ears cut off, his nostrils slit, and to be branded with a hot iron on the forehead. These revolting punishments, which have long been banished from this country, were enforced. The victim stood in the pillory in Palace Yard on the 7th, and in Cheapside on the 10th of May, 1634; losing an ear each time. He bore the infliction, we are told, with the placid courage of a hero.

While Laud was prosecuting Puritans, and enforcing the use of the church ceremonies, Sir Thomas Wentworth was made Baron Strafford, Lord President of the North, and, in 1632, Lord Deputy of Ireland. In that country he ruled with an arrogant despotism; and his extortions enabled him frequently to send large sums of money to the king. His despotism in Ireland, however, had a good effect. There had been no satisfactory, established rule; and the various chiefs, whilst they quarrelled and fought against themselves, robbed the people on every side. Strafford put a stop to these exactions, compelled all to obey his behests, and, if he did not establish law, he certainly restored peace and order; and Ireland was more prosperous under his administration than it had been since its conquest.

CHAPTER LXXI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1631—1640.

IN the year 1631, Charles had recourse to a new scheme for raising money. He issued writs to the great towns of England, commanding them to equip and man ships of war for his service. This had been done by Elizabeth when the country was threatened by the Spanish Armada: but even at such a time as that, the seaport towns only were required to furnish ships to protect themselves. Charles now, in a time of peace, demanded ships, or money instead of them, from the inland counties also—a stretch of kingly power which excited a universal murmur throughout the land. Notwithstanding, a formidable fleet of sixty sail was fitted out, under the Earl of Northumberland, with which British commerce was protected, and the rights of the fishermen preserved, especially against the Dutch, who had made great encroachments in the English seas.

The people of London, and of other great towns and cities, complained loudly of this new mode of taxation; but it was in Buckinghamshire that a resolute stand was first made against it. That county was assessed, in 1636, at a ship of 450 tons, or a sum of £1,500. There lived in that part a wealthy country gentleman, named John Hampden—a man of noble, handsome features, a polite education, great courage, integrity, amiability, and animated by a patriotic love of his native land. He had sat in parliament; but had not as yet acquired any great distinction among that august assembly of orators and statesmen, though he was esteemed as a champion of liberty that no tyranny could either intimidate or corrupt.

Hampden had long grieved for the oppression of his country, and he now resolved, if possible, to check the tyrannical practices of Charles. The amount demanded from him for ship-money was but a trifle to a man in his circumstances—only 20*s.*; but he refused to pay it on principle; for he thought, that, by resolutely persevering in this refusal, the cause between the king and his subjects must be brought to an open trial. Many other gentlemen of the county, encouraged by Hampden's firmness, followed his example.

As Hampden resisted the payment of ship-money on the ground that it was illegal, Charles had this question proposed to the judges—"Whether, in a case of necessity, for the defence of the kingdom, he might not impose this tax; and whether he were not sole judge of the necessity?"—The judges, who would seem to have been more ready to do what they thought would please the king than to declare what really was the legitimate rule of law, replied, on the 12th of February, 1637, in the affirmative. As Hampden still refused to pay the tax, the trial proceeded; and the question was argued, in Michaelmas term, 1637, before all the judges of England. Judgment was not pronounced till the 12th of June, 1638. It was—four of their lordships dissenting—against Hampden, and in favour of the king. No doubt the patriot had expected this result; and it had rather the character of a victory than a defeat. This remarkable case had aroused the whole nation to a spirit of resistance against the despotic encroachments of Charles. Many people who had before paid ship-money now resisted it; the discontent of the nation was daily increasing; and a dark storm was gathering over the head of the obstinate monarch. During this trial Hampden gained great fame by the calm and respectful firmness of his manner; nearly all men spoke in his praise, and even the courtiers regretted that they had such a man for an enemy. But he knew very well that his resistance had made him a marked man; that Charles was longing and watching for an opportunity to crush him. Feeling England no longer a safe home, he resolved to emigrate to America; and his cousin, Oliver Cromwell, also packed up his things to go with him. It is said they had actually embarked on board of one of eight vessels then lying in the Thames, filled with emigrants, anxious to leave a land which they regarded as the home of tyranny, when an order from the king compelled them all to disembark, and remain in England. Thus, by a course of conduct which looks almost like fatality, Charles forcibly kept in England the man who helped to hurl him from his throne and send him to the scaffold.

Before the end of the trial between Hampden and the king about ship-money, Archbishop Laud had prosecuted Dr. Bastwick, a physician; Mr. Burton, a clergyman; and Mr. Prynne (who was then a prisoner in the Tower), for publishing "seditious and libellous books" against the church and the government. These books were very violent; and were, of course, unlicensed. The offenders were tried in the Star-Chamber, on the 14th of June, 1637, and condemned to pay a fine of £5,000 each; to stand in the pillory; Bastwick and Burton to lose their ears; and Prynne to be branded. All these (as we now consider them) disgusting barbarities were performed, to the horror of many of the people, who looked upon the unhappy gentlemen as martyrs, and offered them money, and said many things to comfort them. There were some who looked on approvingly, and thought the offenders had only obtained their deserts. To the masses, however, these prosecutions were most unacceptable: they rendered the king and the archbishop more unpopular every day; but, unfortunately, they were not aware of the storm of indignation they were provoking, nor of the danger it threatened.

A few months afterwards, Laud summoned two persons, named John Lilburne and John Warton, to the Star-Chamber, for printing seditious books in defiance of his decree—that no book should be published without a licence. When Lilburne was required to take an oath to answer all the questions that should be put to him, he replied boldly, that he would do no such thing; for he was a free-born Englishman, and therefore not bound, by the laws of his country, to accuse himself. The Puritans were delighted with this speech, and gave him the name of "Free-born John." The Star-Chamber, however, sent both Lilburne and his companion to prison for contemptuous behaviour; fined them £500 each; and sentenced them to stand in the pillory. As Lilburne had been the boldest, he was condemned, in addition, to be whipped through the streets, from the Fleet prison to the pillory near the gate of Westminster Hall, and then whipped back again to prison. But neither whipping nor the pillory could subdue the spirit of "Free-born John;" and while undergoing his punishment, he spoke many bold things in defiance of his persecutors, and scattered pamphlets among the crowd.

Not contented with the feeling of disgust and resistance they had excited in England, Charles and the archbishop resolved to force the service of the English church upon the Scots. A new church service was, in December, 1636, sent to Edinburgh, and appointed to be read in all the Scottish churches on Easter Day, 1637. The people of that country, who were enthusiastically attached to their own simple form of religion, looked upon the English system as little better than popery. On the first Sunday that the new liturgy was to be read at Edinburgh, the people assembled in and around St. Giles's church. At first they were well-behaved and quiet; but no sooner had the Dean of Edinburgh stepped into the reading-desk, and began the obnoxious service, than an uproar arose as if all the inmates of Bedlam had broken into the church at once. The Bishop of Edinburgh tried to pacify them, but a shower of stones and dirt was thrown at him; and the furious people shouted, "A pope! a pope! Down with the priest of Baal! Antichrist! Throttle him! Stone him!" With much difficulty the service was continued to the end. On leaving the church, the dean escaped by throwing off his surplice; but the bishop was set upon by the mob, and narrowly got off with his life. Similar scenes took place in other Scottish churches; and some of the clergy were chased through the streets, followed by an enraged mob, pelting them with stones and filth.

These scenes were followed by violent riots at Edinburgh, which were not conducted by the poor and ignorant alone, but shared by the wealthy and educated. Some nobles even took part in the expression of popular anger; and the Earl of Traquair went to London, towards the latter end of December, to persuade King Charles to desist from his attempt to coerce the people in their feelings of religion. Charles not only refused to yield, but ordered all Scottish ministers who would not read the New Book of Common Prayer, to be turned out of their livings.

The Scottish people had far too high a spirit, and too great a love of religious liberty, to put up with dictation of this kind. They loved their own form of religion, and were ready to fight to the last gasp in defence of it. In December, 1637, an association of the nobles and people took place; and committees (or Tables, as they were called), which acted according to the directions of a permanent one, constantly sitting at Edinburgh, were formed all over Scotland. It was, indeed, a scheme of insurrection so admirably organised, and so quietly conducted, that its leaders were soon able to resist the authority of the English king. Accordingly, they demanded that the new Liturgy and the Book of Canons should be instantly removed, and the Court of High Commission (which also had been forced upon them) abolished. Charles, in reply, issued a proclamation—which was published at Stirling on the 19th, and at Edinburgh on the 21st, of February, 1638—in which the "Tables" were declared unlawful; their proceedings were condemned, and large meetings prohibited, on pain of incurring the penalties of treason. All persons were ordered to return quietly to their homes, or they would incur the punishment of rebels; submission was to be followed by pardon. This proclamation was met by a protest, signed by Lords Hume and Lindsay, which the Scotch people looked upon as rendering the former document void, and as sanctioning their disobedience to it.

The enthusiasm of the people was now thoroughly aroused. Scotland was in a state of revolution; and the nobles and preachers of that country proceeded to write out that famous document known as the NATIONAL COVENANT!

The idea of the Scottish Covenant was adopted from that made by the people of Israel, when they entered into a solemn obligation with their Creator: the very name, therefore, had a sacred sound in the ears of a people bent on the defence of their national religion. It consisted of a solemn renunciation of the pope and the Catholic form of religion; and the subscribers then bound themselves, "before God, his angels, and the world," to defend their own mode of religion, and to resist all innovations whatever. On the 1st of March, 1638, the people and nobles took possession of St. Giles's church at Edinburgh; and after prayers and exhortations, the Covenant was produced, and the whole congregation standing erect, raised their hands towards heaven, and swore to be faithful to it. In a few days copies were sent to all the towns in the kingdom, and, in a little while, the great mass of the people signed their names to this memorable document. They did not do this with indifference or coldness, as people often sign their names to petitions in these days; but with enthusiastic ardour—with prayers and tears of joy; and everywhere they hailed it as the sacred pledge of liberty and salvation: and all persons who would not sign it were regarded as traitors to God, and as rebels to their country.

Charles was astonished; and in June he sent the Marquis of Hamilton to treat with the Covenanters. The king thought it was prudent not to insist on the changes in the church service for the present; but Hamilton was to allow the Scots six weeks' time utterly to renounce the Covenant to which they had just sworn so solemnly. If they would not do so, he was to treat them as rebels, and punish such of them as fell into his hands. When the marquis arrived at Edinburgh, and asked the Scots what they required as an inducement to renounce their Covenant, they replied, they would as soon renounce their religion; and they advised him to sign it himself.

Too late did Charles begin to see that he was driving the Scots into rebellion; and he became anxious to win them back to submission. For this reason, he consented to abolish the Book of Canons, the Liturgy, and the High Commission Court; and a proclamation to that effect appeared on the 22nd of September. He even consented to their calling a general assembly, to settle the affairs of their own church. This assembly met at Glasgow on the 21st of November, and proceeded to decree the entire abolition of episcopacy throughout Scotland; for they said that this form of church government could not exist together with free institutions and the true worship of God. Although Charles had withdrawn the service of the church of England from Scotland, the bishops he had appointed to sees in that country still remained. But the majority of the Scots resolved, though there were many Episcopalians in the country, to have a free church: they desired no bishops, and they would not have any. Therefore the Covenanters laid an accusation against the bishops before the presbytery of Edinburgh, in which the prelates were charged with almost every sin and immorality that could be committed. The bishops were summoned before the presbytery to answer these accusations; but they very prudently kept out of the way: still, the charges against them were read in all the churches in the country, greatly to the delight, apparently, of the congregations.

Charles, seeing that the Covenanters were as obstinate in defence of their principles, as he was desirous of enforcing his own, directed the Marquis of Hamilton to adjourn the assembly. The marquis did so; but the chief members told him that they had done nothing wrong, and therefore they would not desert the work of God; so they continued to sit and debate as usual. Nor did they debate about trifling things; for, in a little while, they solemnly excommunicated the intruding bishops, and declared episcopacy to be utterly abolished throughout Scotland. Charles then issued proclamations pronouncing the proceedings of the Scottish church to be void; but that body only replied by a counter-proclamation.

Both sides then prepared for war. The Covenanters were first in the field. They had, as early as July, 1638, collected a quantity of muskets, pikes, and halberts; and in December, 6,000 muskets were purchased in Holland. With these they armed several thousand men, and placed them under the command of a brave officer, General Leslie. Charles also collected an army of near 20,000 foot and 3,000 horse, which he placed under the Earl of Arundel, and concentrated in the north, early in 1639. Before it reached the frontiers, Leslie had seized and occupied the castles of Edinburgh, Dumbarton, and Dalkeith, which were destitute of provisions, ammunition, and garrisons. Charles, though obstinate in carrying out his views, was averse to violent and sanguinary measures; and was far from active in commencing hostilities. On the contrary, joining the army at York, on the 30th of March he proceeded slowly to Berwick, feasting and amusing himself all the way. When he arrived there, General Leslie marched boldly up, and fixed his camp within a mile of that of Charles. That monarch now hesitated and wavered—as, indeed, he had good reason to do; for the hearts of his soldiers were not with him. The Puritans of England sympathised with the Presbyterians of Scotland. The English soldiers showed a disposition to desert, rather than to fight against men whom they looked upon as their friends. Charles, therefore, reluctantly consented to a conference; and, on the 18th of June, a convention was signed by the leaders of the Covenanters and the ministers of Charles, in which it was stipulated that a parliament and a general assembly of the church should be called; that the liberties of Scotland should be restored; that the royal forts taken by the Covenanters should be returned to the king; that the Scotch army should be disbanded within forty-eight hours; and that the English forces should be withdrawn. These arrangements were partly carried out, and Charles returned with his troops to London on the 1st of August.

Scarcely a month after his return from Scotland, Charles experienced a great disappointment. A valuable Spanish fleet, with large sums of money on board, took shelter in the Downs from a Dutch squadron under Admirals de Witt and Van Tromp. To save the money, Charles offered to take it, and send it to Spain, on board British ships, for which service he was to receive £150,000. Before the specie and bullion could be removed, the Dutch attacked the Spanish fleet, though it was in neutral waters, and all the vessels, except ten, were captured or destroyed; the £150,000 were therefore lost to Charles.—This event took place in September; and Charles, dissatisfied with the Convention of Berwick—which pleased no one, not even the Covenanters—and being greatly distressed for money, sent to Ireland, and summoned Wentworth to London, to receive the benefit of his counsel. On his arrival his majesty created him Earl of Strafford.

Under the earl's advice, Charles summoned his fourth parliament, which he opened on the 13th of April, 1640, with what he intended to be a conciliating speech. Although the parliament contained most of the old patriotic members (such as Pym, John Hampden, and Oliver Cromwell), still it was, under the circumstances, a dutifully disposed assembly. The royalist historian (Clarendon) observes—"It could never be hoped that more sober or dispassionate men would ever meet together in that place, or fewer who brought ill purposes with them." The Commons, however, under the conviction that the king had only summoned them to obtain a supply of money, and believing that he would dissolve the parliament as soon as he had got what he wanted, resolved that they would not vote away the money of the people before they had obtained a redress of the national grievances. Petitions had been presented against the illegal continuance of ship-money, against monopolies, and for the abolition of the Star-Chamber and High Commission Court. After some debate, the Commons ordered that the records of the trial between Hampden and the king, concerning ship-money, should be laid before them; that the proceedings against Sir John Eliot and other members of the last parliament, who had been imprisoned, should be examined; and they resolved that the conduct of the Speaker of that house, in refusing to obev its commands, was a breach of its privileges.

The king applied to the Commons to vote him the money before they talked about grievances; and sent them a message, offering, if they would vote him twelve subsidies (£600,000), payable in three years, to give up his prerogative of ship-money. Twelve subsidies, it was contended, would be an enormous sum—many said more than all the money in the country amounted to: but there was another reason why they were not inclined to make such a bargain. To buy from the king his right of levying ship-money, would be to acknowledge that he had a right of collecting it. Nor had the Commons forgotten that, some years ago, the assent to the Petition of Right had been obtained after a grant of five subsidies, and that, by consenting to that famous document, the king had given up the right of levying ship-money—even supposing he ever possessed it. They were willing, they said, to vote him a large supply; but not as the purchase-money of a right which they—no doubt following the principles of the constitution—contended did not belong to him. After a tumultuous debate of two days, on the 30th of April and the 1st of May, the house adjourned.

Charles was very angry at this conduct of the Commons; and, without waiting for the money which he had summoned them to grant, and without which he scarcely knew which way to turn, he went down to the House of Lords, and, after an irritable speech, most injudiciously dissolved the parliament on the twenty-second day of its sitting. This was on the 5th of May, 1640; and he never had the opportunity of dissolving an English parliament again. Even the king's friends were astonished at his conduct, and could not understand how the Commons had given sufficient offence to induce him to dissolve them. This step of the king's increased the public discontent; and, wrote the Duke of Northumberland on the 4th of June, "It is impossible that things can long continue in the condition they are now in; so general a defection in this kingdom has not been known in the memory of man."

Though the parliament was dissolved, the convocation, or parliament of the clergy, continued to sit, and voted the king a subsidy. This tended to augment the dislike the people had to Laud and the bishops, whom they regarded as the cause of half their troubles. In the night of the 11th of May, the palace of the archbishop, at Lambeth, was attacked by a mob of about 500 London apprentices; and he was compelled to fortify it to protect himself. One of the rioters (a mere lad) was captured, and put to the disgusting death of hanging and quartering. A writer of that age says he was first racked in the Tower; but this is very doubtful. Such severity did not quite put a stop to the riots: a mob of 2,000 persons entered St. Paul's, where the Court of High Commission sat, and tore up the benches, crying out at the same time, "No bishops! no high commission!"

As Charles so injudiciously dissolved the parliament before it had voted any supplies, he had again to resort to illegal modes of raising money. However unpopular amongst the Puritans and their friends (then, no doubt, the majority of the English people), the king was much beloved by the members of his household and his court, and by all who came in immediate contact with him. In a few days, in this circle of friends, £300,000 was raised, and paid into the royal exchequer, as a loan; a forced loan was attempted in the city, but it was resisted by the citizens, and failed: the payment of ship-money was, however, enforced; and a loan of £40,000 was demanded of, and paid by, the Spanish merchants, as the price of the protection afforded to the bullion they had deposited in the Tower to a large amount. The East India Company had immense quantities of pepper in their stores; all which was bought by the government authorities on credit, and sold for ready money, the purchasers obtaining a liberal discount. It was also proposed to raise £200,000 or £300,000 by vitiating the coin; but the proposal was rejected. By these means, and by collecting tonnage and poundage—which Charles persisted in considering as a source of his legitimate income, although, by so doing, he was directly infringing one of the most important provisions of the Petition of Right—the king obtained funds which enabled him to raise an army, which was sent to the north, followed by a small fleet.

This army was collected in consequence of the measures taken by the Covenanters. The Scotch parliament assembled on the 2nd of June, 1640; and, after confirming the acts of the last assembly, for the abolition of episcopacy, &c., it passed a bill levying a tax of one-tenth of the rents, and one-twentieth of the interest of the kingdom, to carry on war against the king. This was a violation of the Berwick Convention, which had never been set aside; though each party accused the other of violating its provisions. The Covenanters had disbanded their army, in accordance with one of the articles of this Convention; but all the officers were kept in pay, and the men had orders to hold themselves in readiness. Early in 1640, this army was reorganised; although Charles, at that time, had certainly made no attempt to restore episcopacy, or enforce any other unpopular measure in Scotland. A letter, signed by Lords Rothes, Leslie, Montgomery, Forester, Montrose, Mar, and Loudon, was also sent to Louis XIII. of France, soliciting his assistance. The French king sent both money and arms. There were two divisions of the Scotch army—one in the north under the Earl of Argyll; the other in the south, under Leslie, now invested with the rank of field-marshal. The latter was ordered to invade England, in consequence of a letter written (as appears by his own confession) by Lord Saville, inviting the Scots to cross the frontier, and assist their neighbours to obtain a redress of grievances. To this letter, the names of the Earls of Bedford, Essex, Brooke and Warwick, and Lords Say and Sele, were attached, without their consent or knoweldge.

Whilst the troops under Argyll overran the districts of Badenoch, Athol, and Mar, Leslie advanced to the English frontier. The latter movement took place in August; and the Scotch army entered England on the 20th of that month. The English army had previously been ordered to the north, and Charles joined it at York on the 23rd of August. He declared himself the generalissimo; and under him the Earl of Strafford (who had gone back to Ireland, and after a short sojourn, had returned) held the chief command. To check the Scotch, a detachment was sent to Newburn, in Northumberland, under Lord Conway, with orders to prevent the enemy from crossing the Tyne. The two forces met on the 28th of August, on the banks of the river: and as the English refused to accede to the request of the Scots not to impede their march to lay a petition at the king's feet, the latter forced the passage, and the English, after a short resistance, retreated as if seized with a panic: probably many of them were Puritans, disposed to favour the cause of the Scotch, rather than that of the king.

As the English retreated, the Scots advanced, and occupied Newcastle and Durham. The king was then at Northallerton, and Strafford at Darlington. In consequence of the Scotch successes, Strafford ordered the force with him to retire, and directed the entire army to concentrate at York. There he collected 19,000 foot and 2,000 horse, besides the Yorkshire trained bands. The king reviewed these troops on the 11th of September: but no further advance was made, and there was no more fighting. At the same time Charles received two messengers, one bearing a very humble and loyal petition from the Covenanters, praying for a redress of grievances; the other brought an address, signed by twelve peers, and a petition, signed by 10,000 citizens of London, praying the king to summon a parliament. Strafford was opposed to negotiations, and wished the king to order the army to advance and attack the Scotch. Charles, however, resolved to comply with the wishes of the peers and citizens; and, in the interim, to advise with a grand council of peers, called to meet him at the deanery, York, on the 24th of September. When that council assembled, Charles informed them that he had ordered writs to be issued, calling a parliament to meet on the 3rd of November; and he submitted two questions to the peers—First, "What answer should be given to the petition of the rebels?" Secondly, "How his army should be kept on foot and maintained until the supplies of a parliament might be voted?" On the first day, it was arranged that negotiations should be opened with the Scots; and commissioners were appointed—sixteen English noblemen, and six Scots, loyalists—to meet those nominated by the Covenanters.—On the next day, it was arranged that the conference should be opened at Ripon, and that £200,000 should be borrowed of the city of London, on the joint security of the privy council and the peers. The council then separated; the writs were issued; and, on the 1st of October, the English and Scotch commissioners met as appointed. There it was resolved that a cessation of arms should take place; and that £850 per day should be allowed the Scotch for the maintenance of their army.—On the 27th of October the conference was adjourned, to reassemble in London.

CHAPTER LXXII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1640—1642.

THE fifth parliament of Charles—notorious in English history as the Long Parliament—met on the 3rd of November, 1640, and contained a great number of men who, besides loving their country and its natural liberties, were possessed of remarkable talents. Such men were indeed worthy, in many respects, to sit as the representatives of the people of England. But they met under unfavourable auspices. They had imbibed a firm conviction that the king could neither be trusted nor believed; that he was an enemy to the laws and liberties of the country; and they were resolved on a thorough reformation of the wrongs and oppressions of the nation, without taking into consideration the rights of the crown; and whilst many of the men who rendered themselves prominent in the debates only desired a "redress of grievances," but had no wish to overturn the monarchy, there is no doubt that the aim of others was, from the first, the destruction of government by kings, and the establishment of a republic.

Instantly petitions poured in from all parts of the country, and the Commons appointed committees to take the national grievances into consideration. They were not content with denouncing ship-money; for there was scarcely an abuse or tyrannical proceeding of the government that they did not attack. On the fourth day of their sitting they sent for Mr. Burton, Dr. Bastwick, and Mr. Prynne to appear before them. These victims to tyranny had been set free from their dungeons, and were brought to London in triumph, attended by crowds of people shouting "Welcome!" and wearing sprigs of bay and rosemary in their caps as tokens of joy. Such was the general enthusiasm, that, in some places, their path was strewed with flowers, and branches of trees were borne before them. The appearance of these unhappy gentlemen, with their burnt and lacerated faces, in the House of Commons, produced a general shudder, and a feeling of indignation. The house voted that their condemnation had been illegal, unjust, and against the liberty of the subject. It was further decided that they should receive damages for their unmerited sufferings—Mr. Burton £6,000, and Dr. Bastwick and Mr. Prynne £5,000 each; which sums should be paid by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the other lords of the Star-Chamber who had condemned them. Dr. Leighton, John Lilburne, and others, who had been harshly imprisoned for what were called seditious speeches or writings, were also set at liberty.

The conduct of the Commons caused the Archbishop of Canterbury to apprehend that it would be now his turn to be persecuted. A little time before, his portrait that hung in his study had fallen down from the nail upon its face, and he feared that this circumstance was an omen of his coming ruin. But a greater than Laud was first to be brought to account for his tyrannical misdeeds. The Earl of Strafford was now the chief adviser of the king, and upon him the wrath of the nation fell. He had been most anxious to keep away from London and the parliament; for he saw the spirit of that assembly: he knew that he had given great offence to those who then led the Commons; and he hoped that if he were not present he might be forgotten. He implored the king to excuse his attendance in the parliament; but Charles did not wish to lose the services of such an able adviser; and he commanded Strafford to attend, assuring him that the parliament should not be allowed to touch one hair of his head.

It has already been stated, that Mr. Pym said to Strafford, when the latter left the party he had first joined, and devoted his services to the king—"You are going to leave us; but we will never leave you while your head is on your shoulders." Pym had never for an instant forgotten this threat of vengeance; he had followed the statesman with the untiring energy of a bloodhound; he had noted all his actions, treasured up the remembrance of his tyrannies—for his government in Ireland was certainly tyrannical—in the firm belief that the day of retribution would come at last. It had come; and the first day that Strafford took his seat in the House of Lords—the 11th of November—Mr. Pym, in the name of the Commons of England, impeached him of high treason, and desired that he might be removed to a place of safe custody, until his crimes should be proved. Strafford was accordingly committed to the Tower; and although he desired to be released on bail, this was denied him.

Archbishop Laud was the next singled out by the parliament for punishment: he also was accused of high treason; and, on the 18th of December, a message was sent to the Lords that he might be committed to custody. Though he must have expected this, yet the archbishop lost his temper, and declared vehemently, that "the Commons themselves, though his accusers, did not believe him guilty of the crimes with which they charged him." This was an imprudent speech, likely to do him harm, and he afterwards requested permission to withdraw it; but the Lords would not allow him to do so. He was sent to the Tower; and Sir Francis Windebank, one of the Secretaries of State, and said to be a tool of Laud's tyrannies, was next accused; but he contrived to avoid being arrested, and afterwards escaped to Paris, where he publicly went over to the Catholic church. Lord Keeper Finch, the Speaker of the House of Commons, who had refused to put Sir John Eliot's remonstrance to the vote, was also accused as a chief procurer of the judgment against Mr. Hampden, in the great trial about ship-money; and for many other abuses of power. Finch was very submissive, and made a very clever speech in excuse of his conduct: this gained him a little time, which he took advantage of, and fled to Holland. So rapid and decisive were the proceedings of this famous parliament, that it has been said, "the great structure of tyranny was like a gigantic palace of ice, which melted away beneath the first beams of the sun of freedom." But the Commons were not yet satisfied; and they ordered the servile judges who had declared ship-money to be lawful, and had condemned Mr. Hampden, to find bail to abide the judgment of parliament.

The king having no means of resistance, remained a quiet spectator of these measures. But the Commons, remembering how he had constantly dissolved their meetings when they inquired into any abuses, now resolved to protect themselves against any such violent exercise of his authority for the future. For this purpose they brought in a bill for triennial parliaments—that is, for parliaments to be called every three years—which decreed that no future parliament should be dissolved or adjourned by the king, without its own consent, within less than fifty days from the commencement of its sitting. Charles could not get over his distrust of parliaments sufficiently to permit this bill to pass quietly. He sent for the Commons, and expostulated very earnestly against it; but in vain; and on the 15th of February, 1641, he reluctantly gave the royal assent. Both houses returned him their solemn thanks, and the whole nation expressed itself grateful and delighted.

The Commons, having thus secured themselves against being suddenly dissolved as a parliament, entered upon the trial of the Earl of Strafford. A committee of thirteen members of the Commons had been, for some time, preparing the charges, and no less than twenty-eight accusations were brought against him. The trial was appointed to take place in Westminster Hall; and in that noble building a throne was erected for the king, and scaffoldings for the judges and the Houses of Lords and Commons.* The latter were there as the accusers of the earl, and the Lords as his judges. The excitement was immense; the king and queen attended, although they remained hidden from sight; and the whole nation was awaiting the result with feverish anxiety.

The trial commenced on the 22nd of March, 1641. Mr. Pym was the chief accuser, and opened the charges in an eloquent speech. He urged the tyrannies of the earl in Ireland; his oppressions as President of the Council of the North (a sort of Star-Chamber, that was held in Yorkshire); the evil advice he had ever given the king; and his attempt to overthrow the laws and liberties of the people of England by the establishment of a despotic government. Strafford defended himself with great eloquence; and although many bad actions were proved against him, he contended, that as none of them singly amounted to treason, they could not be all put together to make one treason. The Commons felt that the death of Strafford was necessary to the peace and safety of the nation, and insisted that his many state crimes amounted to what was called accumulative or constructive treason. In his defence, the earl said—"My lords, be pleased to give that regard to the peerage of England, as never to expose yourselves to such constructive interpretation of laws. If there must be a trial of wits, let the subject-matter be of somewhat else than the lives and honours of peers. It will be wisdom for yourselves, for your posterity, and for the whole kingdom, to cast into the fire those bloody and mysterious volumes of constructive and arbitrary treason, as the primitive Christians did their books of curious arts, and betake yourselves to the plain letter of the law and statute, that telleth us what is, and what is not treason, without being ambitious to be more learned in the art of killing than our forefathers. It is now full 240 years since any man was touched for this alleged crime, to this height, before myself; let us not awaken these sleeping lions to our destruction, by raking up a few musty records that have lain by so many ages forgotten or neglected."

After having spoken further in the same manner, the earl thus concluded—"My lords, I have troubled you longer than I should have done, were it not for the interest of these dear pledges a saint in heaven hath left me." (Here he pointed to his children, and pausing, shed a few tears to the memory of his dead wife). Then, recovering himself, he resumed—"What I forfeit myself, is nothing; but that my indiscretion should extend to my posterity, woundeth me to the very soul. You will pardon my infirmity:—something I should have added, but am not able; therefore let it pass. And now, my lords, for myself, I have been, by the blessing of Almighty God, taught that the afflictions of this present life are not to be compared to the eternal weight of glory which shall be revealed hereafter. And so, my lords—even so, with all tranquillity of mind—I freely submit myself to your judgment; and whether that judgment be of life or death, Te Deum laudamus."

Bulstrode Whitelocke, the historian of the times, who was a member of the House of Commons, and chairman of the committee which conducted the impeachment against Strafford, remarks, with regard to the noble earl's defence, that "certainly never any man acted such a part, on such a theatre, with more wisdom, constancy, and eloquence, with greater reason, judgment, and temper, and with a better grace in all his words and actions, than did this great and excellent person; and he moved the hearts of all his auditors, some few excepted, to remorse and pity."

The accusation and defence had occupied eighteen days; the Lords were evidently greatly impressed with the latter; and the managers of the impeachment found it impossible, by a legal prosecution, ever to obtain a sentence against the earl. But Pym and his followers were inexorable. They believed that so long as Strafford lived, the king would possess an unprincipled and powerful counsellor for evil, and that the laws and liberties of England would be corrupted. Therefore, they resolved to proceed with a bill of attainder against him, as an enemy to the liberties of his country. A bill of attainder was an arbitrary thing—a doing away with the ordinary forms of law; but even those who called out most loudly for the observance of the law, were compelled, in this case, to go against it. The bill was carried in the House of Commons, on the 3rd of May, by an immense majority—only fifty-nine votes being given against it; but it had still to receive the consent of the peers and the king. The Lords hesitated; but they were urged on by the excitement of the people, who were furious when they learnt that Strafford might yet escape. A mob of 6,000 men surrounded the houses of parliament, and rent the air with shouts of "Justice against Strafford!" Under these circumstances, the Lords gave their consent to the bill.

The condemned earl was no traitor to his king; his offences (under no existing law could they be classed as crimes) had been committed against his country. He had been Charles's friend, his adviser, and the ready instrument of his measures. He and the king were, in fact, fellow-offenders; and it remained to be seen if Charles would sign the death-warrant of his friend. He had assured Strafford that the parliament should not touch a hair of his head; and he now sent him word in prison, that though he might be compelled to make some sacrifices to the violence of the times, yet his life should be in no danger. Charles certainly tried many means to deliver Strafford; but they failed; and he then summoned both houses before him, and earnestly begged them not to proceed to any extremities against the earl. He said he believed him to be guilty of misdemeanours, but not of treason; that his conscience would not permit him to condemn the earl of that. "My lords," he added, "I hope you know what a tender thing conscience is. To satisfy my people, I would do great matters; but in this of conscience, no fear, no respect whatever, shall ever make me go against it. Certainly I have not so ill-deserved of the parliament this time, that it should press me in this tender point." The Commons, however, were resolved that the grand apostate to the commonwealth (as Strafford was called) should be put to death. The Lords joined the Commons in a request to the king to consent to the bill of attainder. Whilst Charles hesitated, he received a letter from the imprisoned earl, desiring him to pass the bill of attainder, and sacrifice him as a peace-offering between him and his people. "Sir," said the captive, "my consent shall more acquit you herein to God than all the world can do besides. To a willing man there is no injury done; and as, by God's grace, I forgive all the world with a calmness and meekness of infinite contentment to my dislodging soul, so, sir, to you I give the life of this world with all the cheerfulness imaginable, in the just acknowledgment of your exceeding favours." Perhaps the earl was perfectly sincere in this heroic offer; but it is more probable he thought he should be able to win upon the compassion of his sovereign, so that he would do anything rather than send so generous a friend to the scaffold. If so, he was mistaken. Charles took him at his word, and, on the 10th of May, gave the royal assent to the bill of attainder. He, however, keenly felt the misery of his position, and that he was condemning his friend for offences committed in his service. He shed tears, and exclaimed, that the condition of the doomed Strafford was happier than his own. On the 11th of May he sent the Prince of Wales with a letter to the peers, entreating them to confer with the Commons, with a view to mitigate, or at least to delay, the execution of the sentence. Both requests were refused.

When the earl learnt that Charles had consented to his death, he received the news with astonishment. Rising from his chair, he lifted his eyes to heaven, and said, in the words of Scripture, "Put not your trust in princes, nor in the sons of men; for in them there is no salvation." Two days afterwards he was led to the scaffold on Tower Hill. As he passed the chamber in which Archbishop Laud was confined, he bowed towards the window, and exclaimed, "My lord, your prayers and your blessing." The trembling prelate, fearing that his own punishment was imminent, raised his hands, pronounced his blessing, and then fell to the ground, overcome with grief and terror. The scaffold was surrounded by about 100,000 people; and the earl's attendants feared that he might be seized by them and torn to pieces; but the crowd behaved quietly, and kept a solemn silence. Strafford delivered a speech, in which, after denying his guilt, he referred to his wife and children, and concluded by saying—"I thank God that I am nowise afraid of death, nor am daunted with any terrors; but do as cheerfully lay down my head at this time, as ever I did when going to repose!" He then submitted to the executioner—the axe descended, and a moment afterwards the changed and bleeding head was held up to the sight of the crowd. This ever-memorable execution took place on the 12th of May, 1641. The earl was in his forty-ninth year.

The work of persecution still went on; most of those who had held places about the king abandoned them, and fled, for fear that they also might fall victims to the vengeance of the Commons; who certainly evinced a tyranny, in their proceedings against the king's friends, as remorseless as that they ascribed to the king in the exercise of his prerogative against the people. Charles, to conciliate the patriots, bestowed most of the vacant places upon them; and the king's new ministry was of a popular kind. As a return for these concessions, the Commons granted the king the old-contested tax called tonnage and poundage, and voted him six subsidies—an enormous sum for those days. But they also abolished the detestable Star-Chamber, and the equally detestable High Commission Court, for ever. Shortly afterwards, no less than thirteen bishops were impeached in the House of Commons. They had all been active, with Laud, in the introduction of the doctrines of Arminius into the church of England; in urging the observance of the rites and ceremonies of that church, which the Puritans deemed more than half popish; and in encouraging the king in his attempts to raise money without the consent of parliament, which led to so many acts of oppression upon his subjects. The charges against them were, that they had made, in the late convocation, several ecclesiastical laws which were contrary to the laws of England, to the rights of parliament, and the liberties of the people. So suspected and disliked were the bishops by the majority of the house, that a bill was brought forward for depriving them of their seats in the House of Lords. The peers were averse to going to such a length as this, and the bill was rejected in that house, on the 25th of May, by a large majority; but the thirteen impeached bishops were not permitted to take their seats. The Commons also appointed a committee, called the "Committee of Scandalous Ministers," which acted as a court of inquisition upon the clergy; beginning with harassing and imprisoning them; and ending with ejectment, and the confiscation of their livings. They also took active proceedings against the Roman Catholics; addressed the king to remove all officers of that religion from the army; and expressed great resentment because his majesty refused to sign the warrant for the execution of Goodman, a Jesuit, who was found in prison. They also ordered all images, altars, and crucifixes to be demolished.—Having sat till the 9th of September, the parliament adjourned for a month; a committee of both houses being appointed to act during the recess.

All this time the king had kept the remains of the army which had been routed at Newburn stationed at York; but he had been unable to make use of it. The Commons had thought it wise to remain good friends with the Scottish army of Covenanters, whom they kept, also, in the north of England, and supplied liberally with money and provisions; for, said one of the leaders in the house (Strode), "We cannot spare the Scots yet; the sons of Zeruiah are still too strong for us." They considered the presence of that force as a protection, and a means of keeping Charles to his word.

The king had promised to pay his subjects in Scotland a visit in the summer of 1641; and he persisted in going to the north against the wishes of the parliament, which appointed a commission to watch his movements, and report to them. He left London on the 10th of August; and, being afraid of his coming in contact with the armies, the Commons ordered arrears due to the Scotch force to be paid; and the men returned home. The English were marched to their different counties, and disbanded. The Scotch parliament met while Charles was in Scotland; and passed several laws restraining the royal authority: one prohibited the creation of any peer of Scotland, unless he possessed property in that kingdom of the value of at least 10,000 marks (above £500) per annum; another prohibited the king from issuing proclamations bearing the force of law; and a third enacted that no officer of state, privy councillor, or judge should be appointed but by the advice and approbation of parliament. Charles—whose object undoubtedly was to attach the Scotch to him, that he might use them against his English foes—attended the Presbyterian church while in Edinburgh; and conferred offices on several Covenanters, and on popular preachers. During the king's residence in the Scotch capital, Argyll and Hamilton were informed, on the 2nd of October, that a plot had been laid to assassinate them; and that the king and the Earl of Montrose (who was then a prisoner in Edinburgh Castle, as "a traitor to the Covenant") were privy to it. No explanation was ever given of this alleged crime, which is known as "the incident;" the affair was investigated in private, against the express wish of the king; and the records are lost. It is very doubtful whether there was any plot at all; if there were, there is no "strong reason," as one historian asserts, for connecting the king with it. Indeed, Hamilton and his friends publicly exonerated him. Whatever Charles's faults (and they were many), he never displayed a desire to shed blood; but always the contrary. However, the English Commons—who were informed of "the incident" by their commissioners—when they assembled on the 20th of October, took the alarm: they expressed a dread that the "Malignants" (as they then termed the king's party) had formed a plot to massacre them and all the godly in the kingdom; and applied to the Earl of Essex, whom the king had left in command of the troops in the south, for a guard to protect them. That nobleman granted their application, and appointed the guard.

Before Charles left Scotland, after the affair of "the incident," he created Marshal Leslie Earl of Leven, and raised the Earl of Argyll to the dignity of a marquis, and Lord Loudon to that of an earl. He was recalled from Scotland by news of a fearful insurrection that broke out in Ireland on the 22nd of October, the object of which was to throw off the English rule, and to crush the Protestant religion in that country. The fury of the rebels was such, that it is calculated no less than 50,000 Protestants—men, women, and children—were massacred. The popish slaughterers represented, with fearful impiety, that it was an act acceptable to the Almighty to destroy all heretics, and to drown, if possible, the name of Protestantism in a hideous sea of human blood. Those events drew a cry of horror and indignation from the English people; and a dark suspicion, in connection with this dreadful massacre, was thrown upon Charles by his enemies. His queen was a papist: he himself, together with his late favourite, the fallen Archbishop Laud, were suspected of being papists in their hearts; and it was generally believed that this rebellion in Ireland had been encouraged and brought about by the king, as an excuse for raising such an army as would give him the means to crush his English parliament, and reign with despotic power.

This suspicion made the parliament and Puritans of England less than ever inclined to be submissive and tractable to the king. In the minds of many it created a sense of restless irritation and suspicion; and the Commons prepared a paper, called "A Remonstrance of the State of the Kingdom," to be presented to his majesty. It was addressed, not only to the king, but to the people, and contained a list of the evils and misfortunes of the government, and of the illegal and tyrannous acts of the king from his accession until that time. The lending of English shipping to the French papists, to crush the Protestants of Rochelle (an act which Charles certainly was not guilty of); the unlawful confinement of men for not obeying unlawful commands; the violent dissolution of four parliaments; the arbitrary government which always followed those dissolutions; the questioning, fining, and imprisoning members of the Commons for their conduct in the house; the levying taxes without consent of the Commons; the introduction of popish ceremonies into the church; and the present dark rumours respecting the king's connection with the rebellion and massacre of the Protestants in Ireland, were all enumerated. None of Charles's misdeeds were forgotten; and the whole of them were attributed to the evil counsels it was said he received from popishly-disposed bishops, and dishonest, mean-spirited courtiers. As remedies, the exclusion of Roman Catholics from all power; the appointment of a commission to watch and report upon the increase of their numbers and of their acts; security for the due administration of the laws; and the appointment of just ministers, not the favourers of papists, were demanded.

Many members of the Commons thought this remonstrance too severe, and would not vote that it should be presented to the king. The debate upon it lasted until two o'clock in the morning of the 22nd of November; and was carried on with such violence, that if it had not been for the presence of Mr. Hampden, the members would have stained their swords in each other's blood. After many of the elderly members, who were in favour of the king, and against presenting the remonstrance, had been compelled to leave the house from utter exhaustion, it was carried only by a majority of eleven—159 to 148 votes. "Had it been rejected," said Oliver Cromwell, as he came out from the heated house into the cold air of a November night, "I would have sold everything I possess, and never seen England more."

The remonstrance was presented to the king on the 1st of December, with a petition which the house had adopted on the 27th of November, calling for the bishops to be deprived of their jurisdiction in parliament; the dismissal of all members of the Malignant party from public offices; the employment only of such as had the confidence of the parliament; and the application of all the land forfeited to the crown by the rebellion in Ireland, to the public necessities. Charles received a deputation of twelve members, who presented this remonstrance and petition at Hampton Court, very graciously; and after they had been read, begged they might not be printed till his answer was received. They were, however, printed without waiting for that reply; which was soon, also, issued from the press. It was very temperate. Denying the allegations against him, and warmly protesting the sincerity of his attachment to the reformed religion, Charles reminded the people of the happiness and prosperity they had enjoyed under his rule; and rebutted the charge about his being misled by evil counsellors, by calling to the recollection of the house and the people, that he had protected no minister from parliamentary justice; and he had conferred office on no one who did not enjoy a high character and estimation in public opinion.

The popular excitement was much increased by what was interpreted as an attempt of the king, at this time, to get the Tower of London entirely into his own hands, by appointing one Colonel Lunsford lieutenant of that fortress. His majesty was obliged to remove the obnoxious officer; and only drew further unpopularity on his head by the unfortunate appointment—the worst he ever made; for there is no doubt that the colonel was a most unprincipled person.—A riot followed this affair, and the houses of parliament were surrounded by mobs, who shouted, "Beware of plots! No bishops! no bishops!" This cry arose from a feeling that the bishops were all concealed papists, and open enemies to liberty and the laws. Charles had always supported the church; and its bishops had, in return, sanctioned his encroachments on law and freedom, and preached that a king reigned by divine right; that to resist him was to resist God; and that the duty of his subjects was passively to obey him in everything, however improper his commands might seem to them.

So strong was the feeling against the prelates, that they scarcely dared take their seats in the House of Lords, for fear of the vengeance of the people. A general excitement prevailed; and crowds constantly assembled about Westminster and Whitehall, and uttered loud shouts in condemnation of "popish bishops and rotten-hearted lords," and grossly insulted and menaced the occupants of the episcopal bench when on their way to the house.—Dr. Williams, the Archbishop of York, having been abused by the populace on the 27th of December, called a meeting of his brethren for the 29th; and twelve of them—the Bishops of Durham, Norwich, St. Asaph, Lichfield, Bath and Wells, Hereford, Oxford, Ely, Gloucester, Peterborough, Llandaff, and York—agreed to a protestation which his grace had drawn up, against all votes and resolutions that had been passed in parliament during their constrained absence, as null and void. This protest—which though, as a popular historian remarks, "just and legal, and very ill-timed"—was presented to the king, who hastily approved of it. Had the House of Lords also concurred in it, the Long Parliament must have been brought to a sudden end, and all its work undone. Instead of doing so, they desired a conference with the Commons, to whom they communicated the document. That house immediately sent up to the peers an impeachment of the bishops for high treason, they having endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws, and to invalidate the authority of the legislature. Their sees were at once declared sequestrated; and they were on the 30th of December, committed to the Tower. No one spoke a word in their favour. One member alone said that he did not believe them to be guilty of high treason; but that they were stark mad, and ought to be sent to Bedlam.

Although the parliament still pushed forward the great work of reform, yet a reaction had taken place in many persons' minds in favour of the king. They thought enough had been done; that his power had been sufficiently curtailed; and that it was better to heal all past disputes by gentleness and submission towards him. While this feeling was becoming diffused, Charles had the madness to commit an act which broke all ties between him and his parliament for ever—an act so important, and which led to such great results (no less than plunging the nation in a civil war), that it demands more than ordinary attention. Previously, we may observe, the king had endeavoured to come to terms with his opponents, and had offered the Chancellorship of the Exchequer to Pym, which he refused.

CHAPTER LXXIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1642.

N the 3rd of January, 1642, the king sent Herbert, the attorney-general, to the House of Peers, with a command to accuse Lord Kimbolton, a patriotic and amiable nobleman, and five of the most distinguished patriots of the House of Commons, of high treason! Those five members were—Mr. Denzil Holles, Sir Arthur Hazelrig, Mr. John Pym, Mr. John Hampden, and Mr. William Strode. The charges against them were—That they had traitorously endeavoured to subvert the laws and government of the kingdom, to deprive the king of his regal power, and to impose on his subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical authority: that they had endeavoured, by many foul aspersions on his majesty and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and make him odious to them: that they had attempted to draw his late army to disobedience of his royal commands, and to side with them in their traitorous designs: that they had invited and encouraged a foreign power to invade the kingdom: that they had aimed at overthrowing the rights and the very being of parliament: that, in order to complete their traitorous designs, they had endeavoured to compel the parliament to join with them, and for that purpose had raised tumults against the king and parliament: and that they had traitorously conspired to levy war against the king.

The peers were amazed; and although Lord Kimbolton was present, no one moved his arrest as a traitor. Their lordships appointed a committee to consider whether it was legal to accuse a member of their house in such a manner; and they sent a message informing the Commons of the affair. That house was already aware of it; for the serjeant-at-arms had, in the king's name, demanded that the five members should be delivered into his hands. The Commons, in reply, assured his majesty that his message should have their serious consideration; and, in the meantime, the accused members should be ready to answer any legal charge made against them. At this moment, news reached the house that the king's officers had searched the chambers of the five members, and were sealing up their doors, trunks, and papers. The Commons became indignant, almost furious, at this illegal and tyrannical act. They voted it a breach of privilege; the serjeant-at-arms was ordered to break the seals: and the Speaker issued a warrant to take Sir William Fleming and Sir William Killigrew—the officials who had made the search—into custody. Fleming was apprehended; Killigrew escaped.

The night was spent by the king in council; and it was decided that he should himself proceed to the house the next day, with his guards, to arrest the five members. Pym was apprised of this determination by the Countess of Carlisle, one of the ladies of the bedchamber; who, from the time of the execution of Strafford, had been unfaithful to her trust.—On the 4th of January, parliament met, and the five members attended in their places. They denied the charges brought against them; and Hampden said, that if to be resolute in the defence of parliament, the liberties of the subject, and the reformed religion, was to be a traitor, then he might be guilty of treason; but not otherwise. The house voted that the accusation was scandalous; and sent a message to the Lords, desiring that an inquiry should be set on foot to find out the authors and advisers of the charge—which was termed "a scandalous paper"—that they might be punished.—Whilst the house was sitting, word was brought that the king was approaching, followed, according to Clarendon, "by his guard of halberdiers, and fewer of them than used to go with him upon any ordinary motion." Other writers of the time state that, besides the guard, many soldiers attended who had assembled at Whitehall. Few or many, their arrival shortened the debate; and it was resolved that the five members should withdraw. "Away we went," says Hazelrig; "the king immediately came in, and was in the house before we got to the water." His majesty left his followers at the door; and as soon as he approached the table, the Speaker withdrew from his chair, in which the king seated himself; the members standing up uncovered. Charles, after looking in vain for the objects of his search, thus addressed the parliament, in an agitated and disappointed tone:—"Gentlemen, I am sorry for this occasion of coming unto you. Yesterday I sent a serjeant-at-arms, upon a very important occasion, to apprehend some that, at my commandment, were accused of high treason, whereunto I did expect obedience, and not a message; and I must declare unto you here, that albeit no king that ever was in England shall be more careful of your privileges to maintain them to the utmost of his power—than I shall be: yet you must know that, in cases of treason, no person hath a privilege; and therefore I am come to know if any of those persons that I have accused for no slight crime, but for treason, are here. I cannot expect that this house can be in the right way that I do heartily wish it; therefore, I am come to tell you that I must have them wheresoever I find them."

After again casting a glance round the house, Charles inquired of the Speaker, "Are any of those persons in the house? Do you see any of them? Where are they?" The Speaker bent his knee, and replied that he had neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in that place, but as the house was pleased to direct him. "Well," continued the king, "since I see all the birds are flown, I do expect from you that you do send them to me as soon as they return hither, otherwise I must take my own course to find them." With these words his majesty departed, the house being in the greatest confusion, and several members shouting, "Privilege! privilege!"

The citizens of London passed that night with arms in their hands; for the five members had taken refuge in the heart of the city; and a proclamation was issued charging them with treason. The next morning Charles went to the city, and entered Guildhall. On his way he saw stern, threatening faces, and was everywhere saluted with shouts of "Privilege of parliament! privilege of parliament!" One man even drew near to his coach, and called aloud, "To your tents, O Israel!"—the words used by the Hebrews when they abandoned their wicked and idolatrous king, Rehoboam. At Guildhall Charles demanded the five members of the common council, saying that he believed they were hid in the city, and he trusted that no good man would keep them from him. The citizens were very polite; and the king told Sheriff Garrett he would dine with him; which he did; but the accused members were not given up.

The House of Commons met on the 5th of January; appointed a committee to sit in the city; and adjourned for six days, not believing their members to be safe from the designs of the king. In the city, the committee was guarded by a body of merchants and tradesmen, who relieved each other twice a-day; and the common council met, and sent a petition to the king, alluding to the fears and distractions to which it was subject; and imploring him to give up his intention of arresting Lord Kimbolton and the five members, and not to proceed against them, except in accordance with the privileges of parliament. Charles returned an answer justifying his conduct, and declared that he only meant to proceed according to law. At the same time, he issued another proclamation, ordering the ports to be closed against the five members, and prohibiting all persons from harbouring them.

The committee of the House of Commons passed several strong resolutions, denouncing the proceedings against the accused members as a seditious act, and a high breach of the privileges of the house; and declaring that those privileges could only be fully vindicated by a discovery of the parties who had advised the king to invade them.—On the 10th of January—the last day that this body was to meet in the city—a deputation of the mercantile marine officers went to Grocers' Hall (where, after the first day, the committee met), and presented a memorial, signed by upwards of 1,000 men, offering their services for the next day when the two houses were to reassemble—"to defend them by water." The offer was accepted; as was another from the authorities of Southwark, to send their trained bands as a guard by land; and it was requested that those bands should assemble the next day, armed, in the Southwark and Lambeth fields. A guard of eight companies, with a piece of ordnance attached to each, was also ordered to be raised, and placed under the command of Captain Skippon, with full powers "to offend and defend," if necessary.

On the 11th of January, the parliament reassembled; and the five members—who had been, since the 4th, concealed in the city—embarked on board one of the city companies' barges, and were escorted up the Thames by a triumphal procession. The trained bands and the guard were all assembled, many of them wearing in their hats the "Remonstrance" adopted in the previous year; or the votes of the committee denouncing the king's proceedings. The populace also assembled in great numbers; and when they had cheered the members into their seats, they went to Whitehall, and made demonstrations against the king and queen. So alarmed was Charles, that, on the 13th of January, he and the queen went to Hampton Court; from whence, on the 16th, they removed to Windsor.—The Commons continued their sittings; and numerous petitions, from Essex, Surrey, Berks, Hertford, and other places, were presented in support of the privileges of parliament. One from London complained of the invasion of those privileges; also of the Irish rebellion, the danger of religion, and the decay of trade; and called for justice on the king's advisers. Another, signed by 4,000, some say 6,000, freeholders of Buckinghamshire—most of whom came to London, and went in a body to present it to the house—pledged the subscribers to die in defence of the members' privileges, and called for justice for their countryman, Hampden. One, almost as numerously signed, was presented in favour of Pym.—For several days the house was occupied in receiving these petitions, and in discussions upon a motion that they should send a message to his majesty, expressing their grief at his absence, their desire for his return, and requesting that he would consider them his best and surest friends. This was negatived on the 14th of January, as Denzil Holles objected to such a course till he and his friends were cleared, and the violation of the privileges of the house redressed.—On the 17th of January, the king sent a message to the Commons, offering to withdraw the proceedings against the members, and to freely pardon all their offences. As the members were considered to be innocent of any crime, the Commons would not accept of a pardon for them; and they demanded justice against the persons on whose information the king had acted. Charles then sent another message, desiring the Commons to digest into one body all the grievances of the kingdom, and he would redress them at once. To this message they paid no attention, as they knew from experience the king's promises to be worth nothing. They were informed that the king had sent Lord Digby abroad to collect troops; this turned out to be false; but it still further estranged the parliament from the king.

The rebellion in Ireland still continued. The English nation thirsted to avenge the massacre of their Protestant brethren in that country; but the Commons dared not trust the king with the command of an army which they believed he would employ to crush the parliament, instead of to subdue Ireland. They determined, therefore, to have the power of the sword in their own hands; and, for this purpose, brought in the Militia Bill. This measure gave them the power of appointing the lords-lieutenants of counties; which in reality placed at their disposal the entire military force of the kingdom. Charles was resolved to keep possession of this power, and he returned a positive refusal to the Militia Bill. The Earl of Pembroke then asked him if he would not consent that the parliament should have the disposal of the militia for a time, until the present troubles were settled? "No!" replied Charles, with an oath, "not for an hour: you have asked that of me that was never asked of any king, and with which I will not trust my wife and children."

On learning this, the parliament declared the kingdom to be in danger; took the matter into their own hands, and gave directions to the lieutenants and deputy-lieutenants of counties to get the militia ready, and set the country in a state of defence. Charles had moved from town to town; and, on the 19th of March, took up his residence in the city of York, where he bgan to set up a separate government, in opposition to that carried on by the parliament, and to collect taxes on his own authority only. A deputation from the parliament waited upon him at York, presented a justification of its proceedings, and accused him of being the cause of all the troubles that afflicted the kingdom by resisting the Militia Bill.

The nation was formed into two distinct parties;—the king's friends, who were called Royalists, or Cavaliers; and the Parliamentarians, or Roundheads—the latter name being given them from their wearing the hair short, and cropped close to the head; whilst the Cavaliers were distinguished by long, flowing hair, or perukes, falling upon the shoulders. In the spring of 1642, most men began to apprehend that the time was fast approaching when these two parties would come into open collision. The Commons, on their reassembling on the 1st of January, had displaced Sir John Byron, the lieutenant of the Tower, and appointed Sir John Conyers to that office—a direct interference with the royal prerogative; the appointment of officers to the Tower having always been in the hands of the sovereign. They also appointed Sir John Hotham governor of the town and castle of Hull, with its magazines of arms and ammunition for 16,000 men. Sir John had received orders not to deliver that town up, or receive any forces into it, without their authority. The king knew its importance, and was desirous of getting it into his own hands. He sent the Duke of York, the Prince Palatine, the Earl of Newport, and Lord Willoughby, to prepare the way. They arrived on the 22nd of April. The next day, the king rode up to the gates, attended by 300 horsemen, and demanded admission. Sir John Hotham replied, that if his majesty pleased to enter with twelve persons only, he should be welcome. Charles refused to enter without his whole guard; and after waiting outside the walls for five hours, he retired to Beverley, from whence he issued a proclamation, declaring Sir John a traitor. A day or two afterwards he sent a message to the parliament, demanding justice against Sir John Hotham; but that body justified the governor, and said that the act of proclaiming that gentleman a traitor without due process of law, was against the liberty of the subject and the law of the land.

At the same time the parliament sent the king word that its precaution in securing Hull was necessary; and that it was he and his followers, and not Sir John Hotham, that had offended the laws. To this message Charles sent a long answer, in which he said—"We would fain be answered what title any subject of our kingdom hath to his house or land that we have not to our town of Hull? Or what right hath he to his money, plate, or jewels, that we have not to our magazine and munition there? We very well know the great and unlimited power of parliament; but we know as well that it is only in that sense as we are a part of that parliament. Without us, and against our consent, the votes of either or both houses together must not, shall not, forbid anything that is enjoined by the law, or enjoin anything that is forbidden by the law."

This paper of the king's was intended as a sort of appeal to the people, and published and distributed accordingly. The parliament, therefore, wrote a reply, which was also printed and published. It was a lecture upon the duties as well as the rights of a king. In answer to what he had said about the town of Hull being his own property, they observed—"Here is that laid down for a principle which would, indeed, pull up the very foundation of the liberty, property, and interest of every subject in particular, and of all subjects in general. For his majesty's towns are no more his own than the kingdom is his own; and the kingdom is no more his own than his people are his own; and if the king had a property in all his towns, what would become of the subjects' property in their houses therein? And if he had a property in his kingdom, what would become of the subjects' property in their lands throughout the kingdom? or of their liberties, if his majesty had the same right in their persons that every subject hath in their lands or goods?" They added that the wrong ideas infused into princes that their kingdoms were their own, and that they might do as they pleased with them, as if their kingdoms were for them and not they for their kingdoms, was the root of all their invasions of their subjects' just rights and liberties; and that so far was such an idea from being a true one, that, in fact, their kingdoms, their towns, the people, the public treasure, and whatsoever was bought with it, were all only given to them in trust, according to the known laws of England. That the very jewels of the crown were not the king's property, but only confided to his keeping, for the use and ornament of his regal dignity. They urged that the trust so given for the public advantage ought to be managed by the advice of parliament, whose duty it was, by all means, to prevent its abuse. On that principle, they believed that, with regard to the town of Hull, they had discharged their own trust, and not invaded the rights of his majesty, much less his property, which, in this case, they could not do.

The king, not long after this affair, collected around him the peers who followed his royal standard, and declared to them that he expected no obedience except to commands warranted by the laws of the land. The peers replied by declaring their resolution to obey none except such as were warranted by that authority. This declaration was made by thirty-eight peers, several officials, and the Lord Chief Justice Banks, besides the Lord Keeper Littleton, who had joined the king at York. A few days later, on the 17th of June, the parliament sent the king certain conditions, upon which it was willing to come to an agreement. They were nineteen in number; and we agree with Hume, that they "amounted to a total abolition of monarchical authority." The Commons demanded that no man should remain in the council who was not agreeable to parliament; that no deed of the king's should have validity unless it passed the council, and was attested under its hand; that all the officers of state and principal judges should be chosen with consent of parliament, and enjoy their offices for life; that none of the royal family should marry without consent of parliament or council; that the law should be executed against Catholics; that the votes of popish lords should be excluded; that the reformation of the Liturgy and church government should have place, according to advice of parliament; that the ordinance, with regard to the militia, should be submitted to; that the justice of parliament should pass upon all delinquents; that a general pardon should be granted, with such exceptions as should be advised by parliament; that the forts and castles should be disposed of by consent of parliament: and that no peer should be made but with consent of both houses.

As might be expected, Charles refused to accede to these demands. Had he done so, he "might have been waited upon bareheaded," he replied, and been attended with all the pomp and ceremony of royalty; but he would have been merely "the outside, the picture, the sign of a king."

Preparations were now made on each side to decide the quarrel by the sword. Troops flocked in rapidly to the service of the parliament, and an army was raised; 4,000 men enlisting, in London alone, in a single day. Besides this, the Londoners lent large sums for the service, and contributed their plate to the cause. The women gave up all their plate and ornaments, and even their silver thimbles and bodkins, to assist the cause. Many of the patriots in the House of Commons gave large sums—Hampden, £1,000; Sir Henry Martin, £1,200; Oliver Cromwell, £500; and John Pym, £600—for the same purpose. But there were some members of the parliament, both Lords and Commons, who thought that the latter were going too far; and after all prospect of an accommodation appeared to have vanished, they refused to go any further with the Parliamentarians, and joined the king. Amongst them were the accomplished Lord Falkland, Sir Edward Hyde (afterwards Lord Clarendon, the able but somewhat partial historian), and Sir John Culpepper. To put a stop to this desertion, the Commons summoned nine lords—the first that had gone to the king at York—to return to their places in the House of Peers. They refused; were impeached of high treason; condemned, by their fellow-peers, never again to sit in the House of Lords, and to suffer imprisonment during their pleasure.

The English fleet declared for the popular cause; and the Commons having voted that an army should be raised for the defence of themselves and the country, the Earl of Essex was appointed the general of it. Many patriotic members of the House of Commons, who had been hitherto only noticed as orators, took out commissions as colonels. Amongst them was the gallant Hampden, who raised a regiment in Buckinghamshire, which soon became famous for its valour and good conduct. The king, in the meantime, issued what was called a commission of array. Both sides enlisted troops with as much activity as possible, and it was plain that this strange struggle must soon break out into open war.—At length Charles issued a proclamation, commanding all men capable of bearing arms to repair to him at Nottingham, on the 25th of August. On that memorable day he erected the royal standard on the castle hill at that town, by which it was understood that he declared war upon his parliament, and that the civil conflict had begun. Many superstitious men regarded it as an ominous thing that the standard was blown down by a tremendous wind that very night.

CHAPTER LXXIV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1642—1647.

THE army of royalists amounted to about 10,000; that of the parliament to about 15,000. In the service of Charles were the two sons of his sister Elizabeth, who married, during the reign of James I., the Palatine Frederic. These two princes (Rupert and Maurice) had arrived in England a short time previous to the outbreak, and Rupert soon obtained the reputation of being a brave and dashing soldier.

As Charles's army increased very slowly, and that of the parliament very rapidly, he thought it would be better to hasten on the encounter, which was inevitable. He therefore marched towards London, to save which he knew Essex would lead the parliament army forward. He was not deceived. Essex followed him rapidly; and on Sunday, the 23rd of October, 1642, the two armies met at Edgehill, in the county of Warwick. A pause of some hours ensued, and each army gazed with strange feelings upon the other; for many, many years had passed since Englishmen stood arrayed in arms against Englishmen; and there seemed an awful feeling of this nature, as if it were a contest between two brothers. At length the battle began in a broad plain at the foot of Edgehill, which bore the romantic name of the Vale of the Red Horse. In consequence of the fiery valour of Prince Rupert, the day was at first in favour of the Royalists; but the Parliamentarians recovered themselves; and at length, when night separated the combatants, 4,000 men lay dead in the Vale of the Red Horse. The next morning the Royalists retired; but both sides claimed the victory.

Charles went to Oxford, the only town in England which was still enthusiastically devoted to him. Prince Rupert, who soon became a terror to the adherents of the parliament, made several flying excursions from Oxford in the direction of the capital, and kept the Londoners in perpetual excitement and alarm. He even attacked the town of Brentford, but was driven back by a regiment of soldiers under Colonel Holles.

In the commencement of the next year (1643), the queen, who had retired for safety to Holland, returned to England; and on the 20th of March, Charles and the parliament began another treaty, to see if they could settle their differences. The parliament demanded that the king should disband his army and return to London; that he should pass a bill for abolishing bishops; that all papists should be disarmed; that he should give his consent to such other bills as were necessary for reformation; consent to the removal of malignant councillors; to settle the militia as the parliament desired; and withdraw his accusation against Lord Kimbolton and the five members; besides granting other concessions. After this treaty had been carried on for several weeks, it ended in nothing. In the meantime the queen had been sending arms and ammunition to her husband; and as she was considered one of his most pernicious advisers, a papist, and an enemy of the national liberty, she was impeached by the Commons of high treason. The Lords were not inclined to go so far or so fast as the other house; and the impeachment remained for some time with them.

The Earl of Essex was a slow and lukewarm general, and under his command the army of the parliament got the worst in several small encounters; and the hopes of the king's friends were greatly excited. Such was the state of things when the battle, or rather skirmish, of Chalgrove Field took place, on the 18th of June, in which the noble John Hampden perished. A Scotch colonel, of the name of Hurry, who served in the army of the parliament having received some offence, had gone over to the side of the king. He informed Prince Rupert that two regiments of the parliament army lay at the village of Wycombe, detached from the main body, and open to attack. This was enough for the fierce Rupert, and away he went with his horsemen: he did not reach Wycombe; but having dispersed a few soldiers whom he found on his way, he went to the village of Chinnor, set it on fire, killed about fifty parliament soldiers whom he found there, and then rode back, with many prisoners and some plunder, to Oxford.

Hampden was much annoyed; he sent a horseman with the intelligence to the Earl of Essex. Rupert and his Cavaliers, he said, could only return by Chiselhampton Bridge, and he advised that a force should be instantly sent in that direction for the purpose of cutting them off. In the meantime he started with a body of dragoons to impede the march of the enemy, until Essex should arrive. He overtook Rupert at Chalgrove Field, and there, amongst the ripening corn, the prince formed his troops for battle. A fierce encounter took place; but in the very first charge Hampden was wounded in the shoulder by two bullets, which broke the bone and entered his body. Dropping the reins in agony, his head dropped over his horse's neck, and he turned away, and rode slowly and feebly out of the battle.

Seeing their leader wounded, and that the idle Essex did not arrive with help, Hampden's troops lost heart, and beat a retreat, leaving many of their comrades dead upon the field: while the victorious Rupert and his troops spurred joyously on towards Oxford.

After leaving the field, the unfortunate patriot made an effort to go to the house of the father of his first wife (the love of his youth), that he might die there. But Rupert and his cavalry were in that direction; therefore he turned his horse's head towards Thame, where he arrived, almost fainting with the agony of his wounds, at the house of his friend Ezekiel Browne. The surgeons dressed his wounds, and at first gave him hopes of life; but he himself knew that the hand of death was upon him. Though suffering dreadful torture, he wrote letters to the parliament about public affairs, and urged that body to more earnest and decisive measures, if they would save the nation from ruin. After six days of suffering, he felt that his last hour had come. Having received the sacrament, he lay murmuring faint prayers to himself. "Lord Jesus!" he exclaimed, "receive my soul! O Lord save my country! O Lord, be merciful to ——!" Life departed as he was uttering this broken sentence; and a generous and devoted patriot of England was no more. He died on the 24th of June, 1643; and his death, as well it might be, was felt as a national calamity. His own regiment of gallant green-coats followed him to the grave, with their arms reversed, and drums and ensigns muffled; and as they marched to that sad burial, they sang the 90th Psalm, which speaks of the frailty of human life in comparison with the immutability of Him to whom a thousand years are as yesterday when it is passed, and as a watch in the night.

Other battles and skirmishes followed, with varying success; but rather in favour of the king than otherwise. The Earl of Newcastle defeated the army of the parliament at Atherton Moor; and Oliver Cromwell, now a rising soldier, defeated the Royalists near Grantham. Bristol was taken by the troops of the king on the 27th of July; and Charles, on the 10th of August, laid siege to Gloucester. After a brave resistance, Essex and his army marched up to its relief, and, on the 6th of September, the Royalists were compelled to abandon the siege.

As he was returning with his army from Gloucester to protect London, Essex was stopped by the king's army at Newbury. Charles had a superior force, and occupied an admirable situation. It was thought he could bleckade the parliament army until the soldiers would be glad to surrender to avoid starvation; but the reckless valour of the English gentlemen about the king engaged them in a battle, on the 20th of September, which lasted until darkness put an end to it. Neither side could claim a victory; but as the Royalists decamped during the night, and Essex was enabled to proceed unmolested to London, it was conceived that he had the best of the encounter. In this battle the amiable and accomplished Lord Falkland (Charles's Secretary of State) was killed. He was once a Parliamentarian, and the bosom friend of Hampden; but the extreme measures to which the Commons resorted induced him to join the royal cause. The horrors of the civil war afflicted him with a deep melancholy which never left him. He would frequently sigh forth the words, "Peace! peace!" and he declared, "that the very agony of the war, the view of the calamities and desolation the kingdom did and must endure, took his sleep from him, and would shortly break his heart."

The lingering and doubtful nature of the war in England, caused both Charles and the parliament to turn their attention for assistance to the neighbouring kingdoms. The king entered into a secret treaty with the Irish papists (who had at length been subdued by the parliament), to land troops in England for the destruction of the patriotic party, and his own restoration to the exercise of kingly authority. The Marquis of Ormond, a desperate royalist, whom Charles had appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1643, actually raised five regiments of Catholic Irish, under the pretence of fighting for the parliament, and then sent them over to England to fight for Charles instead.

They landed at Chester in November, 1643; but on the 25th of January, 1644, they were attacked and utterly defeated by Sir Thomas Fairfax.

The English parliament had previously applied to the Scots for assistance, which the latter were willing to grant if the parliament would take their Covenant. This they consented to do after it had undergone some little modification; and on the 17th of August, 1643, the famous SOLEMN LEAGUE AND COVENANT was entered into between both kingdoms. Those who signed it bound themselves mutually to defend each other against all enemies; to extirpate popery and prelacy, superstition, heresy, schism, and profaneness; to maintain the rights and privileges of parliament, together with the king's authority (for the Scottish leaders were disposed to uphold the monarchy), and to bring to justice all Malignants — a term applied to the king's friends. The English parliament having signed the Solemn League and Covenant, ordered all under its authority to do the same.

On the 8th of December, 1643, the brave and eloquent John Pym breathed his last. He died of a disorder brought on by his incessant activity in the cause of his country. It was supposed that his earnest zeal and exertions to restrain the illegal acts of the king in levying taxes without the consent of parliament, and his desire to reform the abuses of the state, induced Charles to attempt to seize the five members of the House of Commons, and drag them away by violence —an act which is regarded as the commencement of the Revolution. Though he had many chances of becoming rich at the nation's expense, Pym died poor. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, and his debts paid by the parliament.

In consequence of the treaty between the Scots and the parliament, a Scottish army of about 20,000 men, under the command of General Leslie, entered England on the 19th of January, 1644. They advanced to the south; and, on the 22nd of February, crossed the Tyne. Charles was then at Oxford, with an army of about 10,000 men. Having erected fortifications around that city, he called a parliament there, consisting of all the peers and members of the Commons who had left their places and gone over to him. It met on the 22nd of January, 1644, and consisted of forty-three peers and 118 commoners. As many peers sat in this mongrel parliament (as Charles somewhat ungratefully called it) as sat in the House of Lords at Westminster; but more than double the number of commoners met at the latter place. The king, in his opening speech, said— "My hope was, that either by success on my part, or repentance on theirs, God would have put an end to this great storm; but guilt and despair have made these men more wicked than ever I imagined they intended to be; for instead of removing these distractions, and restoring peace to this languishing country, they have invited a foreign enemy to invade this kingdom." This was one of Charles's reckless assertions: the Scots had ceased to be foreigners, and were then a people united with the English—both fellow-subjects under the same monarch; and Charles himself was a Scot—born and bred in that country.

The Oxford parliament, in the month of March, drew up a proposal for peace, and presented it to the English parliament in Westminster; but the latter refused to recognise the rival assembly, and met the friendly advance by a counter-proposition, to negotiate on the basis of the Solemn League and Covenant, the terms of which were quite inadmissible. The Oxford houses then voted supplies of money and men for the king; but these could only be collected in that small part of the country where he had power; and in the month of April Charles dismissed his parliament, which he found rather an incumbrance than a benefit.

About this time the queen left Oxford, and got safely to Exeter, where the Princess Henrietta Maria was born on the 16th of June. Soon after her confinement, the queen made her escape to the continent.

The parliamentary leaders thought an end could be put to the struggle by besieging Oxford. Two of its armies, therefore—one under the command of Essex, and the other under the command of another lukewarm soldier, General Waller—attacked the city at once, and might have taken Charles prisoner, had they not quarrelled and been so inattentive to their business, that he and his troops escaped, on the 2nd of June, by night between the besieging armies, and got, by rapid marches, to Worcester. The king was pursued by Waller; but he turned upon that general, and defeated him in a battle, or rather skirmish, at Copredy Bridge, near Banbury, fought on the 29th. After this he pushed forward to the west of England, where the people were, generally, enthusiastically loyal.

So many tedious skirmishes and unimportant actions occurred between the troops on both sides, that it is interesting to come to the record of a distinguished battle, which was followed by some result. The city of York, which held out for the king, was besieged by Lord Fairfax, the Earl of Manchester, and the Scotch General, Leslie. York was surrounded, and the Earl of Newcastle and Prince Rupert hastened to relieve it; the united armies under their command amounting to more than 20,000 men. A battle took place between them and a parliamentary army on Marston Moor, by the banks of the river Ouse, about five miles from York. It was fought on the 2nd of July—a month when the nights are like a prolonged twilight; and the battle lasted from seven in the evening until ten at night, and was fought with extreme fury. The victory was gained by the army of the parliament, and, to a great extent, through the desperate bravery of Oliver Cromwell and his regiment; which had the name of Ironsides bestowed upon it on the field of battle, as a mark of honour. About 100 standards were taken, which the soldiers proudly tore into ribbons, and bound around their arms, in token of victory. Prince Rupert fled from the field of battle, and Newcastle left the kingdom. By this battle all the north of England was lost to Charles.

While Cromwell was helping to win the battle of Marston Moor, the incapable Earl of Essex led the parliamentary troops into great disgrace in Cornwall. He was driven into a corner by King Charles in the narrow end of Cornwall, and reduced to such extremity, that although he got away, on the 1st of September, with many of his officers, on board a ship, and his cavalry cut their way through the living wall that surrounded them, and escaped, yet all the foot soldiers were, the next day, obliged to surrender. Charles permitted them to retire unhurt; but he took away their arms and clothes. Essex's ill fortune and want of skill in this affair was the cause of his fall as a general, and of Cromwell's rise; for when the latter became distinguished as a soldier, it was seen that he, and he alone, was the man who had sufficient genius and decision to end this weary war.

After his triumph in Cornwall, the king set out to return to Oxford; but he was met by the army of the parliament near Newbury, which place became a second time the scene of a savage war between Englishmen. A battle was fought there on the 27th of October. The soldiers of the parliament went to the charge singing psalms; for they were no mere hirelings, but—notwithstanding the extravagant zeal of some of them—devout men, who fought for their religion and their country. The battle continued all day, and when night fell, the Parliamentarians were on the way to victory. Darkness separated the combatants, and, during the night, the king and his troops retreated to Oxford. When Charles's flight was known, Cromwell earnestly desired to pursue him with the whole army, and, by taking him prisoner, put an end to the war. The Earl of Manchester would not permit this; and Cromwell was so angry in consequence, that he charged him before the parliament with being backward in the war, and against bringing it to a rapid and glorious close. The earl retorted by insinuating that it was Cromwell who was cowardly and averse to fighting, and not he—a charge which nobody could believe; and he also accused Cromwell of an ambitious design of attempting to control both the king and the parliament.

The truth was, that religious dissensions had long been at work among the leaders of the revolution; and the patriots now became openly divided into two religious parties, who were called the PRESBYTERIANS and the INDEPENDENTS. The Presbyterians rejected the authority of the bishops, and the Liturgy and ceremonies of the Episcopalian church. They loathed popery; they hated toleration almost as much; and proclaimed that no one could be saved who differed from them. The Independents rejected all religious establishments; declared that each congregation was a church in itself, and that the election of the members of it was sufficient to bestow the priestly office on any one of them. There was no necessity, they said, for any ceremony or laying on of hands to make a minister; it was sufficient if the would-be preacher felt himself called by the Spirit. The Independents were, however, seriously religious men, and carried their devotion to a degree of wild enthusiasm: they, indeed, resembled the Puritans; but were, if possible, more earnest in what they deemed the cause of God. But while they claimed a right to think, and preach, and pray for themselves, in any manner they thought fit, they were desirous of giving that privilege to every one else. Independent themselves, they held that toleration was the duty of every Christian, and the right of every citizen. For this, and some other reasons, the Presbyterians hated the Independents almost as much as they hated the papists. There was also a political difference between these two sects. The Presbyterians wished to confine the power of the crown to very narrow limits, and to reduce the king to the rank of the first magistrate of the country. The Independents, more ardent in the pursuit of liberty, thought a king inconsistent with the freedom of a great people, and wished to abolish monarchy altogether, and set up a republic in place of it. They regarded Jesus as the Christian's king, and they wanted no other. Of this party, Oliver Cromwell was the recognised leader.

The Independents, sick of the dilatory manner in which the Presbyterians had conducted the war, resolved to take matters into their own hands. For this purpose, they framed what was called the Self-denying Ordinance, by which the members of both houses of parliament were rendered incapable of holding any civil or military employment. After much debate, this ordinance was adopted by the Commons at the close of December, 1644; but it was not passed by the Lords till the 3rd of April, 1645. In consequence of its enactments, Essex, Manchester, Waller, and all the slow, lukewarm generals resigned their commands, and received the thanks of parliament. The army was then remodelled and increased in numbers, and Sir Thomas Fairfax—a gentleman eminent for his courage and military talents—appointed commander-in-chief.

Cromwell, also, ought to have resigned his rank in the army; but he cleverly contrived to avoid doing that. Fairfax declared he could not spare him; and he served under that commander as lieutenant-general. But Fairfax was in most things governed by the superior genius of Cromwell; and the principal officers of the parliamentary army were now Independents.

Before this, proceedings against Archbishop Laud had been resumed, and he had been brought to the scaffold. Since the execution of Strafford, he had remained a prisoner in the Tower; and there, perhaps, he might have remained and died a natural death; but having been desired by the House of Lords to nominate certain clergymen of their choice to some vacant livings, he received a command from the king not to do so, as the incumbencies belonged to the crown. The archbishop bowed to the order of his sovereign, and the Lords, in consequence, sent a message to the Commons, requesting them to place Laud on his trial This they did readily enough; and in May, 1643, he was again arraigned, the articles being prepared by Prynne, the barrister whom Laud had been instrumental in subjecting to such a severe punishment a few years previous. Laud defended himself with considerable skill; and the Commons, doubting whether any of the charges against him amounted to treason, gave up the trial, and condemned him as they had done the Earl of Strafford, by a bill of attainder; which, old and helpless as he was, they passed, with only one dissenting voice, on the 13th of November, 1644. The judges, however, decided, that the acts he was charged with were not treasonable; and the Lords (only fourteen being present) rejected the bill. In a conference on the 2nd of January, 1645, the Commons represented that a man might incur the guilt of high treason as much by offences against the nation, as by offences against the sovereign; that there were two kinds of treason—that which was against the king, and cognizable by the inferior courts, and that which was against the realm, and subject only to the judgment of parliament. The archbishop, they contended, was guilty of treason of the second class; and they pressed the matter so vigorously, that, in a house of ten or eleven peers, the bill was passed, either four or five voting against it. On the 10th of January, 1645, the archbishop was led to the scaffold on Tower Hill. He evinced a truly Christian spirit in his last moments; declaring that he forgave all the world, and desiring to be forgiven of all. The executioner struck off his head at one blow; and his face, which was so ruddy that some suspected he had painted it to avoid the imputation of fear, turned instantly of an ashy paleness. He perished in his seventy-second year; and very few, indeed, have been bold enough to say a word in defence of one of the most illegal and unjust acts on record.

Shortly after the execution of Laud, conferences were held at Uxbridge, between commissioners from the king and commissioners from the parliament, to see if even yet a peace could not be arranged, and the differences between the king and country amicably settled. This step was taken at the request of the Scots. The conference opened on the 30th of January, 1645; but after twenty days of debate and wrangling, no arrangement could be come to, and both sides again prepared to settle the dispute by the sword.

The effect of Cromwell's influence was soon seen. On the 14th of June, 1645, the famous battle of Naseby was fought, in which it may be said that Charles was utterly ruined. The two armies were about equal in numbers. Charles took the command of the main body of his own in person; his nephews, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, led the right wing; and Sir Marmaduke Langdale the left. The main body of the parliamentary army was led by Sir Thomas Fairfax; the right wing by Cromwell; and the left by his son-in-law, Colonel Ireton. The battle-cry of the Royalists was, "God and Queen Mary!" and that of the parliament, "God our strength!" The Royalists began the battle, and at first it seemed as if victory would light upon them. Prince Rupert, as usual, charged with his cavalry, and spread terror and death before him; but Cromwell's charges were just as destructive, and directed with far more judgment. The main body of the army under the king was broken and thrown into confusion by the steady assaults of Fairfax. Charles, in despair, threw himself among Rupert's horsemen, and cried aloud, "One charge more and we recover the day!" It was hopeless; his dismayed soldiers were exposed to showers of bullets, and to a furious shock both of horse and foot, which smote them like a whirlwind, and drove them into headlong flight.

Charles was carried away in the living torrent; and after fleeing from town to town, escaped to Wales; while Prince Rupert dashed off with his cavalry to Bristol, and put that town in a condition to resist his conquerors. Although the victory was decisive, the slain on the field of Naseby was far less than might have been expected; but about 5,000 of the Royalists were taken prisoners. Amongst the spoils were the king's private cabinet of papers and letters, the capture of which did him as much harm as the loss of the battle. The parliament published selections from them, to prove that the king had been guilty of treachery and equivocation, and had applied to the King of France, and other continental sovereigns, to assist him with troops to carry on the war. This did the king great injury; new troops were raised, fresh taxes levied, and there was a general outcry to prosecute the war. Only selections from the king's letters were printed; and Charles asserted that those kept back would have given a different tone and meaning to those that were published. The course the Commons ought to have taken was, to have printed the letters they were charged with suppressing; but they destroyed them; and many persons believe that the king was not fairly dealt with.

General Fairfax obtained some other successes after the battle of Naseby, and then advanced to the siege of Bristol. From the fearless character of Prince Rupert, a desperate resistance was expected. He had indeed written to Charles, to say that he could hold the place four months; but contrary to every one's expectations, he surrendered on the 11th of September, after a resistance of only a few days. The king was so indignant that he sent the prince an order to resign all his commissions and quit the country. Rupert remained for some time in defiance of his uncle, and insisted on justifying himself; but the following year he and his brother left England. The downward course of the king was now very rapid: after several other reverses he fled to Newark, and from thence escaped to Oxford, where he shut himself up during the winter season.

Charles's condition in Oxford was extremely melancholy. His troops had been everywhere defeated or dispersed; he had no longer the means of raising another army; and even the places that had been most devoted to his cause were worn out with his constant demands for assistance. He feared, too, that Fairfax and Cromwell would soon besiege him in Oxford; and once again he proposed a treaty with the parliament. It would only treat with him as a conqueror, and the affair ended in nothing. What was to be done? Cromwell and Fairfax would soon be before the walls of Oxford: the city must of necessity surrender; and Charles would have been led in triumph a captive to London.

In this desperate situation, he made up his mind to escape from Oxford, and throw himself upon the loyalty and generosity of the Scots. Fairfax and Cromwell were within a day's march of the city, and more than 2,000 of the parliament troops were already posted around it. No time was to be lost. In the night of the 26th of April, 1646, therefore, Charles disguised himself as a groom, and having cut off his beard, escaped through one of the gates of the city, attended only by his chaplain, Dr. Hudson, and Mr. Ashburnham, a groom of the chamber. For some time he wandered about in a state of irresolution, uncertain whether he should go to the Scots, or proceed to London and throw himself upon the mercy of his parliament; but on the 5th of May, 1646, he arrived at the Scottish camp before Newark, and trusted himself to the loyalty of that people. Fairfax discovered the king's escape from Oxford, and sent word to the parliament, which issued an order, that any person who harboured or concealed him without acquainting them, should be declared a traitor, and put to death. The Scots did inform the parliament that the king had come privately to their camp; but they refused to deliver him up; and to prevent his being taken by force, they removed nearer to the borders, and encamped at Newcastle.

Though the Scots treated Charles with respect, yet they took care that he should not escape; and he soon found himself a prisoner. He knew of the differences that existed between the Scottish army (which was composed of Presbyterians) and the army of the parliament (which was now made up of Independents); and he was in hopes that the Scots would quarrel with the English, and espouse his cause. To win the favour of the former, he paid great attention to their preachers, whom he detested in his heart. He soon found that they had but little more affection for him; and one of them having, in his sermon, openly reproached him with his evil government, desired this psalm to be sung—

"Why dost thou, tyrant, boast thyself, Thy wicked deeds to praise?"

The humbled monarch stood up, and called, instead, for the psalm beginning—

"Have mercy, Lord, on me, I pray!
For men would me devour."

The congregation, in pity to the fallen king, fulfilled his request.

In the meantime, the city of Oxford surrendered to Fairfax; a few other towns, held by the Royalists, followed its example: the authority of the parliament was universal over England; and the civil war was ended.

Now that the English parliament was safe and victorious, it no longer wanted the assistance of the Scottish army, which they wished to see back again in its own country. But the Scots claimed a large sum of money as payment for their services, and they were not disposed to return home without it. The parliament at length agreed to pay the Scottish army £400,000—half of it down at once; and the Scots were, in return for this payment, to give up the person of the king to the parliament. The episcopal church—that is, a church governed by bishops—had been abolished in England, and the money was raised by a sale of the bishops' lands. So large a sum in cash filled six-and-thirty carts, and took nine or ten days to count. The Scots received the money; and then, on the 30th of January, 1647, delivered up the king into the hands of the English parliament, and left the kingdom.

CHAPTER LXXV.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE FIRST.—A.D. 1647—1649.

KING CHARLES was sent by the parliament to Holmby House—a noble mansion in Northamptonshire, where he arrived on the 16th of February, 1647, and remained in an easy confinement. He passed his time in reading, walking, riding, and playing at chess or bowls. It was, however, but a melancholy time for him; though, if he could have forgotten that he was a powerless sovereign and a captive, and been allowed to share the society of the queen and his children, he might have been happy.

The dissensions between the Presbyterians and the Independents became greater every day. As the parliament was composed chiefly of Presbyterians, and the army almost entirely of Independents, the parliament wished to disband the army, or send the greater part of it into Ireland. It was therefore voted that it should be dismissed, except a few thousand horse, and that every officer should take the Covenant, and conform to the customs of the Presbyterian church. The soldiers felt themselves treated with ingratitude: they had won the victory, and were now to be cast aside. The command, also, that their officers should conform to a church they disliked, rendered them almost furious. They had fought for religious liberty; but this was a tyranny as bad as had been exercised by the abolished bishops. Besides, forty-three weeks' pay was due to them, and they resolved not to disband until they had received it. Indeed, the discontents in the army rose to a mutiny, and Cromwell and some other favourite officers were sent by the Commons to appease them. Cromwell's sympathy was with the army; and, under a pretence of appeasing it, he really encouraged the opposition it expressed towards the parliament. The latter then ordered the army to disband on a certain day; but the soldiers positively refused to do so without payment of the money due to them, and even called for the punishment of those who, they said, had plotted their destruction.

Matters stood thus when the Presbyterians resolved that the king should be brought up to London, and another treaty opened with him. The army was thoroughly tired of treaties, which invariably ended in nothing, and averse to trusting the king, who, it declared, was not to be believed upon his oath. The officers resolved to prevent the treaty by getting Charles into their own hands. It is suspected that what followed was designed and directed by Cromwell, though he himself protested that he knew nothing of it. On the 3rd of June, a cornet in the army, named Joyce, attended by a regiment of 500 horsemen, went to Holmby House, and demanded admission to the king. Having obtained it, he insisted that Charles must be prepared, the next morning, to go with him to the army. Before leaving Holmby, the king asked Joyce what commission he had to secure his person? That officer replied, that the army was informed that he was to be conveyed away by the parliament, and thus occasion another war, and that this was the reason of his conduct. "But where is your commission," repeated the king; "have you nothing in writing from your general, Sir Thomas Fairfax?"—"Here is my commission," replied Joyce—"here, behind me;" and pointing to his mounted soldiers, he continued—"and I hope that will satisfy your majesty." Charles smiled as he answered—"It is as fair a commission, and as well written, as I have ever seen; a company of handsome, proper gentlemen as I have seen a great while." After some further conversation he mounted his horse, and rode with them to Childerley, near Newmarket. He was rather pleased than otherwise at this unexpected incident; for he hoped that a possibility might arise of winning over the army to take up his cause. He was taken along with the army on its marches; and at Maidenhead he had an interview with his children who were in England. When the army went to London, he was lodged at Hampton Court.

The Presbyterian leaders in parliament were, at this period, plotting to send Cromwell to the Tower, because he was looked upon as the head of the Independent party. His danger was so great, that, on the 4th of June, he fled for protection to the camp, and was received by the soldiers with shouts of enthusiasm. Cromwell was, in fact, the real commander of the army, though Fairfax was called so.

A few days afterwards, the army marched towards London, and encamped at St. Alban's, in spite of the commands of the parliament to the contrary. From thence it demanded that the parliament should be purged of such members as had no longer a right to sit in it in consequence of their delinquency and corruption. Proceeding further, they even accused, on the 16th of June, eleven members of the Commons—the leaders of the Presbyterian party—of high treason, and demanded that they should be put in prison until the time of their trial. The parliament at first resisted; but soon found that to be useless: the power was in the hands of the army; the good-will of the people was also with the army; for they began to suspect the sincerity of the Presbyterians: and the eleven accused members fled and hid themselves, and afterwards left the country. The army then, at the desire of the parliament, moved to a greater distance from the metropolis.

This was soon followed by the fall of the Presbyterian party from power, and the rise of Cromwell and the Independents. A council of officers at this time prepared some "Proposals" for the general reform and settlement of the kingdom, upon what they deemed the principles of civil and religious liberty — proposals which professed to respect the freedom of every English citizen, and insisted on his perfect right to worship God in the way he thought most acceptable to the Supreme Being; but they excepted seven of Charles's most steady adherents from amnesty; reduced the church to the level of a sect; and excluded his friends from the next parliament. When these proposals were submitted to Charles, we can scarcely wonder that he rejected them.

Charles paid great court to Cromwell: offered to confer on him the title of Earl of Essex, to make him a Knight of the Garter, and give him the command of the army. At the same time he offered to Colonel Ireton the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland. Cromwell was even suspected of having a partiality for the king too great to be consistent with the welfare of the army. While Charles was making these promises to Cromwell and Ireton, a private letter of his to the queen fell into their hands. Wishing to test his sincerity, they opened it. It contained those words: "Be quite easy as to the concessions I may grant: when the time comes I shall know very well how to treat these rogues; and instead of a silken garter, I will fit them with a hempen halter." Cromwell from this concluded, and not unreasonably, that Charles was deceiving him; and that his intention, if he should be restored to power through his means, was not to raise him to the rank of the peerage, but to send him to the scaffold as a felon. From that moment Cromwell's gentler feelings were closed for ever against the king, whose Machiavelian policy cannot be justified, though he had duplicity to contend with.

A part of the army—known as the Levellers, because they wished for a republic and an equality of all men —called for the government to be new-modelled, and for the punishment of the king as an enemy to the country. They styled him an Ahab, a man of blood, and demanded justice upon him as the cause of the murder of thousands of free-born Englishmen. Terrified by their menaces, and dreading secret assassination, Charles resolved to fly from Hampton Court. He even received anonymous letters, warning him to escape. It is supposed they were written by Cromwell, who, convinced that all ties were severed between Charles and England, wished him to avoid, by a flight to other lands, the fate which he foresaw would overtake him if he remained in this.

Attended by Ashburnham, Sir John Berkeley, and one servant, the king left Hampton Court on the 11th of November. He made his way to the Isle of Wight, and threw himself on the protection of Hammond, the governor. It is said that he wished to reach a vessel which had been sent by the queen, and was then cruising off the coast; but that, being unable to do so, he surrendered to Hammond. That officer was a patriot, an Independent, and a friend of Cromwell's. He treated Charles with respect; but detained him, and sent a message to the parliament. In reply, he was commanded to guard the king with vigilance.

From Carisbrook Castle, where he was detained, Charles despatched a letter to the parliament, desiring a personal treaty with them. In reply, they sent him four propositions, which he was to sign before they would consent to a personal interview. These were— 1st. That his majesty should concur in a bill for settling the militia. 2nd. That he should call in all declarations, oaths, and proclamations against the parliament, and those who had adhered to it. 3rd. That all the lords who were made after the great seal was carried away should be rendered incapable of sitting in the House of Peers. 4th. That power should be given to the two houses of parliament to adjourn as they should think fit.

These propositions were not unreasonable; but Charles, who had opened a secret treaty with the Scots, was imprudent enough to refuse to sign them. It was this secret treating with different parties, and the hope which each held out to the king, of granting better terms than the other, that led to the hesitating, and frequently contradictory proceedings of Charles. By the terms of the treaty now proposed, Charles was required to promise to renounce the episcopal church, and accept the Covenant; and the Scots, in return, engaged to restore him to his throne by force of arms. Fearing the consequences of refusing the propositions, he contemplated an escape from Carisbrook Castle; but he soon found himself a strict prisoner. One dark night he attempted to squeeze himself between the iron bars of his window; but he stuck fast between them, and after much painful struggling, was glad to get back again.

On the 3rd of January, 1648, the Commons met to consider the king's refusal of their four propositions. A violent debate took place, and Charles was fiercely condemned. Some said he was only fit for Bedlam. Colonel Ireton declared that he had refused safety and protection to his people; that their obedience to him was but a reciprocal duty for his protection of them; and that as he had failed on his part, they were freed from their allegiance, and must settle the affairs of the nation without any further reference to him. Oliver Cromwell followed, and said it was time to do what the nation expected of them; that they were able and resolved to govern the kingdom by their own power, and teach the people they had nothing to hope from a man whose heart God hardened in obstinacy. In the end, both Lords and Commons resolved that no further applications should be made to the king, or any message received from him, without the consent of both houses, under the penalties of high treason. This meant that, for the future—as, in fact, they had already done for some time—they intended to govern without consulting him; and Charles was, in reality, dethroned.

Although the parliament and army had proceeded to such a length against the king, the English people showed they were still attached to royalty. Insurrections, in favour of Charles, broke out in London, in Kent, and in several other places, in the spring of 1648, and were not put down without difficulty. Then the Scots, with whom Charles had been keeping up a secret correspondence, raised an army, and invaded England, crossing the borders on the 8th of July. They were speedily met by the undaunted Cromwell, utterly defeated in the following month, and driven back to their own country. The Scottish church, and a large part of the people, had been opposed to this mad invasion, and thanks were given to Cromwell by the preachers of that country for having subdued so ill-judged and malicious an act. After that, Prince Charles, the king's eldest son, made his appearance in the Downs with a fleet, consisting of some English ships that had deserted to him, and others that he had obtained abroad. It was supposed that he would rescue his father from Carisbrook Castle; but he made no attempt to do so, though the king sent a message begging him to set him at liberty. Prince Charles challenged the parliament fleet to battle; but this challenge the Earl of Warwick, who commanded it, declined until he received reinforcements which made his force equal to that of the enemy. Then the prince declined to fight; sailed away to the Dutch coast without firing a gun; and left his father to his fate.

The Presbyterian party was yet strong in parliament, and so obstinately bent against the Independents, that they would rather the country should have been ruined than that the latter should save it. Although it had been voted that no more negotiations should be entered into with the king, whose fondness for tyranny and deception were considered irreclaimable, yet they contrived to have it voted that fifteen commissioners should wait upon him at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, and again see if matters could not be amicably arranged. The commissioners arrived at Newport on the 15th of September, and the negotiations were opened on the 18th of that month, and did not close till the 28th of November. No new demand was made from Charles; but he was inflexible on the point of episcopacy: he would not give up the English form of church service, and the commissioners would do nothing unless he adopted the Presbyterian mode of worship. Some time wore away, and, as usual, the matter ended in nothing.

The army was greatly offended at this negotiation; and a council of officers presented a remonstrance to the Commons, complaining of the danger of negotiations with so insincere a man as the king, and declaring that he ought to be brought to trial, on account of the evil he had done; that all future kings should be elected from the people; that the present parliament should be dissolved, and a new one elected; and that the right of voting for members should be greatly extended. The Presbyterian parliament, after a violent debate, refused to take any notice of this remonstrance, and resolved to carry on the treaty for restoring the king: but the army was too strong to be trifled with; its leaders sent a troop of horse to seize Charles at Carisbrook, and convey him to Hurst Castle—a dreary, solitary place, from which escape was almost an impossibility. The king was seized with a terror that he was taken to this castle to be secretly murdered; but the soldiers had no such criminal intention. They meant to punish him in the sight of the whole country.

Having seized the king, Fairfax and Cromwell resolved to deal with the parliament. Leading the army to London, on the 2nd of December, they stationed it in Whitehall, St. James's, and in other places near the parliament-house. Still the Presbyterians in parliament did not lose heart, and, after a violent debate, they, on the 3rd, 4th, and 5th of December, resolved, by 129 votes to 83, that the king's concessions were satisfactory, and a sufficient foundation for a treaty for his restoration. The Independent members declared that Charles was no more to be trusted than a caged lion when it is set at liberty; and that the house was throwing away the fruit it had fought and striven for so long. But the Presbyterian members had the largest number, and, right or wrong, were resolved to have their own way.

They were not to enjoy their triumph long. In the forenoon of the 6th of December, Colonel Pride surrounded the houses of parliament with two regiments of soldiers. Then he took his station in the lobby, with a list of the Presbyterian members in his hand, and as each of them made his appearance to enter the house, he caused him to be seized and carried away as a prisoner. This act of violence was called "Pride's purge," on account of the daring part he took in it. More than 200 members were thus excluded, and all that remained was about fifty Independents. The Long Parliament was now, in reality, at an end, and what was left of it was called by the odd name of the Rump.

The Long Parliament, which had sat since November, 1640, had, in the first years of its existence, conferred immense benefits on the people; but latterly its strange and doubtful conduct was endangering the safety and liberties of the whole nation. The Independents, however, made short work of the matter, and hurried to a close the inevitable end of all these troubles. They first drew up a scheme of government by which kings were to be for ever abolished, and a republic established in England. Then they sent for Charles from Hurst Castle, and brought him to Windsor, where he was securely kept. After this they appointed a committee to draw up a charge against him, that he might be placed upon his trial, as the cause of all the distractions which had for so long troubled the country.

This committee presented their report on the 23rd of December, and the Commons passed a vote, declaring it treason in a king to levy war against his parliament. They also appointed a High Court of Justice to try him for this offence. The House of Lords had dwindled down to a very contemptible number. There were more than usual (sixteen) present when the ordinance for the trial of the king was presented. They unanimously rejected it, and then adjourned; thinking that by this means the trial could not be proceeded with.

They were strangely mistaken. Though the Commons now were so small a number, they were men certainly of a gigantic spirit and boldness; but they were as disregardful of law and equity, and as tyrannical in their conduct, as ever Charles was. Upon learning what the Lords had done, they passed the following resolution, certainly not in accordance with the constitution or law of the country:—"That the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, do declare that THE PEOPLE ARE, UNDER GOD, THE ORIGIN OF ALL JUST POWER: and do also declare that the Commons of England, in parliament assembled, being chosen as representing the people, have the supreme power in this nation: and do also declare, that whatsoever is enacted or declared for law by the Commons in parliament assembled, hath the force of a law; and all the people of this nation are concluded thereby, although the consent and concurrence of king or House of Peers be not had thereunto."

The High Court of Justice, which had been constituted for the purpose of trying the king, was made up of 135 commissioners, and contained the members of the House of Commons, the generals of the army, thirty-four colonels, a few nobles, many knights and baronets, a few aldermen, and many country gentlemen. Serjeant Bradshaw was chosen president; Mr. Steel, Mr. Coke, Mr. Dorislaus, and Mr. Aske were appointed counsel to manage the charges against the prisoner.

The court sat in Westminster Hall, and on the 20th of January, 1649, the trial began. Bands of soldiers were placed in and around the hall, and as many of the people admitted as the vast building could accommodate. When the king was brought in, he glanced sternly round upon his judges and the spectators, and then sat down with his hat on. The commissioners considered this as a contempt of their authority, and they kept their hats on also.

After certain legal forms, Mr. Coke rose to open the charge. Charles tapped him several times on the shoulder with his cane, and cried "Hold! hold!" As he did so, the gold ornament upon the top of the cane (a crown) fell to the ground. This little incident was considered as ominous of his fate; and Charles himself afterwards admitted that he was struck by it. Coke then proceeded with his charge, and represented, that Charles Stuart, being admitted King of England, and entrusted with a limited power, yet, nevertheless, from a wicked design to erect an unlimited and tyrannical government, had traitorously and maliciously levied war against the present parliament, and the people whom it represented; and was therefore impeached as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public enemy to the commonwealth.

When the charge was finished, Bradshaw told the king that the court expected his answer. Charles replied, with great dignity, that he was their lawful sovereign, and demanded to know by what authority he was brought there? The president answered that he was there by the authority of the people of England. Charles continued—"I see no House of Lords here that may constitute a parliament; and the king, too, must be in and part of a parliament." Bradshaw rejoined—"If it does not satisfy you, we are satisfied with our authority, which we have from God and the people. The court expects you to answer; their purpose is to adjourn to Monday next."

Every day, for three days, was Charles brought before the court, and on each he refused to recognise its authority, and plead either guilty or not guilty. On the fourth day, it was resolved that judgment should go by default; that and the fifth day of the trial were occupied in hearing witnesses; the sixth in determining what should be the sentence; and on the seventh, and last, Charles was once more brought to the bar.

On that day (the 27th of January), Bradshaw, the lord president, who had before worn a suit of black, appeared habited in scarlet. As the king entered, a loud shout arose from the soldiers, of "Justice; justice! Execution! execution!" One of them, however, was touched with pity, and as the king passed, exclaimed, "God bless you, Sir!" His officer, looking upon this as an act of mutiny, struck the man with his cane. "Methinks," observed Charles, as he passed on, "the punishment exceeds the offence."

When the king observed the stern aspect of his judges, and the awful solemnity that prevailed through that vast and crowded hall, he was struck with a sense of terror, and earnestly desired to be heard. Until then he had believed his trial was a mockery, and that his subjects dared not, in defiance of law, and by a court of the class which had been so vehemently denounced, proceed to pass sentence of death upon him. Now that belief faded away, and he was roused to the horror of the reality. He then implored to be heard by the Lords and Commons in the Painted Chamber: and it is thought that he intended to propose to abdicate the throne in favour of his son. But Bradshaw refused this request; and after a long speech to the fallen monarch, on the enormity of his past tyrannies, directed the clerk of the court to read the sentence, which was that he, "Charles Stuart, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and public enemy to the good people of the nation, shall be put to death by severing his head from his body."

The startled king raised his eyes in wonder, as he said, "Will you hear me a word, Sir?" The president informed him that he could not be heard after sentence, and directed the guards to remove their prisoner. "I may speak after the sentence by your favour, Sir," cried Charles, in a voice of great agitation; "I may speak after the sentence, ever. By your favour——." He was interrupted by the president; and turning away in despair, was led from the hall, amidst shouts for justice and execution.

The day appointed for Charles's death was the third from that of his condemnation. He desired the company of the good Bishop Juxon, and to see those of his children who yet remained in England. These requests were readily granted by the parliament; and the Princess Elizabeth, then in her thirteenth year, and the Duke of Gloucester, in his ninth, came to take a last farewell of their father. Charles loved his children dearly, and the interview was a very sad one. After a brief and painful conversation, he kissed them, prayed for the blessing of God upon them, and parted from them in tears. But though he wept on being separated for ever from his children, he shed no tears for himself. The brief remainder of his life was spent in tranquil dignity.

At ten o'clock in the morning of the 30th of January, the officer appointed to conduct Charles to the scaffold tapped gently at his chamber door. He was led from St. James's through the park to Whitehall, accompanied by some of his own gentlemen, and a guard of halberdiers. He walked erect and very fast, as if he wished the terrible ordeal through which he had to pass to be quickly over. The scaffold, covered with black velvet, was erected in the streets before Whitehall, and he entered the palace, and remained there for a short time in prayer with Bishop Juxon. He was then led through the Banqueting Hall, and from thence to the scaffold. Addressing those around him, he protested his innocence, and said, in allusion to the Earl of Strafford, that an unjust sentence he once suffered to take effect was punished by an unjust sentence upon himself. Then, turning to the officer who had charge of him, he said, "Take care they do not put me to pain." Having arranged his hair so that it might not trouble the executioner, he said to Bishop Juxon, "I have a good cause and a gracious God on my side."—"You have," replied the bishop, "but one stage more; it will soon carry you a very great way: it will carry you from earth to heaven."—"I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be," responded the monarch. Then, uttering the one word "Remember," he knelt down, and placing his neck across the block, his head was struck off at a single blow. The other executioner raised it, and, holding it out in the sight of the people, shouted aloud, "This is the head of a traitor!" The vast crowd was silent: much as they had desired that popular justice should be executed upon the king, they were seized with feelings of astonishment and pity when they beheld the ashy features of his grey and severed head convulsed with the passing spasms of a sudden and violent death.

Charles perished in the thirty-ninth year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign. He left six children—three sons and three daughters: their names were Charles, James, and Henry; Mary, Elizabeth, and Henrietta Maria. Before the king's execution, the Commons ordered a new great seal to be engraved, to be called the Great Seal of the Commonwealth of England. On it was a representation of the assembled parliament, round which were engraved the words—"ON THE FIRST YEAR OF FREEDOM, BY GOD'S BLESSING RESTORED, 1648." They also declared it high treason to proclaim, or any way acknowledge the king's eldest son, Charles Stuart, as the sovereign of England.

No man's character has been more misrepresented than that of Charles I. He is described as the odious tyrant, the most unfaithful friend, and the member of society, that ever lived; and, in truth, he merits none of these imputations. The contests with his parliament did not arise from a tyrannical disposition; for where he had the power he was neither cruel nor oppressive. He certainly believed, like his father, in the divine right of kings—a pretence incompatible with the liberty of the subject; but, if Charles could have acted in pursuance of that right, there is every reason to believe that he would have been a merciful and just sovereign. His quarrels with his parliament arose out of the question of money. He deemed, from what had been the case with respect to his predecessors, that he had a right to certain revenues for life, as they had been repeatedly granted to them without question. If the parliament had made the same grant to him, his conduct would have been very different. In his contest with the Parliamentarians, his acts were certainly, in many respects, far from praiseworthy. He wanted sincerity, the greatest blemish in his character: he made his concessions unwillingly, and did not always observe them when made. But there is an excuse, though no justification, for his conduct. He was dealing with men whose ultimate aim he had too much reason to believe was, not to reform, but to abolish, the monarchy; and there was more than one party amongst the English, apart from the Scotch, who were urging upon him different measures, and seeking to bring him to support their views; and he had a natural desire to see from which party he could obtain terms most beneficial to himself. This does not justify insincerity; and, however straightforward and true Charles might have been, we do not believe he would have fared better with the men with whom he had to contend; but his memory would have been much more endeared to posterity.

With respect to the general character of Charles's government, we agree so completely with an eminent modern historian—Mr. C. D. Yonge—that we shall give our own ideas in his words:—"He certainly desired the possession of arbitrary power; but, in practice, his was the most humane government that, at the time, had ever been witnessed in Europe. Men were no longer put to death for their religious opinions. The use of torture—a favourite resource of Elizabeth, whom the Puritans professed to hold in especial reverence—was abolished as illegal; even the taxes imposed by his own authority, though illegal, as being so imposed, were moderate in amount; and though the Star-Chamber inflicted what would now be looked upon as atrocious punishments for slight offences, those punishments were not then considered unusually severe; at all events, they were less cruel than those of the two last reigns. Scandalous as was the practice in accordance with which Prynne and others lost their ears, even such mutilations were less cruel than those inflicted on Stubbs, by Queen Elizabeth, for an offence even slighter than that of Prynne and his fellow-martyrs. And the charge that he had levied war upon the parliament was false: not only did Hotham, with the sanction" [indeed, by the express command] "of that assembly, close the gates of Hull against the king long before he raised his standard at Nottingham, but the two houses, by their own ordinance, called out the militia of the different counties many weeks before he began to levy any forces whatever for his separate use."

As a husband, father, friend, Charles evinced many good qualities. He faithfully observed his conjugal vows; was affectionate and kind. And whilst he was indulgent and loving to his children, he was strict in the enforcement of a sound moral conduct. To his court he restored that character of dignity and refinement which it bore under Elizabeth. To his friends he was faithful; he stood by all who stood by him, except in one instance—that of Strafford; and he never forgave himself for having consented to the death of the noble earl. He was constrained in his manners—a defect probably arising from an impediment he had in his speech, almost amounting to stammering; but "he was humane, affectionate, and religious." Though some persons charged him with being at heart a papist, and he no doubt attended the Presbyterian places of worship when in Scotland, still he was a sincere member of the church of England. His refusal to lower the position of that church, and to abandon his friends, were the chief causes of his failure in the negotiations with the Scotch; and he and Laud were alike falsely accused of a desire to re-establish the church of Rome in this country.

Charles was well educated; he understood the French, Spanish, and Italian languages; and was not deficient in the knowledge of either art or science. Personally, his appearance was graceful and dignified; he excelled in horsemanship and other exercises; and was capable of enduring great fatigue.—Such was Charles I.; of whom Mrs. Hutchinson, the daughter of Cromwell, and the wife of the parliamentary Colonel Hutchinson, spoke in terms of high praise; and Henderson, the Presbyterian, who had much personal intercourse with him, says he had a "sweet disposition;" and that, "if his advice had been followed, all the blood that was shed, and all the rapine that was committed, would have been prevented."

CHAPTER LXXVI.

ENGLAND A REPUBLIC.—A.D. 1649—1653.

SHORTLY after the execution of Charles, the Commons voted that the office of a king should be abolished in England, because it was "unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and public interest of the nation." They also decreed that the statue of Charles, at the Royal Exchange, should be taken down, and the following words inscribed on the place where it stood:—"Exit Tyrannus, Regum Ultimus;" that is, "The tyrant is gone; the last of the kings." The Lords had fallen into so much contempt, and shown such a disposition to lean to the side of the king, that their house also was abolished; and the Commons—that is, the representatives of the people — were regarded as the only source of authority and government. They then published a declaration, in several languages, of the reasons which had induced them to change England into a free state. Of the twelve judges, six declined to act under the new government; but the rest continued in office, and were assured that the fundamental laws of the country should not be abolished. To carry on the business of the nation, on the 13th of February, a council, called the "Executive Council of State," was appointed. It was composed of the men who had been most active in the late events. On the 10th of March, Serjeant Bradshaw, one of the late king's judges, was elected president; and John Milton, the celebrated poet, was appointed secretary. Bishops, and the church of which Laud had been the head, had been abolished before; and something like the Presbyterian mode of worship was used; but the intolerant ministers of that church were not permitted to have any temporal power. The army, consisting of about 50,000 men, remained, nominally, under the command of Fairfax, but was, in reality, under that of Cromwell. The command of the fleet was given to the heroic Admiral Blake.

Most revolutions are attended by a great loss of life; but in this remarkable one, but little blood was spilt. Three noblemen—the Duke of Hamilton, and the Lords Holland and Capel—were beheaded in Palace Yard, for having made war upon the parliament; but the vengeance of the people was then satisfied, and the red hand of the law was stayed.

The Scots had strongly objected to the execution of the king, and, on the 5th of February, they proclaimed his eldest son as Charles II. That prince was also proclaimed as king in Ireland by the Marquis of Ormond. Ireland, indeed, was in a state of insurrection; and the massacre of the Protestants was still unpunished. The parliament, therefore, appointed Cromwell lord-lieutenant of Ireland; and sent him and his son-in-law, Colonel Ireton, to that country, with an army of 9,000 men. These soldiers were most of them the brave Ironsides, who had fought and conquered at the battles of Naseby and Marston Moor; and, amongst the half-armed and savage Irish, they were like eagles among sparrows.

Cromwell and his army did not land in Ireland till the 15th of August, 1649; and, to use the language of a remarkable writer, he "descended on Ireland like the hammer of Thor; smote it, as at one fell stroke, into dust and ruin, never to reunite against him more;" and, it might be added, never more to know content. When Cromwell landed, all the principal towns of Ireland, except Dublin and Derry, were in the hands of the papists, and over them floated the royal banner of King Charles II. The papist army retired to Drogheda; that town was taken by storm on the 2nd of September, and a great number of its defenders put to the sword. Cromwell's orders were, to spare no one that was in arms against him; and this cruel mandate was partly obeyed. He regarded himself, says the writer just quoted, as "the soldier of God the Just; an armed soldier, terrible as death, relentless as doom; doing God's judgments on the enemies of God."

Wexford was next taken by storm, on the 10th of October; and the papist and royalist soldiers were massacred as at Drogheda. Terrified by this example, other towns yielded at once; but when the Irish resisted they were slaughtered without mercy: the Ironsides had no pity for papists, whom they would have completely extirpated by fire and sword, had it been in their power. After remaining ten months in Ireland, Cromwell had subdued it all, except a few towns which he left to Colonel Ireton to proceed with, and then returned to England. He was received with enthusiastic joy: crowds of people went forth to welcome the great soldier of liberty; and he also received the thanks of the parliament.

The Scots, not contented with proclaiming Prince Charles as their king, endeavoured to force the English to receive him also. The parliament answered, that it did not wish to impose any form of government upon the Scottish nation that was in any way disagreeable, and would leave them to choose what government they liked best, if they would suffer the English people to do the same. But the Scots were determined to maintain the rights of their king. They invited Charles from Holland to their country, where he did not land till the 23rd of June, 1650. They had negotiated with him at Breda; and compelled him to sign their Covenant before he landed (which he did greatly against the advice of his English friends), and to promise that he would be entirely guided by the parliament and the Presbyterian clergy: they then raised an army for the invasion of England. Charles promised anything they asked, and that so readily, that the Scots suspected him of insincerity. They were quite right. Charles looked upon his promises as disagreeable necessities, which he had no intention of observing when he got strong enough to set those who exacted them at defiance.

When the Scots were prepared, they denounced the English Commons as traitors and regicides. Upon this, the army of the parliament was got ready, and the command offered to Sir Thomas Fairfax. That officer had for some time been growing cold in the cause, and he declined, his wife's persuasions seconding his own inclinations to do so. His refusal was the most fortunate thing that could have happened for the parliament; for the command was then offered to Cromwell, who at once accepted it. Thus the greatest soldier in the land —perhaps the only man who had the requisite genius and decision to command in such an unsettled time— was appointed captain-general-in-chief of all the military power of the commonwealth of England.

It was during the July of 1650 that Cromwell and his army entered Scotland; for it was resolved that the English should not wait to be invaded, but strike the first blow themselves. The Scots had a fine army, commanded by the brave old General Leslie, and they were very confident of victory. Still they avoided a battle for some time, trusting that want of provisions, and the illness which was the result of it, would drive the English back to their own country. These calculations were justly made; Cromwell soon found himself in a very trying position, and, after retiring to Dunbar, even thought of returning to England. The Scots followed him, and encamped on the heights which overlook the town. In that position they were almost unassailable, and they began to hope for the entire destruction of their foes. But the mad enthusiasm of the Scottish preachers ruined their cause. They assured their general he must conquer; that a divine revelation had informed them so; and they induced him, in spite of his better judgment, to descend into the plain, and attack the English in their retreat. When Cromwell beheld that false movement, he exclaimed joyfully, "The Lord hath delivered them into my hands!" and immediately gave orders for the attack.

The battle began; the cry of the English being, "The Lord of Hosts!" that of the Scots, "The Covenant!" The Scots were more than double the number of the English; but, after a short, though fierce encounter, they were utterly defeated, and fled from the field; 4,000 of them being slain, and 10,000 taken prisoners. Cromwell, in the full flush of his triumph, ordered his soldiers to sing the 107th Psalm on the field of slaughter. This famous battle of Dunbar, which took place on the 31st of August, 1650, humbled the pride of Scotland, and saved the republican government of England. Edinburgh, Glasgow, and the south of Scotland submitted; and the young king found himself in an unpleasant position. The austere Presbyterian ministers kept him under great restraint, and offered him not a few indignities. He resided at Argyll, Edinburgh being in the hands of the English; and, on the 6th of October, he left that city, and attempted to get to the Highlands. He was pursued by Colonel Montgomery and a troop of horse; overtaken the next day, and persuaded to return.

As soon as the season permitted, the Scotch army was recruited; the Duke of Hamilton and Leslie had the command, and Charles was permitted to join the camp. Cromwell sent an army to Scotland, which got in the rear of that of the king; and Charles resolved to invade England. He reached Carlisle on the 6th of August, 1651; and was there proclaimed King of Great Britain and Ireland.

Cromwell and the English parliament were taken by surprise, and Charles, at the head of 16,000 men, got as far as Worcester without opposition. But the active Cromwell was soon ready, and marched to Worcester with an army far superior in numbers and discipline to that which followed the prince. There, on the 3rd of September (the anniversary of the victory of Dunbar), the Royalists were utterly defeated. This conquest was so important and decisive, that Cromwell, in a spirit of grateful joy, called it his "crowning mercy." Charles fled in terror, fearing that, if he were taken prisoner, he, like his father, would perish on the scaffold. Having ridden for twenty-six miles, in company with fifty or sixty of his friends, to secure his safety, he separated himself from them, and, by the direction of the Earl of Derby, went to Boscobel, on the borders of Staffordshire, where he trusted the secret of his rank to one Penderell, a farmer, who supplied him with the dress of a rustic, and he went out with him into a neighbouring wood to cut faggots.

He lived on the homeliest food, lay upon a bed of straw at night, and, to avoid suspicion, resumed his labour of cutting wood during the day. This must have been a time of great agitation to him; for the parliamentary soldiers were upon his track, and he was in great danger of being taken. One day he even heard the voices of some soldiers in pursuit of him, and climbed up amid the clustering branches of a noble oak for concealment. In this trying position he remained for four-and-twenty hours, during which time he saw several soldiers pass beneath, and heard them express an earnest wish that they might find him. This tree was, in after-times, known as the Royal Oak. After a concealment of one-and-forty days, and having undergone many wild adventures, he escaped out of the country, and landed in safety at Fescamp, in Normandy, on the 17th of October. He did not come back during the life of Cromwell.

That wonderful Puritan soldier was now the most important man in England. London poured forth her thousands to welcome him with joyous shouts: the parliament, the Lord Mayor, and the citizens all received him with gratitude and honour. An estate of £4,000 a-year was voted to him; and the noble palace at Hampton Court, so lately the residence of the king, was prepared for his reception. All this was enough to elate the strongest mind; and from that time Cromwell listened to the promptings of ambition. His title of Protector of England was not yet bestowed upon him, though he held the power attached to that office directly after the battle of Worcester. Still it was not only Protector of England that he desired to be; sometimes a feverish dream led him to hope that he might become its KING!

After all that has been said and written against Cromwell, against the Independents, and against a republican form of government, it must be admitted that England then attained to a great height of glory and power. The genius of the people was awakened; their exertions roused to action; and the English name honoured and dreaded by surrounding nations, in the same manner as that of the great Roman people was during the time of their republic. The English of the commonwealth may, indeed, be called the better Romans of a better time. The military talent of the nation has never, either before or since, shone with greater lustre. Ireland was utterly subdued by the warlike genius of Ireton; Scotland by General Monk. Both nations were united and incorporated with the English republic; and the banner of the commonwealth floated proudly and victoriously both by sea and land.

Holland was a republic as well as England, and the Dutch were a haughty and powerful people. The head of their government they called a stadtholder, and he was allied by marriage to the royal family of the Stuarts. In consequence of this, the Dutch had been trying to avenge the death of King Charles, and to restore his son to the now abolished throne of England. Several other causes of jealousy and quarrel existed between the two nations: the English parliament permitted privateers to seize the merchant ships of the Dutch; and in the month of May, 1652, a famous Dutch admiral, named Van Tromp, sailed up the English Channel with a fleet of forty vessels. He was met in the Downs by an equally famous English sea-captain, the bold Admiral Blake, who, however, had but twenty ships. War had not been openly declared; but an engagement took place between the rival fleets, in which the Dutch got the worst of it, and were glad to sail off after they had lost two of their ships.

The Dutch declared the English were the aggressors, and pretended they wished the matter to be settled in a friendly way; but they went on preparing for another fight. The English parliament answered by a formal declaration of war; and Blake and his fleet swept the seas, and captured every Dutch vessel they could meet. Van Tromp put to sea with a hundred ships, and said that he would destroy the English fleet if he could meet it; but he was overtaken by a storm, and obliged to sail home again. Then the famous Admiral De Ruyter put to sea with fifty ships of war, and an engagement took place between him and the English fleet near Plymouth, on the 16th of August. Both sides fought very gallantly; but neither gained a victory, and again the Dutch sailed home much injured by the encounter. Then De Ruyter was joined by another famous sea-captain, named De Witt, and a third indecisive battle took place between the English and the Dutch.

Several other trifling encounters occurred, without any great result either way. But on the 29th of November, 1652, there was a great sea-fight between Blake and Van Tromp, in which the latter gained the victory. The English had but thirty-seven ships, while the Dutch had eighty; but still Van Tromp was so proud of his triumph, that he contemptuously fastened a broom to the mast-head of his ship, by which he meant to proclaim his intention of sweeping the English navy from the seas.

But that was no easy matter; the shattered English fleet was soon repaired, and again abroad on the wide waters. This time Blake had eighty fine vessels, all men-of-war; and on the 18th of February, 1653, a desperate engagement took place between him and the Dutch. The fight lasted for three days, and then Van Tromp was thoroughly beaten in his turn, and glad to take to flight. He had lost eleven ships of war and thirty merchantmen, besides an immense number of his men. The humbled Dutch made some proposals for peace, which were not graciously received. After some months the fighting began again; but, in the meantime, Cromwell dissolved the remains of the Long Parliament.

This parliament consisted of a small number of men; for very few of the vacancies caused in it by Colonel Pride's purge had been filled up. This keeping of all the power in the hands of a few was considered unjust by the nation; for, by that means, many good and able men were utterly excluded from a chance of serving their country. The parliament also had a jealousy of Cromwell and the army; and the army bore a dislike to the parliament, because it refused to dissolve itself, and also because many of the officers thought they were not rewarded according to their deserts. About this time Cromwell complained to Whitelock (the keeper of the great seal) of the pride, ambition, and self-seeking of many members of the parliament. "Really," said he, "their engrossing all places of honour and profit to themselves and their friends; their daily breaking forth into new and violent parties and factions; their delays of business, and design to perpetuate themselves, and to continue the power in their own hands; their meddling in private matters between party and party, contrary to the institution of parliament; their injustice and partiality in these matters, and the scandalous lives of some of the chief of them, do give too much ground for people to open their mouths against them, and to dislike them. Nor can they be kept within the bounds of justice, or law, or reason; and unless there be some authority and power, so full and so high as to restrain and keep things in better order, it will be impossible to prevent our ruin." Whitelock admitted that many things required reformation, and that the parliament was to blame in clinging so resolutely to power; but he added, that he hoped his excellency would not look upon it as generally depraved. Cromwell answered, there was but little to hope and much to fear from them. Then he added—"We all forget God, and God will forget us. God will give us up to confusion; and these men will help it on, if they be suffered to proceed in their ways. Some course must be thought of to curb and restrain them, or we shall all be ruined."

That Cromwell was a sincerely religious man, according to his views, can scarcely be doubted; but his dislike to the parliament arose from a desire to get all the power into his own hands. Whatever were the faults of the parliament, its members had proved themselves bold and able statesmen. They knew that to dissolve the parliament might lead to danger and confusion; for, as they were the source of all authority, it would be, in reality, to dissolve the government, or to throw it into the hands of Cromwell and the army. A new parliament could have been called, certainly; but the government of the country was far in advance of the people, and a fair and open election would have thrown the power into the hands of the Presbyterians, who hated the Independents, would have destroyed the republic, and recalled the fugitive Charles, whom many considered their lawful king.

But Cromwell was bent on the dissolution of the parliament; and he held several meetings of officers lawyers, and others, as to how the government should be carried on when parliament was brought to an end. At one of these meetings, on the 20th of April, 1653, Colonel Ingoldsby arrived in haste from the parliament-house, and informed Cromwell and the assembled officers that the parliament was then passing a bill to prolong its own duration. Cromwell exclaimed, in great excitement—"It is not honest; yea, it is contrary to common honesty." Then he hastened down to the house, attended by a few officers and a company of musketeers.

Some of the soldiers he placed at the door, some in the lobby, and some on the stairs; then, entering the house, he sat for some time in silence, listening to the debate. But when the Speaker was about to put the motion to the vote, Cromwell whispered to his friend, Lieutenant Harrison, "Now is the time; I must do it."—"Sir," replied Harrison, "the work is very great and dangerous; I desire you seriously to consider before you engage in it."—"You say well," rejoined Cromwell, and he paused for a minute. Then, taking off his hat, he began a speech to them in a very excited tone. After a short time he declared that they were deniers of justice, oppressors, openly selfish and profane men, plotting at that very moment to bring in the Presbyterians—men who would lose no time in utterly destroying the great cause they had deserted. Several members rose to expostulate with Cromwell, on account of his violent language and conduct; for he had left his seat, and was walking excitedly up and down, reproaching the members by name. "I'll put an end to your prating," shouted Cromwell, as he interrupted their remonstrance; "you are no longer a parliament; I'll put an end to your sitting. Get you gone. Give way to honester men. The Lord hath done with you: he hath chosen other instruments for carrying on his work." Then, stamping his foot upon the ground, as a signal to the soldiers who were waiting without, they burst into the hall, and surrounded their general. Pointing to the Speaker, he roared out, "Take him down!" and, going to the table where the mace lay, he continued, "Take away that bauble!" In spite of the protestations of the members, the soldiers forced them to retire; and as they passed by Cromwell, he called them drunkards, and other foul names. Sir Harry Vane said to him, "Sir, this is not honest; yea, it is against morality and common honesty."—"Sir Harry Vane! Sir Harry Vane! the Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" shouted Cromwell, in reply to that wise statesman. When by this furious conduct—this act of tyranny far exceeding anything of which King Charles had been guilty—he had cleared the parliament-house, and all the members were gone, he locked the doors, put the keys in his pocket, and returned to Whitehall. On the same day he dissolved the council of state in a similar manner, though without so much violence.

This tyrannical act of Cromwell left the whole power of the nation in his hands. Sensible that his conduct required some apology, he published a declaration justifying it. Then, as he knew the nation would not be satisfied without a parliament, he issued, on the 6th of June, summonses to 139 persons—128 from the counties, cities, and towns in England; five from Scotland; and six from Ireland; upon whom, by his sole act and deed, he devolved the whole power of the state. A great part of these nominees were gentlemen of fortune and education; but many others were of a lower rank of life, and only recommended by their religious enthusiasm and their influence over the common people. One of the most active of these fanatics was a leather-seller, of the name of Barebones; and from him the assembly, first called, "The Little Parliament," obtained the name of "Barebones' Parliament," which is the epithet generally applied to it by writers of history.

Cromwell opened this parliament on the 4th of July, in a long, devout, but very confused speech; for he was at all times but a poor orator. The members spent all the next day in preaching and praying; or, to use their language, in seeking the Lord. When, however, they did proceed to business, they went on with it at a railway-pace. They wished to effect a thorough reformation of religion, and to pave the way for the second coming of Christ upon the earth. For this purpose, they abolished tithes, which they called a relict of Judaism; and even thought of doing away with clergymen altogether; because, they said, every Christian man should be his own minister. They also voted the abolition of the Court of Chancery; decreed that marriages might be solemnised before justices of the peace; and even thought of doing away with all lawyers, whom they considered very unnecessary persons in a godly land. Cromwell was displeased with their activity, and feared they would run into some dangerous extreme. He wanted a parliament which would act quietly under his direction, and not take much authority into its own hand; and he contrived, by an artifice, to induce them to dissolve after they had only sat for about five months.

CHAPTER LXXVII.

THE PROTECTORATE OF OLIVER CROMWELL.—A.D. 1653—1658.

THE Little Parliament was dissolved on the 12th of December, 1653, and then Cromwell, or the lord-general, as he was called, summoned a council of officers and others, to decide how the country should be governed. It was soon resolved, on the proposal of Lambert, one of his creatures, that the republic should be altered. Lambert drew up a deed, called an Instrument of Government, which provided, that while England should still professedly be a republic, the nation should be ruled by a chief magistrate, who was to keep office as long as he lived, with the title of LORD PROTECTOR of England, Scotland, and Ireland. He was to be regarded as the fountain of honour and magisterial authority; to have the right of making peace or war; and of pardoning all criminals, except those condemned for murder or treason. His power was, however, to be restrained by a council of one-and-twenty godly persons, whose consent was necessary to every great public measure. He was also to call a parliament every three years, and allow it to sit for five months before he prorogued or dissolved it.

Of course the dignity of Lord Protector was offered to Cromwell. He readily accepted it, and, on the 16th of December, he proceeded to the High Court of Chancery, and was solemnly installed in his new position. He was attended by the lords commissioners of the great seal of England, the barons of the exchequer, the judges in their robes, the council of state, the Lord Mayor and aldermen in their scarlet gowns, and many officers of the army. Having signed the new deed of government, and sworn to observe it, Cromwell took his seat in the chair of state, and received from the lords commissioners the great seal, and from the Lord Mayor his sword and cap of maintenance. These were surrendered as tokens of submission to his authority, and the Protector then returned them. Upon this the court rose, and the procession returned, amid the exultations of the people, to Whitehall, where a splendid banquet had been prepared.

The next day, Cromwell was proclaimed as Lord Protector by sound of trumpet.

In the summer preceding this event, two other sea-fights had taken place between the English and the Dutch. Van Tromp, having refitted his fleet, once again put to sea with 108 vessels. He was met, on the 2nd of June, by an English fleet, under Generals Monk and Dean. The battle lasted for two days; but on the second, Admiral Blake came up and decided the victory in favour of the English. None of the English ships were burnt or sunk; but the Dutch lost seventeen of theirs. The English fleet then lay off the coast of Holland, capturing all the vessels that could be found. and quite destroying the commerce of that country.

This was not to be endured by so spirited a people as the Dutch; and Van Tromp was soon at sea with fresh ships, and ready to fight again. The rival fleets met on the 31st of July, and a furious battle took place. It was Van Tromp's last fight; for, while cheering on his men, he was killed by a musket-ball which entered his left breast. After that, the Dutch had no heart to fight; and, in the end, they were so thoroughly beaten, that their defeat finished the war. The English only lost two ships, and the Dutch thirty; which was a terrible lesson for interfering in affairs that did not concern them. They then desired peace; Cromwell granted it upon very reasonable conditions; and on the 6th of April, 1654, a defensive alliance was entered into by the two republics, by which each agreed to banish the enemies of the other.

Cromwell exercised his new authority with so much wisdom and dignity, that the great nations of Europe thought it best to recognise his government, forget all about the late king, and to send ambassadors to England, offering friendship and alliance. Charles had been living in Paris; but the court of France even undertook to dismiss him and his family from that country—so dreaded was the power of England during the time of Cromwell and the republic. The Protector was resolved to deal out equal justice to all without distinction of rank, and he gave a remarkable instance of his impartiality in this respect. Don Pantaleon Sa, brother to the Portuguese ambassador, had been insulted by an Englishman named Gerrard. To avenge himself he collected a number of his countrymen, and set upon the Englishman with the intention of murdering him. Gerrard beat off his assailants and escaped; but a riot ensued, and one Englishman was killed, and another seriously wounded. Don Pantaleon then fled to the house of his brother, where he thought he would be secure from the power of justice; for, by the law of nations, the residence of an ambassador was regarded as a sacred asylum.

But the Protector thought nothing above the law or sacred from justice, and he caused Don Pantaleon to be arrested, tried for murder, and executed as a felon on the 10th of July, 1654. The Portuguese were highly incensed; but they feared the power of England, and not only smothered their anger, but signed a treaty highly in favour of this country. The same day as Pantaleon was executed, two Royalists, named Gerard and Vowell, were beheaded, on a charge of conspiring against the life of Cromwell. He appointed a high court of justice to try them, by which they were condemned without an appeal to a jury.

On the 3rd of September, the Protector opened a new parliament he had summoned. It consisted of 400 members who represented England, thirty who represented Scotland, and thirty more who represented Ireland. The elections were unbiassed, and he hoped that he should receive from the new parliament that support he believed he deserved. But the republican party was highly displeased with Cromwell: he had violently dissolved the late parliament; had made himself a sort of sovereign; and many of his sturdy old friends, who had prayed and fought with him against the tyranny of King Charles, now regarded him as little better than a tyrant, and even wished him in his grave. They had loved their brave general; but they loved their country more; and they believed that only under a republican government would England become truly glorious. They detested the name of king, and of everything that resembled it: they wanted no ruler but Jesus, and they continually prayed that His government might overspread the earth.

On these accounts there was a strong feeling of opposition to Cromwell in the new parliament, which contained many of the most illustrious leaders of the revolution; and the very first thing it did, was strictly to examine the late deed of government by which Cromwell was made Lord Protector. The leader of the republicans in the house was that stern Serjeant Bradshaw, who had passed sentence of death on the late king; and he, and others who followed him, could not endure, after tyranny had been put down in one person, that there should be a chance of its being set up in another. Eight days were passed in discussing the lawfulness of the deed by which Cromwell was created Protector, and many severe remarks were made upon his character and conduct.

At the end of that time he summoned the parliament to his presence, and told the members that they must consider the provision in the Instrument of Government, that made him Protector and them a parliament, as a fundamental principle not to be questioned or altered. He said he had not sought his present dignity; that he had been called to it; and added—"If my calling be from God, and my testimony from the people, God and the people shall take it from me, else I will not part with it." In conclusion, he desired them to sign a paper promising "to be true and faithful to the Protector and the commonwealth." Three hundred members signed it, though many of them did so with great reluctance, and the rest absented themselves from the house. But the parliament could not overcome its dislike to the Protector; it granted him no supplies, nor sent up a single bill for his approval, or did anything in recognition of his authority. This might have been expected from zealous republicans, who feared that Cromwell wished to place a crown upon his head; but they went further, and infringed on religious liberty, by voting that they would not tolerate any persons who did not profess the leading doctrines of Christianity. Thus papists, quakers, deists, and many others, were excluded from toleration.

Cromwell was extremely hurt at this conduct towards himself, and this feeling of intolerance against others; and directly the five months were expired, before which he was not to dissolve the parliament, he summoned the members before him for that purpose. In doing so he made a long speech, upbraiding them with their inactivity and spirit of opposition. "You might," said he, "have settled peace and quietness among all professing godliness; you might have healed the breaches of these nations, and rendered them secure, happy, and well satisfied. You have done none of these. But instead of that you have been disputing about the things already settled by the constitution. You have thus consumed all your time, and have done nothing." He then reminded them of the intolerance displayed to those who differed from them in opinion about religion, and desired to know if it were ingenuous to ask liberty, and not to give it. In conclusion, he said—"I think it my duty to tell you, that it is not for the profit of these nations, nor for common and public good, for you to continue here any longer; and therefore I declare unto you that I do dissolve this parliament."

Many of the discontented republicans had joined with the discontented Royalists in a conspiracy against Cromwell; and a few days after the dissolution of parliament it broke out. It seems strange that parties of such opposite principles could join together for any purpose. But each of them was acting a double part. If the Royalists were successful, they intended to bring in Prince Charles, and put down the republicans; while the republicans intended, as soon as they were strong enough, to be treacherous to the Royalists. The insurrection broke out in many places at once, in the month of March, 1655; but it was a failure, and the active iron-handed Protector crushed it with singular ease and rapidity. Such of the leaders as were taken prisoners were executed as traitors to the nation, and the rest transported, as slaves, to Barbadoes. To prevent any fresh attempt of this kind, Cromwell resolved to adopt a military form of government, and to terrify those who were discontented into submission. Therefore he divided England and Wales into eleven districts, over each of which he placed an officer, with authority to exact payment of the heavy fines and forfeitures imposed on the Royalists, to put down riots, and secure submission to his government. This they did so effectually, that, in a little while, his authority was supreme throughout the country.

Under the rule of Cromwell the renown of England was rapidly rising among the great nations of Europe. France and Spain, at war with each other, both earnestly courted his friendship; and he demanded from the latter country that no Englishman should be subject to the Inquisition, and that English vessels should be allowed to trade to the West Indies and to South America; both which places Spain regarded as colonies of her own, and considered that no one else had any business to interfere with. Though very anxious to gain the good-will of the English, the Spanish court hesitated at these demands, which it considered enormous. Besides this, Spain was hated by Cromwell, as the most bitterly popish country in Europe—the great upholder of that Roman Babylon, as he himself called it; and he fitted out two fleets and armies to strike a terror into its people, and to achieve some glorious conquest over it.

One of these fleets was commanded by two officers—Admirals Penn and Venables—men who were Royalists in their hearts; and under their direction it made an unsuccessful attack upon the island of Hispaniola. It somewhat retrieved its reputation by the valuable conquest of Jamaica, which was surrendered to the English on the 10th of May, 1655; but on its return to England, Cromwell, who was furious at his disappointment, sent both the commanders as prisoners to the Tower. The failure was as much owing to the conduct of the troops, who were the refuse of the army, and to their defective equipment, as well as the scarcity and bad quality of the provisions, which produced discontent, as to the want of skill or the misconduct of the admirals, whose bravery was not doubted.

The other fleet was placed under the command of the gallant Admiral Blake, and met with a very different success. Blake put to sea before October, 1654, sailed into the Mediterranean, and struck terror into the heart of the pope, who feared that the great Protestant soldier had sent his floating castles to thunder against the papal power of Rome. Blake first cast anchor before Leghorn, and compelled the Grand Duke of Tuscany to make reparation for having formerly permitted Prince Rupert to sell, in his port, some English vessels he had captured. The grand duke, in terror, engaged to pay the sum required of him, and Blake and his fleet sailed proudly away to Algiers. There they compelled the dey to make peace, and to command his piratical subjects not to attack English vessels. From Algiers they sailed to Tunis, and made the same demands. But the dey of that republic told Blake to look at his strong castles of Porto-Farina and Goletta, and do his worst. Blake took him at his word; his vessels opened a terrific fire upon the castles, and battered them into heaps of ruins. Then he burnt every ship that lay in the harbour of the piratical dey. Thus the fame of English valour was not only spread through Europe, but resounded even on the arid shores of Africa.

After the attempt upon Hispaniola, and the conquest of Jamaica by the English, the Spaniards hastened to a declaration of war. The Spanish ambassador left England on the 24th of October, 1655. The same day a treaty was signed with France; and peace with that country, and war with Spain, were proclaimed on one day—the 28th of November. The Spaniards were very active at sea, and seized all the English vessels they could find. Blake soon retaliated, and made, during 1656, many rich prizes. In the following year, on the 20th of April, having attacked a Spanish treasure-fleet of ships in the bay of Santa Cruz, he set them on fire, after a desperate fight of four hours, and they were destroyed, treasure and all. He was prevented from securing them as prizes, in consequence of the fierce firing from the castle and forts of the harbour. This was Blake's last great action. He was suffering severely from dropsy and the sea-scurvy; and having made the flag of England everywhere triumphant upon the ocean, he returned home to die in the land he loved so dearly and had fought for so bravely. He breathed his last on the 7th of August, 1657, as he came within sight of its white shores. He was a zealous republican, and so just, noble, and generous a man, that he enjoyed the esteem of all parties. He was buried in a magnificent manner in Westminster Abbey, with public honours; and his death caused the sorrow of a whole nation.

Cromwell's influence abroad was exerted to put down tyranny, and to support the cause of religious freedom. In the valleys of Piedmont there dwelt a Protestant people called the Waldenses. The Duke of Savoy was the sovereign of Piedmont, and, at the instigation of the pope, he had resolved on the extirpation of those inoffensive people, unless they became papists. They refused to abjure their religion, and an army of 15,000 men was sent to visit them with the remorseless vengeance of a Christian prelate and a Christian sovereign, who believed that, in this way, they were carrying out the dictates of a merciful Saviour! The horrors committed are too awful for description; and can be but alluded to. Old people were burnt to death in their houses; men cut to pieces; and women stripped naked and impaled alive. Some were thrown over rocks and precipices; many blown to pieces with gunpowder; and 150 women were beheaded, and their heads used by their murderers (who were rather demons than men), to play at bowls with!

When Cromwell received news of these horrors, he burst into tears. The insular position of the persecutors protected them from the thunders of his cannon; but he was that very day to have signed a treaty of alliance with France. This he refused to do until the French king and his minister, Cardinal Mazarin, had bound themselves to assist him in doing justice to the survivors among the wretched Waldenses, who, at this awful time, looked for succour first to God, and then to England. The expostulation of Cardinal Mazarin, aided by a wholesome fear of England, was successful; the persecution of the Waldenses ceased, and religious liberty was restored to them. Cromwell then declared that he would take the first opportunity of punishing the pope for his part in this terrible massacre, and that he would not permit Protestants to be insulted in any part of the world.

Cromwell resolved once again to appeal to the good sense and good feeling of the nation; and, during the September of 1656, he called his third parliament. But this assembly was not, at first, very compliant, and the Protector, therefore, expelled about 100 of the members who refused to acknowledge his government, or were otherwise objectionable to him. This act—much more tyrannical than all those of Charles in the aggregate—was vehemently protested against by the expelled members; but they obtained no redress, either from the house or the council.—The parliament, thus cleared of all Cromwell's enemies and opponents, voted him a liberal supply of money, and then renounced all allegiance to Charles Stuart, or any of his family.—About this time a republican officer, named Syndercombe, undertook to murder the Protector. His intent was, however, discovered: he was arrested, tried, and condemned to death as a traitor; and he avoided a public execution by suicide.

This incident aroused the affection which many bore to Cromwell, and some of his friends proposed that parliament should bestow the crown upon him. Sir Christopher Pack, an alderman of London, on the 23rd of February, 1657, moved in parliament, that the best way of settling the peace of the nation would be to solicit the Protector to take upon him the title of KING! The republican members rose in a tumult; but, in spite of their opposition, the motion was at length carried by large majority. Accordingly, on the 4th of April, 1657, a paper, called the Humble Petition and Advice of Parliament, was presented to Cromwell, in which he was desired "to magnify himself with the title of king."

Cromwell would willingly have complied with the desire of the parliament, and become a crowned sovereign: but such was the opposition of his nearest friends—such the hatred which the army bore to the very name of king—that, after struggling with himself, he felt it prudent to decline the offered dignity. If he had consented, it was feared that the army would have revolted against him; and it is even said that several persons had entered into an engagement to murder him within a few hours of his acceptance of the royal dignity.

After Cromwell had refused the crown, the parliament thought proper to instal him again as Lord Protector, that he might enjoy that title by consent of the representatives of the people, and not by that of a council of officers only, by whom he had at first been chosen to fill that office. It also enlarged his authority on some points; gave him the power of naming his successor; awarded him £1,000,000 for the pay of the fleet and army, and £300,000 a year for the civil government —much larger sums than had ever been voted to any of the sovereigns. His second inauguration as Protector was performed with great pomp at Westminster Hall, on the 25th of June, 1657; indeed, it was very like a coronation.

Cromwell's private life resembled that of a wise and good king, who regarded himself as the father of his people. His favourite residence was Hampton Court; and generally a sober dignity prevailed there, which was in harmony with the Protector's religious character. None of the usual gaieties of courts—pageants, masks, or balls—were to be seen there; but it was not a dull or cheerless place. Cromwell loved mirth, and occasionally indulged in familiar drolleries, which appeared much at variance with his usual demeanour. Sometimes, while at dinner, and surrounded by guests, he gave orders for the drum to beat, and his foot-guards to be called in, who were allowed to scramble for everything upon the table. It is said that one day, while at dinner among his generals and courtiers, he took a fancy to open a bottle of some valuable wine himself. In doing so, the cork-screw fell from his hand, and his guests all went down on their knees to find it. At this sight the Protector burst into a hearty laugh, and exclaimed—"Should any fool put in his head at the door, he would fancy, from your posture, that you were seeking the Lord; and you are only seeking a cork-screw." Perhaps he might have intended this remark as a hint to them that kneeling was a posture which men should only assume before their Maker.

Cromwell's court was also enlivened by the presence of all the men of literature and genius he could find. He took great pleasure in the society of the poets Milton, Waller, and Dryden, and delighted to converse with all men of lofty minds and rare accomplishments. He was also extremely fond of music, and employed those who were most distinguished in that pleasing art. Many scholars, who were struggling with difficulties, were pensioned by him; and though management and economy appeared in his court, he was ever generous to the deserving.

Cromwell was not altogether happy in his family. His favourite daughter, Lady Claypole, was slowly dying; her decline was hastened by the execution of Dr. Huet, a conspirator, for whom she had a great regard; and she smote her father's heart by her complaints and reproaches. This lady had adopted Royalist opinions, and condemned his grand career as one of criminal ambition. Another of Cromwell's daughters, married to Colonel Fleetwood, was a violent republican, and was irritated against her father for assuming the Protectorate. This ungracious, if not ungrateful conduct was a source of great grief to him; for he loved his children dearly.

The parliament again met on the 20th of January, 1658, and contributed greatly to embitter the latter part of the life of the Protector. This arose chiefly from the fact that the 100 Presbyterian and Royalist members, who had been formerly expelled as enemies to Cromwell, were permitted to take their seats. It was also thought proper to restore the House of Lords, and sixty peers and gentlemen assembled to constitute that chamber. They were not all noblemen; amongst them were Cromwell's two sons, Richard and Henry; and even Colonel Pride, who, by his activity and talents, had risen from the ranks of a drayman; and Colonel Hewson, who had been a shoemaker. Most of the old nobility were too proud to sit on terms of equality with these men.

The Commons looked upon the new House of Lords with great contempt, and declared that the peers had always acted in so mean and spiritless a way, that they had no right ever again to have any power in the government of the country. Not content with this, they spoke against the Protector, and talked of abolishing his office. Cromwell's old friends—the Independents—could not forgive him for altering the government from a pure republic; and as for the Presbyterians, they hated him so much, that most of them were even desirous of recalling Prince Charles, and making him king in preference. The violence of the parliament was so great, and it seemed so resolved on quarrelling, instead of attending to the business of the nation, that, after a sitting of only fourteen days, Cromwell dissolved it. As he did so, he appealed to the Almighty to be judge between him and the refractory members that so bitterly opposed him.

There was a number of extreme republicans in the army and country, called Levellers and Fifth Monarchy men. They held very violent opinions; hated a Protector almost as much as they hated a king; wished all men to be equal; and some of them even held that there should be no government at all, except that of the heavenly king, Jesus. The Royalists were engaged in another conspiracy, and the republicans were mad enough to join them; for they did not reflect that, if Cromwell was ruined and Charles restored, they would soon be compelled to submit. One of Cromwell's enemies, in 1657, wrote and published an infamous tract, called Killing no Murder, in which it was said, that the greatest benefit any Englishman could confer on his country would be to assassinate Cromwell. Who was the author of this tract—whether Colonel Sexby, a Republican, or Colonel Titus, a Royalist—has never been ascertained. Sexby was suspected at the time; was arrested in July, 1657, and sent to the Tower, where he died in June, 1658.—After the Restoration, Colonel Titus, thinking it would gain him popularity and reward, said that he was the author —whether truly or not will never be known.

But the Protector, though ill in body and distressed in mind, vigorously crushed these plots, and caused the ringleaders to be executed. No difficulties, in fact, appeared too great for him; with one hand he put down his personal enemies, and that without the slightest regard to law, appointing what he called a High Court of Justice to try them; and with the other held aloft the national glory and prosperity. His troops abroad were joined with the French against the Spaniards and the Dutch: many brilliant victories were obtained in the Low Countries; and Dunkirk, being taken by the allied French and English on the 24th of June, 1658, was, according to agreement, surrendered to Cromwell. The famous Louis XIV.—the dissipated but gorgeous monarch known as Louis le Grande—was then King of France, and mutual protestations of friendship and esteem passed between him and Oliver. His minister, Cardinal Mazarin, even sent his nephew to London to express his regret that urgent business should deprive him of the honour of paying his respects in person to the head of the English government.

But the health of the Protector was rapidly breaking; anxiety and excessive attention to the affairs of the country were wearing him out. It is said that, in the latter part of his life, he was constantly in dread of assassination, and that his public and domestic troubles oppressed him with a weight of melancholy. In the month of August he lost his daughter, Lady Claypole, who is reported to have upbraided him with her dying breath; and his poignant grief on that account is supposed to have hastened his own death. He had been ill for some time; but about the commencement of October, 1658, it was discovered that his disorder was a sort of tertian ague. At first it did not seem dangerous, and between his attacks he was able to walk abroad. It afterwards increased to such an extent, that he believed his last hour was at hand. In this state of mind he showed some anxiety about his eternal welfare, and asked one of his preachers if it were true that the elect could never afterwards incur the anger of the Almighty? The preacher answered, that nothing was more true. "Then," said Oliver, "I am safe; for I am sure that once I was in a state of grace."

Having been brought from Hampton Court to Whitehall, he sank rapidly, and expired on the afternoon of the 3rd of September—the anniversary of his great victories of Dunbar and Worcester, and the day that he always considered his most fortunate one. In his last moments he lay offering up faint prayers to God for himself and for his country; and his language, even when he deemed his last hour to be approaching, was strongly indicative of his character. He is reported to have said—"Lord! I am a poor foolish creature! This people would have me live; they think it will be best for them, and that it will redound much to Thy glory. All the stir is about this. Others would fain have me die. Lord, pardon them, and pardon Thy foolish people! forgive them their sins, and do not forsake them; but love and bless them, and give them rest; and bring them to a consistency, and give me rest." Afterwards he murmured, as if with a feeling that his duty had been well done in this world, and that he felt himself secure of happiness in the next—"I am a conqueror, and more than a conqueror, through Jesus Christ who strengtheneth me." And thus he breathed forth his soul, with its errors and its virtues, into the hands of his Maker. He was in his sixtieth year. A little before his death the council begged him to mention his successor. Though scarcely able to articulate, he was understood to mean that his eldest son Richard should become Protector in his place. On the day of his death a violent tempest occurred. His friends took advantage of this incident to say that even the elements of England mourned for him; while his enemies declared that nature was convulsed in token of the divine displeasure at the late Protector's ambitious crimes.

Cromwell was buried with great magnificence in Westminster Abbey, and most of the poets of the time celebrated his memory. He left two sons (Richard and Henry) and three daughters: one was married to General Fleetwood; another to Lord Falconberg; and the third, first to the Earl of Warwick, and afterwards to Sir John Russell.

Cromwell's character has been viewed in various lights. He had more enemies than friends. His actions offended both Royalists and republicans; both had reason to complain of him; and neither, probably, have done him justice as a man. As a ruler, it has lately become the fashion with some writers to praise him highly. He certainly had splendid governing talents; but he was simply a tyrant, resolved to have his own will; and when it was resisted by parliaments, judges, or any other authorities, they were at once dispensed with. He committed many offences equal to the crimes of Charles I.; and for which the king was condemned and executed—levying taxes by his own authority, imposing heavy penalties on those who were, or who were suspected to be, Royalists, and collecting both through the military commissions which he established in every county. He also established a High Court of Justice to carry out his views. His foreign policy, however, was the best part of his government; it was judicious, wisely planned, and boldly carried out: he regained for England, on the continent, that reputation it had lost under James, and which Charles had been too much engaged in domestic disputes to retrieve. And, as a modern historian observes, when he exerted the power of England abroad, it was generally for beneficial purposes; especially when he interfered for the Protestants of France and the Waldenses, to punish the African pirates, and restore Christian captives to liberty.—As a man, we know little of his conduct to his family; but he was not, as we have already observed, a happy father, though he is said to have been an affectionate one. He was a devout man, and he used the strange language of the zealous Puritans—a language mixed up with unseasonable and inappropriate allusions to Scripture, and the doctrines of religion. The Royalists believed him to be, and called him, a hypocrite; but he was a sincere zealot. His idea of religion was a lofty one, "Let us," said he, "govern all things by the written word of God." He professed to fight for liberty—chiefly for liberty in religion—for the great principle of Protestantism, the right of private judgment, and to worship God as each sincere man thought right. "Thy kingdom come!" was his constant earnest prayer, and he strove to make that prayer a fact upon earth. He was a soldier of wonderful ability, having learnt the art of war from his own courage, energy, determination, and iron will. He was extremely industrious, and had a wonderful ability to know and to command men. But if he had many virtues and good qualities, he had many faults; and his example is one which cannot be held up for unqualified admiration or imitation.

CHAPTER LXXVIII.

THE PROTECTORATE OF RICHARD CROMWELL.—A.D. 1658, 1659.

DIRECTLY after the death of Oliver Cromwell, the council of state assembled and declared his eldest son, Richard, to be the new Lord Protector; and he was proclaimed in the metropolis on the 4th of September. Henry Cromwell was in Ireland, which country he had for some time governed, as lord-lieutenant, with great ability. No one opposed Richard's elevation to the Protectorate, and addresses of congratulation and acknowledgment were presented to him from the army, the navy, the people, and from many religious sects. Neighbouring countries also sent ambassadors to England for the same purpose.

But Richard Cromwell did not possess the commanding genius and resolute will of his father, and his rule was a very brief one. That father ruled by force; and had he lived much longer, the people would have been in arms against him. Richard was gentle and amiable, but he was neither a statesman nor a soldier; and whilst the Protectorate, through the tyranny of his predecessor, had become unpopular, he had no conception of the means to be taken to restore its prestige. And he knew nothing of the army; and an ominous murmur against the new general began to spread throughout that body.

Richard's first act was to summon a parliament, which met on the 27th of January, 1659. He had done his best to get as many as possible of his own friends returned as members of it; but still it contained a number of violent republicans, who hated the office of a Protector, and wished to see it abolished. A House of Lords, or, as it was now called, "the other-house," also assembled. Although the members of parliament had signed an engagement not to alter the present form of government, yet they proceeded directly to examine the instrument, or deed of government, by which parliament had sanctioned the office of a Protector. A great deal of altercation followed; but at length the parliament was with difficulty persuaded to confirm it, and to settle a revenue on the new Protector. This it did on the 14th of February. Nor were the Commons disposed to recognise the new House of Lords as a part of the parliament; and it was not until after another violent debate, on the 28th of March, that they were induced to do so.

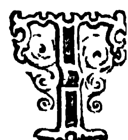
While the parliament was wasting its time in useless talking, serious plots were forming among the republican officers of the army. General Fleetwood (Richard's brother-in-law) had been appointed commander-in-chief of the army, under the Protector; but he became jealous of Richard, and wanted to enjoy that power without acknowledging any superior. He therefore established a council of officers, which met at his residence, and was called, from it, the Wallingford House party. Foremost among these plotters against Richard was General Lambert, who thought if there was to be any Protector at all, he ought to be the man. This council of officers soon presented a remonstrance to Richard. It complained that the "good old cause" (as they called the new cause of republicanism) was quite neglected; that the pay of the soldiers was considerably in arrear; and that the enemies of liberty were striving to ruin both the army and the nation. As a remedy, the council desired that the whole military power should be given to some one who could be trusted.



The feeble-minded Protector was lost amid all these discontents; for he knew that if he gave up all authority over the army, his power as ruler of England was gone. The parliament was as much alarmed as the Protector; and it voted that there should be no meeting or general council of officers without his consent. This vote irritated the officers, and they hastened to Cromwell, and demanded that he should instantly dissolve the parliament. Richard hesitated at first, but he had no power to resist; and on the 2nd of April it was dissolved accordingly.

What government there was in England was now in the hands of these turbulent officers. They immediately invited the famous Rump, or remains of the Long Parliament, whom Oliver Cromwell had expelled from the house, to meet again and resume their authority. Those members accepted the invitation; and, on the 7th of May, 1659, the republican Rump Parliament again sat at Westminster. None of those expelled by Colonel Pride were permitted to take their seats. Prynne, one of the excluded, wrote a narrative of the proceedings, which he described as "a worse and more real levying of war against the parliament than the beheaded king and his party were ever guilty of." The first thing this packed assembly did was to pass a declaration to secure the property and liberty of the people, "without the authority of any chief magistrate, whether called King or Protector!" This was, in fact, to depose poor Richard Cromwell, who did not care to keep a dignity he found so troublesome and dangerous. Without a struggle he retired to Hampton Court, and soon afterwards formally signed his resignation of the Protectorate. It was supposed that his more active brother Henry, then governor of Ireland, might offer some resistance to the parliament. But he was induced by threats to resign his command, and returned to the rank of a private gentleman in England.

As to Richard, he retired to his estate, which was considerable, and lived with more happiness, and far greater tranquillity, than during the brief time that he was acknowledged the ruler of a great nation.—After the restoration of the Stuart family to the English throne, he resided for some years abroad. He lived to a great age, and died in 1712.

CHAPTER LXXIX.

ENGLAND WITHOUT A GOVERNMENT.—A.D. 1659, 1660.

THE restored Rump Parliament appointed a committee of safety (most of the members of which were officers) and a council of state, for the purpose of carrying on the government. No easy task; for the nation was in a distracted state; and the parliament, the members of which were Independents, was hated both by the Presbyterians and the Royalists. These two parties joined together, and insurrections broke out in several parts of the country. The object of the conspirators was, to restore monarchy, and to place Prince Charles upon the throne; but when they rose in arms, they were everywhere defeated by the army, which adhered to the parliament.

No sooner was tranquillity restored, than the parliament and the army quarrelled. The officers demanded that General Fleetwood should be declared commander-in-chief, without any limitation of his authority, and that General Lambert should have the next rank to him. In answer to this demand, the parliament deprived Fleetwood, Lambert, and several other officers of their commissions, and vested the command of the army in seven persons. But the officers knew their power, and would not submit. General Lambert, on the 13th of October, drew up his troops in the streets which led to the parliament-house, and as the members came, the soldiers compelled them all to go home again. Thus the Rump Parliament was a second time dissolved by military force; and the power of the government, such as it now was, again in the hands of the military.

The parliament accused the army of being destroyers of the national liberty; and the officers angrily replied, that the members of that assembly would not have left them any liberty to destroy. After much altercation, it was agreed that the Rump Parliament should not sit any more, but that a new one should soon be summoned, and, in the meantime, a committee of safety should prepare a new form of government.

At this time Scotland was governed by a talented officer, named General Monk. A member of the decayed Devonshire family, he had followed the fortunes of Charles I. till he was taken prisoner, and sent to the Tower, where he remained about two years. When he was liberated, the Royalist cause was lost; but he refused all offers to serve the parliament for some time. At length he was induced to take the command in Ireland. Cromwell made him lieutenant-general, and sent him to Scotland as governor. Before the Protector's death, he was told that Monk was "lying in wait to introduce Charles Stuart into Scotland;" but he took no steps for that purpose whilst Cromwell lived. During the disputes between the parliament and the army, this officer was quietly collecting troops, and acting in so equivocal a manner, that neither party knew which side he meant to take. Therefore, the officers who suppressed the parliament wrote to him in Scotland, and desired his approval of their conduct. Monk, though he entered the service of the Parliamentarians, and had ably and loyally discharged his duties, was still a Royalist at heart; and the discontent of the people determined him to attempt the restoration of Charles, with whom he had for some time kept up a secret correspondence. He wanted an excuse for leading his army to London, that he might the better ascertain the state of parties, also the feeling of the army in England, and take his steps accordingly. But he thought it most prudent to dissimulate: therefore he wrote to the officers, disapproving of what they had done, and protesting that, above all things, he wished to see England a republic. It would have been greatly to his honour if he had abstained from making such a protestation, when he was secretly at work to restore the king.

Monk collected his army, and began a slow march towards the frontiers. The officers suspected his real purpose, and sent General Lambert with troops to oppose him; though, as Lambert had orders to avoid fighting, when he reached Newcastle he remained there doing nothing. The weak-minded Fleetwood, who was commander-in-chief of the army in London, sent commissioners to Monk to arrange a peaceful accommodation. Monk also sent commissioners on his part, with directions to conclude a treaty; but his only object was to lull Fleetwood into security, and to gain time. The treaty was concluded: it contained strong pledges against the king and the monarchy; and Monk refused to ratify it, on the ground that his commissioners had exceeded their powers.

Although the general council of officers feared Monk was aiming at restoring Charles Stuart, yet they took no resolute measure to oppose him, but went on designing a new republican form of government. On the 13th of December, they resolved upon the following articles:—"That there should be no king, Protector, or chief magistrate; that the army should be maintained; that every one should be free with respect to religion; that there should be no House of Peers; that the legislative and executive powers of the state should be in different hands; and that parliament should be elected by the people."

But it was one thing to resolve on a new form of government, and another to put it into execution. The common soldiers revolted in large bodies from General Fleetwood; and, taking upon themselves to do as they pleased, invited the Rump Parliament, which they had so lately dispersed, to renew its sittings and authority. Changes were rapid in this age of anarchy; and on the 26th of December, this parliament, which had witnessed such varieties of fortune, once more met to see if it could tranquillise the distracted nation, and carry on the government.

The members of the Rump Parliament were nearly all republicans; and they voted that a bill should be prepared for again renouncing the claim of Charles Stuart and that of all his family to rule in England. They also sent Monk a letter of thanks, and begged him to come up to London as soon as he could. Being glad enough to accept this invitation, he crossed the Tweed on the 1st of January, 1660, advanced to the south, and, at York, was met by Lord-General Fairfax, who, after the sad experience afforded by the tyranny of the Protectorate, and the state of anarchy which followed, was anxious to see the monarchy restored. He, however, could not get Monk to declare for the king; as, with his small force—6,000 men—it would not have been safe to do so till he ascertained the disposition of the English army. Monk, therefore, continued his march towards London; numerous addresses being sent him on his way, from the resident gentry and others, praying that he would take steps to restore the nation to peace and tranquillity. The little army reached St. Alban's on the 28th of January. From thence Monk sent a message to the parliament, requiring it to remove from London the regiments which, though then quiet and doing their duty, had so recently offered violence to that assembly. The parliament reluctantly complied; some of the soldiers mutinied, but were subdued: and, on the 3rd of February, Monk and his army took up their quarters in Westminster.

The citizens of London had refused to pay the taxes which the Rump Parliament had levied, contending that they were not legally compelled to do so till a free and lawful legislature had assembled. The first duty Monk was called upon to perform, after his arrival, was, to enforce these levies; and on the 9th of February he entered the city, arrested several persons named by the parliament, and removed various obstructions which the citizens had raised to impede the progress of any officers sent to seize either them or their goods. This rendered him very unpopular with the citizens; but on the 11th, he sent a letter to the Commons, reproaching them for various acts recently committed; requiring them immediately to summon to their seats the excluded members; to fix the time for their own dissolution; and to prepare for the assembling of a new parliament. He also complained of the odious character of the service that had been required of him. Having despatched this letter, he repaired to the Guildhall, where, the common council being summoned, he apologised for his conduct two nights previously; told them of the course he had then taken, which he assured them he should persevere in; and expressed his wish for the union of the city and the army, in every enterprise having the happiness, prosperity, and settlement of the people for its object. His speech gave the greatest satisfaction; its purport soon spread abroad; and when he left the Guildhall, cheers, and shouts of "God bless your Excellency!" and "The General is with us; down with the Rump!" were heard in every direction. The bells of the churches rang rejoicing peals; and we learn from Pepys' Diary, that, at night, bonfires were seen in all parts of the city, at some of which rumps were roasted: others were tied on sticks, and carried up and down. The "king's health" was frequently pledged that day and the next in the streets, and the mob would have gone to Westminster, and expelled the parliament, if it had not been restrained by Monk.

After these demonstrations it is difficult to account for Monk's hesitation at once to proclaim the king; or, after the expelled members had been summoned, and they had taken their seats, why he should still have declared, as he did, for a republic; and that he would, "to the utmost oppose the setting-up of Charles Stuart, or a House of Peers." Such dissimulation was alike unworthy the man and the cause. If he felt it unsafe to proclaim Charles till the way had been further prepared, he might have withheld his own pledges to the parliament. In that body, when reinforced by the excluded members, the Presbyterians had a large majority: many of the Independents from that time absented themselves; and the former did as they pleased. They first declared all acts passed by the Rump Parliament to be null and void. Then they resolved that Presbyterianism should be the only religion tolerated in England; and ordered that the League and Covenant should be set up in all the churches. They also appointed Monk commander-in-chief of the forces of England, Scotland, and Ireland; placed the Royalist admiral, Montague, at the head of the fleet; voted Monk a sum of £20,000; offered him the Protectorate, which he declined; and, having ordered writs to be issued for a new House of Commons, the Long Parliament, on the 16th of March, dissolved itself, and met no more.

From that time there could be no doubt as to the tendency of the popular feeling; it was everywhere manifested for the return of the king. On the 15th of March the cry for that return was raised in London. A man that day effaced the words, "Exit tyrannus! regum ultimus!" which the Rump Parliament had ordered to be inscribed in a niche of the Royal Exchange, where the statue of Charles I. had stood. Having done so, he took off his cap, and shouted, "God bless Charles the Second!" The populace re-echoed the cry; at night bonfires again blazed in the public places, and heartily did the Cavaliers sing, "The king shall enjoy his own again!" As this loyal feeling extended amongst the people, the republicans, and especially the late king's judges, took the alarm. They endeavoured to excite the army; and General Lambert (who had been imprisoned by the parliament early in the year, but had made his escape) used his influence with the soldiers to induce them to declare in favour of the commonwealth. Monk, however, had also been dealing with the army: he had removed many officers unfavourable to his objects, and replaced them by Royalists; the troops also, whose pay was greatly in arrear, were not found very zealous in that cause for which they had formerly fought so gallantly. Colonel Ingoldsby, who had been one of the king's judges, but was now a Royalist, had no difficulty in finding men to follow him in pursuit of Lambert. They overtook him at Daventry, where he had only succeeded in raising four troops of horse, one of which immediately deserted him on the appearance of Ingoldsby's force. He was taken prisoner, conveyed to London, and again sent to the Tower. No other attempt was made to turn the tide of public opinion, which had set in so strongly in favour of the king.

The new House of Commons, though the bias was Presbyterian in religious matters, was Royalist in politics. It assembled on the 25th of April, 1660. After the usual routine business, it was decided that, on the 1st of May, the house should resolve itself into a general committee, to take into consideration the state of the nation. On that day, Sir John Grenville—a relative of General Monk, through whom the latter had carried on negotiations with Charles—arrived in London, and presented a letter from the banished Stuart to the parliament. It was accompanied by a paper called "The Declaration of Breda," which promised a forgetfulness of the past, and liberty of conscience for the future. The letter was read with delight in both houses, and committees were appointed to prepare answers. The parliament then voted, that the ancient form of English government by Kings, Lords, and Commons, should be restored; that all acts or orders inconsistent with that arrangement should be erased from their journals; and that the royal fugitive should receive the sum of £50,000, to pay the expenses of his coming to England. Some few members of the lower house wished to make Charles's return dependent upon his entering into certain conditions, pledging him to preserve civil and religious liberty, and generally to promote the prosperity and welfare of the nation. They were overruled by the influence of Monk; and it was resolved that deputations from both houses should proceed to Breda, where Charles was at that time, to invite him to return and take his seat on the throne, as King of Great Britain and Ireland, unshackled by conditions, unpledged by promises. The deputations immediately departed; and preparations were set on foot to receive the king. The royal arms and statues which had been taken down were replaced; the royal palaces were renovated, redecorated, and refurnished; and the whole nation appeared—to judge from the Diaries of Pepys and Evelyn, and many other contemporary records—to be overflowing with joy, when Charles II. was, on the 8th of May, 1660, proclaimed king and the monarchy was restored.

CHAPTER LXXX.

MONARCHY RESTORED; THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE SECOND.—A.D. 1660—1662.

CHARLES and his two brothers, the Dukes of York and Gloucester, landed near Dover on the 25th of May, 1660. They were received by General Monk, whom Charles embraced and called his father. On the 29th of the same month (on which day Charles completed his thirtieth year) he entered London in a grand triumphal procession. People, parliament, and nobles all joined heartily in welcoming him; and the bells rang merry peals during the day, and bonfires blazed at night.

Lord Clarendon (formerly Sir Edward Hyde) returned to England with Charles, to whom he had ever been faithful. He was, therefore, made chancellor and prime minister, and entrusted to select the king's advisers or council. It contained men who were Presbyterians as well as Royalists; for the Presbyterians were too strong to be neglected, and had done the king great service, although Charles had a secret dislike to them. Titles, also, were conferred on many who had been active in assisting the Restoration, and Monk was created Duke of Albemarle.

Charles, according to his promise, desired the parliament to pass a bill of indemnity. But the Commons were now as loyal as the Long Parliament had been the reverse, and were anxious that the regicides should not escape punishment. That house, therefore, induced the king to issue a proclamation, commanding all who had sat in judgment upon his father to surrender themselves within fourteen days. Ten of those judges had already been arrested; nineteen more surrendered themselves; and most of the others fled for safety from England. The parliament then agreed that all who had signed the death-warrant against the late king, or sat in judgment upon him, besides six persons who had not done so, should be excepted from the bill of indemnity. John Milton, the illustrious poet, and one of the most noble Englishmen that ever lived, who had opposed the Restoration, was arrested for writing two anti-monarchical works—the Defence of the English People, and Eikonoclastes. He was, however, soon liberated by the interference of Sir William Davenant, who had always been a Royalist.

Having passed the bill of indemnity, the parliament proceeded to provide for Charles's support as a monarch. On the 4th of September, it voted that £1,200,000 per annum should be settled upon him for life—£100,000 less than was settled on Cromwell; and to raise that sum, tonnage and poundage were granted; also various excise duties; and £100,000 per annum in lieu of the fees and perquisites derived from wardships and purveyance, which were abolished. Though the nominal sum granted Charles was larger than the income any former sovereign had enjoyed, the taxes imposed were not sufficient to raise it; and he was often in want of money in consequence.—Besides settling the revenue, the parliament passed bills, setting apart the 30th of January to be observed as a fast, and the 29th of May as a festival, for ever; forms of prayer being drawn up to be used in the churches on each day.—Having passed these bills, parliament adjourned, on the 13th of September, to the 6th of November.

The trial of the regicides commenced on the 9th of October, before a court of thirty-four commissioners, nominated by the parliament before it adjourned. Twenty-nine prisoners who had presided at the king's trial were now put upon their own. Most of them gloried in their conduct, which they believed, no doubt, was patriotic; and they were proud to die in their country's cause, as they conceived it. All were found guilty; but only Major-General Harrison, and five others, suffered death. Four other parties were also tried, found guilty, and executed—Axtel, who commanded the guard on the day of the king's trial; and Hacker, who commanded on the day of his unjust execution; Cook, who acted as solicitor-general at the trial; and Hugh Peters, a fanatical preacher, who, from the pulpit, had excited the people to put Charles to death. Six persons were to have been tried besides the regicides. Sir Harry Vane and General Lambert were the other two. They were not tried till a later period, when both were found guilty. Vane was executed; Lambert was imprisoned in Guernsey.—We can scarcely wonder, under the excited feelings of the time, that these proceedings were taken; but it would have been much more praiseworthy in Charles and his parliament if they had granted a general indemnity; and, in the triumph of the present, had dropped a veil of oblivion over the past.

King Charles had published what he called A Healing Declaration, on the subject of religion. This was intended as a boon to the Presbyterians, who had tried so hard to force their views of religion upon the country. But Charles had resolved on the restoration of episcopacy and the bishops; and when the parliament met again, the Healing Declaration was rejected, and the old form of worship, or rather that which existed in Bishop Laud's time, restored. The parliament then proceeded to an act not at all to its honour. It declared that Cromwell, his son-in-law Colonel Ireton, and Serjeant Bradshaw, were traitors, and even went so far as to decree that their dead bodies should be dug from the grave, and hanged upon gibbets at Tyburn. This bitter act of vengeance was actually performed on the 30th of January, 1661; and although this warring with the dead is offensive to every feeling of humanity, it was approved of by a majority of all classes at the time. Even the graves of Cromwell's mother and daughter were violated, and their bodies thrown into a pit in St. Margaret's churchyard.—Parliament had been dissolved on the 29th of December, 1660, before these disgraceful measures were carried out.

Soon after this dissolution, London was greatly alarmed by an insurrection, not caused by a disapproval of any of the measures of the parliament, but the result of religious fanaticism. Amongst the republicans, was a small body called the Millenarians, or Fifth Monarchy men, who believed that there was no king but the Saviour; and that only the "true believers"—an epithet they applied exclusively to members of their own sect—were entitled to hold office, or exercise authority. One of their leaders, named Venner, was a desperate enthusiast. He had often entered into petty conspiracies against Cromwell; and he was resolved to raise the Millenarian standard against Charles. On the 6th of January, 1661, he sallied out in a fit of excitement into the city, attended by about sixty of his followers, all completely armed. Having overcome the watchmen and city guards, they proceeded from street to street, proclaiming "King Jesus," who, they said, was their invisible leader. One poor man who, upon being questioned, answered that "he was for God and King Charles," lost his life in the confusion. The magistrates then assembled the city bands, and, after a desperate fight, the enthusiasts fled and took refuge in Caen Wood, near Hampstead. On the 9th they returned, entered the city, traversed nearly every street, committing great disorders, and at length retired to a house, which they resolved to defend to their last breath. Surrounded by thousands, they refused quarter; and most of them died fighting—shouting, even in their latest moments, that the Saviour of men was shortly coming to reign bodily upon the earth. A few were taken prisoners, who were tried on the 19th, and hanged on the 21st, of January. On the scaffold they adhered to their insane belief; and declared that, "if they were deceived, it was the Lord who deceived them!".

The affairs of Scotland had not been neglected while the events we have alluded to were taking place in England. By the advice of the Earl of Lauderdale, the army in that country was disbanded, and the forts erected there razed; but it was resolved to make an example of a few of the principal supporters of the Covenant. The Marquis of Argyll, and a commoner named Guthrie, were selected as those who were to suffer. Argyll was protected, by two acts of indemnity, for his rebellious conduct prior to 1651. He was neutral in the proceedings which led to the Restoration; and in July, 1660, he travelled to London, to submit himself to Charles. But he had enemies who were bent upon his destruction: they arrested him, and threw him into the Tower, without allowing him to see the king, as they dreaded his influence with his majesty. The Scotch parliament was opened on the 1st of January, 1661. The marquis was then sent to Edinburgh without seeing the king, and proceedings were opened against him for his conduct subsequent to 1651. He had, during that period, been guilty of acts of disloyalty; none of them, however, would have incurred the penalty of death; and he would, no doubt, have been acquitted, but for the production of some letters he had written to Albemarle, and which the latter sent to the parliament. They were decidedly treasonable; and, after they had been read, his friends gave up his cause. He was condemned on the 25th of May, and executed on the 27th, without allowing him time to appeal to the king, who, it was thought, would certainly have reprieved him. He died with great courage; and Albemarle's conduct in giving up the letters is very generally and deservedly condemned.—Guthrie, whom the Royalists in Scotland had selected as the second victim, was a seditious preacher who had personally affronted the king. He was tried and convicted on the 11th of April, and executed on the 1st of June.

The re-establishment of episcopacy in Scotland was greatly desired by Charles; for he had endured such indignities at the hands of the Presbyterians of that kingdom, that he entertained for them, and their form of church government, the greatest aversion. "Presbyterianism," he said to the Earl of Lauderdale, "was not, he thought, a religion for a gentleman, and he could not consent to its further continuance in Scotland." A foolish remark; for religion is alike for all. He was strengthened in opposition to this system by General (created Earl of) Middleton, and his other Scotch ministers, who told him that the people in general were so disgusted with the violence and tyranny of the ecclesiastics, that any other form of church government would be accepted with universal gratitude. Clarendon in England, and Ormond in Ireland, also strongly advocated the abolition of Presbyterianism in Scotland; and the resolution was taken to restore prelacy. The members of the assembly had sent Dr. Sharp, a Presbyterian minister, to represent them and their interests before the king and council. When in London he was persuaded to embrace episcopacy, and, tempted by the archbishopric of St. Andrew's, he consented. Four bishops were appointed at his recommendation; and he returned to Scotland to conduct ecclesiastical affairs in the interest of episcopacy, and not of his old faith of Presbyterianism.

On the 23rd of April, 1661, Charles was crowned; the rejoicings in the metropolis being universal on the occasion. On the 8th of May following, the new parliament assembled. Representing the then feeling of the nation, the great majority of members were Royalists and churchmen, only fifty-six being Presbyterians. This parliament greatly strengthened the power of the crown. It passed an act declaring that neither house, nor both together, had any legislative power independent of the king. Other acts were passed for the security of his person; for regulating petitions to either house; and for regulating corporations, so as to exclude all disloyal and improper persons. It was further ordered that the Solemn League and Covenant, and the act declaring England a commonwealth, should be burnt by the common hangman. An act was also passed restoring the bishops to their seats in the House of Lords; and, on the 30th of July, both houses adjourned to the 28th of November.

When the parliament met again, it passed, amongst other acts, the Act of Uniformity, which reinstated the church in the position it occupied before the civil war; and all clergymen were to be reordained, if they had not already received episcopal ordination. They were also to declare their assent to everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer; to take the oath of canonical obedience; to abjure the Solemn League and Covenant; and to renounce the principle of taking arms, on any pretence whatever, against the king. Those clergymen who did not comply with these provisions by St. Bartholomew's Day, the 24th of August, were to be expelled from their livings. This act was a violation of the king's promises made at Breda, and he did not voluntarily give his assent to it. But the churchmen had, for many years, been subject to so many indignities, and such great injustice, that they were determined, now they had the power, to make their enemies feel something of what they had endured themselves.—This bill received the royal assent on the 18th of May, 1662; and, on the 19th, parliament was prorogued.

The court of Charles afforded a strong contrast to that of his father; the king himself, unfortunately, setting the example of immorality and licentiousness. His dissipation had plunged him deeply into debt; and, as one means of getting out of his difficulties, he resolved to marry. Several sovereigns were anxious to connect their families with the English monarch; but the Portuguese court offered the largest dowry. As Charles wanted money, he accepted the offer of that court; and although the lady was a Catholic, and therefore not very acceptable to the nation, he was married to the Princess Catharine of Braganza, who landed at Portsmouth on the 20th of May, 1662. She seems to have been an amiable and agreeable woman; but she never won the affection of the king, who neglected and insulted her from the first—even insisting that she should make a companion of Lady Castlemaine, a fascinating but worthless woman, who was his mistress. The poor queen shed many tears, and at first threatened to return to Portugal. Charles replied, with a cruel sneer, that she had better first inquire whether her family would receive her back; and, that she might have an opportunity of inquiring, he would send all her Portuguese attendants to their own country. He instantly put this threat into execution; and, after a time, the insulted and spirit-broken Catharine was compelled to submit to any indignity that he chose to impose upon her.

The hollow festivities attending Charles's marriage were scarcely over, when proceedings were recommenced against the republicans. At this time Vane and Lambert were tried, as before stated; and three other republican officers—Colonel Okey, Corbet, and Barkstead—who had been concerned in the execution of the late king. They had fled to Holland when Charles came to the throne, but were treacherously ensnared by a villain named Downing, and brought to England. There they were condemned, hanged, and embowelled. They all died glorying in the cause for which they suffered.

CHAPTER LXXXI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE SECOND.—A D. 1662—1677.

CHARLES was always in want of money, and ready to do anything to obtain it. Dunkirk, a famous seaport in the Low Countries, was added to the English territories by the Protector, Cromwell. The people were very proud of this acquisition, and considered the possession of it a defence against the aggressions of any continental sovereign. But Charles had to maintain an expensive garrison there, and was compelled to spend upon the place the money that he wanted for his gambling and his mistresses: so he sold Dunkirk to the ambitious French king, who very readily gave him £400,000 for it. A loud cry of indignation followed this disgraceful transaction.

Charles lived in open defiance of all moral restraint, and seemed quite indifferent to religion. That, however, was not the case; in his heart he loved the Roman Catholic form of worship, and was captivated by its state, its pomp, its license, and its slavish principles. He resolved, therefore, to show the papists all the encouragement he could. Accordingly, on the 29th of December, 1663, he issued what was called a Declaration of Indulgence, by which dissenters of all kinds were relieved from the severities of the Act of Uniformity. He said he wished to trust entirely to the affections of his people, and to bestow upon them that liberty of conscience he had promised when he ascended the throne. But the secret soon came out: he wished to allow a full toleration to Roman Catholics; and, as the popular prejudice was so great against them, he did not dare to show any open sympathy in their favour; he therefore concealed it under a concession to dissenters, or nonconformists generally. The parliament met soon after Charles had published his Declaration; and, much to his annoyance, opposed the project so strongly, that he was compelled to abandon it.

In the year 1664, Charles persuaded the parliament to repeal the Triennial Act—that is, the famous act which decreed that a parliament should be called at least once every three years; and provided, that if the king neglected to summon it, the people should return members of their own authority. Charles even had the boldness to say, in his opening speech to the house, that he would never allow a parliament to be assembled by the means prescribed in that statute. The servile parliament did as the king wished; and, without a murmur, destroyed one of the bulwarks of the nation's liberty.

This "Pension Parliament"—as it was called, many of the members being dependents upon the bounty of the king and others—then passed the Conventicle Act. Its object was to compel dissenters to belong to the established church. It enacted, that wherever five persons more than belonged to the family, were collected in any house for the purpose of any religious service, every one of them was liable, for the first offence to be imprisoned three months, or pay £5; for the second, to be imprisoned six months, or pay £10; and for the third, to be transported for seven years, or pay £100. This cruel act was put into rigorous execution, and the prisons were filled with honest and religious men and women. Others were reduced to poverty by the fines imposed upon them; and some, who were lashed into desperate resistance, were even more severely punished. A similar act was passed in Scotland for the purpose of persecuting the Presbyterians, upon whom the most shameful cruelties were committed. The renegade, Archbishop Sharp, urged on these cruelties with a malignant severity.

The jealous feelings which had long existed between the English and the Dutch broke out again, and, after mutual aggressions, war was declared against the latter people. But before hostilities actually commenced, an awful calamity fell upon London. It was the GREAT PLAGUE of 1665—the most fearful pestilence that has ever visited this country. Within five months, about 100,000 victims were swept to a sudden grave. Business was at an end; a death-like gloom hung over the city, which seemed like some ruined and almost deserted place—a dreary wilderness of houses, on many of which was written the solemn words—"The Lord have mercy upon us!" The dead were placed in an open cart, without coffins, and buried in heaps in deep pits. The Puritans said that it was a visitation of God's anger upon the nation, on account of the wickedness of the king and the Royalists. The republican party had always been marked by earnest devotion and a grave sobriety of manners; but the Royalists were the very reverse, and endeavoured to show their attachment to the king by the gross debauchery of their lives.

The plague disappeared the year following that in which it broke out, and on the 2nd or 3rd of September of 1666, the GREAT FIRE of London occurred. It began in Pudding Lane, 202 feet from where the Monument now stands. The column is exactly its own length from the spot where the conflagration commenced. Most of the houses were then built of lath and plaster, and the streets were very narrow. An east wind blew; the flames, therefore, spread with fearful rapidity, and the fire raged with uncontrolled fury for three days. During the nights the scene was appalling, and the wind scattered burning brands and red-hot fragments of charred wood in every direction. The helpless people looked on in despair, and saw their habitations and property consumed by the roaring flames. The conflagration continued until two-thirds of London was a mass of blackened rafters and heaps of rubbish and cinders. It was calculated that 400 streets, and about 13,000 houses, were destroyed; the value of the property that perished could never be calculated. A report was spread that the city had been set on fire by the papists; but it turned out to be a groundless calumny. The rumour was, however, believed at the time; and as the Monument was built to commemorate the fire, an inscription was placed upon it attributing the calamity to the malice of the Roman Catholics. This inscription remained till it was effaced by order of the corporation of London, on the 6th of December, 1830. Some good often arises from the worst of evils; and so it was in this case; for the fire burnt away the remains of the plague, and destroyed all those contagious nests of filth which bred it. That terrible affliction, which used to break out in London with great fury twice or thrice in every century, has scarcely made its appearance since. The city, too, was rebuilt in a more substantial, elegant, and healthy manner; though not in any way comparable to the many improvements that have been made since then.

While the plague was spreading terror and mourning in London, James, the Duke of York, who commanded the English navy, gained, on the 3rd of June, 1665, a victory at sea over the Dutch, near Lowestoffe. James was courageous, but it was thought that he had not followed up the victory as he ought to have done; and therefore, although a large sum of money was voted to him by the Commons, yet they removed him from the command of the fleet, and appointed Lord Sandwich in his place.

The new commander, on the 3rd of August, attacked a rich merchant fleet of Dutch vessels in the port of Berghen; but he was driven off with loss and disgrace by the fire from the land batteries. During the month of June in the following year (1666), one of the most remarkable sea-fights that ever occurred took place between the English and Dutch. It continued for four days, and both sides fought with desperate bravery. On the third day the English began to retreat, and it is probable that their whole fleet would have been destroyed, and the naval glory of England have been eclipsed, had not Prince Rupert come up with more ships to their assistance. On the fourth day the battle was interrupted by a dense fog; and when it cleared up, the Dutch were seen sailing away. The English mariners were glad enough of this; as, for once, they found themselves over-matched. Both sides claimed the victory; but the English had suffered most severely, and had narrowly escaped utter destruction.

The following month these two gallant enemies engaged again; but this time the English fleet won the victory, and having scattered the Dutch fleet, it again rode proudly on the waters with triumphal sway. It was, however, seen that two such nations were too equal in strength and courage for either to utterly put down the other, and both of them began to treat for peace. While the negotiations were going on, Charles desired that hostilities should be suspended; but the Dutch statesman, De Witt, would not consent to this. He had secretly resolved to strike a blow to regain the honour of his country; for he had learnt that the English fleet was left in a dilapidated and unguarded position. The truth was, that Charles had been spending the money which was intended for its assistance, in paying the great debts arising from his profligate pleasures. The Dutch, early in June, 1667, unexpectedly sailed into the Downs with a fleet of eighty vessels, besides fire-ships; blocked up the mouths of the Medway and the Thames; took Sheerness and destroyed its fortifications; broke down the defences of booms and chains thrown across the river, and sailed up as far as Chatham on one side, and Gravesend on the other, destroying all the English shipping they encountered, and spreading terror throughout the land. It was feared that they might even sail up to London itself. To prevent this calamity, nine ships were sunk at Woolwich, and four at Blackwall, for the purpose of blocking up the river; platforms of artillery were raised; the train-bands called out; and all was terror and confusion.

After doing an immense deal of mischief, and insulting our coasts, the Dutch returned home in triumph. Peace was then concluded at Breda, the treaty being signed on the 21st of July; and the English compelled to put up with their disgrace, and adopt a very humble tone. In the time of Elizabeth or Cromwell, such an aggression as this would not have been permitted to pass unavenged; but the energies of Englishmen seemed to be debased and crippled by the government of the supine and pleasure-loving Charles.

The disgraceful result of this contest with Holland led to the downfall of Charles's minister, Lord Clarendon —a man whose great talents were disgraced by his tyrannical principles. The people hated him, and said he was the cause of all their misfortunes; and a sort of league was formed against him by several members of the court and the House of Commons. Clarendon had been a faithful servant—indeed, almost a slave to the king, constantly doing such things in his cause as every just and noble mind would shrink from; but Charles at once abandoned him. He pretended, however, to be favourably disposed towards his old minister, and advised him to resign the seals, to avoid being impeached of treason. With much unwillingness, Clarendon at length complied. This, however, did not save him from the anger of the nation: he was impeached as a traitor, and fled to France just in time to save himself from being committed to the Tower. A sentence of banishment was then recorded against him: he lived in disgrace and exile for nearly seven years, and died of apoplexy, at Rouen, on the 9th of September, 1674.

Two events that occurred before Clarendon's flight, show the great intolerance of the English government. The first was the passing, by the parliament which met at Oxford in the year of the plague, of the Five Mile Act. This infamous law declared that every Nonconformist clergyman who taught in any school, or came within five miles (except as a traveller in passing) of any city or town where he had preached or taught since the passing of the Act of Uniformity, should be fined £40, and suffer six months' imprisonment, unless he had taken the oath of non-resistance. This bill was brought forward by the clergy, who, not content with removing their Presbyterian brethren from the church, wished by this means to ruin and crush them utterly.

The other event was an insurrection of the Covenanters in Scotland, provoked by the merciless barbarities of the Earl of Lauderdale and Archbishop Sharp. The latter was resolved that the people should adopt the episcopal form of religion, which they resolutely rejected. Troops of dragoons were employed to force them into compliance; and shameful cruelty was used, because they would not abandon a form of religion they loved. At length about 2,000 of the people rose in arms; but they were soon defeated, and the archbishop caused eleven of them to be hanged, on the 7th of December, 1666, upon one gibbet at Edinburgh. Thirty-five more were also executed in other parts of the country. But this was not all: many were subjected to a shocking kind of torture, called "the boot"—a frightful instrument, in which the legs of the victims were crushed to pieces. One enthusiastic young minister, named Maccail, was tortured in a hideous manner, and then put to death. He died in an ecstacy of fanatic joy, exclaiming, "Farewell, sun, moon, and stars; farewell world and time; farewell weak and frail body; welcome eternity; welcome angels and saints; welcome Saviour of the world; and welcome God, the judge of all!" By such savage means as these people were forced to go to church; and the archbishop thought he had attained his purpose, unaware of the fate that awaited him.

After the fall of Clarendon, the authority of government was exercised by five persons, who, on account of the first letters of their names, were called the CABAL, as their initials put together spelt that word. They were—Sir Thomas Clifford, the Earl of Arlington, the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Ashley (afterwards the famous and eccentric Earl of Shaftesbury), and the Duke of Lauderdale. "To be a real, hearty, deadly enemy of the liberties and religion of the nation," says an eminent writer, "was in that dark conclave an honourable distinction." About this time a wise measure was carried out: it was a triple alliance, concluded on the 28th of January, 1668, between England, Holland and Sweden, for the purpose of checking the enormous ambition of the French king, the celebrated Louis XIV.

But while Charles's ministers consented to this alliance publicly, they and the unprincipled king entered into a secret one with the French monarch; in which, with a shameful want of faith, the king promised to join in a war upon Holland, and publicly to proclaim himself a Catholic! in consideration of receiving a yearly pension from Louis of £200,000, and a French army to suppress any rebellion which might arise in England in consequence. Louis then presented to Charles a very beautiful and fascinating young lady, who became his mistress: the English king was so delighted with her, that he conferred on her the title of Duchess of Portsmouth—probably not suspecting that she was placed near him as a spy, to reveal his secrets to the court of France.

Soon after, the Pension Parliament met again, and was as submissive as ever to the king's wishes. One gentleman, however, Sir John Coventry, made an observation which reflected on the king's immoral conduct, and Charles did not receive the remark with his usual good-humour. Coventry suffered for his boldness. Instigated by the Duke of Monmouth, two officers of the guards—Sir John Sandys, who was a lieutenant in the troop commanded by the duke, and O'Brien, a son of Lord Inchiquin—with several others, waylaid Sir John on the night of the 21st of December, 1670, with an intention to "mark him." They attacked him in the street, where he defended himself very bravely, and wounded several. At length he was overpowered and disarmed, and they then cut his nose to the bone, to teach him "to remember the respect he owed to the king." The Commons, indignant at this outrage, passed, before their prorogation, on the 22nd of April, 1671, an act "to prevent malicious maiming and wounding," which is still in force, and known as "The Coventry Act."

Another event that took place about this time brought great dishonour upon the king. A powerful and desperate ruffian, named Colonel Blood, resolved, for some injury he presumed he had received, to be revenged upon the Duke of Ormond. Assisted by five fellows of his own stamp, he surprised the duke as that nobleman was returning, in the night of the 6th of December, from a public dinner in the city. Having dragged him from his carriage, they bound him, and, mounting him on horseback behind one of them, galloped off in the direction of Tyburn, with an intention of hanging him upon the public gibbet there. The duke struggled so violently, that he and the fellow who rode before him rolled from the horse together, and the duke's servants came up and rescued him. Blood and his companions fired their pistols at him, though without effect, and rode off.

So profligate was the court of Charles, that the Duke of Buckingham was generally suspected of having instigated Blood to this infamous attempt. Ormond's son, Lord Ossary, a gallant young soldier, soon after went to court, and was surprised to see Buckingham standing by the side of the king. The anger of the young noble was roused, and his face flushed as he said to Buckingham—"My lord, I know that you are at the bottom of this late attempt upon my father; but I give you warning—if by any means he come to a violent end, I shall not be at a loss to know the author. I shall consider you as the assassin; and wherever I meet you I shall pistol you, though you stood behind the king's chair; and I tell it you in his majesty's presence, that you may be sure I shall keep my word."

Although a great reward had been offered for the apprehension of the ruffians who had attempted the duke's life, Blood was not discovered until, on the 9th of May, 1671, he was arrested in the perpetration of another audacious crime. This was an attempt to steal the crown and regalia from the Tower. Having, in conjunction with some desperate associates, visited the jewel-house under pretence of seeing the emblems of royalty, they wounded, bound, and gagged Mr. Edwards, the aged keeper, and carried away the crown and sceptre; but fortunately, the robbers were arrested before they had time to escape altogether.

One of these ruffians was recognised as having been concerned in the attack on the Duke of Ormond, and it was directly supposed that Blood was the ringleader in that affair. The king was seized with a vulgar desire to see and speak to so bold a villain, and Blood was brought before him. There his conduct was just as audacious as his other exploits. He impudently avowed his crimes, and seemed to glory in them. His attempt to carry off the crown, he said, he could not deny; and that on the Duke of Ormond, he would not. When asked who were his accomplices, he replied that he would never betray a friend's life, nor ever deny his guilt, to save his own. He even confessed that, instigated by the severity exercised over the consciences of the godly in restraining the liberty of their religious assemblies, he had once intended to shoot the king, and had gone to Battersea for that purpose, when Charles was swimming in the Thames; but that his heart failed him at the sight of majesty, and he abandoned his wicked design. Charles was pleased with this bit of gross flattery; and, to the surprise of every one, not only pardoned Blood, but gave him an estate in Ireland, worth £500 per annum, and even made quite a companion of him. Some supposed that Charles did it out of fear of Blood, and from a desire to secure his own safety; for the villain had said that he was indifferent to either life or death; but that he felt it a duty to warn the king of the danger which would attend his execution, as his comrades, who were very numerous, had bound themselves, by the most solemn oaths, to avenge the death of any of their members, and that no power or precaution could elude their attempts.—While the villain Blood was thus rewarded for attempting to steal the crown, poor old Mr. Edwards, who had been nearly killed in his attempts to defend it, was left unnoticed.

To relate all the events of this busy, though worthless time, would alone fill many volumes; only the most important can be alluded to. Charles, in the year 1672, by the advice of the Cabal ministry, shut up the exchequer—a public fraud, by which he gained about £1,500,000; but thousands of persons were reduced to ruin or great distress. On the 15th of March, in the same year, Charles, still aiming at the restoration of popery, and not having the courage to keep his word with the French king, and publicly profess it, exercised his power as head of the church, and issued a second Declaration of Indulgence. By this declaration, all penal laws were suspended against dissenters and Roman Catholics; Protestant dissenters were allowed publicly to perform the rites of their religion, and papists to exercise the functions of theirs, in private houses. This act, though proper in itself, was done for so mischievous a purpose, and in so illegal a manner, that it only irritated the nation.

In spite of his alliance with Holland against France, Charles, on the 27th of March, declared war against Holland, and prepared to assist France in its subjugation. Hostilities began by an attack on the Dutch Smyrna fleet, made before war was declared—a disgraceful act, "worthy," as a modern historian declares, "of a band of pirates rather than of a great nation." One Dutch man-of-war, and three or four merchantmen, of little value, were taken; but the rest of the fleet got safe into port. On the 28th of May, a great sea-fight took place off Solebay, in which the brave Dutch defended their national independence against the combined fleets of England and France. The conflict was a severe one, and the English admiral, Lord Sandwich, was killed; but neither side gained a victory. The ambitious Louis then poured his immense armies across the Rhine into the United Provinces, as the republic of Holland was called. The Dutch were, at first, seized with despair; but, after a time, they recovered their spirits, and, under the command of the Prince of Orange, checked the progress of the French. Charles sent a little army of 6,000 men to Holland to assist his ally; but the French and English together were not able to conquer the Dutch, though they suffered great losses. Charles concluded a separate peace with Holland on the 19th of February, 1674, by which all possessions were restored to the same condition as before the war; and the Dutch paid to England 800,000 crowns (near £300,000). The war with France continued till 1678, when it was concluded by the peace of Nimeguen, signed on the 4th of August, and which contained terms very favourable to France; many towns captured by Louis's army being retained.

On the 4th of February, 1673, the parliament met, after a long recess. Extreme Royalists as most of the members were, they were indignant at the late proceedings of the king and his Cabal ministry. They were incensed at the manner in which Charles had issued the late Declaration of Indulgence, and passed a resolution, "That penal statutes, in matters ecclesiastical, cannot be suspended by an act of parliament, and that an address and petition for satisfaction should be presented to the king." Charles was offended; but he saw, from the temper of the parliament, that resistance was useless, therefore he cancelled the Declaration of Indulgence, and even gave his sanction to a bill called the Test Act, to check the growth of popery. This intolerant law decreed, that every person who refused to receive the sacrament according to the church of England, and formally to renounce the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, should be excluded from all public employments. When this law passed, the king's brother, James, resigned his office of high admiral of the fleet, and soon afterwards publicly adopted the Catholic religion. This was at least honest, however wrong and imprudent; but the king would have taken fifty sacraments in an hypocritical manner, and have broken fifty oaths, sooner than have resigned the slightest advantage. He, too, was a papist at heart; but he thought his brother's open conduct perfectly absurd.

The Cabal ministry now came to an end; and the Earl of Shaftesbury, who saw that nothing more was to be got by advocating popery and despotism, changed his principles and turned patriot. In fact, this bad but brilliant man, who had done his best to crush what little remained of English liberty, seeing that the Commons possessed so much power, joined the Liberal party to secure his own safety.

During the year 1676, Charles, who would do anything for money, gladly became a pensioner of the French king, who engaged to pay him a yearly sum of £100,000—a sum which he afterwards doubled. This was given to bind the English king to his service, and that he might be permitted to carry on his schemes of gigantic ambition without interruption. Of course this disgraceful bargain was kept a secret from the country. The following year (1677), the Prince of Orange visited England, and was married, on the 4th of November, to Charles's niece, the eldest daughter of the Duke of York. In after-times very important things arose from this marriage.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE SECOND.—A.D. 1678—1680.

THE alliance with France was very unpopular with the English people. As time progressed, and Charles's connection with Louis became more intimate, violent jealousies against the court began to be excited; there were also many rumours of noblemen—the Lord Treasurer, Earl Danby, amongst them—being bribed with French gold. Excitement against popery was also increasing: it was believed that an attempt was to be made to re-establish that religion; and the sects drew nearer to the church, under the conviction that another struggle with the "Man of Sin," as the pope was deemed, was at hand. This feeling was gaining strength day by day, when the nation was alarmed with the cry of a POPISH PLOT.

On the 12th of August, 1678, the king was walking in St. James's Park, when a man, named Kirby, thus addressed him—"Sir, keep within the company; your enemies have a design upon your life; and you may be shot in this very walk." Charles appointed a meeting with this person, who then informed him that two men, named Grove and Pickering, had engaged to shoot him, and that Sir George Wakeman, the queen's physician, had been bribed to poison him. He added, he had been told this by one Dr. Tongue, a Protestant clergyman, whom, if he were permitted, he would introduce to the king. Charles consented to see the clergyman, who brought with him a great roll of papers, containing the full particulars of the supposed plot, drawn out under forty-three heads. The king was too idle to read this long account: he suspected the whole affair was a mere invention, and he referred the matter to the Earl of Danby, his prime minister.

Dr. Tongue told the minister that he had not written the papers, but that they had been thrust under his door by a man whom he had seen, and thought he could produce, though he was not acquainted with him. He added, that this man wished his name to be kept secret, lest he should be murdered by the papists. The Earl of Danby wanted to arrest all the persons named in the roll of papers as conspirators; but the king would not permit this, and treated the whole affair as an impudent fabrication. Dr. Tongue, however, was not to be discouraged, and he informed Danby that a packet of letters was to be that night put into the post, directed to Bennifield, the confessor to the Duke of York, and that they contained further revelations. These letters had already (on the 31st of August) been received by Bennifield, who had shown them to the duke, saying, that he knew they were not in the handwriting of the persons whose names were attached to them, and that he feared there was some malignant design against him. This clumsy forgery was thus detected; and, in spite of the excited state of the nation about popery, the whole affair might have been forgotten, had it not been for a mysterious incident which has never yet been either explained or understood.

Titus Oates, the person whom Dr. Tongue said had thrust the papers containing the particulars of the plot beneath his door, suddenly made his appearance. Presenting himself before Sir Edmonbury Godfrey, an active magistrate of Westminster, he not only took his oath that the plot he had spoken of was a real one, but he added thirty-eight more articles to the original list of headings. Titus Oates was then summoned before the council of state, and there he delivered the following extraordinary narrative.

The pope, he said, claimed possession of the sovereignty of England, on account of the heresy of the king and the people, and had given his supreme authority over it to the Society of Jesuits. That the Jesuits, in consequence, had undertaken to expel the Protestant religion, and restore the Catholic faith. That the king, whom they called the Black Bastard, was to be murdered. That £10,000 had been offered to the queen's physician if he would poison Charles; that he himself had been urged to shoot him; and that Grove and Pickering had agreed to shoot him with silver bullets. That a wager had been laid that the king should eat no more Christmas pies; and that if he would not become R. C. (Roman Catholic), he should no longer be C. R. (Charles Rex.) That the Jesuits had been the authors of the great fire of London; and that they had resolved to burn all the chief cities of England. That there were 20,000 papists in London who would rise in insurrection at a day's notice; and Jennison, a Jesuit, had said that they might easily cut the throats of 100,000 Protestants. That the pope, by a secret bull, had filled up all the bishoprics and dignities in the church, and appointed Lord Arundel to be Chancellor; Lord Powis, Treasurer; Sir William Godolphin, Privy Seal; Mr. Coleman (secretary to the Duke of York), to be the Secretary of State; Mr. Langhorne, Attorney-General; Lord Bellasis, General of the Papal Army; Lord Petre, Lieutenant-General; Lord Stafford, Paymaster; and that inferior commissions were to be given to other Catholic gentlemen all over England. That Coleman had sent £200,000 to Ireland to carry out the rebellion there, and the French king was to assist by landing an army on that island. That after the murder of the king, the crown was to be offered to the Catholic Duke of York, on condition that he consented to receive it as a gift from the pope, to pardon the murderers of his brother, and utterly to extirpate the Protestant religion: if he would not consent to these demands, he also was to be put to death.

Titus Oates, who pretended to have got all this information, was a worthless fellow, whose word could not be relied on. He was the son of an Anabaptist preacher; was born in 1619; and having received a university education, took orders in the church. After having obtained a living, he was indicted for perjury, and saved himself from punishment by flight. Notwithstanding this, he obtained a situation as chaplain on board the fleet, but was dismissed on account of his shameful conduct. He then became a convert to the papists, though he afterwards boasted that this conversion was only a pretence, in order to learn their secrets and betray them. After he had lived for some time at the College of Jesus, at St. Omer's, the Jesuits got tired of him, and dismissed him; and it is very likely that want, and a feeling of revenge, induced him to contrive the plot of which he accused the Catholics. At the same time, it is probable that while he lived among the Jesuits he may have heard some wild talk about the best means for restoring popery in England, which supplied him with hints for his improbable revelations.

Oates was asked if he had any letters or papers in evidence of the truth of what he asserted; but he had not a scrap. The second time he was examined, the king was present in the council, and convicted him of gross prevarication. Still the matter became the subject of general attention; and Coleman, the Duke of York's secretary, who was mentioned by Oates as the principal conspirator, was arrested.

Now came the mysterious event that gave an air of truth to the whole affair. Sir Edmonbury Godfrey, the magistrate who had taken Oates's deposition, after having been missed for six days, was discovered, on the 17th of October, lying dead in a ditch near Primrose Hill. The Catholics declared that he must have committed suicide; but from the appearance of the corpse, that was impossible. His own sword was thrust through his body; but there was no blood upon his clothes, and his shoes were quite clean, which they would scarcely have been if he had walked to that country spot in the month of October. His money was in his pocket, and his rings upon his fingers; but his neck was broken, and around it a livid mark, about an inch broad, which showed plainly enough that he had been strangled. Besides this, his breast was covered with bruises, which looked as if he had struggled violently; and every one declared that he must have been first murdered, and then carried to that obscure spot, where his sword had been thrust into him to lead people to believe he had destroyed himself.

To describe the excitement that prevailed throughout the country on the discovery of this dark crime, is impossible; a loud cry of terror and indignation resounded through the land; and the people became convinced that a horrible conspiracy existed among the papists to murder all the Protestants, and change the religion of England. The funeral of the unfortunate magistrate was attended by an immense procession, headed by seventy-two Protestant clergymen: every one dreaded assassination, and the citizens placed London in a state of defence. By whom, or for what purpose, Sir Edmonbury Godfrey was murdered, is known only to God. He might have been put to death by some zealous popish ruffians; but if so, his murder seems to have had no connection with the plot spoken of by Oates.

Another circumstance helped to keep up the alarm and the excitement of the nation. The duke's secretary, Coleman, had destroyed most of his papers; but a few letters remained, which contained some startling expressions. They were addressed to Father la Chaise, confessor to the French king, and to the pope's nuncio at Brussels. Their object was to obtain money from the pope to re-establish the Catholic religion in England. In one of these letters Coleman said—"We are about a great work—no less than the conversion of three kingdoms, and the total and utter subversion and subduing of that pestilent heresy which has domineered over great part of this northern world a long time; there never was such hope of success since the death of Queen Mary as now in our days." If letters containing many similar passages to this had been overlooked through negligence, what might not be expected from those which had been destroyed? There is little doubt that a scheme against the religion and liberty of the country was on foot, and that both the king and the Duke of York were concerned in it; but that plot, and the one that Oates had fabricated, had no connection, though the nation now insisted on confounding them together. In consequence of these letters, Coleman was condemned and executed as a traitor.

On the 21st of October, while the country was in this state of excitement, the parliament met; and the members gave full credit to the revelations of Titus Oates. Calling him before them, they proclaimed him the saviour of the nation, and gave him a pension of £1,200 a year, and a guard to protect him from being murdered. They also committed the Catholic lords—Stafford, Powis, Petre, Arundel, and Bellasis—to the Tower; and both houses voted, "That the Lords and Commons are of opinion, that there hath been, and still is, a hellish plot, contrived and carried on by the popish recusants, for assassinating the king, for subverting the government, and for rooting out and destroying the Protestant religion."

The great reward bestowed upon Titus Oates encouraged another vagabond to act a similar part. This was William Bedloe. He had been a stable-boy, but had risen to be a gentleman's courier, in which situation he had travelled over many parts of Europe. For a long time he got a living by swindling, and had more than once been imprisoned for theft. A reward of £500 being offered for the discovery of the murderers of Sir Edmonbury Godfrey, this man came forward and declared he could reveal them. He said that the murder had been committed at Somerset House, where the queen lived; that he had himself seen the body there: and that Le Fevre, a Jesuit, had told him, that he and another priest, together with some of the queen's servants, had smothered the magistrate, and, several nights afterwards, removed his body to the ditch where he was afterwards found. This fellow equivocated terribly; and, on his second examination, pretended to have a knowledge of the plot as well as of the murder. Then he said, that while travelling abroad, he had mixed with the Jesuits, from whom he had learnt that the king was to be murdered; that an army of 10,000 men was to be landed at Hull: that 20,000 or 30,000 pilgrims were to arrive from Spain; and that by their means the English army, the citizens of London, and all persons noted for Protestantism, were to be massacred. This shocking plot, he added, was known to all the considerable Catholics in England, who had been sworn upon the sacrament to assist in its execution.

Though this statement was plainly a pack of impudent falsehoods, which there was not one jot of evidence to prove, yet it obtained pretty general belief, and the consternation of the people rose into a perfect storm of excitement and fury. Oates was afraid of being outdone in lying; and as he knew that Charles had a dislike to the queen, he accused that neglected lady of a plot to murder her husband, and even impeached her of treason at the bar of the House of Commons. But this seemed too incredible: Charles was angry, and the matter was allowed to drop.

Now came the tragic part of the business—the trial and execution of the persons denounced by Oates as being concerned in the plot. Stayley, a Catholic banker, was executed; Grove, Pickering, and Father Ireland were put to death for the assumed intention of murdering the king. Three men, named Hill, Green, and Bury, were also hanged for the murder of the magistrate, on the evidence of Bedloe and a silversmith, named Prance, whose statements were drawn from him by torture, and afterwards solemnly denied.

Shortly after these sad events, Charles's minister, the Earl of Danby, was impeached by the Commons, because they discovered some letters written by him to the French king, begging money for his own sovereign. This money was of course to be the price of some political treachery; and as the letters were written by Charles's orders, he felt bound to protect his own minister. He therefore dissolved the parliament, to prevent it from carrying on the impeachment. The dissolution took place on the 24th of January, 1679, after the House of Commons had sat for more than seventeen years.

The king's want of money obliged him to summon another parliament immediately. During the elections there was a strong contest of parties; the court interested itself actively in the proceedings; but such was the strong torrent of prejudice, and strong religious faith united, that no influence could prevail against it. The consequence was, that the great majority of the new parliament was composed of the court and ministry, and haters of popery. Indeed, the feeling of the country was so alarming, that Charles persuaded his popish brother, James, to retire for a time to Brussels. The new parliament assembled on the 6th of March, 1679. Its first act was, to proceed with the impeachment of the king's minister, the Earl of Danby. The king did all he could to shield the earl; but Danby, after seeking his safety in flight, surrendered himself on the 16th of April, and was committed to the Tower.

Charles wished to replace Danby by Sir William Temple, a statesman who had distinguished himself on several occasions. By his recommendation, with a view to avert the jealousies of the people, and restore confidence between them and the sovereign, a new privy council of thirty persons was constituted, amongst whom were the most popular opponents of the court party; and the chief power of the state was to be given into their hands. The head of this council was the changeable Earl of Shaftesbury, who still did all in his power to vex the king and his partisans. He even prevailed on the Commons to pass a bill excluding the Duke of York from the throne, because he was a papist; but it was rejected by the House of Lords when sent to them for their sanction. The Commons, however, resolved to curb the power of the king, which they felt had for some time been growing so great as to threaten the extinction of the national freedom. They declared a standing army and the king's guards to be illegal; they began to examine into pensions and secret service money; and passed the famous Habeas Corpus Act, which is very justly considered one of the bulwarks of English liberty. By it, any person committed to prison can demand his habeas corpus—that is, a writ from a judge commanding his gaolers to produce him in court, and publicly state the cause of his arrest and imprisonment. Then, if no crime is proved against him, he can demand his discharge, and, after having been set at liberty by order of the court, he can never be re-committed for the same offence. This act prevented all despotic imprisonments of those who had incurred the displeasure of the king.

The trial of Danby and the five papist lords also imprisoned in the Tower, had been proceeded with. It gave rise to a dispute between the Lords and Commons, as to the right of the bishops to vote on that trial; and the Commons were preparing a remonstrance, which would have still more inflamed the minds of the nation against popery. With a view to put a stop to the quarrel between the two Houses, and to prevent the appeal to the people, Charles, on the 13th of May, prorogued parliament; and, on the 10th of July, dissolved the Commons without the consent of the council of thirty. Great excitement prevailed in consequence; and the Earl of Shaftesbury even declared publicly that he would have the head of the man who advised the king to take that step.

Before another parliament assembled more persons fell victims to the pretended plot. Five unhappy Jesuits, named Whitbread (the provincial), Fenwick, Harcourt, Gavan, and Turner, together with Langhorne, a famous Catholic lawyer, were, on the 13th of June, condemned for being concerned in that assumed conspiracy, and, on the 28th, were all executed. Titus Oates, the chief witness against them, was afterwards convicted of having perjured himself upon this occasion. The queen's physician, Sir George Wakeman, who had been accused of accepting a bribe to poison the king, was also tried, but acquitted. But such was the fear and hatred of popery now felt by the people, that eight Catholic priests were soon after executed, merely for performing the rites of their religion.

Before this event, Archbishop Sharp had been put to death by the Covenanters in Scotland. Six years before, he had been fired at by an enthusiast, named Mitchel, though the assassin missed his aim; but the gray hairs of the priest were doomed to descend to a blood-stained grave. The Scottish people, who still bitterly hated the episcopal church which had been forced upon them, were treated with great severity by Sharp and the Duke of Lauderdale, who governed their country. The Covenanters, driven out of their chapels, and not even permitted to meet for religious worship in each other's houses, took to the field and forest, and praised God in their own way under the magnificent blue vault of heaven.

Even there they were not allowed to assemble in safety; and regiments of dragoons were employed by Lauderdale to disperse these prayer-meetings, and arrest those who attended them. Death and a confiscation of all their property was the punishment decreed against such as were taken. A large reward was also offered to those who would seize any of these unhappy men, and they were to be held guiltless of any murder they might commit in doing so. The persecuted Covenanters were obliged to arm in self-defence; and they went to their prayer-meetings in the wild leafy temples of nature, with a Bible in one hand and a sharp broadsword in the other. Many times were their congregations alarmed by the appearance of the king's troops: there was a cloud of dust, a cry of terror, a savage attack, and soon the wild moor or romantic hill-side was wet with blood, and dotted with the ghastly corpses of those who, but a few minutes before, were peacefully uttering the words of prayer or thanksgiving to their God. When the royal troops, or the human bloodhounds of Sharp and Lauderdale, were victorious in these wild conflicts, they are said (we hope untruly) to have spared no one—man or woman, white-haired grandfather, or little rosy-lipped, lisping child. At one field conventicle alone, it is recorded that upwards of 100 unoffending persons were thus slaughtered in cold blood.

The wretched Covenanters were driven into a state of frenzy; and a band of them resolved to take the life of a ruffian, named Carmichael, who was employed by Archbishop Sharp in arresting those who would not conform to the church. On Saturday, the 3rd of May, 1679, they laid wait for him by the road-side, intending to put him to death as he returned from hunting on the moors. By some accident they missed him, and were about to separate and return to their homes, when a little boy cried out, "There goes the bishop!" Looking in the direction the child pointed, they saw the coach of Archbishop Sharp approaching, drawn by six horses. "Truly," said one of them, "this is of God; the Lord hath delivered the wretch into our hands."

This saying was recognised as a truth by that little band of fanatics; and, in an instant, nine armed horsemen were in pursuit of the archbishop, against whom they were the more enraged for his having left the Presbyterian church; allured, as they believed, by the wealth and position offered him in the episcopal one. When he beheld them he turned to his daughter, who sat by his side, and exclaimed, "The Lord have mercy on me, my dear child, for I am gone!" The assassins then dragged him from the carriage, and, notwithstanding his appeals for mercy, and the tears and cries of his daughter, slew him with many wounds. After this, they retired, and spent the rest of the day in prayer; for they sincerely believed that, in thus destroying the persecutor of their brethren, they were doing an act acceptable in the sight of God. Still it was a murder—an awful and irrevocable crime, hateful to the Almighty, and condemned by human laws. It gave the ministers a pretext—which they eagerly seized—for more violent persecutions against the fanatics.

There was great joy in Scotland when the death of the archbishop was known. On the 29th of the same month (the anniversary of Charles's restoration), a body of armed men entered Rutherglen, a small borough near Glasgow, put out the bonfires that were burning in honour of the king, and fixed a declaration against bishops to the market-cross. An insurrection followed; and the Covenanters were defeated in an engagement at Bothwell Bridge, fought on Sunday, the 22nd of June. The vanquished were not treated with so much severity as might have been expected; for Charles was alarmed, knowing that a large party in England wished well to the Covenanters, and would have joined them had they been successful.

There had been so much excitement about plots, and the discoverers had been so handsomely rewarded, that a vagabond named Dangerfield—a fellow who had been branded, whipped, and pilloried as a felon—pretended that he had discovered a plot of the Presbyterians against the life and government of the king. Charles was pleased that a conspiracy was charged against those whom he considered his enemies, and gave the man forty guineas; but he was only a clumsy rogue, and his plot was so evident a forgery, that nobody believed it. Dangerfield soon saw that he had made a mistake, and that to get up an excitement he must find out a popish plot, and not a Presbyterian one. Therefore he altered his plan, and declared that he had been induced, by some Catholic ladies, to invent a sham plot of the Presbyterians, for the purpose of directing attention from a real one by the Catholics. He added, that documents in proof of this second plot would be found in a meal-tub, in the house of Mrs. Cellier, a Catholic midwife. This foolish affair was therefore called "The Meal-tub Plot." The papers were certainly found, because Dangerfield had put them in the tub; and Mrs. Cellier was sent to prison. The informer, however, fell into contempt, and in the next reign he was severely punished for his imposture.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES THE SECOND.—A.D. 1680—1685.

THE Duke of York had returned from abroad; and the bold and talented Earl of Shaftesbury attended in Westminster Hall, followed by many nobles and gentlemen, and presented to the grand jury of Middlesex reasons for indicting him as a popish recusant. The result of this resolute act might have been the prosecution of the heir to the throne as a felon, had not the judges in alarm dismissed the jury. Charles had an illegitimate son, on whom he had bestowed the title of Duke of Monmouth. He was a Protestant, and much looked up to by the people; for there was a story abroad that the king had really been married to his mother, and that he was the true heir to the throne. This was not the case; and Charles had even publicly declared him to be illegitimate. But Monmouth hoped to succeed his father on the throne, and there was a bitter jealousy in consequence between him and the Duke of York. The popish duke, however, was so much hated, that the king thought it necessary to desire him to retire to Edinburgh. He also sent Monmouth to the continent.

The parliament assembled on the 21st of October, 1680, when the excitement about the popish plot and the hatred of popery was just as violent as ever. The infamous Dangerfield even accused the Duke of York of instigating him, not only to frame his false plot against the Presbyterians, but even to murder the king. This, very probably, was believed; but the Commons proceeded to consider how they should suppress popery, and prevent a popish successor to the crown. For this purpose they brought forward the famous Exclusion Bill, by which the Duke of York was to be rendered incapable of ever becoming king. It passed the Commons in November by a great majority, but was rejected by the Lords, on the 15th of that month, by a majority of 63 against 30.

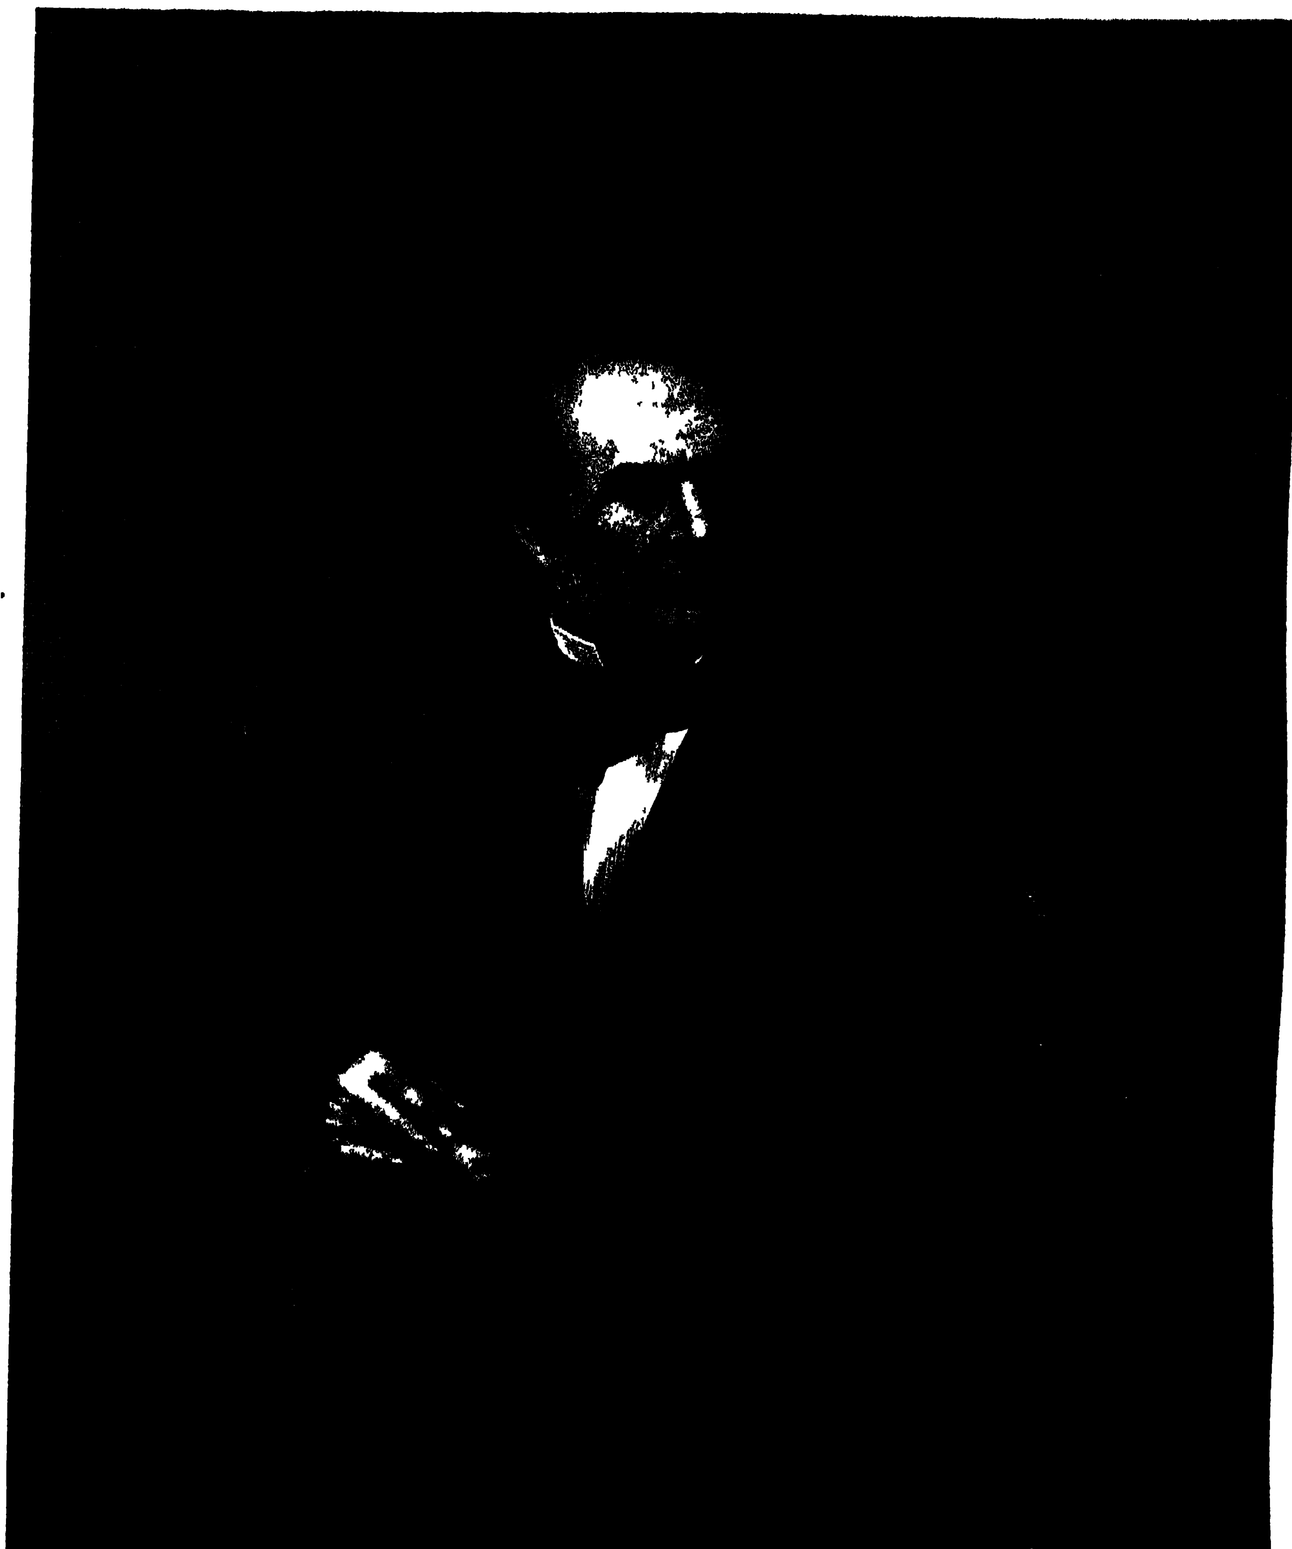
Disappointed on this subject, the Commons resolved to wreak their anger on the Catholic lords in the Tower, who had been arrested in consequence of the revelations of Titus Oates about the pretended popish plot. Lord Stafford, an aged peer, was tried for being concerned in it. The trial continued from the 30th of November to the 7th of December, when the noble earl was condemned, chiefly on the evidence of Oates. He was executed on the 29th of December, though generally believed to be innocent. His was the last blood shed on account of that infamous imposture.



Still the Commons persevered about the Exclusion Bill, and refused to vote the king any supplies of money without it. They also brought forward bills for banishing the most distinguished papists of the country; for getting up a Protestant association against popery; for making the raising of money without the consent of parliament high treason; for securing the regular meeting of parliament; and for dismissing corrupt judges. They then addressed a remonstrance to the king, requiring him to consent to the exclusion of his brother from the throne. Charles replied that he could not consent to a bill which had been rejected by the Lords; but he said he would join them in passing any measures for the safety of the Protestant religion, and reminded them that he must have some supplies. The excitement of the Commons rose into fury, and they resolved that no money should be granted to the king until he would consent to the exclusion of the Duke of York. The storm of revolution was gathering; and it seemed as if another war would break out between the king and the parliament—such a war as might, perhaps, lead Charles to perish on the scaffold at Whitehall, as his father had done. He therefore, on the 8th of January, 1681, prorogued the two Houses; and, on the 19th, dissolved the Commons. On the morning of prorogation that House passed some startling votes; the chief of which was, that all who attempted to defeat the Exclusion Bill were traitors, who had sold the interests of their country to France.

Charles appointed a new parliament to meet at Oxford, where it was opened on the 21st of March. Both king and parliament went to that city surrounded by guards, servants, and friends; and the party opposed to the court wore ribbons round their hats, with the inscription of "No popery! No slavery!" Charles tried to make up matters; but this parliament was just as resolved upon the exclusion of the Duke of York from the succession as the last had been. Determined not to sacrifice his brother (the only person for whom he seems not to have felt a selfish indifference), and perplexed as to what he should do, Charles dissolved this parliament after it had sat only a week. He never called another during the four remaining years of his life.

Not long before, the party words WHIG and TORY first came into use—foolish terms, as all nicknames are; yet they have continued in use to the present day; though the Tory party now is slowly disappearing. Those statesmen who still retain the Tory opinions hold them in a much milder form, and call themselves Conservatives: from "to conserve" or preserve the laws and customs of past times—a thing which it is only wise to do when those laws and customs are good and useful ones; and the Conservatives profess that they wish to preserve no others. The Tories of Charles's time, however, taught that kings reigned by divine right; that they could not err; that the duty of all subjects was passive obedience; that they had no right even to question what the king did; and that no tyranny, no cruelty, no wrong, however monstrous on his part, could justify resistance to his will. They held the church in a similar veneration; and argued, that the people ought to pay a blind, unreasoning submission to the bishops, under all circumstances, even though those bishops (as was too often the case) were slavish parasites, concealed papists, and acting in open defiance to the revealed will of God. The doctrines of the Tories were natural to wealthy and selfish men; but they tended to make the rich richer, the poor poorer, and to deprive the nation of all energy and spirit.

The principles of the Whigs were more liberal and generous. They taught that all power of the state was derived from the people; that the king had no right from heaven, but reigned by consent of the people, and was responsible to them for any gross misconduct. They respected the church and the bishops; but they regarded the latter as erring men, who were sometimes wrong in their decisions; and they maintained the glorious principle of the Reformation—that all persons had a right to read the Bible for themselves, and to exercise their own private judgment upon it, and that religion was a matter between them and their God.

Having dissolved his last parliament, Charles resolved to govern illegally without those assemblies, and to rule his people with a rod of iron. The Earl of Shaftesbury was arrested on a charge of instigating insurrection; and Stephen College, a joiner, famous for his zeal against popery, was tried for treason, because he had attended at Oxford, armed with a sword and pistols, while the parliament and the king were there. He was charged with having accused the king of tyranny and popery, and of having conspired to seize his person. This last was a falsehood, and Charles and his courtiers knew it; but they contrived to get the poor joiner hanged notwithstanding. He was condemned on the 17th, and executed on the 31st, of August. The Earl of Shaftesbury, however, was acquitted—to the great joy of the people, although many perjured witnesses were employed to crush him.

James, the Duke of York, had been for some time governing in Scotland, with the title of King's Commissioner; and he treated the unhappy people of that country with despotic severity. Liberty seemed crushed in Scotland, and the nation submitted in despair. But the courage of her people could never be quite extinguished even in that unhappy time. A band of Covenanters, led by a brave preacher, named Cameron, fixed, early in 1680, a paper to the market-cross of Sanquhar, in which they renounced Charles Stuart as their king; and, under the banner of the Lord Jesus Christ, declared war against him as a traitor and usurper; they also expressed their anger at having the Duke of York, a professed papist, set in authority over them. Poor Cameron and many of his followers were killed in an action with the king's troops at Aird's Moss, in June of that year. Donald Cargill, another enthusiastic preacher, then pronounced excommunication against King Charles, for what he truly called his mocking of God, his perjury, adultery, drunkenness, and dissembling with God and man. Donald Cargill also included the Duke of York, and other persecutors of his country, in this spiritual condemnation. This preacher was taken prisoner in the summer of 1681; and, with four of his followers, tried at Edinburgh, for rebellion, on the 26th of July: all were found guilty, and they were executed on the 27th. Still greater atrocities were committed, according to some authorities, while James remained in Scotland. One sufferer was the Earl of Argyll, who, for qualifying the test he took in the duke's presence, on the 3rd of November, as a privy councillor, and which passed unnoticed at the time, was, on the 9th, arrested. He was placed upon his trial on the 12th of December, and found guilty of treason and leasing-making. He made his escape from prison; but all his estates were confiscated. James returned to England at the close of 1681; and narrowly escaped being drowned on his passage.

At this time the Duke of Monmouth returned to England without his father's consent. He was a Protestant; and being a great favourite of the people, was received with enthusiasm. He made a stately progress through the kingdom with all the pomp of an actual sovereign, and adopted every means of endearing himself to the nation, in the hope of being made king after his father's death, instead of his popish uncle. At every place he dined he ordered 200 dishes to be prepared; and, at Liverpool, he even practised the royal blasphemy of touching persons afflicted with the king's evil. Though a man of no great heart or principle, he was exactly the person to become very popular. He was handsome, cheerful, gracious in his manners, graceful in his demeanour, and very skilful in all manly, country diversions, of which he was extremely fond. Everywhere the people welcomed him with shouts; but during this time the jealous Duke of York was at work, and Monmouth was suddenly arrested; but was soon liberated on bail.

Since Charles had so abruptly dissolved the parliament at Oxford, his power had been increasing, and he was now almost an absolute sovereign. The country thought he had been pressed too severely by the Liberals and the no-popery party, and the king's popularity revived. The power of the crown became immense, and he used it in an arbitrary manner. The citizens of London had always elected their own sheriffs; but, in 1682, Charles interfered, and two court partisans were placed in those important positions against the will of those citizens—sometimes called Whigs, and sometimes the country party. Charles's object was, that Tory sheriffs should appoint Tory juries, who would give any verdicts he might wish against such as opposed his despotism.

The effect of the king's interference in this way was soon discovered. A wealthy citizen, named Pilkington, who was a Whig, or patriot, had an action for libel brought against him by the Duke of York. Pilkington had refused, naturally enough, to join in a city deputation to congratulate James on his return from Scotland, and the refusal was uttered in an indecently violent manner. "He burnt the city at the time of the great fire," said Pilkington, "and he is now coming with his papists to cut our throats." The duke laid his damages at the enormous sum of £100,000, and the Tory judge and jury dishonestly awarded it. The object was utterly to ruin Mr. Pilkington, who was committed to prison because he would not pay such heavy damages. There he remained for some time, without a hope that he would ever be released and breathe the fresh air in freedom again.

After this, Charles determined to terrify the citizens into a servile submission to all his tyrannies. By some legal chicanery London was deprived of its charter, and only obtained it again on the mayor and council submitting to the most degrading interference, by the king, with their affairs. Other corporations were driven into a surrender of their charters, and large sums of money extorted before they were again granted. All offices of power and profit were now at the disposal of Charles; and no English sovereign ever exercised such despotic authority.

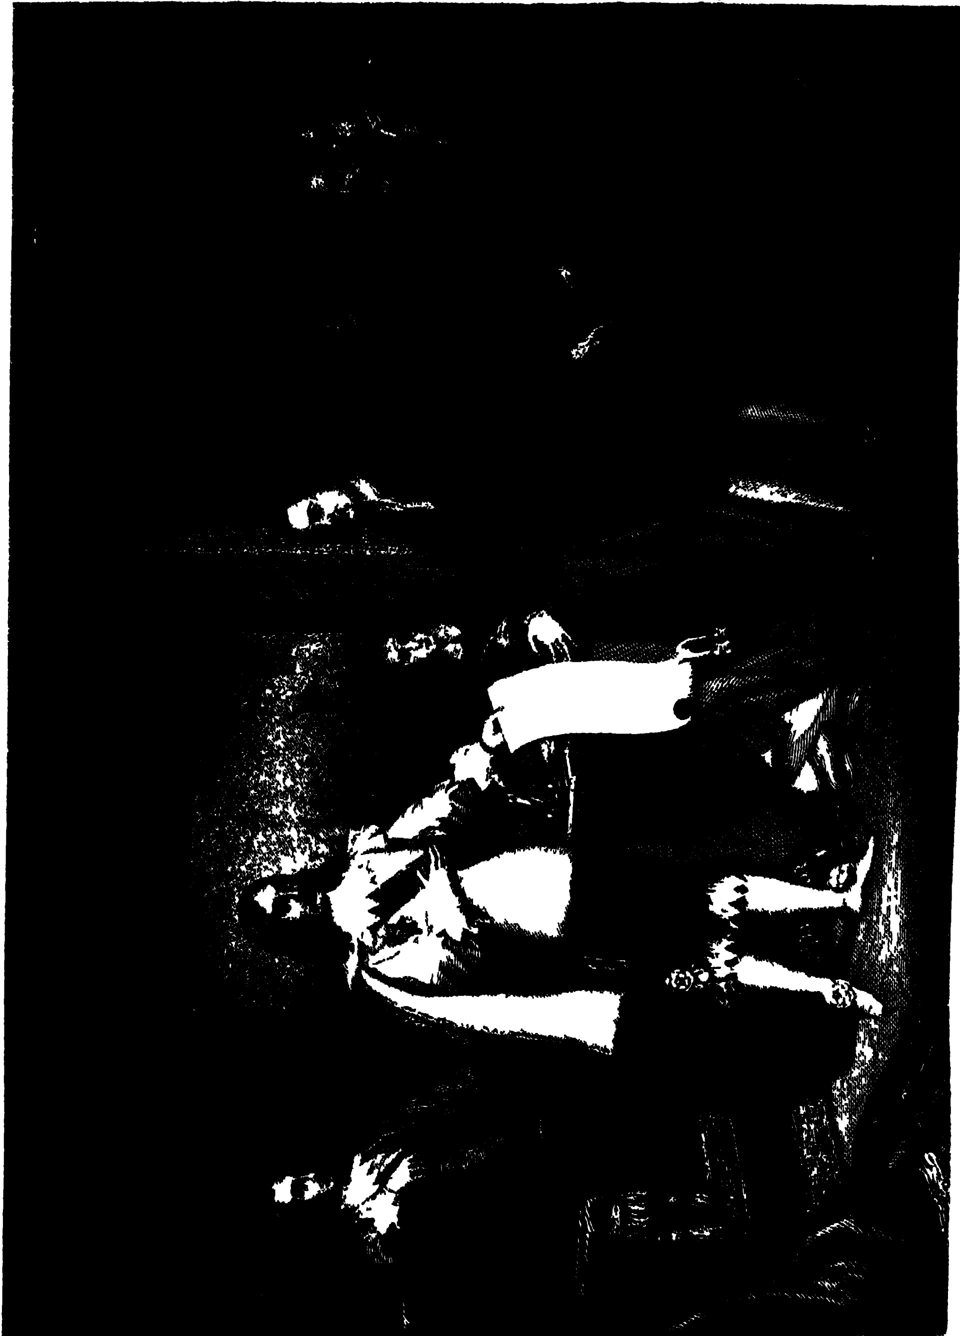
The Earl of Shaftesbury and other statesmen, who stood up for the liberty of the nation, now felt sure that their ruin, and the prostration of the English character, were sought for by the king and his corrupt courtiers. The wild, changeable Shaftesbury knew that there was no safety for him; for, in the heat of his temper, he had once declared, "That he would walk the king leisurely out of his dominions, and make the Duke of York a vagabond upon the earth, like Cain." Therefore, in the summer of 1682, he entered into a conspiracy against the king, in company with the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Russell, Lord Essex, Lord Howard, Mr. Algernon Sidney, and Mr. John Hampden, grandson of the great patriot. They were scarcely agreed among themselves as to what they intended to do; but all their schemes were desperate ones. Some wished to place Monmouth on the throne; others desired to restore the republic; but all wished to provide against tyranny and popery by driving Charles and his brother James from the country.



The Earl of Shaftesbury undertook to raise 10,000 "brisk boys" in the city; while the other conspirators were to induce the people to rise in arms in various parts of the kingdom. But the dilatory nature of his associates vexed Shaftesbury; they lost so much time that he became alarmed for his safety, which he secured by a flight to Holland, where he died on the 21st of January, 1683. His disorder was gout in the stomach; but disappointment at the failure of his plan for the overthrow of the king, no doubt contributed to his death. He was the most remarkable man of his time. Brilliant, courageous, and profligate, he had been as base a courtier as he was latterly a violent opponent of tyranny. He changed his principles just as he was pleased or offended with either party, and served his country, not because he loved it, but because he hated its oppressors. A distinguished writer of that time describes him as—

> "In friendship false, implacable in hate; > Resolved to ruin, or to rule the state."

Shaftesbury's flight and death did not put an end to the conspiracy. So far from that, a new plot was got up, by a number of persons of inferior rank, to murder the king and the Duke of York. These men had some connection with Monmouth, Russell, Sidney, and the chief conspirators; but it does not seem that the latter sanctioned, or even knew of the proposed murders. Among the inferior conspirators was a maltster, named Rumbald, who had a farm called the Rye House, which lay on the road to Newmarket, where the king went once a year, that he might enjoy the races. It was proposed that, as he returned, several of the conspirators should fire at him with blunderbusses from the hedge by the road-side, and then make their escape across the fields to some distant part of the country. From the name of Rumbald's farm this was called "The Rye-House Plot," and the attempt took place in March, 1683. Some writers doubt if it was ever intended to assassinate the king at all, and whether this was not a sham conspiracy, like the popish plot. However that may be, the king left Newmarket a few days before he was expected, on account of a destructive fire which took place there; and the idea of murdering him was not put into practice.

A man of the name of Keeling, a salter, of London, was one of the conspirators. He revealed the particulars of the plot to the government, and some of his companions were immediately arrested. One of them, a wine merchant, named Shepherd, accused the Duke of Monmouth, Lords Grey and Russell, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Colonel Rumsey, and Ferguson, a preacher, of being implicated in the design on the lives of the king and Duke of York. Monmouth, the king's natural son, took to flight, but the others were arrested. Lord Howard was also taken, and, to save his life, promised to reveal everything against his associates. In consequence of his revelations, Lord Essex, Mr. Algernon Sidney, and Mr. John Hampden were also placed in custody.

After the condemnation and execution of some of the inferior conspirators, Lord Russell was, on the 13th of July, placed upon his trial at the Old Bailey. To render his conviction perfectly certain, a Tory jury was nominated—men who were said to be perfectly ready to sacrifice their consciences to please the king. The charge against the unfortunate nobleman was that of conspiring the death of the king, and consulting how to levy war against him. Charles feared and hated Russell, who was loved by the people for his patriotism, and had been resolute for the exclusion of the popish Duke of York from the succession to the throne. The prosecuting lawyers knew this, and they resolved, at all hazards, to procure the condemnation of the accused nobleman. He applied to have his trial postponed, if only for a few hours, because some of his witnesses had not arrived in town; but he was refused. He applied for the assistance of counsel; and that was also refused. He then asked for pens and paper, and whether he might have some one to write for him to assist his memory. A sense of decency compelled the court to grant this request, and the chief justice said, "Any of your servants shall assist you in writing anything you please."—"My lord," remarked Russell, "my wife is here to do it." That brave and virtuous lady then seated herself by the side of her already doomed husband, that she might, in that sad hour of adversity, serve him with more industry and zeal than another.

It was proved that Lord Russell had been connected with a conspiracy against the government of the king, but not against his life; and he himself solemnly called heaven and earth to witness his innocence of any such criminal design. But this availed him nothing; the trial was conducted with the most shameful partiality, and he was condemned to death as a traitor. The fallen noble was prepared, and received his doom with dignified and heroic calmness. His father, the aged Earl of Bedford, offered £100,000 to the king to spare his life; but Charles was implacable; and much as he loved money, on this occasion he preferred revenge. Lord Russell was beheaded on the 31st of July, 1683. In his dying speech on the scaffold he protested his innocence of what he was condemned for, especially of any intention of killing the king; but he did not deny his connection with the conspiracy, which he thought necessary to preserve the religion and liberty of the nation. During the trial of this unfortunate patriot, his companion, the melancholy Lord Essex, had destroyed himself in his prison in the Tower. Many of the people said he had been murdered by order of the king and the Duke of York; but the report seems to have been unfounded.

The bold and patriotic Algernon Sidney was next placed upon his trial, on the 21st of November, at the King's Bench, where Jeffreys, a judge whose conduct has rendered him infamous, presided. Sidney was a stern republican, and had always manfully opposed the despotism of the court. It was therefore resolved that, either innocent or guilty, he should be put to death. His trial was the most impudent mockery of both law and justice. There was only one witness who could testify that he had been concerned in the conspiracy; that one was the recreant Lord Howard, who purchased his own life by betraying those of his associates. But the law required two witnesses, and two could not be procured. A manuscript pamphlet, found among Sidney's papers, was therefore produced in court, and shamefully affirmed to be quite equal to a second witness. This pamphlet contained nothing treasonable, but was a discourse on government, written some years before, and preferring a republic to a monarchy. It contained some sentiment in favour of liberty; "but such," says a Tory historian, "as the best and most dutiful subjects in all ages have been known to embrace." Sidney contended that the pamphlet was not proved to be his writing, and that it was no crime if it was. Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys hypocritically said, that neither the king nor any of his judges desired to take away the life of any man not forfeited by law, and that he had much rather many guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer; but he told the jury that the evidence before them was quite sufficient; and the spirited Algernon Sidney was condemned to death as a traitor.

The patriot declared that he had not had a legal trial, and that there was a material defect in the indictment against him; but the furious Jeffreys, the most violent and abandoned ruffian in the whole kingdom, would not listen to him. Sidney exclaimed—"I appeal to God and the world I am not heard."—"Appeal to whom you will," said the brutal judge, as he passed the sentence of death. The noble prisoner was beheaded on Tower Hill, on the 17th of December, 1683.—Other conspirators were executed; a fine of £10,000 was inflicted on Mr. Hampden; and the Duke of Monmouth was pardoned.

Charles's triumph over the patriotic party was complete, and his power was absolute; no one dared resist him: he had no parliament to check his despotic fancies, and his servile judges were perfectly ready to use the law as an instrument of private vengeance against all who offended him. As the patriots in Scotland had corresponded with the conspirators in England, a fresh prosecution was opened against the Covenanters and discontented persons in that country. Many witnesses were put to the torture, and had their limbs dislocated or broken to extort evidence from them against such as were accused of treason. Numbers of unhappy Covenanters were imprisoned in a bleak, dismal fortress, situated on a wild, barren rock, called the Bass Rock, and surrounded by the sea. In this dreadful place they were treated with shocking cruelty, because they would not submit cheerfully to a church whose principles, both of doctrine and government, they believed to be contrary to Scripture: and to a king who was now undoubtedly a tyrant, ruling by his own will. Some people have tried to excuse the king by throwing these cruelties on the shoulders of his brother James; but they received Charles's sanction, and were done by his authority. All who offended the king were punished with relentless severity; and the vagabond, Titus Oates, came in for his share. He was charged with having uttered libels against the Duke of York, and condemned to pay £100,000 as damages. As he had not 100,000 pence he was sent to prison, where it was intended that he should be kept for life.

But Charles's despotic career was drawing to a close. For some little time he had lost the cheerfulness he once possessed, and had become languid and melancholy. On the 2nd of February, 1685, he was seized with a fit of apoplexy. On the third day of his illness he seemed to be recovering, when a second fit attacked him, and his physicians announced that his death was at hand. At this time, his famous French mistress, the Duchess of Portsmouth, who was a Catholic, took the French ambassador into her private cabinet, and addressed him in the following words:—"Monsieur l'Ambassador, I am going to tell you the greatest secret in the world, and my head would be in danger if it were known here. The king, in the bottom of his heart, is a Catholic, and nobody tells him the state he is in, or speaks to him of God. I can no longer, with propriety, enter his chamber, where the queen is almost constantly with him. The Duke of York thinks about his own affairs, and has no time to take the care he ought of the king's conscience. Go and tell him that I have conjured you to warn him to do what he can to save the soul of the king, his brother. He is master in the royal chamber, and can make any one withdraw from it as he lists. Lose no time; for if you delay ever so little, it may be too late."

The ambassador hurried to the duke, who resolved to hazard anything to win his dying brother to popery. He entered the king's chamber, and spoke to him in whispers. What he said no one could catch; but the king was heard to reply several times—"Yes, with all my heart!" An English Catholic priest, named Huddleston, who had saved Charles's life after the battle of Worcester, was then procured. Every one, except those in the secret, was ordered to leave the chamber, and the disguised priest was introduced. "Sire," said the Duke of York, "here is a man who once saved your life, and who is now come to save your soul." Charles replied—"He is welcome." After this he confessed himself, received absolution, the Romish communion, extreme unction, and formally promised to declare himself a Catholic in case he should recover.

The Protestant bishops and courtiers, who were then readmitted, suspected what had been going on, and exchanged looks of meaning, but none of them alluded to what had passed. After that, the king sent for his natural children, gave them his blessing, and recommended them to the care of his brother. He lived until the next day, and died on the 6th of February, 1685. He was in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-sixth of his reign, counting from the Restoration. In legal documents his reign is calculated from the execution of his father, by which reckoning it extended over thirty-six years. He had been a man of such a robust constitution, that his death took the nation by surprise. It was even rumoured that he was poisoned by his brother; but, bad as James was, there can be no doubt that he never committed so unnatural a crime as that.

Charles has, by his friends, been represented as an erring, but a generous and amiable monarch. He certainly possessed gentlemanly manners, and an easy good-nature, which won him popularity with all classes with whom he came in contact; but, like Cromwell, he was a tyrant in his rule, though not in his nature; and he had not the genius for government, nor that sincerity in religious matters, which the Protector undoubtedly possessed. Thoroughly heartless and ungrateful, he was forgetful of his best friends. Insincere in everything, he had no belief in honour; and he thought those friends deserved the ingratitude with which he treated them. In religion, documents recently brought to light leave little doubt that, during his whole reign, he was a Roman Catholic, though he had not the courage to avow it. Extravagant in his expenditure, and his parliaments not granting him sufficient supplies, he turned a traitor to his own state, and sold himself to the French king. He was lascivious; inconstant in his affections; and the example set by him and his courtiers had a baneful effect on English society. He has been called the "Merry Monarch;" and so he was: but his merriment was that of the profligate and sensualist; and we may heartily wish that we "ne'er may look upon his like again." Indeed, he was indifferent to the prosperity of his people, a hater of their liberty, and an enemy to their religion. So coarse a sensualist, that his character even contaminated the nation, and spread a disregard for truthfulness, simplicity, honour, and decency over a great part of England.

During this reign, some scientific men founded the famous Royal Society; and Charles gave them a patent on the 22nd of April, 1663. England, in that era, possessed also many intellectual men and distinguished writers; but most of their works are so tainted by the prevailing profligacy, that they do not deserve honourable mention in the pages of history. Amongst them were Dryden, Waller, Cowley, Sedley, Denham, Otway, Wycherley, and Rochester. The famous Samuel Butler, the author of Hudibras, also lived in this reign. That satire is considered the most original and witty book in the English language; but it was written for an unworthy party purpose. Its object was to ridicule the religious and political principles of the Puritans—men who, with all their faults, were sincere and honest; but whose principles—as the experience of the commonwealth abundantly proved—are ill-adapted to the government of the English people. Charles greatly admired Hudibras, and frequently quoted it in conversation; he allowed the author of it, however, to die in extreme poverty.

But there were some few great men in this bad time—some pure and lofty spirits—men whose mental qualities were natural miracles, and whose gigantic intellects make us view them with reverence. Chief amongst them stood John Milton, one of the greatest poets, and Sir Isaac Newton, perhaps the greatest master of the exact sciences, that ever lived.

Milton, the son of a scrivener of London, was born on the 9th of December, 1608. He received his early education at St. Paul's school, and, at the age of seventeen, went to the university of Cambridge. He was intended for the church, but could not persuade himself to sign the thirty-nine articles, and therefore abandoned the idea of entering it. After having published his exquisite poems of Lycidas, L'Allegro, and Il Penseroso, he travelled on the continent, and visited Paris, Florence, Rome, and Naples. On his return he opened a school in Aldersgate Street, and assisted the revolution which was then in progress by his eloquent and stirring writings in the cause of what he sincerely believed constituted the only true civil and religious liberty. After the execution of Charles I., Milton was advanced by Cromwell to the position of Latin secretary to the council of state. Milton fully approved of the trial and execution of the king, and gave the best justification that act is capable of receiving, in his work called The Defence of the People of England; his intense application to which, added to years of laborious study, produced blindness. His physician warned him that such would be the case; but he loved his country better than he loved his sight; and by persevering in his task, he earned the gratitude of those Englishmen who think with him. On the restoration of Charles II., Milton feared the vengeance of the Royalists; and not only was he arrested, but some of his noble works in the cause of freedom were condemned to be burnt by the common hangman. He was, however, fortunate enough to escape, and it is perfectly wonderful that he did not share the fate of the unhappy regicides. In his blindness and reverse of fortune he composed his sublime poem of Paradise Lost—a work which ranks him one of the world's greatest bards, and second only to the glorious and universal Shakspeare. In the beginning of the seventh book, he thus alludes to the tyranny and profligacy of the reign of Charles II.:—

> "More safe I sing with mortal voice, unchanged
> To hoarse or mute, though fall'n on evil days—
> On evil days though fall'n and evil tongues;
> In darkness, and with dangers compass'd round,
> And solitude."

Paradise Lost was followed by his poem of Paradise Regained—a work of inferior merit, though Milton himself thought it the most meritorious of the two. In the decline of life he composed other works, both in prose and verse. He died on the 10th of November, 1674, in his sixty-sixth year. He had been thrice married, and left three daughters, who did not treat their honoured parent with that affectionate regard to which he was entitled.

Sir Isaac Newton was born on the Christmas Day of 1642. After having received the rudiments of education, he proceeded to the university of Cambridge, where he devoted himself chiefly to the study of mathematics. He left Cambridge for a time, on account of the plague, and sought for safety in some rural retirement. It is related that there, while sitting in an orchard, he beheld an apple fall from a tree—a circumstance which would have passed unnoticed by most people. Not so, however, with Newton: it excited in his mind a train of reflection which ended in his discovery of the grand theory of the laws of gravitation. Newton's contributions to our scientific knowledge are too numerous even to be mentioned here; but they are of such value, that his name has become honoured among the philosophers of all civilised nations. The events of his life are not of a romantic character, the principal of them being the history of his discoveries. He lived to the age of eighty-four, and died in the year 1726, during the reign of George I. He was buried with public honours in Westminster Abbey; and, as a tribute to his gigantic genius, his pall was supported by six of the most distinguished of our nobles. The profound grandeur of his mind is nobly expressed in the two following lines by the poet Pope:—

> "Nature, and nature's laws, lay hid in night; > God said, 'Let Newton be,' and all was light."

CHAPTER LXXXIV.

THE REIGN OF JAMES THE SECOND.—A.D. 1685—1688.

THE Duke of York, then in the fifty-first year of his age, was proclaimed as JAMES THE SECOND on the afternoon of his brother's death. Although an open and professed Catholic, no opposition appeared; for the great Whig party, or patriots, had been broken up, and the Tories, who supported his right of succession, and always opposed the proposal to exclude him, were, for the time, popular. The people received the proclamation with apparent joy. The king's first act was to address the privy council; and, in the course of his remarks, he said—"I have been reported to be a man fond of arbitrary power; but that is not the only falsehood which has been reported of me: and I shall make it my endeavour to preserve this government, both in church and state, as it is now by law established." We shall see how he kept his promise.

The very first Sunday after his brother's death, James went publicly to mass, attended by all the ensigns of his dignity. He even sent a messenger to Rome to make submission to the pope, and to pave the way for a solemn readmission of England into the communion of that corrupt and persecuting church. The pope, in reply, advised the bigoted king not to be rash and hasty in his proceedings, but to trust rather to time. James also commanded Huddleston, the priest, to publish an account of the late king's belief in the Roman faith; and he himself caused two manuscripts to be printed, which, he said, he had found among his brother's papers. They declared that there could be but one church; that this was the church of Rome; and that whosoever set up their authority against it, whether individuals or nations, fell immediately into fanaticism.

Having thus shown his intention of altering the religion of the country, James next assailed its laws. The customs and great part of the excise duties had been settled on the late king during his life, and consequently they stopped at his death. They were necessary for the support of the royal dignity; and the usual course was, for a new king to summon a parliament, which generally granted him the necessary supplies. James, however, before any parliament was called, arbitrarily commanded these duties to be paid as before—an illegal deed, which he would not deign to qualify by any apology or condescension.

James's next action was in itself a just and noble one; he is charged, however, with being prompted by treacherous motives. Many dissenters and papists had been languishing in prison on account of their attachment to their religion, and he set the whole of them at liberty by his royal warrant. This action was illegal, but its illegality would have been pardoned for its humanity had it been a sincere effort in favour of toleration; though it must be said, that neither papists, churchmen, or dissenters were at all inclined to tolerate each other. But James had no such object as toleration in view: he was aiming, under the pretence of establishing perfect religious liberty, first to remove the laws for persecuting the papists, and then to restore the exclusive dominion of the church of Rome.—On the 25th of April, 1685, James and his queen were crowned at Westminster Abbey, by Sancroft, the Archbishop of Canterbury. It was received as an ill omen, that as the crown was placed upon the king's head it tottered, and almost fell.

James was a man who never forgave an injury: he received all the Whig statesmen and nobles who had voted for his exclusion from the throne with stern and haughty looks. It was plain that he was determined, as king, to punish all affronts that he had received when Duke of York. Titus Oates had certainly given deep cause of offence to James; but the man was expiating his frauds in an imprisonment from which there was but little chance that he would ever escape. But that was not sufficient for the king. Oates was brought from his prison, and, on the 7th of May, placed before Judge Jeffreys on two charges of perjury. Oates defended himself with great courage and audacity, and objected to some of the witnesses, who, he said, must have a feeling of malice against him because they were papists. "Hold your tongue!" shouted the savage judge to the prisoner; "you are a shame to mankind." —"No, my lord," answered Oates firmly, "I am neither a shame to myself or mankind. What I have sworn is true; and I will stand by it to my last breath, and seal it, if occasion be, with my blood."—"'Twere pity," answered the unblushing legal savage, "but that it were to be done by thy blood." Oates, who was clearly convicted of perjury, was sentenced to pay a fine of 2,000 marks, to be placed twice in the pillory, and to be whipped from Aldgate to Tyburn, and, two days afterwards, from Tyburn back to Aldgate. Besides this, he was to stand in the pillory five times every year as long as he lived. The scourging was inflicted in so cruel a manner, that it was evidently the king's intention he should die under the infliction. But Titus Oates was a hardy man: he survived his sufferings; was recovered by the care of many who considered him as a Protestant martyr; and when James was a fugitive, he was set at liberty by King William, and had a pension of £400 a year settled upon him. He died in 1705.

Bedloe, the other speculator in popish plots, was dead; but the vagabond Dangerfield was living, and he was condemned to be scourged and pilloried with as much rigour as Oates was. The wretch was overcome with terror, and declared that such a punishment would be his death. He did die, either from the agony of his whipping, or from a blow which a spectator (a barrister) gave him in the eye with a cane, some angry words having first passed between them. The surgeons said the latter was the cause of his end, and the savage barrister was tried and hanged for his murder.

The parliament met on the 22nd of May. James, in his opening speech, assured the Lords and Commons that he would defend and support the Protestant church, and govern according to the laws. He then told them that he expected a revenue settled upon him for life, the same as had been granted to his brother; and thus continued—"There is one popular argument which may be used against what I have asked of you: the inclination men have for frequent parliaments some may think would be best secured by feeding me, from time to time, by such proportions as they shall think convenient; and this argument (it being the first time I speak to you from the throne) I will answer once for all—that it would be a very improper method to take with me; and that the best way to engage me to meet you often, is always to use me well." The Commons were displeased at this threat; but they thanked the king, and granted a revenue of £1,200,000 a year, for his life, as he asked it.

The deliberations of parliament were interrupted by the news that the Duke of Monmouth had arrived from Holland with three vessels, landed in the west of England, and laid claim to the crown. Though Monmouth had been pardoned by the late king after his connection with the conspiracy against him, yet he had again incurred his displeasure, and been ordered to quit the country. He had taken refuge in Holland; but supposing that the people of England would never submit to the rule of the popish tyrant James, he resolved to declare himself the legitimate son of Charles, and put forward his claim to the crown. In this he was encouraged by the fugitive Earl of Argyll; and it was agreed between them that two expeditions should be made—one into England, by the duke himself, and the other into Scotland, by the earl.

Argyll landed in Scotland before Monmouth was prepared, and but a small number of the Covenanters joined him; for James's awful severities had terrified those unhappy people into submission. The insurrection was managed badly: Argyll was deserted and betrayed by those who pretended to be his friends; and, being arrested on the 20th of June, was beheaded on the 30th, under the old warrant against him, without any further trial. Many other executions and punishments took place in consequence of this insurrection in Scotland.

Monmouth himself met with little better success. He landed at Lyme, in Dorsetshire, on the 12th of June, with scarcely 100 followers; though, in a few days, he was joined by about 2,000 men. He said that he was come to secure the Protestant religion, and to extirpate popery. He then put forth a declaration, in which he only gave the king the title of Duke of York, and called him a traitor, a tyrant, an assassin, and a popish usurper. He accused him of being the author of the great fire of London; declared him to be the murderer of Sir Edmonbury Godfrey, the magistrate, and of Lord Essex; and even revived the accusation that he had poisoned the late king. In conclusion, he invited the people to join in opposition to tyranny. Monmouth then marched through several towns, and arrived at Taunton on the 18th of June, where the Protestant dissenters were very strong, and the popish king much disliked. Here the ambitious duke was recived with enthusiasm; his path was strewn with flowers; and a procession of twenty-six young ladies presented him colours and emblems which they had wrought for him, and with a Bible. Monmouth kissed the volume, and said that he had come to defend its truth, and to perish for it, if it were necessary for him to do so. He then declared himself to be the lawful son of the late monarch, and, on the 20th of June, assumed the title of King of England. He even proclaimed as traitors all the members of the parliament then sitting, and issued a declaration about collecting the revenue.

James had not been idle all this time; the royal army was strengthened, and 3,000 men sent forward to check the insurrection. After several slight skirmishes, an engagement took place at Sedgemoor between the rebels and the king's troops, which commenced in the night of the 5th of July, and did not end till after sunrise on the 6th. Monmouth had about 6,000 followers, and the contest seemed, for some time, to be carried on without victory leaning to either side. But with all his rashness, the duke was at heart a coward, and in the height of the battle he rode off the field, and left his poor deluded followers to shift for themselves. So bravely did these poor peasants fight, that it is supposed they would have obtained a victory, if it had not been for the desertion of their leader. As it was, they were defeated; 1,500 were slain, and 500 made prisoners. On the 8th of July, Monmouth was arrested: he was discovered in a miserable condition, disguised as a peasant, and lying concealed in a ditch, nearly covered with fern and nettles.

He might have been certain that James would never forgive such offences as he had committed: still he wrote a letter of penitence to him, imploring for pardon. In it he promised that, if the king would admit him to his presence, he would communicate something of importance. James consented to see him, and Monmouth crawled upon his knees, and begged for his life. "Remember, Sir," said he, "that I am your brother's son, and if you take my life it is your own blood that you will shed." James was inexorable; and when the duke found he had humbled himself in vain, he assumed more dignity, and was taken back to the Tower. A bill of attainder had already been passed against him; and on the 15th of July, two days after his interview with the king, he was led to the scaffold. There he professed great penitence, and acknowledged that he knew himself to be illegitimate, and that therefore he had no right to the throne. Before he laid his neck across the block, he felt the edge of the axe, expressed a doubt that it was not sharp enough, and begged the executioner not to treat him so awkwardly as he had done Lord Russell. From some cause or other the man was seized with a fit of trembling, and struck so feebly, that the unhappy duke raised his head, and looked him in the face. Two other blows were equally without effect, and the executioner then threw down his axe in horror, and cried out, "I cannot finish this work." The sheriffs compelled him to resume his revolting duty, and, with two blows more, the head was severed.—In this tragic manner perished the favourite son of the late king: he was in the thirty-sixth year of his age.

Immediately after the battle at Sedgemoor, Lord Feversham (a Frenchman), who commanded the king's troops, had caused twenty of his prisoners to be hanged at once without any trial. Probably more would have suffered in the same summary manner, had not the Bishop of Bath and Wells warned him that the unhappy prisoners were entitled to a trial, and that to execute them without was murder. One of his lordship's officers, Colonel Kirke, also had executed nineteen others in the same illegal manner. This cruel man would have put many more to death, but his avarice induced him to sell them their lives for money. This by no means satisfied the king, who determined to punish all persons connected with the late insurrection in such a manner as should strike awe and terror through the land. For this purpose, he sent the Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys, and four other judges, through the districts which had favoured Monmouth, for the purpose of punishing all who had adhered to him. Jeffreys was in his proper element, and he set out on his dark expedition with a savage joy. The wretched people in the west long afterwards spoke of this fearful visitation as "the bloody assize." He went first to Winchester, and there he condemned a venerable and aged lady, Anne Lisle, who had given shelter in her house to two fugitives from the battle-field, to be burnt alive as a female traitor. To their honour, the clergy of the district interfered, and petitioned the king in her behalf. It was proved that she was a woman of the most amiable and loyal character, and that her son had even served in the royal army against Monmouth; but the utmost mercy that the tyrant would grant was, that she should be beheaded instead of burnt. The sentence was carried out on the 22nd of September.

Jeffreys then proceeded to Dorchester, where an immense number of rebels were at once arraigned before him. To save himself trouble, he told them that they who would plead guilty should find him a merciful judge; but that those who put themselves upon their trial should, if convicted, be hanged instantly. Many who were thus led to plead guilty were put to death, the only favour granted them being a brief respite. Eighty persons were hanged at Dorchester in a very few days, and as many more transported and sold as slaves. To one man who objected to the characters of the witnesses against him, Jeffreys roared out, "Villain! rebel! methinks I see thee already with a halter about thy neck." And, shortly after, the wretched man was hanged.

From Dorchester the savage judge (for such he really was) went to Exeter, where he tried no less than 243 prisoners. Many of these were condemned and executed; he even caused one man, who pleaded not guilty, to be taken out and hanged instantly. At Taunton and Wells, the centre of the late insurrection, nearly 1,100 prisoners were tried, and 239 hanged and quartered. All that part of the country was disfigured by the ghastly heads and dissevered limbs which were fixed up in every public place. In the streets, over the town-halls, and even against the doors of the churches, were to be seen these dreadful mementoes of the vengeance of a cruel king. "Every soul," says a writer of the time, "was sunk in anguish and terror, sighing by day and night for deliverance, but shut out of all hope by despair."

When Jeffreys returned to court, after this tour of horror, he was thanked and caressed by the king, created a peer, and, on the 24th of September, was appointed Lord Chancellor of England. But the work of blood was not yet over; other executions of persons disaffected to the government took place in London; and a benevolent and religious lady, named Elizabeth Gaunt, was condemned to be burnt alive at Tyburn, for having given shelter to a man after the battle of Sedgemoor. The fate of this unhappy lady was more shocking than that of Mrs. Lisle; for the shameful sentence was actually put in execution on the 23rd of October. Mrs. Gaunt bore her fearful punishment with heroic fortitude, declaring that she had only obeyed the sacred precept, which commanded her to hide the outcast, and not to betray him that wandereth.

Parliament reassembled on the 12th of November; and James, delighted with the success of his tyranny, addressed the House in a commanding and dictatorial manner. He required a supply of money to support a standing army instead of the militia; but the nation knew very well that he wanted this army to crush what remained of their liberty, and to force upon them the Roman religion. He also alluded to his having employed a number of popish officers; and that he had, in their favour, dispensed with the law requiring the test to be taken by every one that held any public office. "These gentlemen," said he, "are most of them known to me; and having formerly served me on several occasions, and always approved the loyalty of their principles by their practices, I think them now fit to be employed under me; and I will deal plainly with you—that after having had the benefit of their service in such time of need and danger, I will neither expose them to disgrace, nor myself to the want of them, if there should be another rebellion to make them necessary to me." The plain meaning of this was, that he would do as he pleased about employing papists, in spite of the laws which declared them incapable of holding office. The parliament, however, would not quietly submit to see the Protestant religion undermined, and all honours and preferments bestowed upon papists. Both Lords and Commons addressed the king, and requested him to discharge all officers who refused to take the Protestant test; and James passionately prorogued the parliament, after it had sat for eleven days only.

It was at this time that Louis XIV. revoked an edict issued by Henry IV. in 1598, and known as the Edict of Nantes, by which Protestants were tolerated in France. So cruelly were these unhappy people persecuted in consequence, that an enormous number fled their country, and about 50,000 sought a refuge in England, where the accounts of their sufferings kept alive a horror and detestation of the Roman Catholic religion. But the confident English tyrant, though his life was a most immoral one, and all his leisure was bestowed on ugly mistresses, pushed forward his labour of forcing the nation back to popery. His council consisted of popish lords, and his confessor, Father Petre, without whose advice he did nothing. With the concurrence of these men, James actually asserted that he had "a dispensing, a suspending, and a repealing power over all laws or acts of parliament whatsoever!" If such an insolent tyranny as this had been sanctioned, the laws of the country would have been powerless, and the people the slaves of every caprice of the king. The nation was alarmed and disgusted; but, for a time, the king had his way, and everywhere Protestants were dismissed from public employment, and papists placed in their stead. They were admitted into the corporations throughout the kingdom; and none but papists were made lieutenants of counties, sheriffs, and justices of the peace. "If," says an eloquent writer, "James had been suffered to follow this course for twenty years, every military man, from a general to a drummer, every officer of a ship, every judge, every king's counsel, every lord-lieutenant of a county, every justice of the peace, every ambassador, every minister of state, every person employed in the royal household, in the custom-house, in the post-office, in the excise, would have been a Catholic." While papists were thus everywhere encouraged, Protestant soldiers were disbanded throughout the three kingdoms; and in Ireland all Protestants were disarmed.

James's conduct, tolerated for a time by the Tories, at length roused the opposition, not only of that party, but of the bishops and clergy of the established church, whose creed is, in the words of Holy Writ, to "honour the king" (1 Peter ii. 17), and to "be subject unto the higher powers" (Romans xiii. 1), as long as subjection is not incompatible with the broad principles of honour and honesty, justice and humanity. The clergy caused their pulpits to resound with warnings of the danger to which the national religion and the national liberty were exposed. James issued letters to the bishops, commanding them to prevent their clergy from preaching on any controverted point. This order both bishops and clergy disregarded. One Dr. Sharp, rector of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields, and Dean of Norwich, distinguished himself in particular by his sermons against popery; and James directed Compton, the Bishop of London, to suspend him. The bishop replied that he could not obey this command, as it was unlawful to punish Dr. Sharp before he had been heard in his defence. James was incensed, and he resolved to punish both the minister and the bishop.

The king had, in July, 1686, re-established the despotic High Commission Court—that court which had been the instrument of the tyrannies of the church of Rome. It had been abolished during the reign of Charles I. by an act of parliament, which also declared that neither it, nor any court resembling it, should ever be revived. But James held acts of parliament in contempt, and the High Court of Ecclesiastical Commission was again set up. In it seven commissioners were vested with unlimited power over the church of England.

The Bishop of London was summoned before this court. He was a high-spirited man, and declared that it was illegal, that he was not therefore answerable to it, and could only be tried by the laws of his country. He, however, apologised for his resistance to the king's will; but James was resolved to make him an example, and both he and Dr. Sharp were accordingly suspended from the exercise of their duties. James knew that this tyranny was regarded by the nation with angry and jealous eyes; but he had a standing army of 15,000 men at hand, ready to crush the first appearance of insurrection. A clergyman named Johnson was even sentenced to be fined, whipped, and pilloried for writing an address in which he reminded the soldiers they were Englishmen.

James now attempted to open the universities and the church to papists. He demanded, in February, 1687, from the university of Oxford, that it should acknowledge a right in Father Petre, his confessor, to appoint seven Fellows of Exeter College; and, from Cambridge, that it should grant the degree of Master of Arts to a Benedictine friar. Both the universities refused, and the vice-chancellor of Cambridge was accordingly suspended by the Court of Ecclesiastical Commission.

But James would not give over his project; and as the university of Oxford had lately published a declaration in favour of passive obedience, he resolved to put that obedience to the test. The president of Magdalen College died in March, 1687; and James commanded the Fellows to elect a concealed papist, named Farmer, to that important position. The Fellows sent a petition to the king, to permit them to exercise their own authority in the matter; and as they received no answer, they elected Dr. Hough. The king then sent an inferior ecclesiastical commission to Oxford, which declared the election to be void; and (Farmer proving to be both ignorant and dissolute) issued a mandate to the college to elect Parker, the Bishop of Oxford, who was also suspected of popery. The college reasoned against this arbitrary dictation, and declared that Dr. Hough could not be deprived of his office, or any one elected to it during his life. Unable to bend the college to his will, James then attempted to ruin it, and he sent commissioners to alter its statutes, and make new ones. Dr. Hough was expelled, and Bishop Parker put in his place by force; and as the Fellows refused to sign an acknowledgment of their disobedience and repentance, they were driven from the college, and declared incapable of holding any preferment in the church.

James now proceeded with boldness in his work of restoring popery. Still hoping for success, he issued, under the pretence of toleration, on the 4th of April, a "Declaration for Liberty of Conscience," by which all penal laws against both Protestant dissenters and Catholics were to be suspended. Though this was an illegal exercise of power, it would have been a generous one if it had been fairly meant. But we are told it was intended merely as a snare; and the dissenters believed that, under pretence of granting a favour to them, the king wished only to suspend all laws which kept down the Roman Catholics. They felt convinced that, when the latter were once placed on a level with other religionists, they would soon be raised above them, and this pretended liberality be changed into a furious persecution.

James's court was filled with Jesuits and popish priests; a legate from the pope constantly resided there; four popish bishops were publicly consecrated in the Chapel Royal, sent to their dioceses with the titles of vicars-apostolical, and their pastoral letters were printed and dispersed through the kingdom. Such was the confidence of the papists, that their priests actually laid claim to some public buildings, which they intended to convert into monasteries and chapels. Excitement and agitation ruled throughout the country.

This was the state of things at the beginning of the memorable year 1688. On the 27th of April in that year, James not only published a second Declaration of Indulgence to all dissenters, but he commanded that it should be read by the clergy in all the churches after divine service. This command the Protestant clergy regarded only as a tyrannous insult; and they knew that if they obeyed, they should expose themselves to the contempt and hatred of the people. The bishops were in a peculiar and unpleasant position: they had preached the divine right of kings, and the imperative duty of subjects to obey; but they found that implicit obedience to this doctrine would be productive of the greatest evils, both to the religious and secular rights and interests of the people. With few exceptions, both bishops and clergy, therefore, resolved that they would not read the Declaration of Indulgence.

Six bishops met the primate (Sancroft) at his palace at Lambeth, and, having drawn up a petition to the king against the Declaration, they all went together and presented it to him in person at Whitehall, on the 18th of May. The tyrant read the paper with anger and disdain, and then muttered, "This is a great surprise to me. Here are strange words. I did not expect this from you. This is a standard of rebellion." He then dismissed them with anger, resolved to devise some mode of punishing them. The petition was printed and distributed, and, in a few days, seven other bishops publicly declared their concurrence with it; and, on the 20th of May, the first Sunday appointed for reading the Declaration, only four clergymen in London obeyed the king's orders for doing so; but those timid and unworthy ministers were groaned at by their congregations. The nation was so excited, that the friends of James were alarmed; even the bold Judge Jeffreys trembled, and urged his master to moderation; but the royal bigot thought himself safe, and he persevered. He summoned the primate (Sancroft) and the six petitioning bishops to appear before the privy council on a charge of high misdemeanour. They went to Whitehall on the 8th of June, and were, the same day, committed as prisoners to the Tower. The crown lawyers, at the same time, received directions to prosecute the bishops for a seditious libel—as the king called the petition.

This open blow at the liberty and religion of the people roused the whole nation. The bishops were taken from Whitehall to the Tower by water; and when they entered the barge which was to convey them, the shore of the river seemed one living mass of sympathising spectators. The people fell upon their knees, and implored the protection of the Almighty for the sufferers in the cause of a nation's religion and freedom. The soldiers flung themselves on their knees before the prelates, and implored the benediction of those whom they were appointed to guard. Some persons even ran into the water to obtain the blessings which the bishops were conferring on all around them; the dissenters sent a deputation to console them; and twenty-eight peers expressed their readiness to be bail for them, if they should require it.

The bigoted king took no warning from this universal expression of feeling from all ranks of the nation; and, on the 29th of June, the seven bishops were placed on their trial in the Court of King's Bench. They were attended to the court by the peers who had offered to become their bail, and by immense crowds of the gentry and people—all wishing them success, and praying God to bless and protect them. The cause was heard with the most profound attention; for there had not been any such great public excitement since the revelation of the popish plot. James thought that the judges and jury dared not find the bishops innocent, when they knew it to be his intention that they should be pronounced guilty. He was mistaken. The judges, encouraged by the public sympathy with the accused, lent favourably towards the bishops: the attorney-general dared not accuse them harshly, for fear of the people; witnesses, for the same reason, could scarcely be brought to open their lips against them; and every check the counsel of the king sustained was received by that crowded court with shouts of joy and laughter. After a trial which lasted for ten hours, and a long deliberation of the jury, a verdict of not guilty was returned. This verdict would have been given at once, but that some of the jury were creatures of the king. When the result was known, a loud shout of joy reverberated through Westminster Hall. The people outside knew the meaning of that shout, and they raised another, which passed on from group to group throughout London. So tremendous was that wild explosion of joyful noise, that it was heard at Hounslow Heath, where the tyrant was that morning engaged in reviewing the troops he kept in readiness to crush any outbreak against his shameful proceedings. It was echoed back by the troops, who sympathised with their fellow-countrymen whom they were engaged to enslave. James was startled, and asked Lord Feversham the meaning of that noise. The general replied—"It was nothing but the soldiers shouting for the acquittal of the bishops."—"Do you call that nothing?" said the king; "but so much the worse for them."

That night London blazed with bonfires; the church bells rang joyful peals; an effigy of the pope was burnt before the windows of the king's palace; and the people not only drank health to the bishops, but also confusion to the papists. The royal madman took no warning from these signs of coming revolution, but obstinately pursued his course of tyranny. He deprived of their offices two of the judges who had presided at the trial of the bishops; he issued orders for the prosecution of all those clergymen who had not read the Declaration of Indulgence—that is, of the whole church of England, with the exception of about 200—and he endeavoured to force a Romish priest on Magdalen College at Oxford, in place of his creature, Dr. Parker, who had lately died.

James had been very anxious for the birth of a son, to whom he might leave the completion of the work of forcing popery upon England. Before the trial of the bishops took place—on the 11th of June—a prince was born, to the great joy of the papists, who called him the "Son of Prayer," in consequence of the many earnest solicitations they had addressed to heaven on that account. But this event was regarded with sorrow by the great mass of the nation; and it was commonly said that the queen had not become a mother, but that the infant was the child of a stranger, imposed upon the nation for the sake of being brought up in the Catholic principles. But there is no doubt that the infant—afterwards so notorious in history as the Pretender—was the child of James and Mary of Modena, his queen.

James's oldest daughter, Mary, had been, on the 4th of November, 1677, married to William, the Protestant Prince of Orange—the famous stadtholder of Holland, whose military genius had saved his country from the destruction it was threatened with by the ambitious Louis XIV., King of France. Before the birth of the Prince of Wales, William had been looked up to as James's successor on the English throne; and many a fervent wish was secretly uttered that the period of his accession might be near at hand. The birth of a prince, however, put these hopes to flight; and it was evident the nation must submit to have its liberty and religion crushed by the tyranny of James, or at once adopt a very bold and startling measure. The Protestant nobles and clergy took the latter course; and an invitation was secretly sent to the Prince of Orange to come to England with an army, to question the legitimacy of the infant Prince of Wales, and redress the grievances of the nation.

An extensive conspiracy was soon entered into by the most distinguished men in England to depose their popish tyrant, and place William of Orange upon the throne in his stead. Men of the highest trust were engaged in it; even James's own ministers, and those he thought his most faithful friends, entered the league against him, and conveyed all the secrets of the state to his rival. William accepted the offer, and prepared an army for the invasion of England, and the deliverance of its people from slavery and popery. But, with a necessary caution, he concealed the object for which he intended it, and the king never suspected the design of his son-in-law. Though it was natural for him to have expected a signal retribution from his outraged people, he pursued his despotic career to the last with an absence of suspicion perfectly stupid.

At length, during the month of September, he received information, by a letter from the French king, of the intended invasion. The tyrant turned of an ashy paleness, and stood as if paralysed. The letter dropped from his hand, and he burst into tears. Knowing the cause that the whole of his people had to hate him, he feared the worst at once. He was distracted and irresolute: he first refused the offered assistance of the ambitious French king, and then begged him to keep a fleet and army ready for him at Brest. Then, when too late, he attempted to win back the affection of the people. He replaced the Protestant deputy-lieutenants of counties, and magistrates; he restored the charters of London, and of other corporations; he abolished his Court of Ecclesiastical Commission; he restored the suspended Bishop of London to his episcopal duties; he promised to call a parliament; and even flattered and caressed the very bishops whom he had so lately prosecuted. But every one knew that these concessions were the result of fear; and this humiliation did him no good.

At this very time James contrived to give fresh disgust to the zealous Protestantism of the nation. The infant prince, James Francis Edward, was baptized, on the 15th of October, according to the rites of the church of Rome, and the pope became its godfather. The irritated people expressed their disgust by everywhere declaring that the prince was not of royal blood, but the child of some unknown person, imposed upon the nation for the purpose of providing a popish successor to the crown. So general was this rumour, that the king found it necessary to call an extraordinary council to examine into the particulars of the birth of the child, and to prove its legitimacy.

William of Orange was now ready, and, on the 16th of October, he embarked with an army of about 15,000 men on board a fleet of 500 vessels. They were, however, much injured by a tempest, and compelled to put back at Helvoetsluys to refit. In the meantime, a declaration from William to the English nation was generally circulated. It contained a list of the chief grievances of the kingdom:—the pretended power of the king to dispense with or suspend the laws; the Court of Ecclesiastical Commission; the filling of all offices with Catholics, and the raising of a Jesuit to be privy councillor; the open encouragement given to popery; the displacing of judges if they refused to give sentence according to orders received from court; the annulling of the charters of all the corporations; the treating of petitions as criminal and seditious; the committing the whole authority of Ireland into the hands of papists; the assuming an absolute power over the religion and laws of Scotland; and, lastly, to inquire into the supposed imposition of a strange infant upon the nation as Prince of Wales. All these evils the declaration declared Prince William was coming over to redress; and his object in bringing an army was to protect him from the king's evil counsellors, and to provide for the safety and liberty of the nation.

William was soon again ready for sea. This time he had a prosperous voyage; and, on the 5th of November —the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot—he landed without opposition at Torbay. The English fleet had suffered from a recent storm, and was unable to intercept his approach; but it is doubtful whether the English captains and sailors would have done so if they could; for the hearts of most of them were with the brave prince who came to redeem their country from the grasp of a tyrant. William's banner bore the inscription—"I will maintain the Protestant religion and the liberties of England." He was received at Torbay by immense crowds of people, who greeted him with enthusiastic joy as the deliverer of the nation.

Prince William first led his army to Exeter, where he arrived on the 9th of November, and was but coldly received, for the people were terrified by the recent atrocities of Judge Jeffreys. William was disappointed, and, for the present, gave up his intention of marching into the centre of England. But the nobles and military officers soon began to join him: and those who yet feared openly to go over to him offered no opposition. Every day the cause of the prince grew stronger, and that of James weaker. The whole nation was in a state of excitement, and London in wild disorder. As for the Jesuits and monks, whose evil counsel had helped to bring the tyrant into this dilemma, most of them deserted him, and provided for their own safety by flight.

James was bewildered. He set out to join his army, but changed his mind, and returned; again set out, and again came back, fearing that his own soldiers would betray him. Perhaps he was right; for his favourite officer, Lord Churchill, together with the Duke of Grafton (a natural son of the late king), left him on the 11th of November, and joined Prince William. It was soon seen that the whole army was disaffected, and preferred the good of their country to the service of their king.

Lord Churchill had been raised by James from the rank of a page, and he owed his whole fortune to the favour of the king. But Churchill not only abandoned his master, but persuaded Prince George of Denmark —who, on the 28th of July, 1683, had married the king's second daughter, the Princess Anne—to do the same. The princess herself was induced by Lady Churchill to follow her husband. On hearing it, the tyrant burst into an agony of grief, and cried out, "God help me! My very children have forsaken me." By this time, Plymouth, Bath, Bristol, York, and Hull, had declared for the Prince of Orange, and the principal nobles and gentry of England were crowding around his standard. James, who saw his fabric of arbitrary power melting like a palace of ice beneath the beams of a summer sun, issued proclamations, containing all sorts of promises to the people. He also called a council of all the peers and prelates left in London, which was held on the 27th of November, and issued writs for a new parliament to assemble on the 13th of January, 1689. The king also sent commissioners to treat with the Prince of Orange. It was useless: this forced repentance came too late. James began to tremble for his personal safety, and resolved on flight.

He first sent the queen, in disguise, on the 10th of December, with the infant prince to Gravesend, from whence they crossed over to Calais, where they arrived safely on the 11th. They were kindly received by Louis XIV. The same day, James, attended only by Sir Edward Hales, crossed the Thames to Lambeth, taking with him the great seal, which he threw into the river. Horses having been provided by one of the equerries, they rode hastily to Feversham, and then embarked, in disguise, for France. As soon as the king's flight was known, the people burst into a frantic expression of joy. Popish chapels were broken open, and then set on fire; the houses of some of the ambassadors were attacked; and a search was made for James's confessor, Father Petre, who had fortunately escaped. The general confusion was increased by the disbanding of the king's army, which was neither paid nor disarmed. A report soon after was spread that the Irish disbanded soldiers had commenced a massacre of the Protestants. The people were both terrified and furious; the church bells rang out alarms; guns were fired, and beacons blazed. Happily, this rumour turned out to be utterly unfounded; and it speaks well for the character of the people, that, during this state of excitement, the Catholics were not severely ill-treated or murdered. This alarm occurred in the night of the 12th of December, which was known long after, in London, as "The Irish Night." It was during this time that the notorious Lord Chancellor Jeffreys was discovered in a public-house at Wapping in the disguise of a sailor. Had the mob followed his own dark example, they would have hanged him instantly—a fate he richly deserved. But although they beat him severely, they spared his life, and then carried him before the Lord Mayor, who sent him to the Tower, where he died on the 18th of April, 1689, in consequence of the treatment he had received.

James had not yet made good his escape. The little vessel in which he was embarked was driven by a gale of wind into the Isle of Sheppey, where the disguised king was seized as a fugitive Jesuit, and carried back a prisoner to Feversham. The rabble of smugglers and fishermen, into whose hands he had fallen, treated him in the most abusive manner. It was in vain that he declared he was their king—that the Prince of Orange was seeking his life; and screamed for a boat in an agony of fear. Being rescued from the hands of his rough captors by Lord Winchelsea, that nobleman lodged him in a private house of the town, where he burst into tears on discovering he had lost a bit of wood said to have been part of the true cross, and to have belonged to Edward the Confessor.

As James's flight rendered the throne vacant, the bishops and peers who were in London assembled, chose the Marquis of Halifax as their Speaker, and, having sent directions to the Lord Mayor of London to preserve the peace of the city, they invited the Prince of Orange to enter London, and sent word to James that he might either retire to the continent, or return to the metropolis, as he pleased. To their great surprise he chose the latter course, and invited his son-in-law to meet him at Whitehall to settle the disorders of the nation. William declined the interview, and was annoyed at learning that the fickle people had received James, on his return to London, with expressions of respect and sympathy. William regretted that James's flight had been prevented, and steps were taken to frighten him away again. For this purpose four battalions of Dutch guards were placed around Whitehall; but still the humbled tyrant hesitated, being loth to abandon even the shadow of that royalty he had so wickedly abused. The prince then, on the 17th of December, sent him a message by the Earls of Halifax, Shrewsbury, and Delamere, that he must leave the palace, and go to Ham House, near Richmond. James saw that his resistance was useless, and only said that he should prefer going to Rochester. The desire was granted, and he departed, attended by a few ultra-royalist nobles. He lingered a few days at Rochester; but his fears were excited by the Dutch troops, by whom he was followed and watched. It seems he still hoped that he should be recalled; but seeing that neither the nobles, prelates, or people took any notice of him, and dreading that he might be deprived of his liberty or his life, he resolved to retire to France. During the night of the 23rd of December, he rose from his bed, dressed himself, and put off in a boat, with a few attendants. The next morning he reached a fishing-smack, which had been hired for the purpose, and made the best of his way to France. He landed safely at Ambleteuse, in Picardy, and hurried to St. Germaine, where he was received by the French king with hospitality and respect.

Thus was England freed from the rule of the male branches of the Stuart family; who would, if they had been allowed free scope, have converted her government into an iron despotism, her religion into a papal superstition, and her people into slaves. Let us honour and cherish that liberal and manly spirit by which such calamities were prevented.

James was stern, merciless, and cruel where he believed himself right. But he always professed to be the friend of toleration and religious liberty. There is no doubt that this was merely a profession, and he aimed at relieving Roman Catholics from their disabilities, without interfering with the liberties of others. All his acts show one intent—that of making the Roman Catholic faith once more the religion of the state. Papists will not allow any toleration or liberty in religion: they say positively that they are right, and all the rest of the world is wrong; and they deem it a part of their creed to persecute, put down, and, if possible, utterly extirpate, all forms of religion except their own. The obstinate, unbending James was just the man to have carried out such principles; and had the nation submitted to him, we must, however reluctantly, come to the conclusion that he would have carried them out with a remorseless vindictiveness. Indeed, it is highly probable that the terrible scenes which were witnessed in England during the reign of the Catholic bigot, Mary, might have been repeated, with no diminution of horrors, during the time of the equally bigoted Catholic James. He who caused a righteous woman to be burnt at the stake for an act of Christian charity, would have had no hesitation in condemning Protestants to an agonising death by fire because they would not desert their principles, and yield themselves up, body and soul, to the tyranny of Rome.

It must be allowed that James was sincere in his religious views; but though sincerity may be an apology for error, it is none for cruelty: and his religion did not preserve him from private vices. He openly violated the marriage tie, and set a public example of immorality. He was haughty, domineering, and remorseless; and, under a great pretence of openness, retained that vice of his family—equivocation. Vicious in all things, this bad man, and worse monarch, only wanted intellect to have made him as terrible as he at last became contemptible. That he did not possess; and the blind bigot sacrificed his throne in a madly impatient attempt to make it the most despotic one in Europe.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

THE REIGN OF WILLIAM OF ORANGE AND MARY STUART.—A.D. 1689—1691.

AFTER the flight of James, England was, for nearly two months, without a king. The peers and bishops, to the number of ninety, at once drew up an address to the Prince of Orange, requesting him to summon a convention by circular letters, and, till it met, to take upon himself the duties of government. William did not hesitate to comply with the latter part of their request, as it was necessary for the preservation of the public peace; but he doubted the propriety of summoning a convention, his authority being so imperfect for that purpose. It was then suggested—we are not told by whom—that all the members of any House of Commons that had met during the reign of Charles II., together with the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and fifty of the common council of the city of London, should meet, and determine what course it was proper, under the circumstances, to pursue. This was done; and the assembly thus constituted adopted the views of the peers and bishops, and requested William to summon a convention: thus urged, he at once complied. This body met on the 22nd of January, 1689, and the members voted —"That King James II., having endeavoured to subvert the constitution by breaking the original contract between king and people, and, by the advice of Jesuits, and other wicked persons, having violated the fundamental laws, and withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, has ABDICATED the government, and that the throne is thereby become VACANT." They also declared that it was not consistent with the safety of this Protestant nation that it should be governed by a popish prince. After a great deal of discussion, the Lords agreed with these votes, only they wished to say that James had deserted his throne, instead of that he had abdicated it. In the end, both the Lords and the members of the convention declared that the Prince of Orange and Mary Stuart, his wife, should be proclaimed lawful King and Queen of England. It was also declared, that if Mary left no children, the crown should descend to James's other daughter, the Princess Anne.—The two Houses also adopted, on the 12th of February (the day the Princess Mary landed at Greenwich), a Declaration of Rights, setting forth James's offences; claiming civil and religious freedom for the people; and circumscribing the exercise of the royal prerogative.—On Ash Wednesday (February 13), a court was held at Whitehall, where the Declaration was submitted to the prince and princess, who accepted it; and they were that day proclaimed, in London, King and Queen of Great Britain, France, and Ireland.

The Scottish convention, which met at Edinburgh on the 22nd of March, followed the example of the English one, by declaring that James had forfeited his crown, and making an offer of it to William and his wife, Mary. Ireland, where the greater part of the people were Catholics, adhered to the late King James. William and Mary were therefore crowned King and Queen of England on the 11th of April, 1689; the convention having been previously declared a legal parliament. A new oath of allegiance to the sovereign was then framed: but a few of the nobles, together with the Archbishop of Canterbury, seven other bishops, and about 400 of the clergy, refused to take it. In consequence of this, they were called Nonjurors; that is, persons who refused to swear allegiance to William, because they thought James had been unjustly deposed. This conduct on the part of the clergy seems strange; for they, of all men, had cause to bless the revolution, and the Protestant prince it had placed upon the throne; as that revolution and that prince had saved the Protestant religion from being crushed beneath the iron heel of Rome. But many of the bishops and clergy of that day could not shake off their belief in the old doctrines of divine right and passive obedience; and they must be respected for their honesty, however mistaken we may deem them.

The House of Commons had learnt, by experience, that the way to spoil a king, and tempt him to become a tyrant, was to render him independent of a parliament by settling an income upon him for life. Therefore they determined, in future, to grant supplies of money only for short terms, and to state, at the time they voted it, what it was to be used for. This principle has been adhered to ever since, and has at last made the Commons the real governors of this country. An English monarch, in these days, could not do anything in decided opposition to the House of Commons without being in danger of losing his crown—a danger he would, without doubt, incur, unless he was wise enough to see his error, and submit to the will of his people. Thus, although the form of government in this country is monarchical, there is a great deal of republicanism in the spirit of it. Supplies were voted for the government, and for the protection of the nation; and £600,000 was also voted, to be given to the Dutch, as a remuneration for their services in effecting the revolution. But the Commons were jealous of the kingly power, and not so liberal as William wished them to be; and he complained of their want of confidence in him.

The new king had been educated as a Calvinist in religion; but he was a liberal-minded man, and hated all persecution for opinion's sake. For the benefit of the dissenters, he proposed that the Test Act should be abolished; that is, the act which declared that no person should be employed in any office of the state without taking the sacrament according to the church of England. But the bishops were alarmed: they thought the Test Act a defence of the church against both papists and dissenters; and they contrived to get the bill which was introduced to repeal it laid aside. At the same time, the bishops tried to get the law repealed by which they and the clergy were to take an oath of allegiance to the new government. They were not successful in this attempt; but were enjoined to take the oath before a certain date, under a penalty of being suspended from their offices for six months, and of being deprived of their benefices altogether if they would not take it at the end of that time. At the suggestion of the king, what was called a Bill of Comprehension was brought forward, by which the church of England, the dissenters, and the kirk of Scotland might all be united into one church—a church which should only require all its members to be Christians and Protestants, and not to be too rigid about forms. This scheme scarcely pleased anybody, and, after violent disputes, was rejected. A bill to relieve Protestant dissenters from certain penalties—now known as the Toleration Act—was, however, introduced, passed by both Houses, and became law on the 24th of May.—William had a deal of trouble with his parliament on other subjects besides that of religion: he knew that many of the Tories were plotting both against his life and government; and he became jealous of the Whigs, who wished to obtain all offices and authority in the state for themselves, and to limit the power of the sovereign more than he thought consistent with the dignity of his position: in fact, like Charles and James, William was very desirous of having his own way; and, as was the case with them, the Commons frequently refused to permit him.

The fugitive King James and his queen had been treated very generously by Louis of France, who gave them the palace of St. Germaine to reside in, and supported it for them in a style of splendour. Besides that, Louis (from a motive of self-interest) promised to do his best to restore James to the throne from which he had been driven on account of his vices. As Tyrconnel, the governor of Ireland (though he pretended to be faithful to William), was in reality secretly working as a traitor, and as a great part of the Irish were papists, it was resolved that James should land in that country with a French army, to assist him in recovering his regal authority.

Tyrconnel, who was a very dangerous man, treacherously disarmed all the Irish Protestants, and collected a popish army of from 40,000 to 50,000 men. James then set sail with a little fleet of fifteen vessels; and, on the 12th of March, he landed at Kinsale, in Ireland, and was received with enthusiastic rejoicing by the Irish people, who soon had good cause to wish he had never set his foot upon their shores. For the present, however, all was joy; and the people were delighted that they had got back their popish king. All Ireland, except the province of Ulster, submitted to his authority; and Londonderry and Enniskillen alone were strong enough to defy it. The English fleet ought to have stopped James upon the sea; but it missed him, and afterwards met the French fleet on the 1st of May, and was beaten by it. It is said, that when a French nobleman boasted to James how the sailors of his nation had beaten the English, his national feelings overcame him, and he observed sadly, "It is the first time!"

When James entered Dublin, he was met by a procession of popish bishops and priests bearing the host, to which he publicly offered adoration. He then dismissed all who were not Catholics from the council board, and issued five proclamations. Most of the Protestants had fled from Ireland when he landed there; and his first proclamation commanded them to return, on pain of being considered outlaws, and of losing all their property: it also required every one to take up arms to expel the Prince of Orange from the throne. The second proclamation expressed James's gratitude to his Catholic subjects, and desired all of them who were not in military service to lay up their arms till they were wanted. The third desired the people to supply his soldiers with provisions, which were to be paid for honestly. The fourth declared that twenty shillings should pass for a guinea: and the fifth summoned a parliament to meet at Dublin on the 7th of May.

When this popish parliament met, it gave the estates of Protestants to parties of armed Catholics, whenever the latter laid claim to them: it declared all who assisted the Prince of Orange to be traitors; voted £20,000 a month for James; and passed an act granting liberty of conscience to all Christians. James's acts, however, soon showed that he meant to make popery predominant. All the churches, colleges, and schools were given to the papists; and, as if in mockery of the law just passed granting liberty of conscience, Protestants were forbidden to assemble under a penalty of death.

That he might subdue the Protestants utterly, James laid siege to the city of Londonderry. His troops had invested the city in April; and hostilities commenced on the 21st of that month. The siege was actively pressed, and as gallantly resisted, during the months of May and June. The inhabitants indeed defended themselves so bravely, that Enniskillen, and, by degrees, nearly the whole province of Ulster, rose up against the besieging army. James took the command of the siege in June; and assaults were made, day after day, for eleven days without effect. He then went back to Dublin, and left the operations to be conducted by a French general, named Rosen. This man, on the 30th of June, issued a proclamation, to the effect that, if the city were not surrendered on the 1st of July, all the inhabitants of the surrounding country should be collected and driven under the walls, there to starve, or be a burthen to the city; and that when the city was taken, no quarter should be given to age or sex. As soon as James heard of this proclamation, he ordered it to be withdrawn; but Rosen suffered great cruelties to be practised. After considerable delay, the place was rescued by the troops King William had sent over to its relief; and, on the 30th of July, Rosen was obliged to abandon the siege. On the same day the brave Protestants of Enniskillen defeated their popish assailants with great slaughter.

During this time, an insurrection had been got up in favour of James in Scotland. It was led by Lord Dundee (better known as the fierce Graham of Claverhouse). The spirit and genius of this stern man might have largely helped to retrieve the fortunes of a monarch not so odious as James. Dundee and his wild Highlanders, on the 26th of May, defeated one of William's generals at a place called Killiecrankie; but he himself perished in the moment of victory, and his followers mournfully dispersed, and retired to their homes. The Highlanders said that Dundee had a charmed life, and was impenetrable to either leaden or iron bullet, but that one of the English soldiers, who knew this, tore off a silver button from his dress, and, loading his gun with it, gave the Scottish leader his death-wound. On the 13th of June, the Duke of Gordon, who held Edinburgh Castle for James, surrendered it; and, in a short time, the whole of Scotland submitted tranquilly to the rule of William.

On the 19th of October, William reassembled the convention parliament, which passed the Bill of Rights, embodying the provisions of the Declaration of Rights before referred to; excluding from the throne a papist, or any sovereign marrying a papist; and taking from the king his dispensing power. A bill was also passed reversing the attainders against Lord Russell, Algernon Sidney, Alderman Cornish, and Mrs. Lisle. These were the most important acts of the session and of the convention, which William dissolved on the 6th of February, 1690. By that time he had lost much of the popularity he possessed at first. His manners were cold and reserved, and many persons fancied his chilly dignity concealed an arbitrary disposition. The Whigs were desirous of keeping all the power and good things of the state to themselves, and allowing nothing to the king; many of them, also, were unprincipled, crafty men, who held a secret correspondence with the exiled James; and William became irritated against them.

A new parliament met on the 20th of March, in which the Tory party was the strongest. It readily agreed to support the king in a war with France, and to find supplies for the reduction of Ireland to his authority, and the expulsion of James from that island. It also settled the revenues of the crown upon William for his life. A general pardon, or act of grace, was passed by this parliament, and cheerfully signed by the king, who wished to put an end to the quarrels, fears, and jealousies of the two great parties into which the country was divided. Thirty-one persons, however —known and irreclaimable traitors—were excepted from it. William then prorogued the parliament; and in the month of June, 1690, he went over with an army into Ireland, resolved at once, by a great effort, on crushing the rebellion against him in that country.

He landed at Carrickfergus on the 14th of June; and was very pleased with the appearance of Ireland, declaring it to be a country worth fighting for. The armies of the rival kings, on the 30th of June, faced each other on opposite sides of the river Boyne. The soldiers of James wore bits of white paper in their hats as cockades, and those of William little green sprigs, to distinguish them during the action. On that day, as William was riding along the bank of the river to reconnoitre, two field-pieces were fired at him. The discharge from one killed a man and two horses close by him: the ball from the other struck upon the ground, and, rebounding, wounded William on the right shoulder. The enemy thought he was killed, and spread a report to that effect; but he himself treated the matter with calm indifference. The next day (the 1st of July, 1690—a lovely summer's morning) the battle took place. William's Dutch guards dashed into the river, and forced their way across in spite of a terrible fire of musketry. The action was bravely fought on both sides; William's forces were several times repulsed; but, in the end, they gained a decided victory. James kept himself out of danger, and his spiritless conduct was supposed to have contributed to his defeat. As soon as he saw that the day was going against him, he left his army to its fate and fled to Dublin. Still in terror, he proceeded to Duncannon, and from thence embarked for France. He landed at Brest on the 9th of July, and again took up his residence at St. Germaine. His defeat was followed by a general flight of the papists from Dublin; and William, entering that city in triumph on the 6th of July, proceeded to the cathedral church of St. Patrick returned thanks for his victory, and declared the Protestant religion restored. But he was not abl altogether to subdue the Jacobites (as the followers of James were called) in Ireland; and early in September, after some unsuccessful military movements, he returned to England. During his absence, a French fleet of eighty-two vessels had the boldness to attempt to sail up the Thames, in the hope of seizing and carrying off Queen Mary. It was stopped by the English and Dutch fleets, and an engagement took place off Beachy Head. The French were superior in numbers, and took two Dutch and two English ships. The Dutch, whom Torrington, the English commander, put in the van, were obliged to draw off, and Torrington did not offer to support them, but withdrew hi ships into the Thames. The allies lost 900 men and the French admiral was severely censured by his government for not following up what was considered a victory.

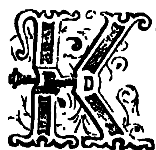
On William's return from Ireland, he met the parliament, which granted £4,500,000 to subdue Ireland, and carry on the war against France So large a sum had never before been voted by an English parliament; but it was necessary to make great efforts, as the ambitious Louis was attempting to extend his dominion over the whole of Europe. The cool, resolute William was the most unconquerable opponent he ever had; although a league of several continental nations was formed against him. Louis therefore supported James, because by so doing he hoped to crush William.

Having for a time settled the affairs of England, William visited Holland, as he still remained stadtholder of that country, although he had become King of England. On the 16th of January, 1691, he embarked at Gravesend despite the extreme severity of the weather. He was attended by twelve men-of-war and seven yachts. As the Dutch coast was frozen in, it was difficult to get into port with the large vessels. William, therefore, when within about a league and a-half from Goree, embarked, with a few friends, in an open boat, and pushed off for the shore. The danger of this act made the sailors hesitate, when the king asked them if they were afraid to die in his company, and commanded them to push off. They soon lost their way in a thick fog, and, during the whole of a bitter night, had to row slowly and cautiously in darkness, amid masses of floating ice. They reached land the next morning, almost perished with cold.

The Dutch celebrated the arrival of their prince with bonfires, illuminations, and other tokens of enthusiastic joy. During his absence they and their allies had been defeated by the French, and they were glad to see William again amongst them; for they regarded him as their hero and deliverer. He had met the continental princes who had leagued themselves against Louis, and infused fresh hope and spirit into their proceedings. To relate the events of that great war would be to give the history, not of England, but of Europe. It continued during a great part of William's reign, and extended into that of Queen Anne: but to describe the constant battles, sieges, and manœuvres of it, even in the briefest way, does not fall within the scope of this history. It was prosecuted by William with a view of achieving the constant object of his life—to check the gigantic power and restless aggression of the mighty Louis XIV. of France. To attain that object, in which England had but a secondary interest, those wars were commenced which laid the foundation of that debt now pressing so heavily upon Englishmen; and that enmity excited between the two nations, which has only, within the last few years, evinced any symptoms of fading away.



Having done his best, in his first campaign, towards the accomplishment of this object, William returned to England, where several conspiracies against his government had been detected and put down in his absence. Then he promoted the famous Bishop Tillotson to be primate of England, and gave the sees of the nonjuring bishops, who still refused to take the oaths of allegiance to him, to wiser, perhaps, but not better men. Having made arrangements for the vigorous prosecution of the war in Ireland, he again started for Holland, to assist the confederate princes in the war against France.

The conduct of the war in Ireland had been entrusted to General Ginckel, who soon brought it to an honourable end. Having crossed the river Shannon, in the teeth of the French and Irish troops, he captured the town of Athlone on the 1st of July. Driven from the town, the French and Irish retired to Aghrim, and encamped in an excellent position, protected by hills and bogs. They were followed by General Ginckel with his army, and a fierce encounter took place on the 12th of July, which ended in the victory of the English. The battle lasted only two hours; but, in that brief time, 4,000 Irish and French were sent to a sudden and blood-bedewed grave. Nearly as many more perished in the pursuit; but the English lost only about 1,400 men. The fatal battle of Aghrim was followed, on the 3rd of September, by the surrender of Limerick, which put an end to the war; and the cause of James and popery was lost in Ireland.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF WILLIAM OF ORANGE AND MARY STUART.—A.D. 1691 —1694.

ING WILLIAM returned to London during the autumn of 1691, and opened the parliament, which voted money for carrying on the war with France, and for increasing the army and navy.

In the commencement of the following year a shocking event happened in Scotland—an event which has ever been considered a stain upon William's character. It is known in history as the massacre of Glencoe. The Scottish people, and especially the Highlanders, were strongly attached to the cause of the Stuarts, and did their best to restore James to his throne. A Scottish nobleman, the Lord Breadalbane, proposed to William a plan for winning the affections of these men, and the English king consented to it. It was, that a general pardon should be given to the Highlanders, £12,000 distributed amongst them, and pensions bestowed upon their chiefs, on condition of their keeping 4,000 of their clansmen ready to resist any invasion from France. The Highland chiefs were ready enough to take the money; but they were a treacherous set of men, and wrote to the banished James for permission to cheat William by pretending to submit, and thus obtain the reward of obedience while they held themselves ready for rebellion. Having made up their minds to this baseness, they could not agree about the division of the money. Indeed, they were so clamorous, and made such extravagant demands, that Breadalbane was unable to come to any terms with them, and the scheme of conciliation was given up.

But as it was necessary to subdue the rebellious spirit of the Highlanders, Breadalbane and some other Scots advised William to make a terrible example of the most abandoned and restless of them. He accordingly resolved to put in execution an old law of the country, and issued what was called "letters of fire and sword." The clan pointed out to him as the most incorrigible and ruffianly was that of Macdonald of Glencoe. Besides being rebels, these men were cattle-lifters, or thieves, and not unfrequently concealed their robberies by murder.

King William had, in August, 1691, offered peace and indemnity to all who had been in arms against him, provided they would submit and take an oath of allegiance before the 1st of December. The obstinate Macdonald of Glencoe, cherishing treason to the latest moment, did not present himself to take the oath until the last day allotted for that purpose. Alarmed for the consequences, he then hurried to Fort William, and offered to take the oaths. The commanding officer refused to administer them, as he was not a civil magistrate. Macdonald was therefore obliged to travel to Inverary, where he arrived three days behind the time. After some hesitation the sheriff consented to receive the oaths, and the chief returned to his native valley, believing himself and his clan to be in safety.

They were not so: the king was not made aware of Macdonald's submission, and he signed a warrant for the extermination of the clan. The mode in which this severity was inflicted has caused it to be regarded, both then and since, with feelings of execration. Captain Campbell, of Glenlyon, was directed to march into the valley with two regiments of soldiers, under pretence of levying some taxes in arrear. They arrived on the 1st of February, 1692; and as they said they came in peace, they were received with hospitality, and lived for thirteen days on terms of hollow, false friendship with their devoted victims. Then, during the night of the 13th of February, they suddenly turned on the unsuspecting Highlanders, and butchered thirty-eight of them in cold blood. Old Macdonald himself was shot through the head, and fell a corpse into the arms of his wife, who, overcome by the horror of the scene, survived only till the next day. It was intended to put to death all the males of the clan, who amounted to upwards of 200; but as the mountain-passes were not effectually secured, as many as 160 escaped. Captain Campbell then carried out his instructions by burning all the houses in the valley, and the wretched women and children were driven out into the bleak, wild country, where many of them perished in the snow from cold, want, and distraction. A great outcry followed this cruel deed: the Jacobites represented William as an inhuman monster. It was long before the feeling abated; and it is not, even now, extinguished. The king directed an inquiry to be made into the affair; but it was afterwards abandoned; and no one connected with the massacre was punished.

The same year that this infliction fell upon the Highlanders of Glencoe, William abolished the episcopal form of worship—a form hated by the Scots, who thought it scarcely better than popery. The attempt to force it upon them had led to the revolution which conducted Charles I. to the scaffold; and had ever since been attended by persecutions, insurrections, and bloodshed. Its abolition, however, could not detach them from the cause of the Stuarts, which they still continued to support.

In March, 1692, William went over to the continent, and joined the grand army of the confederacy. He engaged in several military enterprises without success; and it is remarkable that, though he was, without doubt, both a brave and skilful soldier, he failed in more sieges and lost more actions than any general of that day. While he was abroad, an officer in the French service, named De Grandval, was arrested, in the middle of July, for a design to assassinate him. The villain confessed that he had been hired to murder William, and that he had afterwards seen James, who said to him, "If you and the other officers do me this service, you shall never want." He was very deservedly shot for his intended crime. James declared, however, in his Memoirs, that he had no idea the "service" alluded to, included the assassination of the king. Other traitors at home were plotting the ruin of William; and amongst them was the Earl of Marlborough—a man whose great genius as a warrior has alone redeemed his memory from some of the censure attached to it for his desertion of James, and his subsequent bad faith to William in the early part of his reign. Marlborough was sent to the Tower on a charge of treason, in designing to restore King James—a design he was certainly guilty of; though, as his accuser bore a bad character, the double-dealing earl was soon set at liberty.

While Marlborough was in the Tower, a great sea-fight took place, on the 19th of May, between the English and Dutch fleets, under Admirals Russell and Rooke, and the French, under De Tourville. The latter made the attack, expecting the allies would repeat the tactics of Beachy Head; and that his fleet, stronger than either the English or Dutch singly, but not equal to the two united, would beat them both in detail. There was no defection, however, but the wind was unfavourable to the allies, and only half Russell's ships could be brought into action. They thoroughly beat the French, capturing thirteen ships. The rest took shelter under the guns of the batteries at La Hogue, where the greater part of them were destroyed, on the 23rd of May, by a flotilla of gun-boats, led into the harbour by Admiral Rooke. The French fleet was intended to convoy a French army, collected to make a descent upon the English coast. The defeat put a stop to the expedition. The affair of the 23rd was witnessed by James; who, at the close, retiring in hopeless despondency, exclaimed, in a mournful tone—"Heaven fights against me!"—Queen Mary commemorated the battle of La Hogue by ordering that the royal palace of Greenwich should thenceforth be an asylum for aged and disabled seamen, in honour of that event.

William returned to England on the 18th of October, and was joyfully and enthusiastically received by his people. The parliament was opened on the 4th of November. During the session the Whigs brought forward a bill for purifying the House of Commons of court influence, by making all persons who held places under the crown incapable of serving as members of it. Although the House was full of officers and placemen, this self-denying measure actually passed; but it was rejected by the Lords. Another bill—the famous bill to provide for triennial parliaments—was then introduced. It was very properly argued, that to have a new parliament every three years, was necessary to obtain a fair representation of the people, and to prevent a corrupt and servile one from mismanaging the country for a great period of time; as the Pension Parliament, which sat for seventeen years, did during the reign of Charles II. The generally liberal William acted in an illiberal manner upon this occasion; and, after the bill had passed both Lords and Commons, refused his assent to it. He feared the people—who disliked William personally, and were offended by his evident partiality for the Dutch—might return such members as would place his crown in jeopardy by encouraging the Jacobites.

At the end of the session William again went abroad; indeed, during the whole of his reign, he constantly travelled backward and forward between Holland and England, and devoted his energies to the welfare of both countries. There was probably not a more industrious man in all England than the king who sat upon its throne: this quality helped greatly to make him, in spite of all his errors and military reverses, one of the best monarchs that ever wore the triple crown of the British empire. In the campaign of 1693, he lost, on the 19th of July, the famous battle of Landen. The slain was about equal on both sides; and William conducted his retreat with so much skill and cool bravery, that he rather gained than lost honour by it. During the summer, the French also achieved a triumph over William's forces at sea. A Dutch and English fleet of twenty-three vessels had undertaken to protect a convoy of merchant ships, known as the Smyrna fleet, and destined for the Mediterranean and the Levant. The French fell upon them with a very superior force. Two vessels were destroyed and two captured, but the rest escaped.

William returned to England, and took up his residence at Kensington at the close of October. The parliament assembled on the 7th of November; and the king met it with a new ministry. He had tried to govern first with a Whig, and then with a Tory ministry; and "cabinet councils," before unknown, had become a recognised part of the administration. He now nominated a cabinet of Whigs and Tories—one, in effect, neutralising the other.—The Commons were not influenced by the change of ministers. They still supported the king in his desire to carry on the French war; voting him more soldiers, more sailors, and greatly increased taxes.

The king prorogued the parliament on the 25th of April, 1694, and returned to the continent at the beginning of May. The events of the continental campaign that year were only important so far that Louis made no advance; but he held his own. A naval expedition to Brest was defeated; its purport having been made known to James by Godolphin and Marlborough.—On the 9th of November, William returned to Kensington; and on the 12th, parliament reassembled. The Triennial Parliaments Bill was one of the first measures passed; and not daring to veto it again, the king gave the royal assent on the 22nd of December.—In this session the act was passed incorporating certain London merchants as "the governor and company of the Bank of England," they having lent the government £1,200,000.

William now received a blow from an inexorable power, which seems to have afflicted him more than all the successes of his enemy, Louis. This was the loss of his queen, Mary, who died on the 28th of December, 1694. Her disorder was a malignant form of small-pox, which, added to much mental anxiety, proved fatal. As soon as she became aware of her danger she was perfectly resigned, and her last days were spent almost entirely in prayer: she expired in the thirty-third year of her age. She was tall, and elegant in her figure; her features were pleasing, her manners mild, and her conduct dignified. She had a mind of more than ordinary capacity, and was a zealous Protestant in religion. As a wife, she was most devoted and affectionate. On one occasion, when writing to her husband when he was abroad, and complaining of the difficulties by which she was surrounded, she added—"But do but continue to love me, and I can bear all things else." Her conduct as a daughter, in ascending the throne from which her father had been driven, and doing so without one apparent sign of regret, has been much censured. Certainly James deserved no sympathy from any one; but a forbearing tenderness on the part of his own daughter would have been natural and pleasing. She had long quarrelled with her sister, the Princess Anne; and some say that, in her dying moments, she refused to see her, or be reconciled to her; though, according to another account, she sent her a kindly and forgiving message.

Though William was a man of cold manners, and apparently of cold affections, he returned the tender love which his queen bore to him, and mourned her loss with a grief so violent as seriously to affect his own health. During her illness he frequently burst into tears; and he told Bishop Burnet, that from being the happiest, he was now going to be the most miserable creature upon earth. He added, that he had never known a single fault in her. When she died, he broke out into violent lamentations, fainted frequently, and for some weeks was incapable of attending to business, or of seeing company. Mary's funeral was performed with great magnificence; and her body was followed to its last resting-place, in Westminster Abbey, by the members of both Houses of Parliament. Though a diversity of opinion existed as to the character of the queen, she seems, generally speaking, to have enjoyed the respect of the nation; and the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and common council of London came to a resolution to erect her statue with that of the king in the Royal Exchange.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE THIRD.—A.D. 1694—1702.

ROM the death of his queen, Mary Stuart, William of Orange reigned over England as sovereign in his own right until the end of his life. Many of the Jacobites said, that now his wife, through whom he ascended the throne, was no more, his right to it had ceased, and that the Princess Anne ought to wear the crown. But William was too firmly seated for those dangerous insinuations to have any effect.

Busy as this time was, and full of parliamentary contests and continental wars, yet no event of striking interest or importance took place for more than a year. A dangerous conspiracy of the Jacobites was then discovered—a conspiracy which there is scarcely any doubt was sanctioned by the exiled James, and entered into at his express command. It was arranged to attack King William on the road between Brentford and Turnham Green, as he returned from hunting at Richmond, and either carry him off a prisoner to France, or murder him on the spot. During the confusion and terror which would follow this event, it was intended that James should make a descent on the English coast with a French army, and take possession of the throne from which he had been so properly expelled.

After one or two disappointments, the conspirators resolved to put their wicked scheme in practice on the 15th of February, 1696. But before that day, some of them, seized with horror at the intended murder, revealed the plot to the government. The first information came from a Captain Fisher, who communicated it to the Earl of Portland. There had of late been so many sham plots, that William gave no credit to the affair; but, on the 14th, an Irish officer, named Pendergrast, addressed the earl at Whitehall, and assured him that if the king went to hunt the next day he would certainly be murdered. He said that he had been called up from Hampshire to assist in the assassination—a crime he regarded with detestation, and resolved to prevent. He owned himself a Catholic; but said he did not believe any religion could justify so treacherous a deed. He then gave an account of the whole plot; but refused to name the conspirators, considering himself bound in honour not to do so. When the king heard this disclosure, he was still scarcely convinced of the reality of the plot; but a third conspirator, named La Rue, having revealed the same particulars, without knowing any one else had done so, he was satisfied of its existence. William examined La Rue and Pendergrast separately, and prevailed upon the latter to give him a list of the conspirators.

As William did not go to Richmond on the 15th of February, the conspirators put off the intended execution of their wicked plot until the 22nd. On that morning he entered his coach, but, after riding a short distance, suddenly returned; and Sir George Barclay, the principal conspirator, fearing his plot was discovered, fled back to France. Most of the other plotters were seized that night in their beds. A proclamation was issued for the apprehension of those who had absconded, and £1,000 offered as a reward to any one who should seize them. Amongst the names inserted in this proclamation was that of James's natural son, the Duke of Berwick, who had visited and encouraged the conspirators. Some writers have denied that James, who, during his exile, devoted the greater part of his time to his religious duties, sanctioned the proposed murder. The ex-king himself, in his Letters and Memoirs, admitting the conspiracies against William's government, which he considered were right, always denied a connection with any attempts on his successor's life.

On the 11th of March, Charnock, King, and Keys, three of the conspirators, were tried at the Old Bailey, and condemned to death as traitors. They suffered at Tyburn, confessing the plot in their last moments; but Charnock, who was a scholar, left a paper, in which he attempted to justify his conduct by saying that William was an usurper. It also declared that King James had no knowledge of the intended murder. Sir John Friend, Sir William Perkins, Brigadier Rookwood, Major Lowick, and Captain Cranburn were tried, condemned, and executed a few days afterwards. Friend, a rich brewer, declared he believed that he was going to suffer for the cause of God and true religion. He added, that he knew nothing either of the proposed murder of William, or the invasion of the kingdom; and that he could not understand that James's subjects had a right to depose or dethrone him on any account whatever. These traitors were attended on the scaffold by three nonjuring clergymen, named Cook, Snatt, and Collier, who publicly absolved the criminals of all their sins. For this conduct, which was intended as a justification of the conspiracy, Cook and Snatt were sent to Newgate, but Collier escaped.

The projected invasion was as fruitless as the plot for assassination; and, although James had proceeded as far as Calais, it was abandoned as hopeless. He then published a denial that he knew anything about the proposed murder; but the majority of the English people did not believe him. Both Houses of Parliament waited on William with addresses of congratulation, and assured him that they would defend his life to the utmost; support his government against the late King James and all other enemies; and declared, that in the event of his coming to a violent end, they would avenge it upon his adversaries and their adherents. To provide for his present safety, they suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, and voted the banishment of all papists from London and Westminster. Lords and Commons both joined in a bond of association for the defence of the king: it declared that "King William hath a right by law to the crown of this realm, and that neither King James, nor the pretended Prince of Wales, nor any other person, hath any right whatsoever to the same." This bond of association was signed, not only by most of the members of the Houses of Lords and Commons, but by the people generally.

During the month of June, 1696, Sir John Fenwick, who had been connected with the late plot, and with several others, was arrested as he was attempting to escape into France. To save his own life, Fenwick revealed to the Duke of Devonshire, that the Earls of Marlborough, Shrewsbury, and Bath, the Lord Godolphin and Admiral Russell, were all in correspondence with James; and although they pretended to be very loyal to William, were in the habit of betraying his secrets to his banished rival, whom they were ready to restore. It is known that some of these lords were traitors; and there is little doubt they all were; but as it was now their interest to act honourably, William trusted that they would do so, and did not seem to give any credit to the accusations of Sir John Fenwick. There were only two witnesses to convict that known traitor, and Lady Fenwick bribed one of them to leave England, and thus render his conviction by the ordinary laws of the country impossible. But there was an extraordinary way of procuring the condemnation of an enemy to the state—and one which those who bitterly condemned any extraordinary exercise of the prerogative by the sovereign, never failed to resort to when the law would not support them—namely, by an act of attainder in parliament. By this means Fenwick was sentenced to the block, and was beheaded upon Tower Hill, on the 28th of January, 1697. On the scaffold he declared that he was innocent of any share in the intended invasion, and that he regarded the idea of assassinating William with horror. Still he professed his loyalty to James, and prayed for his speedy restoration.

This bill of attainder was the most important act of the session of 1696–'97. Parliament was prorogued on the 16th, and the king embarked for Holland on the 26th, of April. The campaign of 1696 had not been favourable to Louis; nor was that of 1697; and the monarch who had so long been at war with half Europe, was at length desirous of a peace. His people were weary; his treasury almost exhausted; and he had a design upon the crown of Spain, which he feared he could not accomplish while so many confederated princes were in arms against him. A treaty was therefore set on foot at Ryswick, and peace was concluded, on the 22nd of September, 1697, between England, France, Holland, and Spain. By this treaty Louis abandoned the cause of James, acknowledged the Prince of Orange to be King of England, and agreed to restore to the potentates of Germany, of Spain, of Holland, and of other countries, all that he had won from them by force of arms. The French people were terribly mortified; but they needed peace; and Louis merely made that peace to serve his own ambitious schemes, and intended to break it again as soon as it was convenient for him to do so.—William remained at his favourite residence, the palace of Loo, some time after the treaty had been signed. He did not return to London till the 26th of November, when he was received with transports of joy; and the people hailed him as their deliverer from a war which had so long consumed their resources, and held back the tide of their prosperity.

A coldness soon began between William and the House of Commons. He wished to retain his army, because he believed Louis would not long observe the treaty that had just been concluded; but the Commons entertained a natural jealousy of permitting him to keep up an army in time of peace, and insisted that it should be disbanded. When he opened the parliament on the 3rd of December, 1697, the king distinctly stated his opinion, "that, for the present, England could not be safe without a land force." The Commons took up the subject a few days subsequently; and in reply to the ministers, who supported the king's wish that a respectable army should be kept up, it was maintained that a standing army was utterly inconsistent with a free government; and that if it were once established, it was a power kings would never forego. That the history of every country showed, that to establish a military force apart from the people, had ever been an act fatal to liberty; that a people could no longer be free when they were disarmed, and the power of the sword placed in the hands of mercenaries; and that the fruit of the Revolution would be trampled upon and lost if a standing army were permitted to exist in England. These arguments had such an effect that, by the votes of 185 members against those of 148, it was resolved to disband all the forces raised since 1680—a vote which reduced the troops of the country to no more than 10,000 men. William was much hurt, and declared to some of his friends, that he would never have interfered with the affairs of the English people, had he thought they would have treated him with so much distrust and ingratitude. The people were not yet satisfied with the reduction that had taken place; the parliament began the agitation again; and William, though it had voted him most liberal supplies—in all, amounting to £7,118,000—dissolved it, and summoned a new one.

The affairs of Spain at this time occupied a large share of the attention of the other European powers. That country had been the wealthiest and most powerful in Europe; but, from long-continued, bad government, it was gradually declining to a state of anarchy and weakness. Spain was the most intensely popish country in Europe; the Roman church had hung like a mill-stone around the neck of its people, and the result was, that it was hastening to decay. At the period we are now arrived at, it was governed by Charles II., a young king whom constitutional maladies had left a mere wreck both in mind and body. He was childless, and such a prey to illness and melancholy, that he had given up all idea of being blessed with children. The question which engaged the attention of the statesmen of Europe was, who should succeed him on the throne of Spain?

There were three competitors for the dignity which Charles II. was almost daily expected to leave. His eldest sister had been married to Louis XIV. of France. Louis's son, the dauphin, would therefore have succeeded to the Spanish crown in the common course of inheritance, if his mother, at the time of her marriage, had not solemnly renounced her claim to it—a renunciation that had been confirmed by the Cortes, or parliament of Spain. The second claimant was the electoral Prince of Bavaria, the son of a younger sister of the Spanish King Charles. She also had renounced her claim to the crown at the time of her marriage; but as the Cortes had not sanctioned this renunciation, it was not considered binding on her posterity. The third claimant was Leopold, the Emperor of Germany, who was descended from a daughter of Philip III. of Spain. His claim was the weakest; but no renunciation of the crown had been exacted from his mother on her marriage.

Who was to succeed to the crown of the afflicted Spanish king? was a question of immense importance. All the sovereigns of Europe were interested in preventing any one becoming so powerful that he could endanger the independence of the rest. They were interested in supporting what is called a balance of power between the great states of the continent. To prevent the alarm and jealousy which would have been excited, had either the Emperor of Germany or the Dauphin of France become King of Spain, each of those princes offered to give up his right in favour of his second son;—the emperor in favour of the Archduke Charles; the dauphin in favour of Philip, Duke of Anjou.

The King of England dreaded the great power and ambition of the French king, and he would have snatched the crown of Spain from the grandson of that monarch by force of arms, if he could. This he was unable to do; for, since the peace of Ryswick, as just stated, he had been compelled to disband the greater part of his army. Therefore William tried to reduce, by statesmanship, an evil he could not prevent by force. He entered into an arrangement with the French king to settle the question of the succession to the Spanish crown, without consulting either Archduke Charles or the Emperor of Germany. On the 11th of October, 1698, a treaty, known as the First Partition Treaty, was concluded between England, France, and Holland, by which the Spanish dominions were to be divided among the rival claimants. It was arranged that the electoral Prince of Bavaria should succeed to Spain, the Indies, and the Netherlands; that the son of the German emperor should have the duchy of Milan; and the dauphin the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. This proposed division of the inheritance of the Spanish king, when it became known, caused great excitement and indignation among his people. To prevent it, Charles resolved to bequeath his dominions to the Prince of Bavaria—an arrangement which was considered to have settled the question. The settlement, however, was a very brief one; but it led to important results, in which England was greatly concerned.

When the English parliament met on the 6th of December, 1698, the Commons were irritated because the king had kept together a greater number of troops than their predecessors had voted should be retained. Determined that he should feel their displeasure, and respect their decision, they not only omitted the usual compliment of an address to him, but, on the 16th of December, resolved that a still further reduction of the army should take place. They determined that no more than 7,000 soldiers should be kept up in England, and 12,000 in Ireland, and that all of them should be natural-born subjects. Though William was bitterly vexed, he gave his royal assent to the bill; but he sent a message to the Commons, requesting that his faithful Dutch guards, who had followed him through good and through ill fortune, might remain in his service. The Commons refused his request. William's cool temperament was now effectively roused; and in the violence of his feelings he even threatened privately to leave the kingdom. It is said that when the talented but unprincipled Earl of Sunderland heard of William's threat to resign the crown, that nobleman exclaimed—"Does he so? Well, there is Tom Pembroke, who is as good a block of wood as a king can be cut out of! We will send for him, and make him our king." By Tom Pembroke he meant the popular earl of that name.

The year 1699 presents no incident of great historical interest: it was occupied chiefly by parliamentary proceedings, and by political struggles and jealousies, and meannesses, which are not only tedious to relate, but would be devoid of interest to the reader.

In the year 1700, Spanish affairs again occupied the attention of William. The Prince of Bavaria, to whom Charles had bequeathed his crown, had died, and that vexed question yet remained to be settled. On the 18th of March, a second treaty of partition was entered into, by which it was agreed, that Spain, the Indies, and the Netherlands should descend to the Archduke Charles of Germany; and that the Dauphin of France should have the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, together with other possessions; but that the crown of Spain should never be worn by a French prince. When information of this second treaty reached Spain, both court and people were as incensed at it as they were at the first. The Spanish ambassador was directed to remonstrate with William: and he did so with such insolence, that he was commanded to leave the country; the English ambassador, also, was recalled from Spain, and the crafty and ambitious French king thus had the field all to himself. He used every art to influence the mind of the dying Charles; and at length induced him to sign a will, leaving his crown to the grandson of Louis. Charles did so with the greatest reluctance, for he wished to leave it to a member of the House of Austria, to which he was closely related. But the papal influence was given to France; and the cardinal, Porto Carrero, who was the papal nuncio at the court of Spain, so worked upon the religious fears of the dying king, that he did as he was directed. He signed the will, and, bursting into tears, exclaimed, "God gives kingdoms and takes them away. I am already one of the dead."

The anticipations of the wretched monarch were soon fulfilled, and he expired on the 3rd of November, 1700. The will was then made public; the delighted King Louis broke the partition treaty, and placed his grandson Philip, Duke of Anjou, on the Spanish throne. William was bitterly vexed and angry at this perfidious conduct; but he accepted the apologies of Louis. He would instantly have declared war against him if he could; but his hands were tied by the jealousy of his people: he had no army: the nation was not inclined to engage in another war; and his own health was breaking.

The Princess Anne had, on the 24th of July, 1689, given birth to a son—a promising little boy, who was educated as a Protestant, and to whom the crown of England would have descended after her death. The little prince, who was called the Duke of Gloucester, fell ill, and died during the summer of 1700; and when the parliament assembled, on the 6th of February, 1701, William said that it was necessary it should provide for the Protestant succession of the crown after him and the Princess Anne. He added, very truly, that the happiness of the nation and the security of the national religion depended greatly upon its safety on this head. The Jacobites were delighted at the death of the young prince, and began plotting how they might raise the son of the banished James to the throne. Many Protestants wished to see the proper line of succession kept up, and they were desirous that James's son might be sent to England, and educated in the principles of the church of England. They secretly sent Lord Preston to St. Germaine, with a proposal to that effect; but the ex-king rejected it. The Commons did not lose sight of this important question. On the 3rd of March, Mr. Harley introduced the Succession Bill; which, after long debates, passed both Houses, and received the royal assent. By it the PRINCESS SOPHIA, DUCHESS-DOWAGER OF BRUNSWICK, and granddaughter of James I., and her children after her, were declared next in succession to the Princess Anne, if that lady should die without leaving a child to ascend her throne. This bill placed several useful limits to the power of any future sovereign of England. It declared, that whoever hereafter came to the possession of the crown should join in communion with the church of England, as by law established; that they should not oblige the nation to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, unless they obtained the permission of parliament to do so; and that they should not go out of the kingdoms of England, Ireland, and Scotland without the consent of parliament.

Shortly afterwards, William intercepted a letter from the Jacobite Lord Melfort, at St. Germaine, to his brother the Earl of Perth. This letter announced that Louis intended soon to sail from France with a great fleet, and restore James to his throne by force of arms. William sent it to the parliament, on which the Lords bound themselves to support the Protestant succession, and the Commons voted a large sum of money to put the nation in a proper state of defence, and raised the seamen of the royal navy from 7,000 to 30,000 men. The Lords also recommended, that all papists (a great part of whom were generally ready for conspiracy) should be banished from London, and that all their arms and horses should be seized. The French king, however, declared that he had no intention of invading England, and he banished Lord Melfort from his court for daring to make such an assertion.

William, who was himself a wise and liberal sovereign, had been so annoyed by the jealousies of the contending parties into which the country was divided, that he sided sometimes with the Whigs and sometimes with the Tories, to see which would treat him best, and offer the least factious opposition to his government. He had so little confidence in either party, however, that once he said, in a moment of irritation, that all the difference between them was - that the Tories would cut his throat in the morning, and the Whigs in the afternoon. At this time the Tories were in the ascendant, and their chief object, instead of carrying out the king's wishes in any way, or caring much for the affairs of the nation, was to disgrace and ruin their rivals the Whigs.

To accomplish this, they appointed a committee to take the two partition treaties into consideration, and they impeached the Whig Earl of Portland of a high crime and misdemeanour for negotiating them, and the Whig lords, Somers, Halifax, and Orford, for having advised the signing of them. This was very annoying to William; for the partition treaties had originated with him, and been carried out by his commands. But the Lords and Commons could not agree in the matter. The latter presented an address to the king, desiring that he would remove the accused noblemen from his councils for ever; and then the Lords sent him an address, begging that he would do no such thing. William replied to the Commons, that he would employ none but those he deemed worthy of trust: to the Lords he gave no answer. As the two Houses could not agree, the impeachments fell through.

Many of the people of England were fairly tired of these contests of parties; and the Kentish men resolved to speak their minds freely, and give the parliament a little wholesome advice. Accordingly, at the quarter sessions for Kent, held at Maidstone, on the 29th of April, 1701, the grand jury drew up a petition, which was signed by them, the chairman of the bench of magistrates, twenty-one justices, and a large body of freeholders. This document, known as the "Kentish Petition," was presented to the House of Commons on the 8th of May. Its object was to recommend union to the representatives of the people, and confidence in the king, whose great actions for the nation, it said, could never be forgotten without the blackest ingratitude; to beg that those representatives would attend to the desires of the people, and effectually provide for their religion and safety; and to hint that their addresses to the king should be turned into bills of supply, so that his majesty might be enabled to assist his allies before it should be too late.

The Commons were in a perfect fury on receiving this petition, and declared they would punish those who presented it. Several gentlemen, who came up from Kent, were privately desired to apologise for their conduct, and beg the pardon of the House; but these spirited men refused to do anything of the kind, and declared that all Englishmen had a right to present petitions to the government. Then the Commons, on the 13th of May, voted that the petition was scandalous, insolent, and seditious, and committed the gentlemen who signed it, and were in attendance, to custody in the Gate-house. In former times despotic conduct had been exercised by the kings, while parliaments had been the defenders of liberty; but now matters were reversed, and England had a king who favoured freedom, and a parliament that aimed at increasing its own importance by curtailing the undoubted rights of the nation.

The Kentish gentlemen remained in prison until the parliament was prorogued, on the 24th of June; but the sympathy of the country was with them: they were visited by such numbers of persons, and treated with so much honour as defenders of the nation's freedom, that they had very little reason to complain of their confinement. This arbitrary proceeding of the House of Commons gave rise to a singular circumstance. A memorial was placed in the hands of the Speaker by a poor woman, together with a letter, in which he was commanded, in the name of 200,000 Englishmen, to deliver it to the Commons. This spirited memorial charged the members with illegal and unwarrantable proceedings, and directed them to amend their conduct, or they would soon incur the resentment of an injured nation. It concluded with these words—words which are well worth remembering:—"For Englishmen are no more to be slaves to parliaments than to kings. Our name is Legion, and we are many." This document, which created great alarm at the time, and was known as the Legion Memorial, was soon understood to be a hoax. It was the "memorial," not of 200,000 Englishmen, but was written by one honest, stout-hearted one—Daniel Defoe, the famous political writer and novelist, whose natural story of Robinson Crusoe nearly every schoolboy has read with delight, and believed in as a true narrative. The Commons had been much frightened at first; but when they found out that they had been tricked and laughed at, they put on a very dignified air, and said the thing was beneath their notice.

The exiled King James died on the 16th of September, 1701, at St. Germaine, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. His health had been broken by disappointments, and by the religious penances he imposed upon himself. A fortnight before his death he was seized with a fit in the chapel of his palace. A few days afterwards it was followed by a second one, and then it was plain that his last hour was near. Sending for his children, he blessed them, and urged them always to adhere to the Catholic faith. He also made a short, pious exhortation to almost every one around him, and urged them to embrace Roman Catholicism. When the sacrament was brought, he cried out, "The happy day is come at last!" And when the priest who administered it inquired if he believed that the bread and wine contained the real and substantial body and blood of the Saviour, he answered fervently, "Yes, I believe it; I believe it; I believe it with my whole heart." He declared he forgave all his enemies, particularly the Prince of Orange and his daughter Anne. In his last moments he was visited by King Louis, who permitted his pity for the dying man to overcome his prudence, and he acknowledged the son of James as the future King of England.

William was highly incensed at this conduct of the French king, as it was a violation of the treaty of Ryswick, by which Louis acknowledged him as the lawful sovereign of this country; and he instantly recalled his ambassador from the French court. But the indignation of William was no greater than that of the English people, when they heard that Louis had presumed to decide who should be their king. The excitement was tremendous: for once, Whigs and Tories agreed; and a cry for war with France, to avenge the insult, rose from all parts of the land. This cry went to William's heart like life-blood; and although he was nearly in a dying state, it restored, for a time, the vigour and almost the strength of his youth. At last he thought the English people were aroused from their lethargy, and by their assistance he would yet punish the oppressor of his country, and humble the monarch who had so long striven to overturn the peace and freedom of Europe. He had been in Holland since the 3rd of July; where he had signed, on the 7th of September, a treaty of alliance with the emperor and the States-General, which had for its object the union of the crowns of France and Spain. He hastened home, reaching London on the 4th of November; and on the 11th dissolved the Tory parliament, and appealed to the people for another. A new parliament was elected—a parliament actuated by Whig principles—which met on the 30th of December. William's opening speech to the members was so admired, that the lovers of liberty printed it in several languages, surrounded with decorations: they even hung it up in their houses, as the king's last legacy to his own and to all Protestant people. After pointing out to them the dangerous ambition of Louis, the ruin it might bring upon England, and the necessity to resist it, he thus concluded:—"I should think it as great a blessing as could befall England, if I could observe you as much inclined to lay aside those unhappy and fatal animosities which divide and weaken you, as I am disposed to make all my subjects safe and easy as to any, even the highest, offences committed against me. Let me conjure you to disappoint the only hopes of your enemies by your unanimity. I have shown, and will always show, how desirous I am to be the common father of all my people: do you, in like manner, lay aside parties and divisions. Let there be no other distinction heard of among us, for the future, but of those who are for the Protestant religion and the present establishment, and of those who mean a popish prince and a French government. I will only add this: if you do, in good earnest, desire to see England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the Protestant interest, it will appear by your rightly improving the present opportunity."

This was William's last speech to his parliament, and the effect of it was electrical: the voice of opposition was silenced, and his long-clouded popularity revived in the nation. Both Houses presented loyal addresses to him, and declared that they would enter heartily into the new confederacy for a war against Louis, and snatch Spain from the grasp of his grandson. They then decreed that the navy should be increased to 40,000 men, and that an army of the same number should be raised; and they cheerfully voted large supplies of money to carry on the war. Not satisfied with the exclusion of the son of the late King James, on the 15th of January, 1702, the Commons passed, unanimously, an act of attainder against the pretended Prince of Wales (as he was called), by which he could be arrested and put to death if he presumed to land in England. In the Lords this bill was warmly opposed, and twenty peers signed a protest against it.—Another measure of the session was the Act of Abjuration, by which all persons were required to take an oath abjuring the Stuart prince, and acknowledging William as the rightful and lawful King of England.

Active as William was, and brightly as his genius shone even till the last, he knew that the hand of death was upon him, and that his days were numbered. His constitution was exhausted, and his sufferings during the winter had been extremely severe. Still he never relaxed that wonderful industry which, all his life, he had been accustomed to. He never omitted attending to the welfare of his people and the concerns of state; while, in his hours of relaxation, he amused himself with horse exercise. On Saturday, the 21st of February, 1702, as he was riding from Kensington to Hampton Court, his horse stumbled and fell, and

William was thrown to the ground with such violence that his collar-bone was fractured. His attendants conducted him to Hampton Court, where the bone was set, and in the evening he returned to Kensington in his coach, by which means the fractured bone became disunited. It was re-set, and he appeared to be in a fair way of recovering from the consequences of the accident: he even sent a message to the two Houses of parliament, regretting his present inability to attend in person, but recommending to their attention the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland. The favourable symptoms were delusive: having fallen asleep on a couch in the gallery at Kensington, he awoke and was seized with a shivering, which ended in fever. The utmost care of his physicians was nugatory in arresting the progress of his disorder; and on the 7th of March, when some papers were sent to him for signature, he was unable to sign his name, but affixed it with a stamp made for the purpose. The same day his favourite courtier, Lord Albemarle, arrived from Holland with good news; but the exhausted king heard it without any emotion of satisfaction, and exclaimed languidly, in French, "I approach the end of my life."

Archbishop Tennison, and Bishop Burnet, the historian, remained with him in his last hours. They prayed beside him, though he was so feeble as scarcely to be able to speak; but he gave the archbishop his hand, as a sign that he was a firm believer in the Christian religion. Afterwards he collected his strength so far as to be able to receive the sacrament. To the last he was tranquil, and his mind remained unclouded. After suffering much from a hollow cough, and a difficulty of breathing (for he was always asthmatical), he died on Sunday, the 8th of March, 1702. He was in the fifty-second year of his age, and had reigned thirteen years. He was buried in a vault in Henry VII.'s chapel, in Westminster Abbey.

William scarcely reached the usual height of men: his person was thin; his constitution delicate; and he was subject to a cough from his infancy. He had an aquiline nose, sparkling eyes, a large forehead, and a grave, solemn aspect. He was usually cold and retired in his manners, and very sparing in conversation; though, in battle, his tongue was unbound, and his manner spirited and cheering.

With respect to his character, he has been called the "hero of Protestant liberty, and the most illustrious of the kings of England;" and there can be little doubt that we are indebted to him for that religious freedom which our country at present enjoys. If James was sincere in his expressed wish to allow perfect liberty of conscience to all his subjects, it is impossible that that liberty could have been secured under a Roman Catholic sovereign; and the establishment of the Protestant succession was the most beneficial act of William's reign. As a king, in his general character, that reign was certainly of much benefit to England. Holland, as was natural, held a great place in his affections and in his views; the interests of that country were never lost sight of; whilst those of England were, to a certain extent, made subservient to his foreign policy. In estimating the character of William, it must never be forgotten that he carried on the great work of tolerance, freedom, and justice, which was so nobly begun by Oliver Cromwell, and which some future Oliver or William will come, in time, to finish. A great historical writer (Mr. Hallam) has said, that "it must ever be an honour to the English crown that it has been worn by so great a man." A skilful yet humane warrior, distinguished in the field alike by his fortitude and his bravery—just in his conduct, sincere in his character, calm and passionless in his conversation—he may almost be referred to as the model of a wise and patriotic sovereign. Ascending the throne under such peculiar circumstances as he did, William had many enemies, and it is not wonderful that his motives should have been misrepresented and his character traduced by party writers. Still he had many friends in England—men who, like the Kentish petitioners, loved a purified religion better than a popish superstition; a civil freedom better than a rigid and harassing despotism. William's errors were merely faults of judgment, not deeds done in defiance of his sense of justice and humanity. Considered altogether, though his reign was not a period of prosperity—though, during it, England was engaged in a long, wasting war, and involved in a heavy debt—yet every lover of his fatherland will speak of that period with gladness, and yield to William a tribute of gratitude and honour.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII

THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE—A.D. 1701—1707.

ILLIAM was succeeded on the throne by the PRINCESS ANNE, the second daughter of James II. When Anne became queen, she was nearly thirty-eight years old, and had been married eighteen years. The people generally seemed very pleased with her accession; and even the Jacobites, who wanted her young half-brother to have been made king, gave no opposition; for they hoped that she would contrive that he should succeed her on the throne. This they supposed to be the more probable, as, although the new queen had had many children, she had been unable to rear any of them.

Anne's husband, Prince George of Denmark, was a fat, lazy sort of person, very fond of his queen, and of eating and drinking, and as much of a Tory as such an insipid character could be anything. Anne, who seems to have been tolerably fond of her dull husband, soon contrived to get £100,000 a year settled on him for life, and to have him made generalissimo of the army and lord high admiral of the navy. He had no talent either as a soldier or a sailor; but he took the salaries attached to those offices, and other people did the work. Indeed, from the beginning of Anne's reign, until the conclusion of peace with France, the army was, in reality, under the command of that famous soldier, but avaricious and, we fear, not very honest man, the Earl of Marlborough: and Anne, who had been completely in the hands of the Countess of Marlborough before she became queen, continued under her pupilage when she ascended the throne.

Anne met the parliament on the 11th of March; and, in a brief speech, assured the two Houses that she intended to fulfil the late king's engagements with the allied princes on the continent, to reduce the overgrown power of Louis XIV. On the 4th of May, war was, therefore, declared against France, and the Earl of Marlborough sent to Holland, where it was arranged that he should have the command of the allied armies; it being supposed that he was the best substitute that could be found for the brave King William. Several military exploits took place during this campaign, and Marlborough was made prisoner, with some of his officers (while on a canal), by some Frenchmen, who, not knowing the rank of their captives, merely plundered them, and set them at liberty. To give a detailed account of the incessant military proceedings which took place in this reign until the peace of Utrecht, would be extremely tedious, and by no means instructive. The great battles that occurred, however, such as Blenheim, Ramilies, Almanza, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet, will be noticed. Battles and sieges were constantly going forward on the continent between the French and allied armies; but those mentioned were the chief military struggles in which England was engaged; and in all of them, except one, the genius of Marlborough won for her the victory. At the battle of Almanza, where the English were defeated, that great soldier was not present. It is strange that several of the most distinguished victories ever obtained by the arms of this country, were won while England was governed by a queen remarkable for her timidity of character.

A new parliament met on the 20th of October, 1702—a parliament so intensely Tory that the queen was perfectly delighted. The first thing this assembly did, was to pass a vote reflecting on the memory of the late king. Marlborough had as yet only taken a few towns; but the parliament declared that he had "retrieved" the ancient glory and honour of the British nation: a motion to substitute "maintained" for retrieved being negatived by a large majority. For this a vote of thanks was passed to him; but when the queen created him a duke, and conferred upon him a pension of £5,000 per annum, the Commons expressed great disapprobation. Marlborough, therefore, declined the pension, but accepted the title. The queen then set apart £2,000 a year for him out of her privy purse: this was also declined at the time; but it was claimed several years after; when all the arrears were applied for, and paid.

The Tory parliament next attempted to roll back the progress of the nation in good feeling and enlightenment by bringing forward the "Occasional Conformity Bill." This bill enacted, that all who had taken the sacrament and test for offices of trust, and afterwards frequented any meeting of dissenters, should be disabled from holding their employments, pay a fine of £100, and another fine of £5 for every day they continued to fulfil their public duties after they had been at any such meeting. The Commons passed this uncalled-for and ungenerous bill by a great majority; but the Lords rejected it, so it did not become law. During this reign the Lords were far more liberal, and showed more concern for the rights of the people, than did the Commons.

The Tories were extremely anxious to blacken the characters of their rivals the Whigs, and they presented a long address to the queen, in which they charged that party with having involved the nation in the debt which was incurred for carrying on the war during the late reign. They also charged the Whigs with having improperly used the public money, and, at the close of 1702, appointed a commission to examine the state of the public accounts. In consequence of this, Lord Ranelagh, the paymaster of the army, was disgraced by being deprived of his office, and expelled from the House of Commons. In consequence of these disputes, the queen prorogued the Houses on the 27th of February, 1703. The quarrels that agitated parliament spread to the clergy, who began to be distinguished as high churchmen and low churchmen. The former adhered to the ceremonies as well as the doctrines of the church, and declined all co-operation with dissenters. The latter neglected church forms, and considered the religious views of dissenters as correct as their own: associating with them in preference to the high church party. The queen was a member of the high church. Her majesty revived the practice of touching for the evil; and a form of prayer was inserted in the church service to be used on the occasion. On one day her majesty touched 200 persons afflicted with the malady. One was a poor, half-blind, heavy-looking boy, five years old, named Samuel Johnson. In after times that boy became Dr. Johnson, the famous lexicographer and moral writer. The ceremony was always accompanied by the gift of a small gold coin; and as most of the patients appear to have been poor people, if the queen's touch did them no good, the money did.

The war on the continent continued to be carried on by the Duke of Marlborough and the allies against France. Several successes were acquired, and the military duke obtained considerable renown as a soldier; but no great result was gained on either side. When the queen reopened parliament, on the 9th of November, 1703, she spoke in a very warlike way, and declared that it was her intention to continue the struggle until the allied armies had driven Louis XIV.'s grandson from the throne of Spain, and placed the Austrian prince, Archduke Charles, upon it. This was a very foolish resolve; and the attempt to carry it into execution cost a fearful loss of life, and immense sums of money, and yet failed at last. That which we have no right to attempt deserves to fail, as this did. The Tory Commons, who had blamed the Whigs so much for the war that had been carried on in William's time, now turned round, and voted immense sums for carrying on a more aggressive war in Anne's time. They also made another attempt to persecute the dissenters by again bringing forward the intolerant Occasional Conformity Bill; but again it was rejected by the more enlightened and patriotic Lords. In consequence of this, and some other disputes, great ill-feeling prevailed between the two Houses.

Anne was certainly sincere in her attachment to the Protestant church; and she showed that sincerity in a very generous manner. In February, 1704, her majesty granted that part of her revenue which was derived from the taxes, called first-fruits and tenths (which amounted to about £16,000 a year), to the poor clergymen of the land, to enable them to live in a more comfortable and independent manner. The clergy presented addresses of thanks and acknowledgment to the queen, and bestowed on her the title of "Nursing-Mother to the Church"—a distinction of which she was very proud. This grant is known by the name of "Queen Anne's Bounty."

During the month of July, 1704, the Duke of Marlborough, together with that equally distinguished general, Prince Eugene, gained a famous victory over the Elector of Bavaria, who was an ally of the French king. The war in which the ambition of the aged French king had engaged England now agitated all Europe. On one side was France, Spain, and Bavaria; on the other, England, Holland, Germany, and many inferior states. This contest, which is known as the battle of Schellenberg or Donawert, was fought in a beautifully romantic spot on the banks of the river Danube, in Germany, near the town of Donawert. The battle was fought on the 2nd of July; and although the allied army (as the English and those associated with them were called) won the victory, yet both sides suffered severely, but the enemy the most. They were encamped upon the hill called the Schellenberg. The allies stormed and carried the camp; the Gallo-Bavarians fled towards Donawert, and when crossing the Danube, the bridge gave way, and numbers were drowned.

After this battle a negotiation was begun between the allies and the Elector of Bavaria. It had got so far, that articles were prepared, which the elector was expected to sign; but he declined, because the French general, Marshal Tallard, was coming to his relief with 30,000 men; and he could not, with honour, desert the French interests. In consequence, soldiers were sent to ravage and lay waste a great part of Bavaria. In a short time upwards of 300 towns, villages, and castles were given to the flames, and the wretched inhabitants ruined. To the honour of Marlborough, it must be said that he was much affected at the sight of the misery which he caused to be inflicted. "My nature," he said, "suffers when I see so many fine places burnt, and that must be burnt, if the elector will not hinder it." The stern dictates of war left him no choice.

This desolation was soon followed by the famous battle of Blenheim—a battle which humbled the pride of France, changed the affairs of Europe, restored the military fame of England to the height it had reached in the days of Edward III. and Harry V., and made the name of Marlborough illustrious for ever. This memorable battle was fought at the village of Blenheim, on the banks of the Danube, on the 13th of August. It was gained by the allied armies; but the British troops distinguished themselves in a remarkable manner, and Marlborough was acknowledged to be the hero of that fatal field. The united French and Bavarian armies amounted to 56,000 men; the English and their allies to 52,000. The battle was bravely and furiously contested, and the victory was dearly purchased by a loss of above 12,000 men in killed and prisoners. The French and Bavarians lost, altogether, as many as 35,000. Of these, 13,000 were taken prisoners, 10,000 were left dead upon the field, and the rest driven into the Danube, and drowned in its blood-polluted waters.

This great battle is known by different names: the English call it Blenheim: the French, Hochstet; and the Germans, Plentheim. The Elector of Bavaria fled from the field in terror; the whole of his dominions fell into the grasp of the victors; and the French king was seized with astonishment and dismay. For some time no one dared to inform him of the ruin which had fallen upon his army; but at length a lady of the court told him that he was no longer invincible. Such is the atmosphere of delusion and flattery by which sovereigns are surrounded.

Marlborough and Eugene closed this brilliant campaign by the siege and capture of Ulm, Landau, and Traerbach. The great English warrior then returned home, carrying the French general and other distinguished officers with him as prisoners. He also brought an immense number of standards, colours, and cannon as trophies of victory. Marlborough had deserted the Tory party, because they refused to grant his pension; and they were displeased that a man who had left their ranks should have obtained such honours; but the Whigs and the nation generally received him with transports of grateful joy. The queen shortly afterwards rewarded him with the princely domain of Woodstock. She accompanied the gift with an order to the Board of Works to build him a magnificent palace at her expense, which, in memory of his victory, was to bear the name of Blenheim.

The month before the victory of the allied army on the banks of the Danube, the English obtained a remarkable conquest at sea. This was the capture of the famous Rock of Gibraltar—a fortress in the possession of the Spaniards, and considered impregnable. Although the natural advantages and strength of the place were such that it is said it might have been defended by a garrison of fifty men against a considerable army, yet it was taken by Admiral Rooke in three days, surrendering on the 24th of July. Such fierce broadsides were directed against its walls, that 15,000 shots were discharged in about five or six hours. The famous old rock has remained ever since in the hands of the English; and it has been so fortified by modern science, that there is very little doubt it will ever remain so. At any rate, it has not yielded to sieges of many months' duration, and has more than once defied the united power of France and Spain. After taking the Rock of Gibraltar, Admiral Rooke came up with a French fleet slightly superior to his own. An engagement took place between them off Malaga. Not a ship was captured on either side, but the loss of life was great: both sides claimed a victory; but posterity has adjudged it to have been a drawn battle. Admiral Rooke was a Tory; and the Tories declared him to be as great a hero as Marlborough. But party spirit ran very high in England at that time, and the Whigs declared that Rooke, so far from being a hero, had not even discharged his duty; and as the Whigs were now rising into power, and the Tories falling from it, Admiral Rooke was dismissed from the command of the fleet for alleged mismanagement, and Sir Cloudesley Shovel appointed in his place. Sir Cloudesley was a brave and talented officer, who, by intelligence and good conduct, had risen to his distinguished rank from the humble position of a cabin-boy.

The Tory House of Commons had gradually become very unpopular; and on the 5th of April, 1705, the queen dissolved it. The Whigs then came into power, and Marlborough was regarded as their hero. The professed principles of the Whigs were liberal—in favour of popular rights, and love of country; but their conduct certainly was not in accordance with their professions, as the public soon found.—Queen Anne met her new parliament on the 14th of June, 1705. She told them that she intended to press on with the war against France; for, said she (or rather her new ministers wrote it for her), in the speech which she read—"Nothing can be more evident, than that if the French king continues master of the Spanish monarchy, the balance of power in Europe will be utterly destroyed, and he will be able, in a short time, to engross the trade and the wealth of the world." After that, she asked for large supplies to carry on the war (for even victories are usually very expensive things); and recommended a commission for treating of a union between England and Scotland. These two countries had, since the accession of James I., both been ruled by the same sovereign; but they were two distinct nations, each possessing its own peculiar customs, and each governed by its own laws. William III. had longed to see the two nations united—incorporated into one great people; but such strong prejudices existed on both sides, that he was unable to carry his desire into execution.

The disappointed Tories, who were out of place, gave all the opposition they could to the progress of the government. Knowing how fond the weak queen was of the bishops and the very high church party, they tried to frighten her back to their councils. For this purpose they got up a cry that the church was in danger: as if God's truth could ever perish in a Christian land. The Whigs, who quite understood the trick, challenged the Tories to prove that the church was in any danger; and a day was appointed for the examination of the subject. When the day came, the Tory orators declared that the church must be in danger because episcopacy was not tolerated in Scotland, and because dissenters were tolerated in England;—because the Protestant successor to the crown was not resident in England; and because a city clergyman, named Hoadley, had preached a manly sermon, declaring that subjects had a right to resist a wicked king. After much of this frivolity, which it would be wrong to dignify with the name of argument, it was resolved by both Houses—"That the church of England, as by law established, which was rescued from the extremest danger by King William III., of glorious memory, is now, by God's blessing, in a most safe and flourishing condition; and that whoever goes about to suggest and insinuate that the church is in danger under her majesty's administration, is an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom." Disappointed in this scheme, the Tories consoled themselves with blackening the character of the Duke of Marlborough, who had now quite deserted them, and was the idol of the Whig party.

The famous general again left England for Holland in the spring of 1706, and soon gained another great victory over the French and Bavarian armies. This was the famous battle of Ramilies, fought on the 23rd of May, in which the French and Bavarians suffered a decided and terrible defeat. Their united army consisted of 80,000 men, of whom 13,000 were killed or wounded, and the rest fled in confusion. Marlborough, in killed and wounded, did not lose more than 3,000 men. The great duke himself, however, narrowly escaped; for, having ridden forward to cheer his soldiers while they were exposed to a murderous fire, he was recognised and shot at by the French. He instantly retreated within his own lines; but the head of an officer who was holding his stirrup was struck off by a cannon-ball. The result of the battle of Ramilies was, that the French were driven out of the Spanish Netherlands, and that country was given to the Austrian claimant, the Archduke Charles.

Shortly after the battle, Mechlin, Brussels, Antwerp, Ghent, Bruges, and other towns submitted, and were thus wrested from the grasp of France. The French troops were utterly dispirited, and the aged Louis seriously affected by these startling reverses. He assumed an air of calmness; but the check his ambition had received so injured his constitution, that his physicians thought it necessary to subject him to frequent bleedings. In his court no mention was made of the war; and an air of gloomy constraint prevailed in his once brilliant, gay, and gorgeous palace. But the misfortunes of the French were far from being ended. Very soon after Marlborough's victory over them at Ramilies, they were again defeated at Turin, on the 7th of September, by the brave Prince Eugene.

In spite of all these reverses on the part of the French, the great war went on, and the very life-blood of France was drained to maintain it. But while Spain, France, Holland, and Bavaria were the scenes of many fearful struggles, an event of a very different character took place in England. This was the UNION OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND into one nation, under the title of GREAT BRITAIN. Commissioners were appointed to represent each country, and make such arrangements as should be satisfactory to both peoples. Though the union was a wise measure, and by far the best thing done during the reign of Queen Anne, yet it met with the greatest opposition. On each side there were many jealous prejudices to overcome. The English looked down upon the Scots because England was the wealthiest country; and the Scots loved their nationality, and feared that their independence would be sacrificed. To such an extent was this feeling carried, that the Scottish people were thrown into a violent excitement. Great riots took place at Edinburgh: those members of the Scottish parliament who were known to be in favour of the union, went in fear of being murdered by the mob. Peace only was maintained by regiments of soldiers, and the ministers were protected by troops of dragoons. But the riots in Edinburgh failed: other riots, got up elsewhere, failed too; and the fiery people were gradually pacified.

On the 16th of January, 1706, the Act of Union passed the Scottish parliament: on the 6th of March, 1707, it received the royal assent, and, as far as law was concerned, the mingling of the two nations into one was effected. Many little jealousies and foolish feelings were, however, to be overcome before a real national mingling took place, and Englishmen and Scotsmen regarded each other as fellow-countrymen as well as fellow-subjects. Thank God, all this enmity has at length died away, and the noblest men of both sides the river Tweed join their hands in the hearty grasp of affection, and regard each other as brothers. The Scots will not yield to the English in their admiration of Shakspeare or Milton, nor will the English yield to the Scots in an affectionate appreciation of that noble, manly poet—that simple, self-taught son of genius—Robert Burns.

By the Act of Union, it was agreed that the Scottish parliament should be abolished, and that Scotland should be represented in the British parliament. Sixteen Scottish peers were to sit in the House of Lords, and forty-five Scottish gentlemen were to be sent as members to the House of Commons. No attempt was ever again to be made to alter the form of religion to which the Scottish people attached themselves. Episcopacy was never to be forced upon them; bishops were never again to be appointed in Scotland; and the church, or kirk, was to remain a Presbyterian church, as it has remained to the present hour; but it is divided into the established and the free church; and the followers of episcopacy are becoming more numerous.

CHAPTER LXXXIX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE.—A.D. 1707—1714.

RANCE, as time progressed, seemed about to pay a bitter penalty for the tyrannical ambition of her king. The country was hovering on the brink of utter ruin; constant wars had drained it of people and treasure; land lay uncultivated, trade was stagnant; and the poor were perishing from famine. Her aged king longed for peace, but he could not bring his proud mind to surrender all his vast conquests, and humble himself before the allied princes in array against him.

But some good fortune was still in store for Louis. The allies were jealous of each other, and took to quarrelling amongst themselves.—In 1705, the Earl of Peterborough had been sent to Spain, where, having landed in Catalonia with a not very numerous land force, he achieved a series of the most brilliant successes; his career in Catalonia and Valencia being one of rapid conquest. The fortresses of Lerida and Tortosa were taken with little resistance. Barcelona capitulated, after a siege, on the 4th of October; and the two provinces acknowledged the Austrian prince as their sovereign. In 1706, the Portuguese forces joined the English; Madrid was captured on the 24th of June; and the archduke was proclaimed king, as Charles III. But, in that year, the command of the English troops had been taken from the chivalrous Earl of Peterborough, and given to Lord Galway, a man of very little military talent. The result of this was, that in a battle fought on the plain of Almanza, on the 14th of April, 1707, by the English, Dutch, and Portuguese, against the French and the Spaniards, the latter obtained a great and complete victory. In a few hours the English and their allies lost, 18,000 men in killed and prisoners, 120 standards, and all their artillery and baggage. In this disastrous battle the French were commanded by an English general, in whose veins ran the blood of the great soldier, Marlborough. This was the Duke of Berwick, an illegitimate son of the late James II., by Arabella Churchill. Berwick was not free from the family vices of the House of Stuart, but he was a warrior of bravery and genius. Still, had Marlborough commanded at the battle of Almanza, it is likely it would have ended very differently. The French followed up their victory by taking Valencia, Saragossa, and a number of other towns. These successes fixed the grandson of Louis firmly on the Spanish throne; and the regal dignity of that distracted country was lost to the Archduke Charles.

The united parliament of England and Scotland (called the first parliament of Great Britain) assembled on the 23rd of October, 1707. In her opening speech the queen spoke of the late military reverses without despondency, and said that all which was lost would soon be recovered. The Commons seemed to think so too; for, in the address they presented in reply, they assured her that the want of success in the last campaign should not discourage them from making the utmost attempts for recovering the whole Spanish monarchy.

Queen Anne was a weak-minded woman, incapable of acting for herself, and always governed by some one. She had, up to this period of her life, been greatly attached to the Duchess of Marlborough—a clever and commanding woman, who completely ruled her. The duchess at length exercised her power a little too openly, the queen became afraid of her, and longed for some opportunity of getting rid of her late favourite. That opportunity at length arrived; for the duchess having introduced a poor relation of her's, named Mrs. Abigail Masham, to the queen as her bed-chamber woman, that cunning person contrived to supplant the duchess in the royal favour; and Anne came to love Mrs. Masham quite as much, or more, than she had loved the haughty Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough.

The Marlboroughs belonged to the Whig party, and Mrs. Masham was a Tory, being bribed by that party, according to popular rumour, to take their part in private with the queen. Mr. Henry St. John and Mr. Harley—men of great talent, strongly attached to their party, and not very scrupulous as to the means to be employed in advancing its interests—were the leaders of the Tory party, and obtained an influence over the queen through the intrigues of Mrs. Masham; and the Whigs began to sink in the royal favour, and the Tories to rise in it. The Duchess of Marlborough was unable to recover her lost ascendancy, and a party was formed to ruin both her and her husband.

The discontent of a great part of the Scottish people encouraged Anne's half-brother, the son of James II., to make preparations to invade England, and obtain that crown which had been forfeited by the crimes of his father. On account of his claim to the English throne, this young man was called the Pretender; but he himself, although his real name was James Stuart, assumed the romantic one of the Chevalier St. George. A constant intercourse had been kept up between the chevalier and the discontented in Scotland; but he had no means of raising an army and fleet. In 1708, however, the French king furnished him with ships and a body of troops; saying that he did so merely for the sake of restoring the prince to the throne of his ancestors; but his real motive was, to get up such a revolt in England as would give Queen Anne quite enough to do at home; and prevent her from sending armies against him to the continent. On parting from the Pretender, Louis gave him many rich presents, and the pope blessed the standards of the young Stuart, who was then at the head of 5,000 troops, with a fleet of five ships of war and twenty frigates at his disposal.

Anne had received information of this intended invasion, and was prepared for it. The Pretender and his ships were blockaded in the port of Dunkirk by an English squadron under Sir George Byng. The ships got out of port on the 19th of March, but, meeting with an English fleet, tacked about and sailed away as fast as they could. One of them, however, was captured. The Lords Griffin and Clermont, together with several Scotch and Irish officers, were on board. These men were imprisoned, but none of them put to death. With all her faults (and she had many), Anne was a merciful princess. During her reign no blood was shed upon the scaffold for the crime of treason. As for the Pretender, he was glad enough to get back to France, after having been tossed about at sea, in very tempestuous weather, for nearly a month.—An attempt was then made to get up an insurrection in Ireland in his favour; but, after a great deal of spying and trickery, it was abandoned.

In the spring of 1708, the Duke of Marlborough again led an army to Holland, and joined his forces to those of Prince Eugene. The French army, cheered by its late success, had taken the towns of Ghent, Bruges, and Ypres, and had invested Oudenarde. It was near the latter place that it met with the allied armies. The French numbered 100,000 men; Marlborough and Eugene 80,000; and for some years two such noble armies had not been seen in Europe. With the French was the Pretender, in arms against his own countrymen; with the English was Prince George of Hanover, who afterwards became King George II. The battle of Oudenarde took place on the 11th of July, 1708, and the French were utterly defeated. They lost 15,000 men (though only 3,000 were slain, the rest being prisoners), and above 100 standards, and were only saved by the approach of night from total destruction. At the beginning of the battle, the French generals quarrelled amongst themselves, and gave contradictory orders; and to this circumstance their defeat has been partially attributed. No doubt, however, it was largely owing to the military genius of Marlborough and Eugene.

After the brilliant victory of Oudenarde, the successful generals laid siege to the city of Lisle, a place of great importance to France. The city surrendered on the 22nd of October; but the citadel was defended till the 10th of December. Before it yielded, the allies had lost an immense number of men. Ghent was then taken, and the dispirited French abandoned Bruges, Plassendahl, and Leffinghen to their triumphant foes. The Whigs, and the English people generally, were delighted with these successes of the national arms, and naturally proud of the courage and military genius of their countrymen. But the Tories, who would rather have seen England disgraced than a Whig general triumph, grieved for the successes of the British troops, and did their utmost to asperse the character of the Duke of Marlborough. During the month of August in this year, the island of Minorca, in the Mediterranean, fell into the hands of the English.

The queen, soon after, lost her husband, Prince George of Denmark. His chief occupation for many years had been eating and drinking, of which he was very fond, so that he had grown enormously fat, and had suffered from those disorders to which gluttonous people are subject. He died on the 28th of October, 1708, of a complication of asthma, dropsy, and the gout.

The frightful state to which France was reduced made King Louis again anxious for peace. One of his own grandchildren had summoned courage to ask the proud old monarch, what had been the fruits of his insatiable ambition, and why the succession to the Spanish crown should be preferred to the prosperity of France? Louis was convinced of the hopelessness of his attempt to sway the destinies of Europe, and, before the year 1708 closed, he entered into a negotiation for peace. The victorious allies made many demands as conditions, the chief of which was, that Louis's grandson, Philip, should resign the crown of Spain to the Austrian Charles. To this Louis would not consent; and after a great deal of diplomatic discussion, the treaty was broken off, and hostilities were resumed, Prince Eugene declaring, that the only proper place to treat with the French was a field of battle.

Accordingly, Marlborough and Eugene again took the field in Flanders, with an army consisting of 110,000 men. They crossed the frontiers of France on the 21st of June, 1709; and first they besieged Tournay, a town in the possession of the French, and compelled it to surrender after a siege which continued from the 7th to the 28th of July. Whole battalions of the besiegers were, however, blown up into the air by the explosions of concealed mines of gunpowder, or crushed and buried beneath the falling ruins.—The movements in August were not important; but, at the close of that month, an enormous French army, amounting to 120,000 men, encamped in the woods near the town of Malplaquet. The allies were so near that a brief cannonading ensued between the forces; but the battle did not take place until three days afterwards—the 12th of September, 1709. Marlborough was waiting for reinforcements; and for two days these gigantic rival armies stood looking at each other. At length the battle began, and lasted, with fearful fury, from eight in the morning until three in the afternoon. The French fought with the ferocious courage of despair; but seeing their general dangerously wounded, their lines forced, and the left wing and centre of their army giving way, they retreated in good order, and left the field to Marlborough and Eugene. The allies, therefore, claimed the victory; but it was indeed dearly bought. Twenty thousand soldiers of the allied army lay dead upon the ground, while only half that number of the French perished. England and Holland certainly had the glory of the day, but France reaped the most advantage from it. However, it was a victory, and is ranked as one of the triumphs of the British arms.

During this year (1709), London was disturbed by the movements of a vain and arrogant clergyman, named Dr. Henry Sacheverel, rector of the church of St. Saviour's, Southwark. He was a person without principle, and ready to do anything to obtain notoriety. At one time he was a furious Whig, and constantly abused the Tories in his sermons; but as the Whigs took no notice of him, he turned Tory, and lavished his invectives on the other party. In 1705, he obtained the living of St. Saviour's. Having to preach, during the summer assizes of 1709, at Derby, before the judges, he vehemently abused the dissenters, and cried up the doctrine of the divine right of princes, and the duty of the people to pay them a passive obedience in all things. Soon afterwards he preached in St. Paul's cathedral, before the Lord Mayor and coporation of London. On this occasion he repeated what he had said at Derby, but in a more violent manner. He traduced some of the bishops in the most scurrilous way, because they approved of the doctrine of toleration, and thought it did not become a Christian prelate to persecute or annoy those who differed from him in opinion. He furiously abused the dissenters; spoke of the Revolution as a great sin; defended the doctrine of non-resistance to princes; declared that the church was dangerously attacked by her enemies, and only slightly defended by her false friends; and exhorted the people to put on the whole armour of God, and stand up in her defence.

Not contented with having preached this absurd and ridiculous sermon, Dr. Sacheverel published it, with the title of The Perils of False Brethren. It created quite an excitement; and, in a short time, as many as 40,000 copies were sold. No doubt it was irritating to the feelings of right-thinking men to see the church and the press put to this bad purpose; but the best plan would have been to let the clerical parasite alone, and he would have been soon forgotten. A member of the Commons, however, complained of it in parliament; the trashy sermon was produced, passages were read, and it was voted a scandalous and seditious libel. The doctor was taken into custody; and it was resolved, by a great majority, that he should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. Some of the ministry thought that this would be making the man too conspicuous; but others, who had been abused in the sermon, insisted that it was the best way of proceeding with him.

The Whig ministry was now sinking in public opinion; for the nation was weary of the heavy taxes it had to pay for the support of the war. Anne had always been a Tory in her heart; and the Tories and the high church party resolved to seize this opportunity, and make an outcry against the government. They declared that the Whigs had formed a design of ruining the church, and that the prosecution of Sacheverel was merely done to try the temper of the nation; and that, if this were borne, the Whigs would proceed to the execution of their wicked object without fear. These reports were spread in every direction, and by every means, money not being wanting to pay agents. The Tory and Jacobite clergy also took them up, and from their pulpits inveighed against the Whig government, and in favour of the impeached doctor. In a little while an intense excitement prevailed, and a perfect storm of Tory feeling and sympathy for the preacher spread over the land.

On the 27th of February, 1710, Dr. Sacheverel was placed on his trial at Westminster Hall, before the assembled Lords and Commons. He was assisted by several distinguished Jacobite clergymen, and even by some of the queen's chaplains. The trial occupied no less than six days, and was extended over a period of three weeks. Each time the doctor was brought to or from the hall, the streets through which he had to pass were thronged with dense crowds, who prayed for his delivery as if he had been a hero and a martyr. The queen herself attended the trial, and her sedan was beset by the mob, who cried out, "God bless your majesty and the church! We hope your majesty is for Dr. Sacheverel." It is strange that the people should have been in favour of this advocate of a doctrine that approached to slavery; but they followed their leaders without reflection, and loved the excitement of a popular disturbance. Indeed, riots occurred in many parts of the kingdom; and butcher-boys, sweeps, scavengers, costermongers, thieves, and women of the most depraved character, went about shouting prosperity to the high church and Dr. Sacheverel. These people knew nothing of what they were shouting for. Probably, similarly excited, if the cry had been, "Down with the church, and death to Sacheverel," they would have joined it just as heartily.

Several members of the Commons were appointed managers of the impeachment, and amongst them was Mr. Robert Walpole, a rising statesman, who ultimately obtained great distinction. His speech was much admired. In it he said—"I hope that your lordships' just judgment will convince the world, that every seditious, discontented, hot-headed, ungifted, unedifying preacher (the doctor will pardon me for borrowing one string of epithets from him, and for once using a little of his own language), who has no hope of distinguishing himself in the world but by a matchless indiscretion, may not advance, with impunity, doctrines destructive of the peace and quietness of her majesty's government and the Protestant succession, or prepare the minds of the people for an alteration by giving them ill impressions of the present establishment and its administration. This doctrine of unlimited, unconditional, passive obedience, was first invented to support arbitrary and despotic power, and was never promoted or countenanced by any government that had no designs, some time or other, of making use of it. What, then, can be the design of preaching this doctrine now, unasked, unsought for, in her majesty's reign, when the law is the only ruling measure both of the power of the crown and the obedience of the people?"

After Sacheverel's counsel had replied, he himself read a speech which had been written for him; for although a doctor of the church, he was a very ignorant person; and the Tories who backed him thought anything of his own composition would be too illiterate for the august assembly in whose presence he stood. In this paper he declared himself innocent of any evil intentions towards the queen or her government. He spoke in respectful terms of the Revolution and the Protestant succession; maintained that the doctrine of non-resistance, in all cases whatsoever, was a maxim of the church in which he was educated; and, finally, called God and His holy angels to witness that he had never been guilty of the wicked, seditious, or malicious intention imputed to him.

Notwithstanding the great excitement in his favour, the doctor was found guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. The judgment was, that he should not be permitted to preach for three years, and that his two sermons should be burnt by the common hangman. The lightness of this sentence caused it to be looked upon by the Tories and the doctor as a triumph. Some dissenters' chapels had been broken into and burnt during the trial; and when it was over, London was illuminated, and bonfires were made in the streets. Barrels of beer were given to the mob, and all passers-by compelled to drink health to Sacheverel. He himself, for several days, went about from house to house, attended by a noisy, dirty rabble, to return thanks to the nobles and gentlemen who had given him their support. Many of these gave him presents of money; and one peer even presented him with as much as £50. Portraits of him were printed, and medals struck to commemorate his trial. To crown his triumph, he rode through the country, and made seditious and foolish speeches at every town he came to. At many places the inhabitants received him with the most extravagant rejoicings. The university of Oxford even gave a great dinner to the doctor to do him honour.

The Tories did not really care about Sacheverel; but they used him as a tool to serve their purpose. That purpose was answered; the Whigs were made unpopular, and soon after displaced from the government of the country. The Whig parliament was, on the 26th of September, dissolved by the queen, and, while the people were still drunk with excitement about the late trial, a thoroughly Tory one was elected. Mr. Harley became Chancellor of the Exchequer; Mr. Henry St. John (afterwards Lord Bolingbroke), Secretary of State; and the queen's uncle, the Earl of Rochester, a noted bon vivant of the day, was made President of the Council.

While these popular tumults and ministerial changes were taking place at home, negotiations were being carried on abroad. After the battle of Malplaquet, the French king again made overtures for peace, and conferences to arrange it took place at Geirtruydenberg. There the allies insisted, as a condition, that Louis should compel his grandson Philip to surrender the Spanish crown within two months, and, if necessary, join his arms with theirs for that object. Louis humbled himself on many points, but he would not submit to that; and as the Dutch resolutely insisted upon it, the conference was broken off, and he resolved to try the chance of war once more.

The Duke of Marlborough was greatly vexed that the Whig party, of which he was a member, was driven from power; still he and Prince Eugene again took the field with an army of 60,000 men. After they had taken several towns, and many skirmishes had occurred between them and the French, both armies went into winter quarters. Nothing brilliant was done by the allies; and it was noticed, that, since the downfall of the Whig party, Marlborough was an altered man. His usual cheerfulness and self-possession in war had left him: and, indeed, the brilliant military successes of Anne's reign were soon about to be terminated by a peace, which many writers have branded as infamous. In Spain the war was in favour of the French; the English suffered several reverses; Charles III. had to leave Madrid; and the fortunes of Philip V. were again in the ascendant.

Marlborough returned home, during the Christmas holidays of 1710, to be treated with coldness by the queen, and to have insult and contempt heaped upon him by the new parliament, which had assembled on the 25th of November; and in which the majority was Tory, though containing a strong body of Whigs. After the Commons had passed many offensive resolutions, reflecting on the character of the late ministry, they made a law by which it was enacted that no person should be a member of any future House of Parliament unless he was qualified, not by intellect or education, but by property. No one was, henceforth, to represent a county in parliament unless he had a real estate in land of £600 a year value; and no one was to represent a borough unless he had a real estate of £300 per annum.

This parliament did one thing which promoted the religious instruction of posterity, and helped the adornment of London: it voted £350,000 for the building of fifty new churches. Amongst those which were erected on this occasion, is the magnificent church of St. Martin-in-the Fields, which was designed by a talented Scotch architect, named James Gibbs. After the great fire of London, in the time of Charles II., fifty-one new churches were built in the city, from the designs of Sir Christopher Wren, the famous architect of St. Paul's cathedral. It is rather singular that he was engaged to repair the old cathedral—a magnificent Gothic structure, which being destroyed by the great conflagration, gave him the opportunity of exhibiting his talents in the erection of an entirely new one. St. Paul's was completed during the reign of Queen Anne, and the gifted architect himself had the satisfaction of laying the last stone in his seventy-ninth year. He lived to the advanced age of eighty-six; died in the year 1723; and was buried under the choir of the cathedral.

The minister Harley had a narrow escape of his life at this period. The English government employed a number of foreign spies to bring secret intelligence. One of these—a Frenchman, who called himself the Marquis de Guiscard—had £500 a year allowed him, which Mr. Harley, thinking it was too much, caused to be reduced to £400. Shortly afterwards, Guiscard was arrested for selling the secrets of his employers to the French court. He was brought before the council on the 8th of March, 1711. On entering the council-chamber, he desired to speak privately with Mr. St. John, whom it is supposed he intended to assassinate. His request was refused; and as St. John was out of his reach, Guiscard stepped up to the table, and exclaiming, "Have at thee, then!" stabbed Mr. Harley in the breast with a penknife which he had concealed about him. The instrument broke against the bone; but the ruffian repeated the blow several times with such violence that the minister fell bleeding to the ground. All was confusion; St. John drew his sword, and crying out, "The villain has killed Mr. Harley," plunged the weapon into Guiscard. The rest of the ministers attacked the assassin—some with their swords, and others with their naked fists; and the Frenchman, after making a desperate defence, was dragged away with several of his bones broken, and lodged in Newgate, where he shortly after died. Such was the excitement this event created, that the turnkey preserved the body for some little time in brine, and exhibited it for a small sum of money. This revolting circumstance coming to the ears of the queen, she commanded the corpse of the assassin to be buried instantly. Mr. Harley was made so popular by this attempt on his life by a French papist, that Anne created him a peer, with the title of Lord Oxford. A proclamation was also issued against the papists, and the parliament besought the queen to take care of her own sacred person.

The English people were tired of the long harassing war with France. They began to think, that although military glory was, perhaps, a very fine thing, it was also a very expensive thing, and that they had to purchase it by the constant payment of exorbitant taxes. The Tory government also hated the war, because all its triumphs had been gained by a Whig general, and a secret negotiation was opened with the French king for peace. This the English ministers were resolved to have at any price; but as yet they kept faith with their allies; and Marlborough, on the 4th of March, 1711, went abroad, for the last time, to conduct the war. The French had made great preparations, and threw up lines at Arleux, which were thought impregnable. So proud were they of these defences, that they called them the ne plus ultra of Marlborough—meaning that they were much beyond his ability to force. But the great English general did force his way through them; and, after a brilliant siege of twenty days, became master, on the 14th of September, of the town of Bouchain. This was Marlborough's last military exploit; and after it the allied armies separated and went into winter quarters. The Tories at home had predicted the duke's disgrace in this campaign; but we cannot believe they wished it, as their country would have been involved in it.

As, in the peace which the Tories had resolved on, they would no longer require the assistance of the great military genius of Marlborough, they ungratefully resolved to wreak their party spite upon him. An opportunity soon offered itself: the general had accepted a small per-centage from the money paid to the contractors who supplied the army with bread. This was not proper, but it was usual; and every commander did the same. It would have been quite just to deprive Marlborough of this improper source of revenue; but the Tories brought a charge against him, in the House of Commons, of having appropriated to his own use more than £500,000 of the public money; or, to use plainer language, of having robbed the state. Marlborough attempted to justify himself by stating that the money he had received was a customary perquisite, to which he considered himself entitled. This defence was useless; and the queen, now the tool of his enemies, dismissed him from all his employments. Marlborough submitted; merely telling Anne that this was an ill reward for his long services.—The Tories next attacked the eloquent patriot, Mr. Robert Walpole, who, as Secretary of War, had accepted a present of £500 from some army contractors. This certainly was an act of corruption which the Whigs would have earnestly denounced had it been practised by any of their opponents. It caused Walpole's expulsion from the House of Commons, and his imprisonment in the Tower.

After a great deal of weary negotiation, the war was concluded on the 11th of April, 1713, by the celebrated PEACE OF UTRECHT—so called because it was entered into at that place. It was considered that the conditions were far too favourable to France, and by no means honourable to England. Many people thought that, after so many military successes, the peace was scarcely more advantageous to England than if she had been conquered. Indeed, the Whigs furiously opposed it; but the Tories possessed all the power of the state, and it was carried. By the articles of the Peace of Utrecht, the French king recognised the Protestant succession of the House of Hanover, and engaged not to permit the Pretender to return to his dominions, or in any way to assist him. Louis also agreed that France and Spain should never be governed by one man; but Philip, the French prince, remained King of Spain, and Charles of Austria was obliged to abandon that country. A great deal has been written against this treaty, and it has been denounced as disgraceful and infamous; but, although the motives that dictated it may have been unworthy ones, the act itself was a benefit to the English nation. It was right to go to war with France when the power of that nation threatened to overturn the independence of Europe; but it was well to sheathe the sword when that power had been shaken to its foundations, and its pride humbled in the dust.

There were great rejoicings in England on the 7th of July, when the peace was proclaimed; and a public thanksgiving was appointed, and observed with great solemnity. Marlborough had previously left England in disgust at the ill-treatment he had received, and retired to Brussels, where he corresponded both with the Pretender and the princes of the House of Hanover; and his enemies say that he held himself ready to betray either, and attach himself to that side which he saw likely to succeed to the English crown after the death of Anne. On the 16th of July, the queen prorogued the parliament; and, in her speech, took a great deal of credit to herself for having ended the war. The speech caused some alarm to the Whigs, because she did not even allude to the Pretender and the Protestant succession. They thought that Anne would have been very glad that her popish half-brother should succeed her on the throne, and feared that she had entered into some scheme to ensure his doing so. It is certain that Anne was favourably disposed towards the Pretender; but she was too prudent or too timid a woman to attempt anything on his behalf; for she knew that any such act would be followed by a loud outcry of popular indignation. Despite the intrigues of the Jacobites, Tories, and Papists, the English people had too much good sense to prefer a popish king of the Stuart race, to a tolerant Protestant sovereign.

During the month of March, in this year, that disgrace to the church, Dr. Sacheverel, came again into notice. He had been forbidden to preach for three years. That period had expired, and the vain, servile priest again took possession of his church in the Borough. His opening sermon was from the text—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." In it he had the profane audacity to compare his deserved punishment (which, indeed, had proved no punishment at all) to the sufferings of the Saviour of the world. Yet this man was still caressed and followed; and a bookseller gave him £100 for this very sermon. The Tories even bestowed upon him the rich rectory of St. Andrew's, Holborn; but he soon afterwards sank into the obscurity from which he ought never to have been raised.

Anne had long been ailing; and she survived the peace little more than a year. That year was spent by the Whigs in exerting themselves to secure the Protestant succession to the House of Hanover, and by most of the Tories in intrigues to bring in the Pretender, and make him king on the death of the queen. The Tories, who were in power, would have succeeded in their scheme, had they not possessed a wholesome dread of the vengeance of the people. Lord Bolingbroke's activity in this bad cause was surprising. Still the Whigs were strong enough to be able to carry a vote, by which it was decreed, that if the Pretender dared to land in Great Britain, a large reward should be given for his apprehension. Shortly afterwards, two Irish officers were actually arrested in the city, while engaged in the daring act of enlisting men for the service of the Pretender. In consequence of this, a bill was passed making it treason to enlist or be enlisted in his cause.

The last act of the Tories, during this reign, was one of great intolerance; but it was only in unison with the spirit of the time, when the principles of general liberty were understood only by a few; and each party in the state, and every religious sect, only sought to establish its own supremacy. The act alluded to was the Schism Act; the object of which was to prevent dissenters from educating their own children, and to make education a monopoly of the church of England. It enacted, that no person in Great Britain should keep a public or private school, or act as a tutor, unless he signed a declaration to subscribe to the church of England, and obtain a licence from the bishop of the diocese. The mode of education used by the clergy of the church of England was, no doubt, a very good one; but the dissenters did not think so; and it was tyranny to compel them either to adopt it, or bring up their children in ignorance. This act, which was defended as necessary for the welfare of the church, was actually drawn up by Lord Bolingbroke, who was not even a believer in Christianity, but held that the Bible was a collection of fables.

The Whigs gave great opposition to the passing of the Schism Act; and as, in the debate upon it, the bishops were silent, Lord Wharton, turning to the benches where they sat, thus addressed them:—"Precedents and authorities have been cited in favour of the present measure; but there is against it an authority of the highest weight, which has not yet been mentioned. I acknowledge that it would have come with most force and propriety from that venerable bench; but, since their lordships have been wholly silent in this debate, I will myself tell them, that it is the rule of the gospel to do unto others as we would be done unto." Still the Schism Act was passed; but the very day it was to come into operation, the queen breathed her last, and it was never put in practice. In the next reign it was repealed.

The queen had been suffering from many disorders, and these were aggravated by agitation of mind, produced by the disputes of the ministers with her favourite, Mrs. Masham. A violent quarrel that took place in her presence had such an effect upon her, that she declared she could never recover. A few days afterwards (on the 30th of July) she was seized with an apoplectic fit. When the fit was past, Anne sank into a stupor, and it was soon evident that she was dying. Bolingbroke's plots for bringing in the Pretender were not yet ripe, and he was struck with astonishment and dismay. The Dukes of Argyll and Somerset, two Whig noblemen, waited upon the dying queen, and offered their services. They recommended the Duke of Shrewsbury to her as the fittest person to fill the vacant office of Lord Treasurer, which had lately been held by Lord Oxford (formerly Mr. Harley). The Duke of Shrewsbury was a Whig; but he had played a doubtful part, and Anne thought he was a Tory. She therefore, by a sign, signified her assent to his appointment as Lord Treasurer. The ground thus slid from beneath the feet of the Tories, the Whigs were restored to power, and England saved from the danger of having a popish king.

The queen continued to doze in lethargic insensibility, and did not recover her senses sufficiently either to sign her will or to take the sacrament. On the morning of the 1st of August, 1714, she breathed her last, in the fiftieth year of her age, and the thirteenth of her reign.

Anne's personal appearance was pleasing, but not majestic: she was of the middle height, had dark-brown hair, a ruddy complexion, and a round full face. She was not deficient in understanding, but her mind was uncultivated and full of prejudices. The things she seemed to love best were high-church principles and good eating and drinking. She was a conscientious princess, and did everything for the best; but her judgment was not strong enough to discover what was the best. She mistook a love of bishops for a love of the true precepts of religion, and, with the best intentions in the world, was ready to persecute dissenters to the verge of despair. She was a merciful sovereign, and would have advanced the prosperity of her people if she had known how to do so. But her want of judgment, and love of favourites, always made her the tool of some one; and, unfortunately, she fell into bad hands. Although she loved the church with perfect sincerity, she plotted against the Protestant succession, and desired that her popish half-brother, the Pretender, should succeed her. This was not very wonderful; for the high church of Anne's time was not far removed from the superstitions of the church of Rome. Anne was the last of the Stuart race that sat upon the English throne, and she was certainly the best. Still she inherited their love of the kingly prerogative, or, in other words, of despotic power; but her natural timidity restrained her from any bold attack upon the national liberties.

The age of William III. was not very remarkable for its literary and scientific men, though it produced John Locke, the famous philosopher, and author of the celebrated Essay on the Human Understanding, and other works. So many great writers, however, lived in the reign of Anne, that it has always been regarded as a brilliant age, and is styled the Golden Age of English Literature. The most distinguished poet of her time was Alexander Pope, whose Essay on Man is still extensively read, and frequently quoted. His poetry is extremely interesting and instructive, and his versification exquisite. Jonathan Swift (better known as Dean Swift) was the most famous prose writer of that time; but his writings, though powerful, brilliant, and witty, are frequently extremely indecent. Joseph Addison and Sir Richard Steele were two distinguished liberal writers of a more pleasing character, to whom, amongst other things, we are indebted for those delightful volumes called The Spectator. The famous Daniel Defoe lived in this age; and so did John Gay, whose fables are so much admired. Mr. Henry St. John (otherwise Lord Bolingbroke) was an elegant writer on the Tory side; and so was Matthew Prior, the poet; but their works are very little read now.

CHAPTER XC.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE FIRST.—A.D. 1714—1727.

NOTWITHSTANDING all the plotting there had been in favour of the Pretender, the Elector of Hanover was proclaimed King of England without any opposition, by the title of GEORGE THE FIRST. Thus a new family (the Guelphs) ruled in Great Britain, and George was the first sovereign of the House of BRUNSWICK.

The Elector of Hanover was a very plain old gentleman, slovenly in his dress, clumsy in his figure, but possessed of a good understanding, a phlegmatic nature, and a resolute temper. At the time of ascending the British throne he was fifty-five years of age. He took matters very coolly, and did not arrive in England until the 18th of September, 1714—nearly seven weeks after the death of Queen Anne; but the government had been carried on in the meantime by a council of regency. The Whig party welcomed him with joy, and he returned the compliment by dividing all the great offices of state amongst them. The Duke of Marlborough, now an old man, but as fond of money and distinction as ever, returned to England, and was again made commander-in-chief of the army. As for the Tories, George feared and disliked them: he knew that nearly all of them had done their best to give the crown to his rival, James Francis Stuart, the Pretender, and he may be excused for looking on all Tories as concealed Jacobites and traitors. Lord Oxford, the late queen's chief minister, evinced much pleasure on the accession of the new king; but George treated him with a freezing coldness. As for Lord Bolingbroke, he had been turned out of his position as Secretary of State before the new king set foot in England. This was done in consequence of a command from George himself; so Bolingbroke was wise enough to keep out of the way.

The Pretender did not like to give up his chance of the crown without a struggle; but the old French king, Louis, was not inclined to do anything more for him; and without his assistance, the Chevalier de St. George was powerless. All he did was to issue a manifesto to the English people, asserting his right to the throne, and complaining that his subjects (as he called them), instead of doing justice to him and themselves, had proclaimed a foreign prince for their king, in defiance of the incontestible laws of hereditary right. He added, that he could not doubt the good intentions of his sister, the late queen, towards him; in consequence of which he had waited with patience for a dignity which was now snatched from his grasp. Jacobite and drunken riots took place at Norwich, Bristol, Birmingham, and a few other places; but they were soon put down; and George was crowned King of England on the 20th of October, with the usual solemnities.

The new sovereign's eldest son, George, who had been created Prince of Wales, was present; but the king's beautiful and amiable wife, the Princess Sophia Dorothea, of Zell, was wearing out her life in confinement in the lonely castle of Ahlen, on the river Aller. Instead of his wife George had brought with him to England two mistresses. One of these, the Duchess of Kendal, was a tall, thin, and hard-faced old woman; and the other, who was called the Countess of Platen in Germany, but the Countess of Darlington in England, was so enormously fat, and red, and fierce-looking, that a gentleman of the court compared her to a great greasy ogress. Several kings of England had lived a loose, adulterous life; but they had usually chosen beautiful women as their companions; and the mistresses of Charles II. had been famous for their graces and their generosity to the people. The lean German duchess and the fat German countess, however, besides being ugly and unpleasant sort of people, were also very poor, grasping, and stingy: they soon became much detested; and people began to think they had gained little by a transfer from a Stuart to a Guelph.

On the 21st of January, 1715, a new parliament was elected, and the king opened it in person. But this German monarch of the British people could not utter a word of English; and his speech, which had been written for him by one minister, was read for him by another. It was an honest, straightforward address; in which he thanked his subjects for the firmness they had shown for the Protestant succession; desired that no unhappy divisions of parties might divert them from pursuing the common interests of their country; declared that the established constitution in church and state should be the rule of his government; and that the happiness, ease, and prosperity of his people should be the care of his life.

The new Whig ministers resolved to punish the late Tory ones for their treachery to George, and their efforts to place the Pretender upon the throne. Lord Bolingbroke, the Earl of Oxford, and the Duke of Ormond were all impeached of high treason. Bolingbroke and the Duke of Ormond saved themselves by a flight to France, where they carried on their plots for the restoration of the exiled Stuart. Lord Oxford, however, was committed a prisoner to the Tower, where he remained for some years; after which he was tried and acquitted. Notwithstanding this, great discontent prevailed in the nation, and there were many Jacobite and Tory plots and riots. The people loved royalty, but they did not fancy an uncouth old German for a king. And as the social evils of the commonwealth, too recent to be forgotten, prevented them from trying the experiment of another republic, or electing a Protector like Oliver Cromwell, numbers of the people forgot the tyrannies of the family of Stuart, and longed to see James Francis, the papist, seated on the throne, instead of Protestant George.

Many Jacobites secretly sent word to the Pretender, that if he came to England there would be a general rising in his favour. The chevalier accordingly prepared to invade his native country, and Louis XIV. promised secretly to assist him. This scheme was disconcerted by the death of that ambitious monarch, who breathed his last on the 1st of September, 1715, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, after having kept Europe in a state of confusion for upwards of half a century. With Louis perished the hopes of the Pretender in France.

The Earl of Mar, however, got up an insurrection among the Scottish Highlanders, and erected the standard of the Pretender at Braemar, on the 6th of September; and the Catholics and Jacobites of the north of England rose in arms, under the command of the Earl of Derwentwater and a Mr. Foster. But King George and his ministers were on their guard: many suspected Scottish and English nobles were arrested, and placed in confinement; troops were sent into Scotland; the loyal Duke of Argyll was made commander of them; and an engagement took place at Sheriffmuir, near the village of Dunblane, on the 13th of November. This battle of Dunblane was very indecisive; 700 of the rebels were slain, and 400 of the king's troops: both parties claimed the victory; but the Duke of Argyll kept the field, and the banner of the Stuart, called the Restoration, was taken.

In the meantime the English rebels proclaimed the Pretender in several places, and marched as far as Preston. They were soon overtaken by George's troops, and, after a paltry skirmish on the same day that the battle of Dunblane was fought, lost heart, and surrendered. Only seventeen of them had been killed; but more than 1,400 were taken prisoners. Several of the captains were executed at once by martial law; the common men were crowded into the neighbouring gaols, and the noblemen and leading gentry sent to London.

The Earls of Derwentwater, Nithsdale, Winton, and Carnwath, Lords Widdrington and Nairn, and Viscount Kenworth, were all impeached as traitors. Of these, the young and accomplished Earl of Derwentwater, and the Scottish peer Kenmure, were condemned, and sentenced to be beheaded. They suffered on the 24th of February, 1716. Lord Nithsdale escaped from the Tower the night before the day appointed for his execution, by exchanging clothes with his devoted wife, who heroically remained in his place. The other noblemen, though condemned, were respited. Shortly afterwards, six-and-twenty of the common rebels were hanged, and about 1,000 transported to the colonies in America. Thus ended this rash attempt to restore the exiled family.

Lord Bolingbroke had entered the service of the Pretender as his secretary; and that profligate statesman told James Francis Stuart, that nothing would be so likely to lead to the recovery of his down-trodden fortunes as at once boldly going to England. To avoid the suspicion of cowardice, the Pretender adopted this desperate resolve. He landed at Peterhead, in Scotland, on the 22nd of December, 1715, and went in disguise to the house of a friendly noble, where he was joined by about thirty Jacobite gentlemen. These desperate men proclaimed him as King James III.; and soon after he made a public entrance into Dundee on horseback, followed by about 300 Jacobites, who had gradually joined him. Taking up his residence in the ancient royal palace of Scone, he assumed the state of a sovereign, fearing all the time lest he should be surrounded and captured by George's troops. He had been led to expect that more than half the people of England and Scotland would have flocked to his standard; but he was terribly disappointed. Though joined by the Earl of Mar and the remnant of his forces, and though every effort was made by the nobles who had espoused his desperate cause, not above 5,000 or 6,000 men could be collected around the drooping Stuart banner. The parliament, also, had offered a reward of £100,000 to any one who should seize him, dead or alive; which caused the Pretender to become gloomy, sullen, and irresolute. Such a dejected creature did he seem, that his own soldiers began to despise him, and some of them inquired contemptuously whether he could speak?

Though it was mid winter, and the ground was clothed with snow, the Duke of Argyll and the royal troops marched in pursuit of the Pretender. Calling a council of his officers at Scone, on the 16th of January, 1716, the desponding prince addressed them in a melancholy way, saying—"For me will it be no new thing to be unfortunate. My whole life, even from my cradle, has been a constant series of misfortunes; and I am prepared, if so it please God, to suffer the threats of my enemies and yours." He reminded them that it was no time to dispute, but to act; but he did not act with energy himself. After burning many towns and villages between Perth and Stirling, to prevent the advance of the Duke of Argyll, and causing many helpless women and children to perish of destitution in the snow, the Pretender deserted his poor, deluded troops, and escaping, on the 3rd of February, to a ship, fled in disguise to France. The Highlanders returned to their homes; most of the chiefs escaped in a vessel, and rejoined their master on the continent; though forty-seven of them, who had embarked in small, worthless boats, were upset and drowned. Of the prisoners who were taken, some were shot, and others left to rot and die in various prisons.

George was now firmly seated on the throne, and the Whig minister adopted a strange plan to keep him so. By the Triennial Act, a new parliament was to be elected every three years; but there were so many Jacobites and Tories in the nation, that the Whigs resolved not to run the chance of a new general election, for fear their enemies should get the upper hand. To avoid that, the Septennial Act, by which parliament was to last for seven years, instead of for three, was introduced by the ministers and passed into law. This act (which still remains in force) secured a Whig parliament for four years longer. It was a clever Whig trick, and the Tories denounced it loudly; but it was received very quietly by the public.

In the summer King George visited Hanover, and busied himself with the politics of the continent. On his return, a friendly treaty was entered into between France, Holland, and England, which was not, however, ratified till January, 1717. George was anxious, by this means, to protect himself against that famous soldier and hero, Charles XII. of Sweden, whose hatred to George was so great, that he talked of making war against England, for the sake of restoring the Pretender. The Swedish ambassador was arrested for conspiracy against the British government, and there was a talk of war with Sweden, which would probably have taken place, but for the death of the Swedish hero, who was killed at the siege of Fredrickshall, in 1718. A quarrel had also arisen between England and Spain, which led to a war so tedious and intricate, that it would be impossible to give any just idea of it in the limits to which this work must be confined. During the course of it, Admiral Byng performed some gallant actions.—King George was not only engaged in wars abroad, but was unhappy in his family. He was jealous of his own son, the Prince of Wales; and the prince was very undutiful to his father. Frequent disputes took place between them; and about this time (1718) the king first placed his son under arrest, and afterwards ordered him to quit St. James's. The prince then resided at Leicester House, which became a meeting-place for all who hated and opposed the king.—Such are the unnatural dissensions of princes.

The events of 1719 were but of slight historical importance. In the following year, the wonderful bubble, the famous South Sea scheme, was brought forward. As a recompense to certain merchants and others, to whom the government owed a large sum of money, it allowed them to form themselves into an association, under the name of the "South Sea Company," with the sole right of trading to those seas. An act of parliament for this purpose was passed in April, 1720; and such wild expectations were formed of the success of the undertaking, that people rushed in crowds to invest their money in shares. The directors promised to pay 50 per cent. interest; and such an excitement prevailed, that many men of property sold their estates, that they might obtain this extravagant interest for their money. Within four months, the shares of the company that had been bought for £100, could be sold for £1,000. Every other kind of business was suspended; a spirit of gambling seized the whole nation; and statesmen, nobles, prelates, physicians, lawyers, and tradesmen, spent their time in trafficking for shares.

Other companies were soon started, anxious to share the immense fortunes which the directors of the South Sea scheme were reaping. Many of them were mere impudent frauds; and all of them soon came to be known by the appropriate name of "bubbles." Still people were found ready to invest their money, and joint-stock companies sprung up like mushrooms, by the score. The following are examples of some of the wild schemes projected: converting salt water into fresh; extracting silver out of lead; trading in human hair; importing large donkeys from Spain; a new mode of fattening pigs; and a wheel for perpetual motion. An audacious swindler even issued proposals for a subscription, the particulars of which he said he would disclose in a month's time, but promising that every person who paid two guineas should be entitled to a £100 share, which would produce that amount of profit yearly. In one morning this daring rogue actually received 2,000 guineas, with which he fled, that very evening, to a foreign land.

In about six months this gambling madness began to abate; the little companies died out, or were put down by the law; and the shares of the great South Sea bubble fell from £1,000 to less than £300. Several great bankers, merchants, and goldsmiths were ruined, and compelled to abscond; and thousands of tradesmen and others were reduced to beggary. An excitement of another kind now prevailed—alarm was in every face, and few felt themselves safe from impending ruin. A furious outcry arose; commerce was palsied, credit struck dead, and society was shaken to its foundation. The people bitterly cursed the South Sea Company, and the directors dared not appear abroad.

So great was the panic, that the king was sent for from Hanover, where he usually went in the summer, and the parliament assembled, to see what could be done to allay the popular excitement. The directors of the company were commanded to lay their books before parliament, and were punished by the confiscation of all their property. By the sagacity of that rising statesman, Mr. Robert Walpole, the people were at length pacified, and business returned to its ordinary healthy channel. As the prime minister had been accused of accepting bribes from the company, he was compelled to resign, and Walpole was appointed to take his place: his predecessor was expelled the House, and sent to the Tower.—This year (1721) peace was made with Spain, and a defensive alliance entered into with that country. On the 16th of June in the following year, that great warrior, the Duke of Marlborough, died in his seventy-second year. A gorgeous public funeral was bestowed upon his remains, which were deposited in Westminster Abbey. The king, the Prince of Wales, a vast procession of nobles, military officers, and troops followed him to the grave; but very few persons regretted him.

James Francis Stuart, the Pretender, had married the Princess Clementina, grand-daughter of the famous John Sobieski, King of Poland. In the year 1720 that lady had presented her husband with a son, upon whom was bestowed the sounding names of Charles Edward Louis Cassimir Stuart. When this little prince grew up, he came to be known as the Young Pretender; while his father, James Francis, was called the Old Pretender. The birth of a Stuart gave fresh hopes to the Jacobites of England, and set the Pretender again at work to see if he could obtain the English crown. A formidable conspiracy was entered into in his favour. Many noblemen were connected with it; but the real leader was the talented, restless Jacobite, Atterbury, the Bishop of Rochester. It was proposed to seize the Tower, the Bank, and the Exchequer; to proclaim the Pretender as King James III. in many parts of the country, and to trust to a general rising in his favour.

This mad scheme was discovered by Mr. Robert Walpole, the prime minister, and means were instantly taken to frustrate it. The attempt was to have been made when the king went to Hanover, in the summer of 1722. He was advised to put off his visit; a camp was formed in Hyde Park; troops were brought over from Ireland; suspected persons were seized, and all the principal conspirators arrested. They were a strange mixture—Catholic priests and Protestant non-juring clergymen, haughty nobles and swindling vagabond adventurers. Many fled; but Lord Orrery, Lords North and Grey, and Bishop Atterbury were committed to the Tower. So disaffected and factious were many of the clergy, that they offered up public prayers for the preservation and welfare of the traitorous prelate.

The parliament had been dissolved in March, 1722; and the new one (the first House of Commons elected under the Septennial Act) assembled in October. In his speech on the 11th, the king alluded to this conspiracy—that is, the minister who read the speech did so for him; but the sentiments were, no doubt, those of George himself. "I should less wonder at it," said he, "had I, in any one instance since my accession to the throne, invaded the liberty or property of my subjects." Referring to the Jacobite plotters, he said, very truly, "By forming plots, they depreciate all property that is invested in the public funds, and then complain of the low state of credit; they make an increase of the national expenses necessary, and then clamour at the burden of taxes, and endeavour to impute to my government, as grievances, the mischiefs and calamities which they alone occasion."

The Pretender chose this very time to issue a declaration to the king and people of Great Britain. In it he proposed that George should resign the English throne to him, and retire to Hanover with the title of king instead of elector; and that, in return for this concession, he should wear the British crown after the death of the Pretender, in case he should outlive him. The only notice the parliament condescended to give to this absurd declaration was, to order it to be burnt by the common hangman. George behaved with clemency to the actors in the late conspiracy; only one of them being put to death. Bishop Atterbury was tried for treason before the House of Lords, and sentenced to deprivation of his clerical dignity, and banishment. On arriving on the continent in June, 1723, he immediately entered the service of the Pretender. He died at Paris, in 1732. At the same time, Lord Bolingbroke, who had quarrelled with the Stuart prince, was pardoned, and returned to England.

In the year 1724, the tranquillity of George's government was disturbed by alarming riots both in Ireland and Scotland. The cause of the Irish riots was a singular one. On account of there being a deficiency of copper coin in that country, a patent was granted to Mr. William Wood, for coining farthings and halfpence. The Irish people took a whimsical dislike to this new money, and swore they would have nothing to do with it. The discontent of that excitable people was raised, by the writings of Dean Swift, into a storm of popular fury. Scurrilous ballads were sung about the streets, riotous processions were formed, and an effigy of Mr. Wood publicly burnt. The common people of Dublin neglected their business, and did nothing, from morning till night, but howl and rave against the new farthings. Nor was tranquillity restored until the new coinage was withdrawn.—The disturbances in Scotland had a more reasonable foundation; for the people of that country are generally too sagacious and industrious to spend their time in rioting without a cause. A malt-tax had been imposed upon the Scottish people, who resolved that they would not pay it. Immense mobs assembled; and at Glasgow the military was obliged to be drawn out. The mob pelted the soldiers with stones; then the soldiers fired upon the mob; and nine persons were killed, and many others wounded.

During the spring of 1726, George sent Admiral Hosier with a fleet to the West Indies, with orders to seize such Spanish vessels as he might meet with. This expedition was fatally unfortunate, and is considered the most inglorious event of the reign. Instead of attacking the Spaniards, the admiral and a great part of his crew were attacked by the yellow fever, and perished miserably.

In the month of November, 1726, the Princess Sophia Dorothea of Zell, wife of King George I., breathed her last in the castle of Ahlen, after nearly thirty-two years of captivity. At the time of her marriage (in 1682) she was much admired for her beauty and the vivacity of her spirits. That vivacity, added to an imprudent thoughtlessness, was her ruin; for she does not appear to have been guilty of any crime; though her conduct was certainly indiscreet. George neglected his graceful, cheerful wife; and a young Swedish noble, the Count Philip Christopher Königsmark, paid her a great deal of attention. The princess received his civilities with more freedom than the etiquette of court allowed, and a kind of flirtation was carried on between them. The jealousy of the prince was aroused; and his father, the old elector, commanded Count Königsmark to leave his dominions. He prepared to obey, but secretly solicited the princess to permit him to take his farewell. Dorothea was persuaded, by some treacherous woman about her, to consent, and the count was introduced, the next morning, into her bedroom, that he might kiss her hand before his departure. The story is hidden in mystery; but it is supposed that the malicious attendants of the princess informed Prince George and his father, and that an ambush was laid for the imprudent noble. After leaving the chamber of the princess, he was never seen alive again. Suspicions were entertained that he had been murdered; but it was not known what had become of him until after the death of George I.

Then his dead body was discovered under the floor of the dressing-room of the princess. He was, no doubt, seized and strangled the moment he left her bedroom, on the morning of their farewell, and instantly buried on the spot where the murder took place. On account of the rank of the actors in this dark crime, the particulars of it were carefully hushed up.

After the murder, the Princess Dorothea was arrested, and placed in confinement, where she remained till the hour of her death, always strongly protesting her innocence. Perhaps George did not believe her guilty of anything more than imprudent levity; for it was reported that he once made proposals for a reconciliation. The princess is said to have declined it proudly, replying, "If what I am accused of be true, I am unworthy of him; and if the accusation is false, he is unworthy of me."

Seven months after the death of Sophia Dorothea, King George followed her to the grave. Having set out on a journey to Hanover in his usual state of health, he was smitten with apoplexy shortly after his arrival in Holland. The fit seized him while sitting in his carriage; and in a short time he became apathetic, his eyes being fixed, and his tongue hanging from his mouth. His attendants proposed to stop at Ippenburen, and send for medical aid, but he was just able to articulate, "Osnabruck! Osnabruck!" His command was obeyed—the carriage was driven forward; but before it reached that place the king was dead. He expired on Sunday, the 11th of June, 1727, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign. He was buried at Hanover, amongst the remains of his ancestors.

George I. was plain in his appearance and manners, and slovenly in his dress. He had not the outward dignity of a sovereign, but he knew how to command. His deportment was usually a grave one, but he sometimes became very cheerful, and even facetious, in private society over his bottle. His character had many moral blemishes, but he was a just king, who studied the good of his people. He did not neglect his own interests, nor those of his subjects in Hanover; but that was to be expected. He never stretched his prerogative to unjust uses—never trampled on the liberty of his people; and was content to govern according to the laws of England. That he did not possess the affection of his subjects arose chiefly from the fact that he was a foreigner, who had set aside the hereditary heir to the throne.

CHAPTER XCI.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE SECOND.—A.D. 1727—1737.

NEWS of the old king's death was despatched to England, and on the 15th of June, 1727, his eldest son, the Prince of Wales, was proclaimed, without opposition, as George the Second. The new sovereign was in his forty-fourth year, and in person and manners just as plain as his father. Though a German, he could speak English very well, but with a foreign accent. He had been married many years to a lady of his own age—Carolina Wilhelmina of Brandenburg, the daughter of the Margrave of Anspach. She had been beautiful, and was a woman of remarkable talents, and of the most amiable disposition. Her husband sought her advice upon all subjects, though he was very anxious to avoid the appearance of being in any way ruled by her. She loved him devotedly, and obeyed him implicitly; yet it is said that, in consequence of her fine intellect, during the remaining ten years of her life she was more king than her husband. Her influence over him, however, did not prevent him from following the immoral example of his father, and keeping two or three mistresses.

George II. entertained the same liberal principles to which his father had been attached, and Mr. (now Sir Robert) Walpole remained chief minister. The parliament of the late king having voted more than usually liberal supplies to the new one, it was dissolved, and another summoned.* The Jacobites made some secret attempts to place the Pretender upon the throne, but the feeling in favour of George was too strong for them to stem; and sensible men in England felt that they had endured enough for the Stuarts.

This was a long reign of thirty-four years; and it is quite impossible, in a history of this kind, to give a narrative that would embrace all the events; we can only select the most prominent, instructive, and interesting to lay before the reader.

George II.'s eldest son, Frederick, had been left at Hanover; but early in 1729 he came to England, and was created Prince of Wales. He was in his twenty-first year, but a weak-minded and selfish young man. He was an ungracious son, devoid of natural affection, and gave his father as much trouble as that father had given to his parent. He was, however, received with joy by the nation, who supposed that, in time, he would wear the English crown. Great court was therefore paid to him by all the discontented statesmen who had not good places in the government.—During that year the king visited Hanover, leaving his queen regent during his absence. Like his father, he always showed a great partiality for the interests of his native country, and promoted them at the expense of England—a matter which occasioned a great deal of jealousy.

Sir Robert Walpole was an excellent financier; that is, he was very expert at figures, and understood the art of imposing taxes in such a manner as to make them fall as lightly as possible on the people. In 1733, he brought forward a plan for increasing the duty upon wines and tobacco—things on which a considerable duty is comparatively unobjectionable, because they are not absolute necessities. The poor do not drink wine, and are not obliged to smoke tobacco. This plan was called Walpole's Excise Scheme, and a violent feeling was entertained against it. The Tory statesmen in the House of Commons, and the people out of it, alike assailed the originator. It was declared that the liberties of the nation were gone for ever, if tobacco was to be subject to the excise. The feeling grew so high, that alarming riots were anticipated, and the minister, who went in fear of his life, prudently withdrew the bill. This was followed by public rejoicings; the Monument was illuminated, bonfires blazed in the streets of London, and figures of Walpole were consumed in them. Most of the intended regulations of this bill have been since adopted.

After a session which was chiefly spent by the Tories who were out of office in saying cutting things against the Whigs who were in, and by the Whigs in saying cutting things to the Tories in reply, the parliament was dissolved on the 18th of April, 1734. In the new parliament, which opened on the 13th of June, Walpole and the Whigs found themselves still in the ascendant.

Many quarrels and wars were going on in Europe at this time; and England narrowly escaped being involved in them: but Walpole loved peace; he knew that it was necessary for the nation's prosperity; and by his exertions this country remained quiescent. In 1736, fresh riots were caused by a new duty. This was a tax on gin, imposed for the purpose of putting a check upon drunkenness. The lower orders in England are by no means a peculiarly sober people now, but they gave way to the most disgusting excesses then. As no licence was required for selling gin, it was retailed in almost every direction; and people were invited, by written boards, to walk into houses where they might get drunk for one penny, gloriously drunk for twopence, and have clean straw to lie upon for nothing. This Gin Act (which was to come into operation on the 29th of September) only increased the evil; for many riotous people got drunk every day, to show their opposition to it; and it was afterwards repealed. It was also proposed, in this year, to relieve the dissenters by repealing the Test Act; but Walpole, who remembered the Sacheverel high-church riots of the time of Queen Anne, voted against it. He has been much blamed for this act; but, as we have before remarked, few persons at that time understood the real principles of true liberty.

During this year (1736), there was a remarkable riot in Edinburgh. On the 16th of April, a smuggler, named Wilson, was condemned to death for robbing an exciseman; but on account of a noble action he had performed, public sympathy was enlisted in his favour, and it was expected that he would be reprieved. No respite, however, came. Preparations were made for the execution; and rumours were spread about that the man would be rescued and set at liberty by the mob. To prevent this, the city guard was drawn up around the scaffold. When the man was hanged, and about to be cut down, the mob cursed the executioner, and pelted him with stones. John Porteous, the captain of the city guard, seized a musket, and fired among the crowd. His example was followed by some of his men, and several persons were killed. As generally happens in cases of this kind, they were some of the most passive among the spectators. A general indignation followed this violence. On the 19th of July, Porteous was tried for murder, and condemned to death. As the attack had first been made by the mob, the queen thought proper to grant a respite until the matter was further inquired into. The common people of Edinburgh were in a fury in consequence of this lenity, and they resolved that Porteous should not escape. His execution had been fixed for the 8th of September: in the night of the 7th, an armed mob burst the prison doors, seized the unhappy captain, dragged him to the place of execution, and hanged him on a dyer's pole. Having thus satisfied their thirst for vengeance, they quietly dispersed. The English queen and parliament were extremely incensed at this strange riot; a severe inquiry was made, and large rewards offered for the apprehension of the ringleaders. But no information was obtained; for in Edinburgh, those who were not implicated in the outrage, approved of it, and thought it merely a wild act of national justice.

George's eldest son, Prince Frederick, married, on the 25th of April, 1736, the Princess Augusta of Saxe-Gotha. In consequence of this, he complained of his poverty, and said that, although £50,000 a year was enough to keep a prince while he was single, he could not possibly be expected to do without £100,000 a year when he was married. The prudent king thought the prince's income was quite sufficient; on which the prince, in a very ill-temper, got one of his friends in the House of Commons to move for an address to the king, that he would be pleased to settle £100,000 a year upon the Prince of Wales. Walpole opposed this motion, saying that he thought £50,000 a year, added to the revenues enjoyed by the prince as Duke of Cornwall, which amounted to about £10,000 a year more, was income enough even for the heir-apparent, and quite as much as his father could afford out of the civil list.

The motion was lost in the Commons, and Prince Frederick got another friend to bring it forward in the House of Lords. It was lost there also: and from that moment the irritated prince acted in such an insulting manner to his father, that the king thought fit to command him and his family to quit St. James's. "The whole tenor of your conduct," said the king, in a message to his son, "for a considerable time, has been so entirely void of all real duty to me, that I have long had reason to be highly offended with you; and until you withdraw your regard and confidence from those by whose advice you are directed and encouraged in your unwarrantable behaviour to me and to the queen, and until your return to duty, you shall not reside in my palace, which I will not suffer to be made the resort of those who, under the appearance of an attachment to you, foment the divisions which you have made in my family, and thereby weaken the common interest of the whole. In this situation I will receive no reply; but when your actions manifest a just sense of your duty and submission, that may induce me to pardon what at present I most justly resent." On receiving this message, the prince sulkily retired to Leicester House, which immediately became the haunt of all those nobles who did their utmost to vex and thwart their sovereign.

On the 20th of November, 1737, George lost his accomplished and amiable queen. Her disorder was a mortification of the stomach, arising from an internal injury, which an excess of delicacy had induced her to conceal and neglect. The day before her death, when the king and the prime minister, Sir Robert Walpole, were standing by her bedside, she said to the latter, "I hope you will never desert the king, but continue to serve him with your usual fidelity: I recommend his majesty to you." Such was the high opinion which that dying woman entertained of the talents of the great Whig statesman. She did not see her undutiful son but sent him her forgiveness and her blessing, together with a message that she would gladly have admitted him to her presence, but that she feared to irritate his father. Her majesty was deeply regretted by the king, and lamented by the nation, as a woman of great abilities, noble principles, and a pattern of domestic virtue.

George's grief for her was both sincere and deep. Some time afterwards he sent for the Baron Brinkman, one of his German attendants, to his bedside, and said, "I hear you have a picture of my wife—a better likeness than any in my possession: bring it to me." The portrait was brought, and the king gazed upon it with deep emotion. After a pause, he exclaimed, "It is very like; put it upon the chair at the foot of my bed, and leave it till I ring the bell." Two hours passed away while the lonely old monarch was gazing at the resemblance of his dead queen: at length he rang the bell, and when the baron re-entered, exclaimed, "Take the picture away: I never yet saw the woman worthy to buckle her shoe."

With the death of his good queen ended the first ten years of George's reign—years of prosperity and of almost uninterrupted peace. But a change was at hand; and before another ten years had passed, there was war at home and abroad: rebellion, with its hundred heads, stalked over the land; and the power of the House of Hanover was shaken to its foundation.

CHAPTER XCII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE SECOND.—A.D. 1737—1746.

SIR ROBERT WALPOLE, the prime minister, had many enemies, both among the Tories and among such of the Whigs as happened to be out of place. The latter party obtained the noble name of "the patriots;" but it was one they did not deserve, as they loved themselves and their own interests very much better than they loved their country; as, indeed, did most of the public men of that day. Now, as Sir Robert was much attached to peace, the opposition called for war; and they soon induced the unthinking nation to join in the cry. When people have made up their minds for war, it is not very difficult to find out a grievance. By a treaty made in 1670, Spain had recognised the right of the English to found colonies in North America, and England had agreed that her ships should not approach the Spanish colonies in South America. This was demanded by Spain to prevent the English from supplying her colonists with manufactured goods, and thus destroying her own trade. Guard-ships were kept on the coast of the Spanish possessions in America, and the crews insisted on searching all vessels that put into the harbours, to see that they had not come laden with merchandise. This right of search had been tacitly recognised by our government; but the English sailors (who constantly found means of landing their goods in the Spanish colonies) resented it very resolutely, and disputes were constantly taking place. Angry passions were aroused, and the Spanish officers sometimes acted with great severity in the exercise of their duty.

Seven years before the time of which we are writing, an English captain, named Robert Jenkyns, had been ill-treated by the Spanish coast-guards. He said that, on the 20th of April, 1731, they had tortured him and some of his crew, had cut off one of his ears, and told him to carry it to his king, and inform his majesty that they should like to serve him in the same manner. The opposition hearing of this man, caused him to attend at the bar of the House of Commons, on Tuesday, the 21st of March, 1738, and relate at full the circumstance of the outrage he had undergone. It has been said that the captain's story, if not a forgery, was at least a gross exaggeration; and some writers have asserted, that his ear was not cut off by the Spaniards abroad, but by the hangman at home, and nailed to the pillory—of course for no commendable conduct. How that was, it is now impossible to say; but Jenkyns was certainly engaged by the opposition to make the best of his case, and tutored as to what he should say. At the bar, he produced his ear wrapped up in cotton; and when asked what he, a free-born Briton, felt when subjected to such treatment at the hands of foreigners? he replied, "I recommended my soul to God, and my cause to my country."

This reply produced the effect the opposition desired: the people were violently excited, and there was a demand for an instant war with Spain, to avenge the outrage committed on an English subject, to compel the Spaniards to abandon the right they claimed to search English vessels, and to acknowledge the privilege of the British to cut logwood on the shores of the Bay of Campeachy, and gather salt on the island of Tortuga. Walpole admitted that the Spaniards had acted arbitrarily; but he urged that all differences could be settled by a treaty, and thus save the amount of life and treasure that is always destroyed by a war.

But the people still shouted for war; and, thus urged, Walpole sent a fleet into the Mediterranean, and took some other hostile proceedings. This made the King of Spain adopt a mild tone, and a convention was entered into between him and George, by which the former agreed to make reparation to all British merchants for any losses they might have sustained through the misconduct of his officers, and for settling all matters of dispute in such a manner as would prevent any complaints in future. But the nation wanted war; the convention was considered very unsatisfactory; and, in the parliament which assembled in February, 1739, the opposition attacked it with great bitterness. It was on the 8th of March, when this question was before the House, that William Pitt (afterwards the great Earl of Chatham, and the most brilliant orator that England has produced) first distinguished himself in parliament. He was the resolute opponent of Walpole, and denounced the Spanish convention with the most withering indignation.

Still Walpole carried his point about the Spanish convention, and a treaty was commenced between England and that country. But though the Spaniards by no means desired war, they were not very compliant; and when Sir Robert demanded that they should renounce for ever the right to search British vessels, they resolutely refused to do so. Only one course was then left, and the English minister reluctantly consented to a declaration of war. War was accordingly proclaimed against Spain on the 19th of October, 1739, to the great joy of the English people. All the church bells of London rang out merry peals, as if for some great festival; but Walpole, who truly regarded war as a great national calamity, exclaimed, "They may ring the bells now, but they will soon be wringing their hands."

The war against Spain, though tedious and inglorious in its course, and scarcely honourable in its close, commenced with a triumph. The parliament met on the 13th of November. It voted four millions of money, and increased the army and navy, for the purpose of carrying on the war. After these arrangements had been made, the nation was gratified by learning that Admiral Vernon, with only six ships of war, had, on the 22nd of November, taken Porto Bello from the Spaniards. The English were much elated; but this success was soon to be clouded by disappointment and reverse. Sir John Norris sailed with a fleet to intercept and make prizes of the Spanish ships about to sail for the West Indies. This expedition totally failed.—A great fleet, with a fine army on board, was next sent to harass and take the Spanish settlements in South America. Such an English fleet had never before been seen in those seas, and lofty hopes were entertained of the triumphs it would effect. Instead of that, it met with nothing but misfortunes: the climate induced disease among the men; Lord Cathcart, who commanded the land forces, died of fever; the new general quarrelled with the admiral, and neither seemed to know what course to take. At length they laid siege to Carthagena, but blundered in such a manner, that they were compelled to retreat in disgrace, and leave 600 Englishmen lying dead upon the earth. They next attacked Cuba; but the men were disheartened, and rapidly dying from the effects of the climate; and they failed there also. A reinforcement of four ships and 3,000 men was sent out, but they shared the fate of the rest. Another expedition was sent to the west in September, 1740, under Commodore Anson, who then made that remarkable voyage, of which we possess so interesting a narrative, and in which he met with many difficulties and dangers, but did little harm to the Spaniards.—When all these failures and misfortunes were known in England, there was a general outcry of sorrow and indignation.

In the meantime Sir Robert Walpole had become very unpopular in England, and the opposition was bent on driving him from his post as prime minister. On the 13th of February, 1741, Mr. Sandys proposed that an address be presented to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to remove the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole from his presence and councils for ever. All the distinguished leaders of the opposition spoke in favour of the proposed address, and charged the minister with having been guilty of many errors and crimes. Sir Robert replied in a speech of great force and eloquence. He was particularly severe upon the disappointed Whigs, who assumed the name of patriots, and had turned against him because they had no share in the profitable places the minister had to give away. "Gentlemen," said he, "have talked a great deal of patriotism—a venerable word when duly practised. But I am sorry to say, that of late it has been so much hackneyed about, that it is in danger of falling into disgrace. The very idea of true patriotism is lost, and the name has been used for the worst of purposes. A patriot, sir! why, patriots spring up like mushrooms. I could raise fifty of them within four-and-twenty hours. I have raised many of them in one night. It is but refusing to gratify an unreasonable or an insolent demand, and up starts a patriot. I have never been afraid of making such patriots; and I disclaim and despise all their efforts. This pretended virtue proceeds from personal malice and from disappointed ambition; and there is not a man amongst them whose particular aim I am not able to ascertain, and from what motive he entered the lists of opposition." When the debate closed, the enemies of the minister were defeated, and the motion for desiring the king to dismiss him was lost by 290 votes against 106.

When the news reached England of the miserable failure of our great expedition against Spain, the outcry against Walpole was redoubled. Men forgot that he had opposed the war, and they denounced him as the cause of every national grievance or misfortune. The parliament had been dissolved on the 28th of April, 1741. A new one was elected, which, after a short session in June, reassembled on the 4th of December; and the attacks on Walpole and the government were renewed. In three divisions on questions affecting his position, the premier had majorities, first of 7; next of 3; and then, on the 28th of January, 1742, of 1. On the 1st of February, he resigned his distinguished office of prime minister, and retired, a private man, to spend the remainder of his life at his splendid mansion at Houghton. Walpole had laboured faithfully and laboriously for the Protestant cause and the interests of the House of Hanover. He had supported himself in power by bribery: he had bought the votes of his opponents over and over again; but this was his only vice. In other respects he was a good, as well as a wise, statesman. George was so sensible of this, that he actually shed tears on parting with him, and shortly afterwards created him Earl of Orford. The enemies of the fallen minister talked of an impeachment, carried a resolution for a secret inquiry into his administration, and seemed actually to thirst for his blood; but the favour of the king was his protection: the inquiry revealed such trifling acts of corruption, that it rather whitened than blackened his character, and the storm blew over. He did not long survive his loss of power, but died three years afterwards, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

The year after the resignation of Walpole (1743), King George and his second son, the Duke of Cumberland, went to Germany. A doubtful peace had lasted for some time between England and France; but political jealousies existed between them, the chief of which was, the assistance given by France to the cause of the exiled Stuarts. The dispute was complicated by the attempt of the French to strip Maria Theresa, Queen of Hungary, of her dominions. George had declared in her favour, and an English army was sent to the continent to aid in the defence of her rights. On the 27th of June, 1743, the English king and his son Cumberland were engaged with the French in the battle of Dettingen—an event it is only necessary to refer to, as it had very little connection with the affairs of England. The king and the prince behaved with great bravery, and the latter was wounded in the leg. The English and Hanoverians gained the victory; but their own loss was so considerable, that they were obliged to leave the field and abandon the wounded.

Early in 1744, a report reached the king and British parliament, that Charles Edward, the young Pretender, was about to invade England with a French army, to assist him in regaining the crown for his family. The report was a true one; the parliamentary disputes in England, and the discontent of the people, made the French ministry believe the nation was ripe for a revolt. This idea was encouraged by the Scottish Jacobites, who had written to the old Pretender, that if he or his son, Prince Charles Edward, would land in England or Scotland at the head of a French army, there would be a revolution in his favour. Seven Scottish nobles and gentlemen (if it is right to call traitors by that name) formed themselves into an association for conducting the conspiracy in favour of the exiled Stuarts. The old Pretender, who, as we have seen, had little personal courage, declined going to England himself; but he consented that his son should go in his stead. He therefore drew up and signed a proclamation to be published in England on the prince's landing, and appointed him regent.

In the month of January, 1744, the young Pretender embarked, and with a small French fleet sailed up the English Channel; but he and his ships were driven back in a shattered and miserable condition by a storm.

The battle of Dettingen had taken place while England and France were professedly at peace; but now war was openly declared between them. The result of this declaration was the battle of Fontenoy, fought on the 11th of May, 1745, between the French on one side, and the allied English and Hanoverians on the other. It was contested with great fury, and the Duke of Cumberland, who commanded, behaved with much bravery; but the French were the victors. The slaughter on both sides was terrible, and the defeat of the allies was attributed to the cowardly conduct of the Dutch troops, who held aloof from the conflict. The result of this battle was, that Tournay fell into the hands of the French, and that they preserved an ascendancy in Flanders during the rest of the war.

The young Pretender was not seriously discouraged by the failure of his intended invasion in 1744, and the following year (the memorable 1745) he renewed his attempt. The opportunity seemed favourable: for King George was absent in Germany; his warlike son, the Duke of Cumberland, was in Flanders; and the Scottish Jacobites assured the young Stuart prince that the nation hated the reigning family, could no longer bear the heavy taxes laid upon it, and that if he landed at the head of an army, the whole people would soon join him. Besides this, the Stuart family was greatly encouraged by the defeat of the allies at Fontenoy, and the discontent it had caused in England.

The French were no longer inclined to throw away their ships and men for the sake of the Stuarts; and the young Pretender, with two vessels only, some arms, a little money, and a few desperate friends, sailed from the continent in disguise in June, 1745, and landed to the west of Scotland, on a little island named Erisca, Between Barra and South Uist—two of the Hebrides. As they approached the wild, rocky shore, an eagle hovered over their ship. "Here," exclaimed one of the prince's mad friends, "is the king of birds come to welcome your royal highness to old Scotland." At first the Scottish chiefs represented to the Pretender, that his landing without an army was both imprudent and useless; but he soon received some encouraging messages; and on the 25th of July he set his foot on the main-land of Scotland, landing at Boradale, in Lochaber, accompanied by only seven persons, who afterwards obtained the romantic name of "the seven men of Moidart."

The Scottish Jacobites, disappointed that Prince Charles came without an army, at first held aloof from joining him; and had the English government acted with any decision, the insurrection would have been crushed at once, and the young Pretender scared back to France, or taken prisoner. The ministers, however, rested in careless supineness, doubted that Charles had landed, and contented themselves with offering a reward for his arrest. In the meantime the young Pretender was joined by several of the Highland clans, amounting to about 1,200 men; and, on the 19th of August, the standard of the Stuarts was erected in Glenfinnin, about fifteen miles from Fort William and by this act civil war was declared.

The government now thought it time to do something; and Sir John Cope, the commander-in-chief for Scotland, put himself at the head of a small body of royal troops, and marched after the rebels. The Pretender's power was increasing every day; and two companies of the regular troops were taken by a body of the Highlanders, even before they joined the main army of the rebels. Charles Edward and his Highlanders marched first to Blair Castle; then they proceeded to Perth, where the prince made his public entry on the 3rd of September, and, being a far better dancer than a warrior, gave a grand ball to the Jacobite ladies. At Perth he was joined by many new adherents, amongst whom was MacGregor, of Glenguile, with 250 MacGregors, every one of whom had red hair. From Perth the Pretender marched to Linlithgow, and from thence to Edinburgh, which he summoned to surrender. The inhabitants were distracted by fear, and unable to provide effectually for their defence. One of the city gates having been accidentally opened, Cameron, of Lochiel, together with 800 Highlanders, rushed in, and secured it without opposition; and, on the 18th of September, Charles Edward, whose troops now amounted to about 2,000 men, entered Edinburgh in triumph, and took up his residence at Holyrood House.

A spectator has thus described this adventurous heir of a royal but evil and ruined race:—"He was in the prime of youth, tall and handsome, and of a fair complexion. He had on a light-coloured periwig, with his own hair combed over the front; and he wore the Highland dress; that is, a tartan short coat without the plaid, a blue bonnet on his head, and on his breast the star of the Order of St. Andrew. Charles stood some time in the park, to show himself to the people; and then, though he was very near the palace, mounted his horse, either to render himself more conspicuous, or because he rode well, and looked graceful on horseback. The Jacobites were charmed with his appearance, and compared him to Robert Bruce, whom they said he resembled both in his figure and in his fortunes."

The same day the old Pretender was proclaimed in Edinburgh as King James VIII., and the young Pretender was declared his regent. Some of the people shouted, and a number of silly women waved their handkerchiefs; but a part of the crowd remained quiet and apathetic. In the evening Charles Edward gave a ball at Holyrood, and the Jacobite ladies were delighted with his dancing. This young prince could dance, and ride, and shoot extremely well; but there his accomplishments ended: in other respects he was so extremely ignorant, that he could neither write nor spell correctly.

The English people were now aroused from their torpor, and alarm took the place of indifference. The king was sent for from Hanover, and preparations made for the defence of the country. But they were paltry and insufficient preparations; and there is no doubt that many English statesmen and nobles wished, in their hearts, that the Pretender might succeed in his daring project. As to Sir John Cope, he had been marching about with his troops in almost every direction except in the one he was wanted. At length he went towards Edinburgh, to give the rebels battle. The young Pretender did not keep Cope waiting. He and his Highland army marched forth to meet him, and, on the 20th of September, they encamped near Prestonpans. The next morning the Highlanders began the battle with such impetuosity, that, in less than ten minutes, the royal troops were broken and thrown into confusion. Cope's cannons were taken at once; his dragoons turned and fled; the infantry followed their example; and, in an incredibly short time, the disgraceful battle of Prestonpans ended in favour of the rebels. The light-footed Highlanders pursued the flying dastards on foot, and slew some of them with their sharp broadswords; but the majority surrendered in flocks. The young Pretender had kept out of the battle, but he showed some prudence and humanity when it was over. The next day he returned to Edinburgh, and re-entered Holyrood House in joyful procession, the bagpipes playing, "The king shall have his ain again."

George and his government acted with singular irresolution; and had the young Pretender been joined at this time by a French army, the Stuarts might have again worn the crown of England. Charles Edward lived like a sovereign in Edinburgh—seized the public money, imposed taxes, and compelled the inhabitants of Glasgow to lend him a large sum of money, which, of course, he never repaid. Many Jacobite noblemen joined him, and every day the rebellion became more formidable. Being so successful in Scotland, Charles Edward resolved on entering England, and, on the 8th of November, he crossed the river Esk, followed by 5,000 men. His first exploit was to lay siege to Carlisle; and that city surrendered to him on the 15th of November. On receiving the keys, he caused his father to be proclaimed King of Great Britain, and himself regent. Leaving a small garrison in Carlisle Castle, he pressed forward, through Lancaster and Preston, to Manchester, where he established his head-quarters on the 28th. His followers had hitherto consisted entirely of Highlanders; but now some Englishmen entered his service, and were formed into what was called the "Manchester regiment." All the gentry of England, and the mass of the people, stood aloof, or were opposed to the rebellion.

The Duke of Cumberland had assumed the command of the royal troops, and was approaching; the country was arming; and the Highlanders began to have a fear that they should be surrounded. Their chiefs advised a retreat; but Charles Edward, who still hoped a French army would be landed in England for his assistance, urged them to continue their march as far as Derby; and on the 4th of December, the Pretender and his troops entered that town. Here, as elsewhere, he caused his father to be proclaimed king, and seized all the public money. Cumberland had been deluded with the idea that the rebels intended to march towards Wales, and he had gone in that direction; so that if the Pretender and his followers had pushed forward with vigour, they might have reached London. Great fears were entertained in the metropolis, and all the affairs of the nation were paralysed. Orders were given for forming a camp on Finchley Common; and the king, now roused to a sense of danger, resolved to take the field himself.

If the Pretender had remained at Derby, he would soon have been surrounded by three armies. No insurrection was made in his favour: the English Jacobites seemed to have vanished; no French army appeared on the coast to support him; his advisers were distracted by jealousies and opposing opinions. The Highland chiefs also began to murmur, and their clans to show signs of mutiny. Nothing was left but to retreat; and, on the 6th of December, the rebels shook off the dust of their shoes against Derby, and began to march back to Scotland. In their advance, the Highlanders were kept in order by the exertions of their chiefs; but during the retreat, they stole everything they could lay their hands on, and committed many excesses. They were closely followed by the Duke of Cumberland and his army; and a skirmish took place near Clifton Moor. But the star of the young Stuart was still in the ascendant, and the English dragoons were driven back, with considerable loss, by the fierce Highlanders.

The Pretender succeeded in crossing the river Esk on the 20th of December, and re-entering Scotland. He left a garrison in Carlisle Castle, but it was compelled to surrender, on the 30th, by the Duke of Cumberland, who then gave the command of the army to General Hawley, and returned to London. The rebels taken prisoners at Carlisle, amounting to 400 men, were crowded into the neighbouring gaols, and eleven, who had deserted from the royal army at the rout at Prestonpans, were hanged.

On their return to Scotland, the rebels laid siege to Stirling Castle, which offered a resolute resistance. General Hawley marched towards Stirling to relieve it. The young Pretender, who had now about 9,000 followers, advanced to meet him; and on the 17th of January, 1746, the disgraceful battle of Falkirk took place. In consequence of the neglect of General Hawley, and the cowardice of his troops, the Highlanders were again the victors. Such was the shameful behaviour of the British troops in this civil war, that the names of Prestonpans and Falkirk will ever remain as memorials of our military dishonour. The battle did not last above half-an-hour; not more than 300 of the royal troops perished; and then this heroic English army broke and fled in confusion, leaving their tents, artillery, ammunition, and provisions to the hungry and delighted Highlanders.

Had George II. been driven from his throne by the young Pretender, he would almost have deserved his fate, on account of the miserably incompetent way in which he defended it. A soldier like Marlborough, or the late Duke of Wellington, would have struck such a blow at once as to have annihilated the rebellion in its outbreak, and driven the Highlanders in terror back to their glens and mountains. George and his ministers acted in a petty, peddling way: his generals were distinguished for want of ability, and his soldiers for want of that courage, hardihood, and discipline which have usually distinguished British troops. These series of disgraces were, however, coming to a close: the Duke of Cumberland, stung into activity, posted down from London, and resumed the command of the army. Encouraging his beaten troops, he led them again in pursuit of the Pretender, who was then compelled to abandon the siege of Stirling Castle. Although the Highlanders retreated before the duke, yet they were strong and bold enough to besiege and take Fort George and Fort Augustus. This was the last of their successes, and the tide of fortune then turned against them.

On the 17th of April, 1746, the armies of the Duke of Cumberland and the young Pretender met at Culloden, or Drummossie Moor. The rebels, who had failed in an attempt to surprise the English army the preceding night, were worn out with fatigue, and almost exhausted for want of food. Their condition was indeed pitiable; for when, in consequence of Cumberland's approach, they were summoned to form in order of battle, numbers of these strong, hardy men were lying in an almost fainting state upon the earth. Many had strayed away in search of something to eat; and the whole army did not amount to 4,000 men. The Duke of Cumberland had 7,000 or 8,000, all fresh, and in fighting condition. About one o'clock the battle began; the Highlanders fought with great bravery, firing their muskets; and then rushing impetuously on to the attack with their broadswords. Their fury was useless; the English had recovered their spirit, and received them with such murderous fires, that they reeled back, and fell dead in heaps. In a very short time the jaded Highlanders fled from the field, pursued by the English cavalry. More were killed during the flight than in the battle, and the slaughter was very great. This has been called the famous battle of Culloden; but surely there was nothing very famous in a fresh English army beating half the number of exhausted and fainting Highlanders! The victory of the English, however was a complete one, and the cause of the Pretender was crushed, utterly and for ever.

Immediately after the battle, the Duke of Cumberland —a man of very stern temper—caused thirty-six deserters to be shot. As for the prisoners, the gaols of all the surrounding towns were crowded with them, and some of rank were sent up to London. Amongst these were the Earls of Kilmarnock, Cromartie, and Lords Balmerino and Macleod. The Duke of Cumberland then marched his victorious troops into the centre of the Jacobite districts, and gave them up to military execution. Such was the bitterness of his vengeance, that it earned for him, even in England, the offensive title of "the butcher!" The castles of Glengarry and Lochiel were burnt to ashes, and every house and cottage near them left mere blackened ruins. The fugitive Highlanders were hunted down like wild beasts, shot or sabred without mercy, and sometimes burnt or suffocated in dens and caves into which they had crept for concealment. Women saw their infants brained against the rocks—their husbands or fathers murdered before their eyes; and were then subjected to the brutal violence of the worst rabble of the army—stripped naked, and driven out, with their children, to perish from cold and hunger. So awful and so complete was the work of vengeance, that, in a few days, neither house nor cottage, man nor beast was to be seen for fifty miles round.

The young Pretender—the selfish cause of all this horror—fled headlong from the battle-field at Culloden. At first he rode in hot haste to the house of Lord Lovat, where he assumed a disguise, and, deserting his companions, stole away by night, in the hope of being able to embark in some friendly vessel, and return to France. This was no easy matter: a reward of £30,000 was set upon his head, the royal troops were hunting for him, and the sea was guarded by British men-of-war. For five dreary months he wandered about in a miserable condition, living sometimes on nothing but oatmeal and water. He was hunted from island to island; and on one occasion saved his life by disguising himself as a lady's maid, and following a Jacobite lady—a Miss Flora Macdonald—as her servant. This adventurous damsel was arrested as a traitoress for concealing him, and suffered twelve months' imprisonment. Having, by means of this artifice, escaped from South Uist (where the soldiers were searching for him) to the Isle of Skye, the Pretender disguised himself as a mountaineer, and lodged for a time in a cow-shed.

He could not remain long in safety at Skye, and some Jacobite gentlemen conveyed him to Ross-shire. At first he ran a risk of perishing from hunger, but a Highlander led him to a cave in the mountain of Corado, where for more than five weeks he dwelt with some freebooters or robbers. These men behaved towards him with the utmost fidelity, and supplied his wants by hunting and by theft. They contrived to steal some clean linen for him; for he was almost in rags, and his apparel unwholesome from want of change. Indeed, his whole appearance was extremely miserable; his hair and beard were matted, his face was sallow and haggard, his figure meagre, and he was a prey to that offensive disorder, the scurvy. Weary of his companions, he contrived to join Lochiel and some other chiefs, who were hiding from the English troops, and lived with them in a wild romantic retreat called "the Cage," situated in the mountain of Benalder. Here he remained till the 13th of September, when a trusty messenger arrived with the welcome intelligence, that two French vessels were waiting at Lochnanuagh, to carry him and his friends to France. Away went the fugitive, and succeeded in embarking with safety, accompanied by other Jacobite gentlemen. Passing, during a thick fog, through the British squadron, the vessels reached the French coast, and the young Pretender rejoined his father at Paris.

As this was Charles Edward's last exploit, and as he never appeared again upon the stage of history, we will briefly sketch his subsequent career. Two years after the events just described, the French king, in a treaty with George II., consented that the young Pretender should be banished from his dominions. The Stuart prince refused to go; so one evening, as he was on his way to the opera, he was dragged from his coach, bound hand and foot, conveyed to the frontiers, and then set at liberty. He joined his father, who went to live at Rome, where he treated his wife (the Princess of Stahlberg, whom he married in 1772, when he was fifty-two years old, and she a girl of twenty) with so much brutality, that she was compelled to leave him and seek for protection within the walls of a convent. For some time Charles Edward was lost sight of, and wandered about, under various disguises and different names. The latter part of his life he spent at Florence, in drunkenness and coarse pleasures. During his wanderings he visited England several times. He was in London in the year 1754, when a nobleman, hearing of it, asked the king what should be done with him. "Nothing," wisely but contemptuously replied George; "when he is tired of staying here, let him go away." It is asserted that he came to London again in 1760, and witnessed the coronation of George III. He died in obscurity in 1788, not leaving any legitimate children. His father went to the grave before him; his brother Henry became a cardinal; and the Stuart race became extinct in 1807.

CHAPTER XCIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE SECOND.—A.D. 1746—1760.

THOUGH the young Pretender got safe to Paris, for most of his followers there was no escape; and hundreds of bereaved or ruined Scottish families cursed the hour in which he placed his foot on their distracted country. Better, indeed, would it have been had a plague or famine visited their country, than thus to have sold themselves into the hands of the hangman, in a criminal attempt to restore to regal power the descendants of a banished tyrant.

While the Stuart prince was showing himself to admiring crowds at the French opera, hundreds of his wretched followers were pining to death in over-crowded and pestilential prisons. Numbers died of the gaol fever, and from the want of fresh air and wholesome food. George was severe, and did not check the avenging arm of the law. Executions for treason, accompanied with all the horrors of embowelling and quartering, took place in great numbers; and about eighty ghastly heads were set up in different places in the north, as a warning against rebellion. Colonel Townley, and sixteen other English Jacobites, were hanged and quartered upon Kennington Common, and in other places round London. The Earl of Kilmarnock, together with Lords Balmerino and Lovat of Fraser, were beheaded. The latter was an old man, more than eighty years of age, who had spent a long life in sin. He behaved with a strange indifference to his fate; jested and hummed songs during his trial, and died with a joke on his lips. The Earl of Cromartie, who made a very pathetic appeal to his judges, was condemned, but afterwards pardoned. "My own fate," said this unhappy criminal, "is the least part of my suffering; but, my lords, I have involved an affectionate wife with an unborn infant as parties of my guilt to share its penalties. I have involved my eldest son, whose youth and regard for his parent hurried him down the stream of rebellion. I have involved eight innocent children, who must feel their parent's punishment before they know his guilt. Let the silent eloquence of their grief and tears supply my want of persuasion."

When the rebellion was over, and the work of retribution past, statesmen began to see that it was necessary to civilise and educate the Highlanders. The ignorance of these wretched men was both their curse and the curse of England. They did not know that, in fighting for the Pretender, they were taking the side of tyranny and popery, against that of liberty and Protestantism. Several bills were passed respecting them, and they were encouraged to emigrate to America, and to enlist in the British army. A few years afterwards, a bill was passed expressly to better their condition. And, asked one of its supporters, "What is loyalty or disloyalty here? Is there food or starving? Feed the clans, and they will obey; starve them, and they must rebel. The means of eradicating this spirit in the common people are obvious. Civilise them! Introduce the arts of peace among them!"

The Duke of Cumberland was a brave soldier, but by no means a very skilful or fortunate general. During the outbreak of the Highlanders, England was at war with France; and now that the rebellion was over, the English and their continental allies—the Dutch, Flemish, Bavarians, and Austrians—brought an immense army into the field against the French. A great battle was fought at Lanffeld, near Maestricht, which ended in the defeat of the English and their allies. The French, however, purchased their victory with the loss of a great number of men. They followed up this battle by taking many fortresses in the Low Countries, and went into winter quarters in great triumph. As if to heal their wounded pride for this disgrace on land, the English were gratified by some successes over the French at sea. Admiral Anson defeated the French fleet in a battle off Cape Finisterre. Admiral Hawke, in another encounter, took six French ships; and Commodore Fox captured no less than forty French merchant vessels, laden with rich cargoes from the West Indies. The result of these actions was, that, in spite of all their triumphs, the French were very anxious for peace. The causes of dispute were referred to a congress at Aix-la-Chapelle; and in the following year (1748) a long and expensive war, by which no one got any advantage, was concluded by a peace which was not considered very honourable. England restored all her conquests, and submitted to the indignity of sending two noblemen as hostages to France, until she had given up possession of Cape Breton, which she had recently acquired. By the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (signed on the 7th of October), peace was also made with Spain. The cry for war against that country had been got up by the enemies of Sir Robert Walpole, for the unworthy purpose of driving him from his post as minister. The reason given for it, as before stated, was, that the English would not submit to the right claimed by Spanish officers of searching British vessels in their colonial ports; and now peace was concluded without a word being said about the right of search, and the matter was left just as it was when the war began.

Parliament was opened on the 17th of January, 1751. Soon afterwards an immense sensation was created by great numbers of a political pamphlet or paper, called Constitutional Queries, being dropped down the areas of houses, and dispersed throughout London by the post. They reflected severely on the conduct and character of the Duke of Cumberland, whose cruelties in Scotland, and defeat in Flanders, had made him very unpopular. Now-a-days Englishmen speak their minds very freely about the most distinguished persons in the land—princes not excepted. They publish what they please, provided that the press is not used for any immoral or evidently improper purpose. A free press is the safeguard of our liberty; the right to express our opinions is the bulwark of freedom, and has helped to raise the country to its present exalted position. Freemen are active and intelligent, and consequently prosperous; while a nation of slaves generally sinks into poverty and contempt. The English government understands this now, and generally acts upon it; but, 100 years ago, the ideas of our ancestors were by no means clear upon this subject. They were slowly groping their way from the darkness of ignorance, through the twilight of doubt, to the radiant brightness of truth. These Constitutional Queries gave rise to a great sensation; and the Duke of Marlborough moved, in the House of Lords, that they should be burnt by the common hangman, as a mark of disgrace. The papers were burnt accordingly, though not without considerable opposition to the motion in the Commons; for several members said that the assertions contained in them were not devoid of truth. Civilisation has made great strides in the 100 years and upwards that have rolled away since then; for now the free expression of public opinion is very properly considered as the bridle and corrector of public men; and no Duke of Cumberland, or any other prince, can defy it with impunity.

Soon after this affair of the Queries, the House of Commons attracted considerable notice by a vehement assertion of its privileges. Mr. Crowle, a lawyer and high bailiff of Westminster, and Mr. Murray, a Scotch gentleman of Tory principles, were summoned to attend at the bar of the House, in connection with some alleged improper proceedings in the election of Lord Trentham for Westminster; against whose return a petition was presented. Mr. Crowle, being commanded to kneel while he was reprimanded by the Speaker, escaped further punishment by doing as he was bid; but, as he arose, he dusted his knees with his handkerchief, and said satirically, "This is the dirtiest house I ever was in." Mr. Murray, instead of kneeling, stood proudly erect. On being told by the Speaker that he must kneel, he replied, "Sir, I beg to be excused; I never kneel but to God." The command was angrily repeated, but Mr. Murray returned his former answer. "Sir," said he, "when I have committed a crime, I kneel to God for pardon; but I know my own innocence, and cannot kneel to any one else." In consequence of this bold conduct, Mr. Murray was committed a prisoner to Newgate, where he caught the gaol fever; but he was obliged to be liberated when the House adjourned, and he escaped further punishment by going abroad.

During this contest about the privileges of parliament, the king's eldest son, Frederick, Prince of Wales, expired on the 20th of March, 1751. His death caused considerable excitement, because, as his father was already advanced in years, it was reasonably expected that he would soon have worn the English crown. The nation had no particular reason to regret him; for, besides being an ungrateful son, he was a prince of narrow intellect, and possessed of no redeeming virtues. The great point of his character was love of money: he borrowed from every one who would lend to him; and is said to have been mean enough to cheat at cards. For some time he had been suffering from a pulmonary disorder; and while in a very delicate state, he caught a severe cold, which proved fatal. His factious behaviour had long estranged him from his father, but the old king was shocked at his death. The prince left a widow and a large family of young children. His eldest son, George, was created Prince of Wales, and afterwards became King George III.

At this time the prince was a dull, bashful, indolent, and timid lad, in his thirteenth year. He was extremely backward; and his education had been so neglected, that, notwithstanding all the pains bestowed upon persons of his rank, at eleven years of age he was scarcely able to read. His mother, the princess-dowager, was an indulgent parent, but extremely weak-minded. Strange as it may seem, she actually confided his education to two men of Jacobite principles—men who believed that the royal family were usurpers, and who instilled the dangerous precepts of despotism into the dull mind of their young charge. Public attention was afterwards called to this circumstance, and Lord Waldegrave, a nobleman of correct principles, appointed as governor of the prince. That noble spoke of his pupil in very unpromising terms. "I found his royal highness," said he, "uncommonly full of princely prejudice—contracted in the nursery, and improved by the society of bedchamber women, and pages of the back-stairs. As a right system of education seemed quite impracticable, the best which could be hoped for was to give him true notions of common things. To instruct him by conversation rather than by books; and sometimes, under the disguise of amusement, to entice him to the pursuit of more serious studies." The education of the prince was now more carefully attended to; and he attracted considerable notice, as it was the general opinion that he would soon be called to the throne. Such was the dislike the nation bore to the Duke of Cumberland, that a bill was passed to exclude him from becoming regent, in case the king should die before the young prince came of age.

In the year 1753, an event occurred which deserves to be recorded to the honour of the British parliament. That body passed an act giving power to the king to raise money, by lottery, to purchase the Sloane library and museum, the Harleian manuscripts, together with Montague House to keep them in—as the common property, and for the general good of the whole nation. Such was the origin of that magnificent structure and great fountain of practical instruction—the BRITISH MUSEUM!

A quarrel broke out with the French, in 1755, about the boundaries of the respective colonies of the two nations in Canada. The French encroached on the British dominions; and the English sent a fleet to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, to intercept a French fleet which was carrying reinforcements to their colonists. The result of this was an engagement in time of a professed peace, and two French vessels were captured by the British. The French court expostulated; the English court defended its conduct; ambassadors on each side were recalled; and both countries prepared again for war. The following year the war broke out, and the French sent a great fleet to take possession of Minorca, an island in the Mediterranean, belonging to the English, and considered of great importance. This fleet, of twelve ships of the line, and a number of transports, with 16,000 troops on board, appeared off Minorca on the 18th of April, 1756. After some delay, the English government sent Admiral John Byng with a small fleet to protect the island. The father of this officer was a famous naval commander, who had won great distinction during the last reign, and acquired the name of "Mediterranean Byng." The son, though a brave man, did not possess the talents of his father. The whole affair was miserably conducted; and Byng acted with such obstinate caution, that he was suspected of cowardice. The French had landed troops upon the island, and had obtained possession of it, with the exception of the fortress of St. Philip. That fortress was defended by the brave old General Blakeney, whom it was Byng's duty to have relieved by causing the French to abandon the siege they had laid to it. His squadron came in sight of St. Philip on the 19th of May; but, after an action between a part of the two fleets, in which the French were dispersed, he determined to retreat, as his force was very inferior to that of the enemy; and, sailing away to the Rock of Gibraltar, he left the fortress to its fate. On the 27th of June it was surrendered to the French; and thus Minorca was lost. When the British ministry heard of this conduct, they sent out Admiral Hawke to take the command, and gave him directions to place Byng under arrest, and send him a prisoner to England.

The disgraced admiral charged his failure upon the ministry, and declared that his fleet was too small for the purpose for which it was designed, and that his instructions were improper and insufficient. The ministry, who felt that they were not exempt from blame, resolved to save themselves from public censure by exaggerating the misconduct of the admiral. They succeeded so well in this, that when Byng landed at Portsmouth, he was with difficulty prevented from being torn to pieces by the mob. So great was the popular fury against him, that sixty dragoons were required to bring him in safety to London.

The following December Admiral Byng was placed upon his trial before a court-martial. The affair occupied a month; and the court then came to the conclusion that the admiral had not done his utmost to take, seize, and destroy the ships of the French king, which it was his duty to have engaged; and to assist such of his majesty's ships as were engaged, which it was his duty to have assisted; and that he did not exert his utmost power for the relief of Fort St. Philip. Having come to this conclusion, the articles of war allowed the court no choice as to the sentence, and the unfortunate admiral was condemned to be shot: at the same time the court recommended him to the mercy of the king, because it did not believe that his misconduct arose from either cowardice or treachery. It is supposed that this recommendation was not permitted to reach George; and although the officers who formed the court-martial deplored the sentence they had been compelled to pass as unjustly severe, it was carried into effect.

The admiral had fully expected to be acquitted, but he bore his sentence with manly resignation. A day or two before his execution, one of his friends, standing upright by his side, inquired, "Which of us is the tallest?" "Why this ceremony?" replied the fallen commander; "I know what it means: let the man come in and measure me for my coffin." He was shot on board the Monarque, a ship of war lying in Portsmouth harbour, on the 14th of March, 1757. He walked with great calmness and dignity from the cabin to the quarter-deck, where he was to suffer. Having unwillingly submitted to tie a white handkerchief over his eyes, he knelt upon a cushion, and gave the signal by throwing his hat upon the deck. So effective was the fire of the marines, that five bullets passed through his body, and he fell dead in an instant. The execution was conducted so rapidly, that the time from his leaving the cabin to being laid in his coffin, did not exceed three minutes. It is now generally admitted, that though his conduct was far from blameless, yet that he was put to death to divert popular indignation from the ministers. They did not, however, altogether escape: the Duke of Newcastle was obliged to resign; and Mr. Pitt and his friends came into power.

It was at this period (1757) that General Clive (afterwards so famous as Lord Clive) laid the foundations of our Indian empire. In the preceding year had occurred that awful act of Indian barbarity known as the tragedy of the Black Hole of Calcutta. Surajah Dowlah, the sovereign of Bengal, had, from a brutal whim, attacked the British settlers—destroyed their factories, taken Calcutta, and thrust 146 Englishmen into a miserable dungeon only twenty feet square. The wretched prisoners, in spite of their expostulations and entreaties, were driven in at the point of the sword. It is difficult to describe that night of horror. They were perishing in that loathsome den from suffocation; in vain they shrieked aloud for air, for water; and at length, in agony, implored their guards to fire upon them, and put an end to their torture. The wretches laughed at their misery; and, at length, the despairing ravings of the captives died away into low gaspings and moanings. The next morning, when the door of the dungeon was thrown open, only twenty-three staggered forth alive; all the rest—123 in number—had died of suffocation. General Clive was the avenger of this awful act of tyranny: with a mere handful of Englishmen he defeated the vast native army of Surajah Dowlah in the great battle of Plassey, on the 27th of June, 1757; drove him from his throne; and, finally, established the power of the English in India.

The war between the English and French was carried on in each of the four quarters of the world. At first, the fortune of war was with the French. Sir Edward Hawke was sent, with a fleet and a powerful land army, to take Rochefort; but he failed, and returned home without doing anything. The Duke of Cumberland, with an army of Hanoverian and other troops, amounting to 50,000 men, had been defeated by the French, and compelled to sign a disgraceful treaty to save his troops from being cut to pieces. Other reverses were experienced: and, indeed, that Seven Years' War (as it is called), which was afterwards carried on so brilliantly through the great talents of Mr. Pitt, was at first the cause of national discontent and humiliation.

The wounded pride of the nation was soon healed, and victories were obtained in various parts of the globe. The power of the French was destroyed in the West Indies; and in the East Indies Clive proceeded from triumph to triumph. Admiral Boscawen obtained a victory over the French fleet off Cape Lagos, in Portugal, on the 18th of August, 1759; and Sir Edward Hawke, on the 20th of November, gained another in Quiberon Bay. The famous general, Wolfe, also gained great military glory against the French in America. To the astonishment of the enemy, he and his troops, during the darkness of night, scaled the steep heights of Abraham—a feat which was deemed impossible—and formed in order upon the summit. The battle of Quebec followed (fought on the 13th of September), in which Wolfe won the victory, but lost his own life. A musket-ball struck him on the wrist, but he wrapped his handkerchief round the wound, and continued giving his orders, unmoved: a second bullet struck him in the upper part of the stomach, but he still continued at his post, and performed his duty: a third ball pierced his bosom, and felled him to the earth. He was then carried to the rear, and told, as his glazed eyes were closing, that the French were flying from the field. "Then," said he, "I die content!" and soon expired. Five days afterwards the city of Quebec surrendered to the English, and the remains of the French army retired to Montreal.—An attempt was made to recover Quebec, but was defeated; and, from that time, all Canada has been an English colony.

In Europe the French had been more successful; but they were defeated, on the 1st of August, at the battle of Minden, by an army of English, Hanoverians, and Hessians. The battle revived the sullied military glory of the English on the continent. For a time, six regiments of English infantry sustained the attacks of the whole French army, which exceeded 60,000 men.

The expenses of this war were enormous. In the session of 1759, £15,000,000 and upwards were voted to carry it on; and what with the militia, the regular army, and the foreign troops in British service, England had 175,000 soldiers in her pay.

The late despondency of the people was turned into rejoicing by the victories obtained on sea and land; but this joy was checked by the sudden death of the king, who, in his old age, had become extremely popular. On the 25th of October, 1760, George rose, as usual, at six o'clock in the morning in apparent health. Having drank his chocolate, and inquired about the arrival of the foreign mails, he opened the window, and, as the air seemed pleasant, expressed his intention of walking in the garden. A few minutes afterwards, while alone in his chamber, he fell suddenly. The noise alarmed his attendants, who entered the room, and raising the dying monarch, laid him upon the bed. In a faint voice he desired that the Princess Amelia might be summoned; but before she arrived he was no more.

George II. died at the advanced age of seventy-seven, after a long reign of thirty-four years. His death was caused by a rupture of the right ventricle of the heart. He was a little man, with very prominent eyes, and a fair complexion; and his features, though not ill-formed, were pinched and hard. He was possessed of more than average understanding, but was by no means a great or brilliant character. He was extremely avaricious, and hasty in his temper, particularly during his youth. On the other hand, he possessed a love of justice and honour, governed according to the laws, and respected the liberties of his people. He was temperate in his habits, and extremely methodical; brave in the field of battle; and so fond of war, that the Jacobites gave him the name of "The Little Captain." He used to read history, and had a good memory, but was quite insensible to poetry or elegant literature. He was rather too much attached to the interests of his native country, and inclined to view those of England as a secondary matter; but that was natural, and to be expected. If the people could not find an Englishman great and wise enough to be their ruler, and were obliged to call a foreigner to wear the crown, they had no right to expect that he should entirely forget the land of his birth, and dedicate himself, without reserve, to the prosperity of theirs. George II. died in a happy time: the nation was thriving; its military exploits were crowned with success; he had lived to see his own family firmly seated upon the throne, and his rivals, the Stuarts, fallen never to rise again. Full of years he sank into the grave when the advance of age threatened to take from him his sight and hearing, and thus deprive him of the enjoyments of existence.

Many famous writers, philosophers, and men of science lived during the reigns of the two first Georges. That period, however, is not so brilliant in these respects as the one that preceded it. No Shakspeare, Bacon, Milton, or Newton adorns the eighteenth century. Among the poets, however, Dr. Edward Young, the author of Night Thoughts, and James Thompson, who wrote The Seasons—a delightful poem, which abounds in truthful descriptions of the varied aspects of nature—deserve honourable mention. With them must be associated the names of Mark Akenside, chiefly known by his poem On the Pleasures of the Imagination; and Thomas Gray, author of The Progress of Poetry, The Bard, and an Elegy in a Country Churchyard. The latter was so attractive that, though published anonymously, it ran immediately through eleven editions. Horne, Garrick, Foote, and Goldsmith wrote for the stage. The latter was a very pleasing writer in other walks, and his Vicar of Wakefield will long be favourably remembered. The most distinguished writers in history were Robertson, Hume, and Guthrie. Fielding, Richardson, Sterne, and Smollett were famous as novelists. Adam Smith, the originator of the science of political economy, and Dr. Samuel Johnson, so famous as a moral and philological writer, also adorned this period. A national school of painting arose in England at this time—a school of which the humorous Hogarth was esteemed the most original, and Sir Joshua Reynolds the most elegant, artist. The arts appear to have received a liberal encouragement. Handel, the great German composer, adopted England as his country; as also did Roubilliac, a famous sculptor, born at Lyons. Lord Chesterfield said of him, that he was our only statuary, and that all other would-be sculptors were mere stone-cutters.

CHAPTER XCIV.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE THIRD.—A.D. 1760—1764.

EORGE THE SECOND was succeeded by his grandson, the eldest son of the late Frederick, Prince of Wales. The new sovereign, who was born on the 4th of June, 1738, and was, consequently, in his twenty-third year, was proclaimed, the day after the old king's death, as GEORGE THE THIRD, amidst the approving shouts of the nation. A few days after that event, he issued a proclamation, "For the encouragement of piety and virtue; and for preventing and punishing of vice, profaneness, and immorality." Though George had some faults, he set an example to his people of domestic virtues; and immorality was banished from his refined court.

The two first Georges had been only tolerated by the great mass of the English people. They were foreigners, and their rule was welcome to the nation simply because it excluded a popish prince. The new king had been born in England; his person and address were rather pleasing, though he was considered deficient in frankness and openness of behaviour; and the feelings of loyalty began to revive in the nation. The speech which the young king made on the 18th of November, when he first met parliament, also tended to endear him to the hearts of his people. "Born and educated in this country," said he, "I glory in the name of Briton; and the peculiar happiness of my life will ever consist in promoting the welfare of a people whose loyalty and warm affection to me I consider as the greatest and most permanent security of my throne; and I doubt not but their steadiness in those principles will equal the firmness of my invariable resolution to adhere to and strengthen this excellent constitution in church and state, and to maintain toleration inviolable. The civil and religious rights of my loving subjects are equally dear to me with the most valuable prerogatives of my crown; and as the surest foundation of the whole, and the best means to draw down the Divine favour on my reign, it is my fixed purpose to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue." He then alluded to the war in which the nation was engaged, and trusted that the Commons would make such provision for carrying it on, as would force their enemies to equitable terms of accommodation.

Notwithstanding the young king's assurances, and the affection generally borne towards him, there were some things that gave uneasiness to a great number of people. He was supposed to be too much under the influence of his mother, Augusta, the Princess-Dowager of Wales, a woman who was far from being respected by the nation. She, in her turn, was said to be greatly under the influence of a handsome Scotch nobleman, whom scandal represented as her lover. This Scotch peer (Lord Bute) was a decided Tory, and much disliked by the people. Such was the suspicion entertained of him, that a paper was set up in the Royal Exchange, with the words, "No petticoat government! —no Scotch minister!" Although the Earl of Bute had been introduced into the cabinet, among the king's councillors, no change was as yet made in the ministry. Mr. Pitt, as principal Secretary of State, remained at the head of affairs, and the other members of the cabinet were Mr. Henry Fox (afterwards Lord Holland), Mr. Legge, the Duke of Newcastle, the Earl of Holderness, and Lord Anson.

The year following that in which young George ascended the throne, the courts of France and Spain entered into a close alliance, which was known as the "Family Compact." It was signed on the 15th of August. By its provisions, the kings of those countries (who were relations) agreed to consider every power as their common enemy which might become the enemy of either, and to afford assistance to each other by land and sea. It was further agreed, that no proposal of peace to their common enemies was to be made, except by common consent; and that the two monarchies of France and Spain were to act as if they were but one nation.

As England, though at peace with Spain, was at war with France, this family compact caused considerable alarm, especially as the Spaniards were busily engaged in building a new fleet. It was naturally supposed that the intention of Spain was to turn its arms against us, and to assist the French in their hostility to England. Pitt boldly argued, that the best plan was to anticipate Spain by instantly declaring war, and thus punish her treachery by seizing upon her fleet of treasure-ships, then on their passage from the Western World. This policy startled his fellow-ministers: it was thought too bold and precipitate; they resolutely opposed it, and the young king expressed his decided disapprobation of it. Pitt, whose commanding nature could brook no contradiction, immediately resigned his office, declaring that he would not remain in a situation which made him responsible for measures he was no longer allowed to guide. George was sorry to lose his great minister, whom he feared might go into opposition and obstruct his government. In parting with Mr. Pitt, the young king behaved with so much kindness, that that strange, haughty man even shed tears. He was offered the governorship of Canada, or the chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster, with a salary of £5,000: he refused both; but accepted a pension of £3,000 a year, and the title of Baroness of Chatham for his wife, Lady Hester Pitt. After Pitt's retirement, the Earl of Bute became one of the principal Secretaries of State; and, soon after, the Duke of Newcastle also left the cabinet; and then the earl took his office of First Lord of the Treasury, and became prime minister; George Grenville was appointed Secretary of State, and Sir Francis Dashwood Chancellor of the Exchequer.

On the 8th of September, 1761, George III. married the Princess Charlotte Sophia, of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, second daughter of the late duke. It is said he was attracted to this lady in consequence of seeing a very sensible letter she had written to Frederick the Great of Prussia. At any rate, he demanded her hand in marriage; the princess and her friends willingly complied, and she soon afterwards arrived in England. The royal union took place at the palace of St. James's. The character of the lady rather resembled that of her husband: she was very rigid in the observance of moral and religious duties, stubborn in temper, and deficient in that open frankness and condescension which wins the love of a people. The coronation of the royal couple was celebrated the same month; for, as yet, George had only been proclaimed King of England. It was conducted with great magnificence; and Charles Edward Stuart was present in disguise. No doubt he felt, from the affection shown to the young king by the nobles and people, that all chance of the deposed Stuart family regaining the throne had vanished for ever—gone like frost-flowers beneath a winter's sun, or like the half-remembered shadows of a summer's dream.

It was soon found that the late minister was right; as, early in 1762, it was found necessary to declare war against Spain. Ministers had lowered their dignity by a vain attempt to accommodate the dispute; but they were compelled at last to adopt the policy which, from the first, had been inevitable. A British fleet and army, under the command of Lord Albemarle and Admiral Pococke, sailed to the Havannah, and laid siege to the fort and city. The Spaniards defended them bravely; but both were compelled to yield. Nine Spanish ships of the line and four frigates were captured, three were sunk, and two that were then being built destroyed. The value of the prizes thus obtained by the British amounted to £3,000,000. The possession of the Havannahs gave England the command of the passage pursued by the treasure-fleets of Spain, and seemed to open unbounded opportunities for plunder. This triumph was followed by the capitulation of Manilla, a possession of scarcely less importance than the Havannahs; and by other successes.

These results did not lessen the inclination of Bute for peace; and towards the close of 1762, negotiations were opened with France. The French were also anxious to terminate a war in which they had experienced so many reverses; and preliminaries of peace were signed at Fontainebleau. The treaty founded upon them, known as the "Treaty of Paris," was concluded on the 10th of February, 1763. By this treaty the original cause of quarrel was removed, France giving up all claim to Canada and its dependencies, together with Cape Breton and all other islands in the gulf and river of St. Lawrence. Minorca—the island in the Mediterranean which had been lost by the misconduct of Admiral Byng—was also restored in consideration of the English surrendering Belleisle. Spain, too, was sick of the war, and ready to make a reasonable peace preliminaries, therefore, were entered into with that power also. The British parliament approved them, and peace was concluded—a peace both honourable and advantageous; but scarcely so much as it was considered the nation had a right to expect from a succession of victories. By one article Havannah was restored to Spain, which excited great dissatisfaction. This peace put an end to that contest on the continent known as the Seven Years' War. England, at the same time, withdrew from that connection with Germany which she had been led into by her Hanoverian sovereigns.

The young king was of a rather despotic nature, and his attachments were entirely to the Tory party, except with respect to tolerating the Roman Catholics: on that point his majesty had formed his opinion, and it never could be shaken. He connected himself with the Tories because he had discovered that the object of the Whigs was, to retain the power of the state in the hands of the heads of those families who had mainly contributed, first, to counteract the despotism of James II., and then to secure the Protestant succession—most praiseworthy objects, but the attainment of which, George thought, did not entitle the Whigs to the power they had exercised over the first and second Georges. Those sovereigns were mere puppets in the hands of the Whigs; and thus, in fact, an oligarchy was established, and the monarchy rendered only a name. Unfortunately, the king, at the commencement of his reign, put himself into the hands of Lord Bute more completely than his two immediate predecessors had been in the hands of the Whigs; and while avowing his determination to be "his own minister," he was, for a time, enabling Bute and another statesman—Bubb Doddington, afterwards Lord Melcombe Regis—to intrigue against Pitt, who was as deservedly popular as Bute was the reverse. In 1762, a paper, called The North Briton, was established by John Wilkes, M.P. for Aylesbury, and lieutenant-colonel of the Buckinghamshire militia; who was assisted by Churchill, the poet. In this paper the king and his favourite were grossly assailed; the latter not merely for his political conduct, but on account of his nationality as a Scotchman. His intimacy at Leicester House was also a constant topic; he and the king's mother being compared to Isabella, the queen of Edward II., and her paramour, Mortimer. In the streets, a jack-boot and petticoat were frequently displayed, as emblems of the princess and the earl; and they were sometimes first suspended from a gallows, and then burned.

Led to believe that the king was aiming at despotism, neither the Whigs nor the people were disposed to submit in silence. Passive obedience had become a worn-out doctrine; and a storm of ill-feeling was excited throughout the nation, which, although the king did not escape its effects, was directed chiefly against his minister. In this state of the public mind, a tax that was imposed on cider created a perfect tempest of opposition. Pitt denounced it in one of his tremendous orations; the country gentlemen of all parties were violently against it, and declared that they would let the apples fall from the trees, and rot where they fell, sooner than make them into cider, if they were to be annoyed by such an irritating tax. Scared by the outcry he had created, Lord Bute shrank from the anger of the nation, and, on the 8th of April, 1763, resigned his office as prime minister.

Mr. George Grenville succeeded him. A more unfortunate choice could scarcely have been made. Grenville was a cold, proud, imperious man, of whom an eloquent writer has said, that "his public acts may be classed under two heads—outrages on the liberty of the people, and outrages on the dignity of the crown." It is therefore no surprise that he soon became detested both by king and people; and, in after-times, the king said that he would as soon see the devil enter his apartment as Mr. Grenville.

John Wilkes was a man of considerable talent, and particularly famous for the airy lightness of his wit, and the gay brilliancy of his conversation. His moral character, however, was far from estimable; his language was sometimes profane; and he was considered as one of the most dissipated, though agreeable, rakes about town. As a writer he was extremely bitter; but it is said that his political satires were more conspicuous for their courage and scurrility, than for the higher talent of wit or genius. He was not content with abusing Lord Bute with a rancour perhaps never before exercised against a prime minister, but he heaped the bitterest and most unfair sarcasms and denunciations upon Bute's countrymen, the Scotch. Every Scot he described as a mean, time-serving traitor, and hungry beggar.

The North Briton attracted a great deal of notice; and, in the forty-fifth number of that paper, published on the 23rd of April, 1763, Mr. Wilkes accused the king of uttering a direct falsehood in a speech he made to the parliament. In consequence of this, Grenville issued a general warrant, and directed the messengers to seize the author, printer, and publisher of the offensive paper. A general warrant is one in which no person is named, but by the authority of which the messengers might seize any one whom they suspected. When they arrested Wilkes, he declared the warrant illegal, and refused to go with them. At first they retired, but returned the next morning, and the satirist was carried to the Tower, and placed in strict confinement. His papers, also, were seized, and his friends refused admission to him.—On the 3rd of May, he was brought before the Court of Common Pleas, upon a writ of habeas corpus. On the 6th, his arrest was declared unlawful by Chief Justice Sir Charles Pratt, and, to the great joy of the people, he was set at liberty. Wilkes behaved with remarkable spirit, and wrote to the Secretaries of State, saying that his house had been robbed of his papers, and that, as he was informed the stolen goods were in their lordships' possession, he insisted on their being instantly returned to him. Not satisfied with sending this letter, Mr. Wilkes published it: the government replied; angry pamphlets appeared daily; the excitement agitated the whole nation, and scarcely anything was talked of but the tyranny of the government, and the heroic patriotism of Mr. Wilkes.

When the parliament met, on the 15th of November, the king brought the subject before it. He sent a message to the Commons by the Chancellor, the meaning of which was, that as Wilkes was a member of their House, he expected them to punish him. The members examined the libel contained in the celebrated No. 45 of the North Briton, and, after a warm debate, passed a resolution declaring it to be a false, scandalous, and seditious libel; and as such they condemned it to be burnt by the common hangman. Mr. Wilkes declared this decision to be a violation of the privileges of parliament, and the House was adjourned to consider that point. On that occasion Mr. Pitt made one of his eloquent speeches, in which, though he condemned the conduct of Wilkes, he opposed the sentence of parliament on one of its own members as a surrender of its own rights. "To talk," said he, "against an abuse of privilege, was to talk against the constitution—against the very being and life of parliament. It was an arraignment of the justice and honour of parliament to suppose they would protect any criminal whatever. Whenever a complaint was made against any member, the House could give him up. This privilege has never been abused; it has been reposed in parliament for ages. But take away this privilege, and the whole parliament is laid at the mercy of the crown. Why is a privilege, which has never been abused, to be voted away? Parliament has no right to vote away its privileges. They are the inherent right of the succeeding members of this House, as well as of the present members; and I very much doubt whether a sacrifice made by this House is valid and conclusive against the claim of a future parliament."

As Mr. Grenville, the minister, had a majority in the House, the debate on privilege ended in nothing. In pursuance of the resolution previously passed, No. 45 of the North Briton was attempted to be burned by the common hangman; but a riot took place, the paper was rescued by the mob, and a jack-boot and a petticoat committed to the fire instead. A flaming piece of wood was even hurled at one of the sheriffs, which broke the glass of his carriage, and wounded him on the forehead. In consequence of this, the sheriff beat a hasty retreat: the hangman followed his example; the mob remained victors; and the intended disgrace ended in a sort of triumph. The victory of Wilkes over the minister (for so it was regarded) was made more evident by his obtaining a verdict, and £1,000 damages, against the Under-Secretary of State, for false imprisonment: Lord Chief Justice Pratt, on that occasion, honourably declaring that general warrants were unconstitutional, illegal, and void.

Before this affair was over, another event occurred which made Mr. Wilkes the talk of the town. Lord Sandwich—a dissolute nobleman, who had long been his companion—charged him, in the House of Lords, with being the author of an obscene poem, called An Essay on Woman, with notes, to which the impudent wit had appended the name of Dr. Warburton, the learned Bishop of Gloucester, as the author. This production was a disgusting affair; but it had never been published, and only fourteen copies printed at a private press in Mr. Wilkes' house. Lord Sandwich's conduct excited general indignation: he was then regarded as the betrayer of his friend; and it is now known that his lordship employed spies to watch Wilkes's movements, and report all his actions. But for him the vulgar poem of Mr. Wilkes would never have been heard of out of the circle of his private friends. When it became publicly known, no wonder that Dr. Warburton was furious at the use that had been made of his name; or that the peers generally were shocked at the indecent book produced, and voted that the author was guilty both of blasphemy and libel. Mr. Wilkes was accordingly summoned to appear before the bar of their lordships' house.

This he was unable to do, having been seriously wounded in a duel with a Mr. Martin, who had challenged him on account of having been abused in the North Briton. Though supported by the attachment of the people, Mr. Wilkes was alarmed at the indignation he had aroused, and, as soon as his health permitted, he fled to Paris. As he would not return when summoned by the House of Commons, on the 20th of January, 1764, he was expelled that House, outlawed, and found guilty of libel both on account of the North Briton and the Essay on Woman. The people at large, who are usually actuated by generous sentiments, still advocated his cause. They thought that so unrelenting a prosecution of Mr. Wilkes, for the bold expression of his opinion, and for the writing of a vulgar and foolish poem, was unjust and arbitrary. This sentiment they xpressed on every occasion; nor could even the king avoid hearing it. Having gone, one evening, to Drury ane Theatre, the play announced for the next night was All in the Wrong. The people in the galleries applauded vociferously, and then shouted—"Let us be ll in the right. Wilkes and liberty!"

CHAPTER XCV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE THIRD.—A.D. 1764—1784.

MR. GRENVILLE, the prime minister, having thrown England into excitement by his attacks on the liberty of the press, through Mr. Wilkes, turned his attention to the English colonies in America. He thought he could raise a large revenue by taxing the king's subjects in America, for the benefit of his subjects in England. In consequence of this, the memorable Stamp Act—by which stamp duties were to be levied upon the Americans—was passed into a law with very little opposition; for no one seems to have suspected the result it would lead to. An illness of the king at that time, of which no one could learn the exact nature, attracted much more attention. He was kept in deep seclusion, and many stories were told as to the cause of his malady; but the truth was carefully hidden. That truth was a startling one—his mind was affected; and the king was labouring under the first of those attacks of madness or idiocy by which he was several times afterwards afflicted, and which, in his old age, converted the sovereign of a great empire into a hopeless lunatic.

Before the king's illness, he gladly gave his assent to the American Stamp Act, and that impolitic measure became law on the 22nd of March, 1765. Mr. Grenville had, in the session of 1764, proposed and carried some small duties on various articles of American produce; and when news of the Stamp Act arrived in that continent, the excitement of the colonists rose to an absolute fury. The ships in the harbours hung their colours half-mast high, in token of deep mourning; the church bells were muffled, and tolled dismally; the offensive act was printed with a skull and cross-bones upon it, instead of the royal arms; it was cried about the streets with the title of "The folly of England and ruin of America:" and the people seemed resolved to run any risks rather than submit. In the House of Assembly at Virginia, Patrick Henry, a famous American patriot and orator, denounced the measure in the most vehement language. In one debate, he exclaimed —"Cæsar had his Brutus; Charles I. his Oliver Cromwell; and George III. ——;" at this critical moment he was interrupted by a cry of "Treason!" The orator paused a moment for reflection, and then added—"And George III. may profit by their example. If that be treason, make the most of it." Excited by the brilliant speeches of Henry, the assembly of Virginia declared that the first settlers in that country had brought with them all the privileges enjoyed by the people of England; that they had never forfeited or relinquished the right of being taxed by their own House of Assembly; and that every attempt to deprive them of that right was illegal, unconstitutional, and unjust, and had a tendency to destroy the independence of both Britain and America. Nor was the opposition of the Americans confined to mere words: formidable riots took place, and the Stamp Act was burnt in the streets, amidst the bitterest expressions of anger and contempt. When the stamps arrived in America, it was found impossible either to enforce their use or to save them from being destroyed.

On the reassembling of the English parliament, the king drew attention to the subject of the alarming outbreak in America. Mr. Grenville was no longer minister; and the Marquis of Rockingham, a nobleman of more liberal principles, supplied his place. Pitt advocated the cause of the Americans in a speech of great power: he denied the right of the British parliament to tax the colonies. In answer to Grenville, he exclaimed—"The gentleman tells us that America is obstinate—that America is almost in open rebellion. I rejoice that America has resisted. Three millions of people, so dead to all the feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves, would have been fit instruments to make slaves of all the rest." In conclusion, he proposed moderation towards America, and that the Stamp Act should be totally and immediately repealed. Several of the most enlightened and distinguished English statesmen spoke to the same effect: petitions also poured in from the mercantile classes, imploring the government to repeal the Stamp Act. The bill, therefore, in the session of 1766, was repealed; and the king, who had recovered from his mental malady, gave an unwilling assent to the withdrawal of this injustice.

The Rockingham ministry, though a good, was a very feeble one. Lord Rockinghan was dismissed, and the king, on the 7th of July, 1766, sent for Mr. Pitt, then the idol of the people, to form a new cabinet. The reat orator himself was raised to the House of Lords, as Earl of Chatham. He was declared prime minister, but refused to take any laborious office, and the privy seal was delivered to him. In this ministry many of the king's friends were provided for; and the other members of it were men altogether unacquainted with each other. By the acceptance of a peerage, Pitt had lost much of his popularity, and his ministry was scarcely stronger than the one which had preceded it.

The Earl of Chatham was very popular in America, for the people there learnt that he had been the advocate of their cause. Tranquillity was accordingly restored; but the Americans considered the repeal of the offensive Stamp Act rather as a confession of weakness on the part of the English government, than as a deed dictated by justice and gentleness. The assemblies of the various colonies sent thanks and addresses to the king; but a new feeling had arisen in the minds of the Americans—a feeling of alarm and jealousy, and perhaps a remote desire to emancipate themselves from a nation whose ruler seemed disposed to use his power for their oppression.

Unfortunately the dispute with America was soon to be renewed. Mr. Townshend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed, in the session of 1767, to extract a revenue from the Americans by imposing a duty on tea, paper, glass, colours, and other articles imported there. In spite of the late warning, the measure passed into a law. Lord Chatham, lately so eloquent in the cause of the American colonists, had retired into the country, and gave no opposition. He was suffering severely from gout, and from some affection of the nerves, which rendered him weak, hysterical, and unfit for business. For two years and a-half, although still nominally prime minister, he retired from public duties, lived in close seclusion, and was forgotten.

In the spring of 1768, the parliament which had sat for seven years was dissolved, and writs issued for the election of a new one, which met on the 10th of May in that year. In the meantime, Mr. Wilkes had ventured to return to England. He first wrote a humble letter to the king, supplicating his pardon; but George took no notice of the communication. Then, in spite of his outlawry, Mr. Wilkes offered himself as a candidate for the city. The people received him with tremendous enthusiasm, and the air rang with shouts of "Wilkes and liberty!" But the great majority of the people are not voters: the franchise, or right to vote for representatives in parliament, was a privilege then enjoyed chiefly by wealthy men; and Wilkes was rejected. Not discouraged, he offered himself for the county of Middlesex, and was elected by a great majority. A few days afterwards he entered the Court of King's Bench, and declared himself ready to submit to the laws of his country. He was committed to the King's Bench prison, to await his trial. Such was the sympathy expressed by the people for him, and so great were the crowds assembled round the prison on the day parliament assembled, that it was thought proper to station a body of soldiers near the building. This led to a riot; the military, in a very hasty manner, fired upon the people, and six unhappy persons were killed, and fourteen severely wounded. The Surrey magistrate and two of the soldiers were placed on their trial for murder, but acquitted. The people gave the name of "The Massacre of St. George's Fields" to this affray; but the king (at least the ministers in his name) expressed his approval of the conduct of the magistrate and soldiery, and bestowed a reward on the two acquitted soldiers who had run from their ranks, pursued, and shot an unfortunate young man who, it is said, was merely a quiet spectator. Riots broke out in various parts of London; general discontent prevailed; and crowds of sailors, watermen, coal-heavers, and mechanics, constantly assembled to complain of want and low wages.

Mr. Wilkes' outlawry was reversed because he had surrendered himself; but when his trial came on, in June, he was sentenced to pay a fine of £500, and to be imprisoned a year, for publishing No. 45 of the North Briton; and to pay another fine of £500, and be imprisoned another year, for writing the Essay on Woman. In addition to this, he was to find heavy security for his good behaviour for seven years.

The mass of the nation was still with Wilkes, and thought his sentence not only severe, but dictated more by private animosity than by public justice; and they honoured him as a patriotic defender of the public liberty. His moral character, of course, must be condemned; but his licentious gaiety was not the offence for which he was tried and punished. He had spoken his mind with blunt plainness about the king; he had ridiculed a learned but pompous and erratic bishop; and both king and bishop hated him bitterly in consequence. The gratification of private enemies by means of the public laws, ought to have been opposed, and Mr. Wilkes did oppose it bravely. Those who have condemned his licentious conduct the most bitterly, and sneered at his patriotism as a pretence, have still admitted that he did acceptable service in the cause of English freedom.

He was not quiet in his prison: he petitioned the House of Commons; and he published in the newspapers a bitter comment upon a letter of Lord Weymouth, one of the Secretaries of State, charging him and the other ministers with being the cause of the bloodshed that took place in St. George's Fields, and of nourishing a dark project, deliberately planned, against the lives and liberties of the people. This exaggerated language—not unnatural in an injured and angry man—was regarded as another libel, and, through the influence of ministers, he was expelled from the House of Commons.

On the 2nd of January, 1769, Wilkes was elected an alderman of the ward of Farringdon Without, in the city of London; and, though still a prisoner, he was re-elected by his late constituents. The Commons passed an arbitrary vote, to the effect—"That John Wilkes, Esq., having been, in this session of parliament, expelled this House, was and is incapable of being elected a member to serve in this present parliament." In consequence of this decision, Colonel Luttrel, who had only 296 votes, was declared elected instead of Mr. Wilkes, who had 1,143. This decision excited general condemnation and disgust, as an arbitrary violation of the rights of election. The following year (1770) he was released from prison, on giving bond for his good behaviour for seven years. On his reappearance there was a very general illumination throughout the kingdom. His bond, however, did not prevent him from displaying his usual spirit against illegal oppressions.

The arbitrary disposition of the ministry again exhibited itself by prosecuting Mr. Woodfall, the publisher of the Morning Advertiser, for printing some brilliant political letters bearing the signature of JUNIUS. These letters had appeared, occasionally, for some years, and caused great excitement by the force and elegance of their style, as well as by the violence of their attacks on individuals. The most famous of them was one which appeared on the 19th of December, 1769, addressed to the king himself. In it Junius spoke with great freedom of all the errors of the king's reign; treated his ministers with contempt and abhorrence; alluded to the fate of Charles I.; the expulsion of the Stuarts; and then concluded with these words—"The prince who imitates their conduct, should be warned by their example; and, while he plumes himself upon the security of his title to the crown, should remember that, as it was acquired by one revolution, it may be lost by another." As the author of the letters was unknown—for the name of Junius was an assumed one—the attorney-general had instructions to proceed against the publisher for libel. The trial took place in June, 1770; and the jury returned a verdict of "guilty of printing and publishing only," which was considered the same as an acquittal. The whole kingdom was in an alarming condition; George and his ministers (Lord North was then the head of the government) were equally disliked; and signs were to be discerned that resembled those of impending revolution. The king was said to be inveterately opposed to the principles of liberty which had raised his family to the English throne, and inclined to follow the example of the despotic House of Stuart; and certainly those on whom he principally conferred his regard were chiefly Jacobites and Tories.

The nation had for some time taken a greater interest in the proceedings of parliament than it used to do. Several newspapers, therefore, ventured to give reports of the debates of parliament—a circumstance which was then considered a breach of privilege. In the session of 1771, Colonel Onslow brought this matter before the notice of the House, and complained that the papers had given him the name of "Little Cocking George!" Two printers—Messrs. Thompson and Wheble—were accordingly summoned to the bar of the House for infringing its orders. As they took no notice of the summons, the sergeant-at-arms was directed to take them into custody. The printers kept out of the way; and the Commons then offered a reward of £50 for the apprehension of either of them. In consequence of this, Mr. Wheble was seized by another printer named Carpenter, and carried before Alderman Wilkes. That magistrate considered the arrest illegal, discharged Wheble, and bound him over to prosecute Carpenter for false imprisonment. Mr. Thompson, the other printer, was also carried before Alderman Oliver, who imitated the example of Alderman Wilkes, and discharged him. A messenger of the House of Commons, who entered the city to arrest another printer for having reported the debates of the House, was himself arrested for an assault, and sent by the Lord Mayor a prisoner to the Compter. Crosby, the Mayor, together with Aldermen Wilkes and Oliver, justified their bold conduct by stating, that no capture could be made in the city without the authority of its chief magistrate.

The Commons, in consequence of these proceedings, summoned the Lord Mayor before them. That functionary went to the House followed by an immense mob, cheering him all the way. Alderman Oliver rose in his place when called upon, defended his conduct, set the ministry at defiance, and denounced the mother of the king as the real sovereign of the country and the dishonour of England. Intense excitement took place; the House was surrounded by mobs; the ministers were hooted and threatened; and, in the end, the Lord Mayor and Alderman Oliver were committed to the Tower. Alderman Wilkes was also summoned to the House, but he treated the order with contempt: the ministers were afraid to proceed against him; and even the obstinate king exclaimed—"I will have nothing more to do with that devil Wilkes."

Many members of the House violently opposed sending the Lord Mayor and Alderman Oliver to the Tower; and those gentlemen were visited in their confinement by the most illustrious of the Whig nobility, and by many celebrated men. Amongst them was the famous Edmund Burke, the brilliant orator, who afterwards almost rivalled the fame of Lord Chatham, and was then rising rapidly into distinction. The captives remained in the Tower until the parliament was prorogued; but they were entertained there at the cost of the city. Amidst all this tumult, the printers who gave occasion to it were forgotten or taken no notice of. The affair was really a popular triumph; and from that time to the present, the debates of parliament have been regularly published in the newspapers.

The affairs of America must now be reverted to. The tea and import duties revived all the animosities of the colonists to the British government. Serious riots took place at Boston and Virginia; the military were called out; and the custom-house officers appointed to collect the tea duty were seized by the people, tarred, and feathered. Once roused, the Americans boldly denied the right of the English parliament to legislate for them in any matter whatever. Suspicions were entertained that the English king and government wished to rule them with a rod of iron, and to this they resolved not to submit. The first English ship with tea arrived in Boston harbour on the 28th of November, 1773. Others followed; but the landing of their cargoes was prohibited, and the captains were directed to take them back again to England. In consequence of their refusal, in the night of the 16th of December, an armed mob of American sailors and others, many of whom were disguised as wild Indians, boarded the ships, and threw all the chests of the taxed tea overboard. The property thus destroyed was of several thousands of pounds value; but what was of far more importance, that act of violent resistance to the English government was the actual beginning of the revolution—a revolution that severed England and her American colonies for ever, and rendered the latter a great and free republic.

The parliament assembled in the month of January, 1774. On the 27th, news of the destruction of the tea in Boston harbour reached England, and caused great excitement. The king was indignant at the conduct of the colonists; and, by the advice of Colonel Gage, just arrived from Boston, he resolved upon extreme measures. The colonel said to his majesty, "They will be lions while we are lambs; but if we take the resolute part, they will prove very meek."—The ministry sided with the king; and, to punish the Americans, three severe measures were passed. By the first the port of Boston was closed, and the trade of that city entirely stopped. By the second, part of the charter of the province of Massachusetts Bay was annulled; the power of self-government taken away from the people, and placed in the hands of the crown. By the third, it was enacted, that any person who committed murder in enforcing the laws and putting down riots, might, if a fair trial could not be had in the province, be sent to any other colony, or to Great Britain, to take his trial. These measures were not passed without a great deal of opposition; several distinguished English statesmen condemned them as unjust and tyrannical. One member of parliament said—"I sincerely hope the Americans will not admit of the execution of any of these destructive bills, but nobly refuse them all. If they do not, they are the most abject slaves upon earth, and nothing the minister can do is base enough for them." As it was expected the Americans would not pay any very ready submission, four regiments of soldiers were ordered to Boston, under General Gage, who was appointed commander-in-chief and governor of the province.

He arrived at Boston on the 13th of May, 1774. His arrival caused a great meeting to be held in the town, to take the act for closing the port and destroying the trade into consideration, when the following resolution was passed:—"That it is the opinion of this town, that if the other colonies come into a joint resolution to stop all importation from, and exportation to, Great Britain, till the act be repealed, the same will prove the salvation of North America and her liberties; and that the impolicy, injustice, inhumanity, and cruelty of the act exceed all our powers of expression: we therefore leave it to the just censure of others, and appeal to God and the world."

The port of Boston being closed, and the assembly of Massachusetts dissolved by General Gage, a number of patriotic American gentlemen met to oppose what they regarded as a deliberate plan for reducing the British colonies in North America to slavery. An attack on one colony, they said, was an attack on all, and would ruin them all, unless it was resisted by their united councils. They therefore formed a general congress, consisting of delegates from all the different provinces. Accordingly, on the 5th of September, 1774, the first American congress, composed of fifty-one gentlemen, representing the thirteen old provinces, met at Carpenter's Hall, in Philadelphia. This congress, which was a great means of effecting the revolution, resolved that the people of America should have no further commercial intercourse with Great Britain until the Boston Port Bill was repealed, and the charter of Massachusetts restored. In fact, a covenant was entered into by the colonists, not to import or consume any British goods, and to have no dealings with those who did import or consume them, until the English government removed the heavy restraints laid upon them. The congress also proposed several addresses: one to King George, stating their grievances, and blending professions of loyalty with a firm demand for the abolition of the obnoxious statutes, as the only means of preserving harmony between Great Britain and the colonies. Another was to the English people, apologising for the suspension of commerce, and assuring them that the attempt to enslave the Americans was only a prelude to the introduction of despotism at home. A third address was sent to the inhabitants of the colonies, explaining how they were all interested in the struggle carried on by the people of Boston. After these public acts, the congress adjourned until the following May.

The result of these resolutions was to spread throughout the American colonies a determination to resist the injustice of the English government. At Massachusetts Bay, which was considered the centre of American patriotism, a provincial congress was held, which took upon itself the duties of government, and resolved that a body of 12,000 men should be got under arms for the defence of the province. Fresh provocations followed, both on the side of the English and the Americans; and each prepared for an appeal to arms.

To show that the people of England were distinct from the government, and not opposed to the Americans, the city of London presented an address to the king, which expressed the strongest abhorrence of the measures adopted towards the Americans, justified their resistance, and desired his majesty to dismiss his ministers from his councils. George expressed great astonishment on receiving this petition, and replied, that he had perfect confidence in the wisdom of his ministers, and should steadily pursue the measures they had recommended.

Open hostilities between the English and the Americans began on the 19th of April, 1775, at Lexington. For some time the colonists had been collecting stores of arms, ammunition, and provisions, particularly at Concord, about twenty miles from Boston. To prevent an insurrection, General Gage sent a body of 800 troops, with directions to seize or destroy these stores. That the work might be done without resistance, the soldiers marched during the night. The Americans, however, were not to be taken by surprise; and between four and five in the morning, the troops met 150 of the Lexington militia, assembled near that town. A slight skirmish took place, in which a few men were killed; but the Americans, being greatly over-matched, thought it prudent to retire. The troops then proceeded to Concord, destroyed the stores they found there, and then began their return to Boston. During their retreat, the American militiamen, who were considerably reinforced, fired at them from the houses, from behind walls and trees, and harassed them in a fearful manner. The Americans were, most of them, expert marksmen with the rifle, and many of the English soldiers were shot without even seeing their enemies. There is reason to believe that this detachment of troops would have been entirely destroyed, had they not been succoured by a body of 900 men sent forward to support them. When they reached Boston, they had about 240 men killed or wounded. In this encounter, which has received the name of the battle of Lexington, the loss of the Americans was trifling. They had been shooting from behind trees, walls, and hedges, and the English had scarcely any chance of returning their fire.

The spirits of the Americans were wonderfully raised by this event; and those who, from doubt or timidity, had held back, now joined in the insurrection. The provincial congress of Massachusetts resolved that an army of 30,000 men should be instantly raised. The business of recruiting was accordingly begun; and, in a short time, an army of Americans, which far outnumbered the royal troops, assembled in the neighbourhood of Boston.

General Gage, having received reinforcements of troops from England, issued a proclamation, offering pardon to all (except two) who should lay down their arms; but declaring that any who did not accept the proffered mercy, or protected, assisted, supplied, concealed, or corresponded with such, were to be treated as rebels and traitors. This proclamation was met with defiance, and preparations for hostilities were continued on both sides. Near Boston is a considerable eminence, named Bunker's Hill, the possession of which was considered of immense advantage to either army. After some delay, General Gage talked of fortifying this hill; but while he was deliberating, the Americans put it out of his power by taking possession of it themselves. On the night of the 16th of June, a detachment of the American army ascended the hill in silence, and, before the morning, they had covered the top of it with military works. The astonished English general ordered his troops to advance and dislodge the Americans. The attempt was made; and the British soldiers, to the number of 3,000, advanced up the hill. With a coolness and resolution worthy of veterans, rather than of raw recruits, the Americans reserved their fire until the British were within a short distance of the muzzles of their guns. Then they opened such a terrific and incessant fire as mowed their enemies down like ripe wheat beneath the sickle of a sturdy husbandman. When the men in front had discharged their muskets, they were supplied with others, ready loaded by those behind them, and a deadly rain of bullets was thus kept up. The British line reeled back and gave way in several places; the men dropped dead in heaps, while others turned and fled. Rallied by the courage of some of their officers, they were again led to the attack; but a second time were they driven back by the deadly fire from the Americans. A third effort was more successful; and a charge was made on the Americans and their works with fixed bayonets. The powder of the latter began to fail, and some cannon had been brought to bear upon them from various points. The redoubt was attacked on three sides at once, and the Americans thought it wise to retreat. But they only retired to another spot, where they threw up fresh works to defend themselves. As the English gained Bunker's Hill, the victory was theirs, though the honour is claimed for the Americans, who had only about 1,500 men engaged whilst their opponents had 3,000. But it should be recollected that their defences placed the smaller number on more than equal terms with their assailants till the latter procured their cannon. From behind those defences the Americans were enabled to shoot down the English as they advanced, without any danger to themselves. The loss of the English, in killed and wounded, was 1,050.

The second American congress met a little before the battle of Bunker's Hill; and, as a last attempt to avoid further bloodshed, sent a petition to England to the king. It received no reply; and the colonists were thus driven forward on their career of resistance. As they now resolved to oppose force by force, it was requisite to proceed upon some definite plan. By common consent, they made the illustrious George Washington the general of their army, which then amounted to about 14,500 men. The choice was a singularly fortunate one: to remarkable abilities as a warrior, Washington added a character for integrity and patriotism, which the breath of slander has never dared to sully.

To avoid confusion in a period of history crowded with events both at home and abroad, we will briefly—and very briefly—follow out the course of the struggle between America and England down to its conclusion in the year 1783. A full account of this great revolution is rather the history of America than that of England.

A few months after the battle of Bunker's Hill, Montreal, in Canada, was taken by the Americans. The few British forces there, unable to stand their ground, embarked on board the shipping, in hopes of making their escape; but they were stopped by a superior force, and surrendered as prisoners of war. Eleven vessels, with their cargoes, consisting of ammunition, provisions, and military stores, also became the prize of the victors. The Americans then made an attack on Quebec, but there they were defeated on the 31st of December, 1775; about 100 being slain, and 300 taken prisoners. In this action the famous General Montgomery perished: he was esteemed on both sides;—by the Americans as a martyr to the cause of liberty; and by the English who approved of the military coercion of the colonists, as a misguided, good man, who fell a victim to what he believed to be the rights of his country.

The main British army was blockaded for some months in Boston by the Americans, under General Washington. General Howe had succeeded General Gage in the command; and his troops were not only rendered useless, but in danger of perishing from want. They were therefore compelled, in April, 1776, to evacuate Boston, and abandon that town to the triumphant Americans. The English army left behind it 250 pieces of cannon, four large mortars, 150 horses, 25,000 bushels of wheat, and other provisions, which fell into the hands of Washington. But the English took away with them about 2,000 Americans, who still remained loyal to King George—American Tories (as they were called), who no longer felt themselves safe from the anger of their revolutionary countrymen. Several vessels with military stores, which arrived from England and put into Boston harbour without knowing that it was abandoned by the British troops, were also taken by the Americans. The thanks of congress were given to General Washington for this triumph, and a gold medal was cast to commemorate it.

Thus encouraged, the American congress proceeded, on the 4th of July, 1776 (the anniversary of which day is always celebrated by the American people with public rejoicings, as the birthday of their national freedom), to issue their famous DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. The minds of the people had been for some time prepared for this natural result of the conflict, by pamphlets published for that purpose. One of these works, entitled Common Sense, produced an almost incredible effect: it was written by Thomas Paine, author of The Rights of Man, who afterwards acquired an unhappy notoriety by his attack on the Christian religion. Common Sense acquired Paine the admiration and gratitude of all the republican party in America; in other words, of the great majority of the people. Honours were heaped upon him, and the legislature of Pennsylvania voted him £500 as a reward.

The Declaration of Independence asserted that all men were made equal, and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights. That amongst them was the right of the people to alter or abolish any form of government when it no longer tended to secure the life, liberty, and happiness of the people. That the history of the King of Great Britain was a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having, in direct object, the establishment of an absolute tyranny over the colonial states. To prove this, it added a long list of the acts of tyranny and cruelty which the American patriots laid to the charge of King George; and then concluded with these words:—"We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in general congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain, is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do. And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour."

After this famous Declaration, by which the Americans had risen from the rank of colonists to that of a great and independent people, General Howe attempted to settle the dispute by negotiation. He would not, however, recognise the military rank of the American leader, but addressed his letter to "George Washington, Esq." In consequence of which, that officer, as might have been expected, declined to receive it, saying—"I would not, on any occasion, sacrifice essentials to punctilio; but, in this instance, I deem it a duty to my country and appointment to insist on that respect which, in any other than a public view, I would willingly have waived." The bearer of the letter to General Washington having observed, that the commissioners appointed to treat with the Americans were entrusted with great powers, and would be very happy to effect an accommodation, received for reply—"That from what appeared, their powers were only to grant pardon; and that they who had committed no fault, wanted no pardon."

As no arrangements could possibly be made while the English persisted in treating the Americans as rebels, the work of war was again resumed. In an engagement which took place at Flatbush, Long Island, the British troops were victorious. Upwards of 1,200 Americans were killed or wounded, and nearly 1,100 taken prisoners. Washington only saved his army from destruction by a well-conducted retreat. This misfortune was followed by others: the Americans experienced another defeat at the White Plains; Fort Washington, with a garrison of 3,000 men, surrendered; New York fell into the hands of the British; and the Americans seemed almost in despair. So dispirited were they, that Washington even courted an honourable death on the field; for that brave man would rather have perished than see his beloved country desolated by the vengeance of a mistaken, narrow-minded king. Flushed with success, the British general issued a proclamation, commanding "all persons assembled in arms against his majesty's government to disband, and all general or provincial congresses to desist from their treasonable actions, and to relinquish their usurped power." It also promised pardon to all who should submit, and sign a declaration, testifying their obedience to the king. Many accepted these terms, and gave up the struggle for independence; but a great body of the middle ranks of the American people still remained in arms, and would not resign their hopes of national freedom.

The British pursued their successes with remarkable vigour, and Washington and his army were compelled to retreat successively to Newark, to Brunswick, to Princetown, to Trenton, and to the Pennsylvanian side of the Delaware. So rapid was the pursuit, that the rear of one army, while breaking down bridges, was often within sight and shot of the van of the other building them up. To make the cause of the Americans still more desperate, those who had engaged as soldiers could claim their discharge, as a matter of right, in less than a week, and none were bold enough to come forward as recruits to supply their places. In this condition, Washington adopted the desperate resolve of recrossing the Delaware, and, by making a sudden attack upon the British, compel them to retire and abandon the pursuit. He timed this movement so well, that a body of 1,000 Hessians was surprised at Trenton, their leader and about thirty of them shot, and the rest taken prisoners. Their success raised the dejected spirits of the Americans; their old courage revived; and the army of patriots, which had dwindled to a very low ebb, began instantly to increase in numbers. The scale of fortune seemed to have turned; and, after the capture of the Hessians at Trenton, Washington nearly succeeded in an attempt to surprise the English camp at Princetown during the dead of night. Though he failed in entirely surprising the British, he took them unprepared, and defeated them in a fierce skirmish. The consternation into which the British were thrown, induced them to evacuate both Trenton and Princetown, and to retreat to New Brunswick.

When hostilities were recommenced, the Americans, on the 13th of September, 1777, experienced a defeat at Brandywine, a small stream which flows into Christmas Creek, near its conflux with the river Delaware. In this engagement 300 of them were killed, about 600 wounded, and 400 taken prisoners. The loss of the British, in killed and wounded, amounted to about 500. Amongst the wounded, on the side of the Americans, was a celebrated young French noble, the Marquis de la Fayette. Animated by a generous love of liberty, he had left his native country, and offered his sword to the cause of American freedom. He eventually distinguished himself in the great revolution which convulsed his own country. After the battle of Brandywine, the American congress was compelled to fly from Philadelphia, and the British troops entered it in triumph.

The American forts on the river Delaware, at Mud Island, and Red Bank, were also taken.

We pass over the many unimportant actions which led to no result, to record the surrender, in October, 1777, of General Burgoyne at Saratoga, with an English army amounting to 5,790 men, as prisoners to General Gates, an American officer. The humbled British were treated with great consideration, and allowed, after surrendering their arms, to embark and return to England, on condition of never again serving against the Americans. Amongst the military stores taken on this occasion, were thirty-five brass field-pieces. This disgrace was a great mortification to the English Tories; and on hearing it, Lord North, the minister, actually shed tears. For some time congress had issued letters of marque—that is, given permission to privateers to attack and capture British vessels laden with stores or reinforcements. This permission was soon extended to include all vessels bearing the English flag; and the American privateers committed numerous and startling depredations. So far did they extend their operations, and so bold had they become, that they insulted and plundered the coast of England and Ireland in a manner that had not been attempted for centuries. Amongst them was the famous Captain Paul Jones, who sailed across the Atlantic, made a descent upon Whitehaven, spiked the guns in the fort, and destroyed all the shipping in the harbour. He afterwards landed in Scotland, attacked the mansion of Lord Selkirk, and carried off his plate and furniture. Paul Jones was the hero of other daring adventures, an account of which forms a romantic episode to the history of the American war. The English vessels captured by the Transatlantic privateers, were allowed to be openly sold in the French and Dutch ports.

But France had long secretly encouraged the Americans to continue their struggle against England; and, after the surrender of General Burgoyne, when there seemed a chance of doing so with ultimate success, the French king publicly acknowledged the independence of America, entered into an alliance with the states, and received ambassadors from them.

In the following year (1778), Spain also joined the Americans against England; and before yet another year had expired, Holland also espoused the cause of the colonists; and it was found that the obstinacy of George and his ministers had exposed England to the hostilities of a powerful confederacy.

The support which the French king gave to the Americans, led to the declaration, on the part of England, of a war against France. The English government would then have given up the obnoxious tea duty, and repealed the other measures they had passed against the Americans. But the time for concession of that kind was gone for ever: the minds of the majority of the Americans were alienated from the government of the mother country; and their congress declined to treat with the English commissioners, unless the independence of the colonies was first acknowledged. The British commissioners, incensed at the rejection of their plan of conciliation, threatened to devastate and ruin the country; and the British army seconded these threats by many outrages. During the winter of 1777, parties of soldiers issued from Philadelphia, where they were quartered, and committed many acts of destruction.

The revolutionary war went wearily on; but, in despite of the assistance of a French fleet, the British now seemed to be in the ascendant. In the year 1778, the beautiful and prosperous settlement of Wyoming, consisting of eight townships, situated on the river Susquehannah, was destroyed, under circumstances of great barbarity, by a party of Americans who remained loyal to George III. They allied themselves to a tribe of ferocious Indians, and fell upon the unhappy district; 400 persons were massacred, numbers of them scalped, all valuable movables were carried off as plunder, and every house and cottage burnt to ashes. This year the French and the Americans were repulsed in an attempt to drive a British army from Rhole Island. In the south, also, the Americans experienced a defeat, and Savannah, the capital of Georgia, fell into the hands of the British.

In the year 1779, the misfortunes of the Americans still continued. Having fortified Charlestown, and sustained a siege in it, they were compelled to surrender it to the British, and about 5,000 Americans gave themselves up as prisoners of war. General Gates, also, was defeated at Camden by Lord Cornwallis, the victory being followed by some shameful severities. That nobleman obtained another victory over the Americans in 1781, at Guildford; but the British suffered so severely, that, though the honour of the contest remained with them, the advantage was chiefly on the other side. About 400 of the Americans perished; but the British loss was not only much greater, but included several of their distinguished officers. Though the Americans retreated, and Lord Cornwallis kept the field, the British interest in North Carolina was ruined.

After the battle of Guildford, Lord Cornwallis, not being in a condition to follow up his victory, retired with his troops to Virginia. The British had enjoyed their last triumph, and were soon surrounded and blockaded in York Town by the united arms of the French and Americans. After bravely protracting a hopeless struggle to the last, Lord Cornwallis and his troops, amounting to upwards of 7,000 men, surrendered to General Washington on the 16th of October, 1781. This loss on the part of the British was the closing scene of the war—a war as disastrous as any in which this country has ever been engaged.

The reverses which had been experienced during the American conflict, and the opinion which many Englishmen entertained, that it was an unjust war, had made it very unpopular. The House of Commons, therefore, went in a body to St. James's, and presented an address to the king, desiring that peace should be concluded. George, not willing to acknowledge that he was in the wrong—as he firmly believed he was only asserting his own rights and those of his people—gave a very evasive answer. The Commons then passed a resolution, that the House would consider as enemies to his majesty and the country, all who should advise or attempt the prosecution of offensive hostilities in North America. Shortly afterwards, Lord North resigned, and the administration which had plunged England into the war was at an end. The struggle not only deprived England of her colonies, but added upwards of £100,000,000 of money to her national debt, and wasted the lives of about 50,000 of her subjects. France and Spain were also tired of the war; for, though the French had rendered great service to America, they had reaped nothing but loss themselves; while the Spaniards had experienced a total defeat in a vain attempt to recover Gibraltar. All parties were therefore desirous of peace, which was concluded in 1783: and, after a struggle of eight years' duration, the United States of America were acknowledged to be FREE and INDEPENDENT.—Although the English government had learnt, by a painful experience, that the conquest of America was impossible, yet it was with extreme reluctance that the obstinate king was prevailed upon to consent to recognise its national freedom. He would sooner have gone on impoverishing England, for the purpose of desolating America, than frankly acknowledge that his measures were unjust.

After the British forces had abandoned New York, General Washington resigned his command into the hands of congress, and took an affecting leave of his officers. He was afterwards elected the first president of America, which dignified position he filled with wisdom and moderation for a period of eight years. His death took place on the 14th of December, 1799; and it is generally admitted, that though there have been far greater soldiers and greater statesmen than George Washington, yet that the whole range of history does not present a character on which posterity can dwell with such entire and unmixed admiration. Shortly after the peace, Mr. John Adams arrived at St. James's, as ambassador from the United States. The king received him with affability, though not without agitation; and, in the course of his remarks, observed—"I was the last man in the kingdom, Sir, to consent to the independence of America; but now it is granted, I shall be the last man in the world to sanction a violation of it."

During the eight years occupied by the American war of independence, the attention of England was chiefly engaged by that subject. King, parliament, and people—all seem to have been engrossed by the great struggle on the other side of the broad Atlantic, and few events of much historical interest took place at home.

Late in the year 1776, great excitement prevailed on account of the discovery of a supposed conspiracy to set fire to Portsmouth dockyard, and to burn the warehouses and shipping at Bristol. On the 7th of December, a fire broke out in the rope-house of the dockyard at Portsmouth, which was, however, soon extinguished, and it was believed to be the result of accident. Soon afterwards, a machine and some combustible materials were discovered beneath the hemp, and a suspicion arose that the fire had been the work of an incendiary. This suspicion was increased by fires breaking out at other places, particularly at Bristol, where six or seven houses on the quay were consumed, and the neighbouring shipping had a narrow escape. It was instantly rumoured that the Americans had hired incendiaries to spread fire and devastation throughout the country; and a sullen, wandering man, called John the Painter, was arrested on suspicion. On his examination, nothing appeared to criminate him; but still the charge was so serious a one, that he was committed to prison. An unworthy stratagem was then employed to entrap him into a confession of guilt. Another travelling painter, named Baldwin, who, like the prisoner, had been in America, was placed in the same ward with him—pretended a sympathy for him, wormed himself into his confidence, and in a short time extorted such particulars as were supposed would lead to his conviction. According to this Baldwin, the real name of John the Painter was James Aitkin. He was a native of Edinburgh, and had led a wild, wandering life—sometimes working at his trade, and at others living by theft. Either to gratify a roving disposition, or to escape the penalty of his crimes, he had gone to America, where he formed the idea of serving the cause of independence by returning to England and burning its shipping and principal trading towns and cities. He added, that he had been encouraged to this wicked work by Silas Deane, one of the American agents at Paris.

On the evidence of the spy Baldwin, who had procured these confessions in so treacherous a way, John the Painter was placed on his trial, and condemned to death. He defended himself with considerable ability, and contended that no reliance could be placed on the testimony of such a man as Baldwin. His judges, however, expressed their conviction of his guilt, and he was hanged at Portsmouth dock-gate, on a gallows sixty feet high, and then suspended in chains.—Shortly after this event (on the 27th of June, 1777), that accomplished but dissipated clergyman, the Rev. Dr. William Dodd, was hanged for the forgery of Lord Chesterfield's name to a bond. Dr. Dodd's fate excited a great sensation, and the most strenuous efforts were made to procure a mitigation of his sentence. He was a man of great ability; and, amongst other works, had published a Commentary on the Bible, and a book entitled The Frequency of Capital Punishments inconsistent with Justice, Sound Policy, and Religion. He died very penitently, much regretting the scandal his sad example had brought upon his sacred profession.

In the spring of 1778, England experienced the loss of her greatest orator. Lord Chatham died almost in the performance of his senatorial duties. On the 8th of April, the Duke of Richmond moved for an address to the king on the state of the nation. In his speech on this occasion, the duke expressed his strong conviction of the necessity of an immediate recognition of American independence. Lord Chatham, who had bitterly condemned the proceedings against America, and had eloquently applauded that country for its resistance to England, was yet averse to its separation from the mother country. He wished to see it ruled justly and wisely, but did not desire it to be independent of Great Britain. Though he had long been suffering severe illness, yet he entered the House of Lords that night to oppose the motion of the Duke of Richmond. His appearance was that of a dying man; and he was so emaciated, that little of his face but his aquiline nose, and the still fiery glance of his eyes, was to be seen between the curls of his great wig. Wrapped in flannels, and supported on his crutches, he was led to his seat by two friends. In this state he rose to make his last speech. The lords listened with the most profound attention; but the oratorical triumphs of Chatham had passed for ever. For some time he was scarcely audible, then he hesitated, and occasionally lost the thread of his discourse. Having protested against the Duke of Richmond's motion, he sat down, and that nobleman replied. On the conclusion of the duke's speech, Chatham rose again in a fit of impatient irritability: he seemed as if labouring to utter some great thought; but his emotions were too powerful for his weakened frame: he pressed his hand to his bosom, and sank down in a convulsive fit.

Several noblemen caught him in their arms; the debate broke up, and the dying orator was carried into an adjoining apartment. The following day he was conveyed to his mansion at Hayes, where he lingered for more than a month, and expired on the 11th of May, 1778, in the seventieth year of his age. This distinguished statesman and orator—always regarded as the Demosthenes of England—professed himself a Whig in principle, and was called "the man of the people;" but his political conduct was, in reality, independent of any party. In public his manners were cold, haughty, and irritable, and he was extremely impatient of contradiction; but in his own family he was gentle and kindly. His actions were marked by promptitude, sagacity, and an overpowering energy; and it has been truly observed, that he was neither stained by any vice nor sullied by any meanness. Parliament voted him a public funeral, and erected a statue over his grave in Westminster Abbey. His debts, also, were paid by the nation; and an annuity of £4,000 a year settled upon those of his heirs on whom the earldom of Chatham should descend.

Before this distinguished man had departed from the political arena, the famous Edmund Burke was rising into distinction as an orator and advocate of liberty. Early in 1780, he brought forward in parliament a plan of economical reform. This scheme was comprehended in five different bills, all of which had for their object the doing away with unnecessary offices, the limitation of pensions, and the reduction of public expenses. Mr. Burke's eloquence, in advocating these reforms, was much admired; but the Tory influence of the ministry was so powerful as to cause them to be rejected.

Though the ministry was strong enough to crush any project of reform, it could not silence the complaints of a justly discontented people. Forty petitions, signed by an immense number of persons, were placed upon the table of the House of Commons; and, on the 9th of April, 1780, Mr. Dunning, a member of that assembly, brought forward a bold and startling resolution, which, he said, embodied the sense of them. It was, "That the influence of the crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished." This resolution, though almost revolutionary in its character, was felt to be so deserved and so necessary, that, in spite of the entreaties of the minister, it was carried by 233 votes against 215. Other resolutions were passed, of a nature calculated to startle the king and introduce a reform in the government. For a time, the principles of liberty seemed to possess new life; but the success of the opposition received a serious check through the illness of the Speaker, who was esteemed one of its most powerful advocates.

A wild outbreak of fanatical ignorance, which occurred soon afterwards, caused the subject of reform to be for a time forgotten. In 1778, a bill was passed to relieve Roman Catholics from the severe penal laws which had been enacted against them. This was extremely just; because the papists were no longer politically formidable, and no rational fears could be entertained that this form of religion would ever again have the mastery in Great Britain. The following year it was determined to extend the benefits of this law to the Catholics of Scotland. So fierce an outbreak of Protestant violence was the result in that country, that the measure was obliged to be abandoned, in order to provide for the safety of the Catholics.

This illiberal feeling soon extended to England. A violent society for the destruction of popery had been established in Edinburgh, and eighty-five corresponding Christian societies (as they were called) were started in England. The president of them was Lord George Gordon, a young nobleman, whose strange eccentricities bordered upon insanity. He was a member of the House of Commons, where he had attracted notice by his slovenly dress, his strangeness of behaviour, and the talent displayed in his occasional attacks on the ministry. Lord George issued an address to the people of London, urging them to demand the repeal of the law in favour of the Catholics; and by his exertions, and those of the Protestant Association, a violent excitement was produced amongst the lowest of the people, and a petition to parliament got up, with no less than 120,000 signatures or marks; for an immense number of those intolerant men and women could not sign their names.

Lord George Gordon, who was constantly making inflammatory addresses to the people, told them that he would not present the petition to parliament unless as many as 20,000 men would meet in St. George's Fields, and follow him with it to the House of Commons. On the appointed day—the 2nd of June, 1780—upwards of 60,000 persons assembled; and, after listening to an exciting speech from his lordship, whose zeal for the Protestant religion was nearly allied to insanity, they formed themselves into four divisions, and marched, with him at their head, through the city to the Houses of Parliament; all the streets and avenues leading to which were blocked up by them. As the Lords and members of the House of Commons presented themselves, the mob compelled them to put on blue cockades, and join in their uproarious shouts of "No popery!" Some of the bishops and nobles were treated in an insulting and violent manner; one bishop having his gown torn from his back, and others being severely hustled.

Entering the House of Commons, Lord George moved that the petition should be brought in and immediately considered. As the building was then surrounded by an immense mob of rioters, shouting, "Repeal the bill! no popery! Lord George Gordon!" to have considered the petition at once, would have been to yield to vulgar intimidation. The members, therefore, very properly resolved to put off the consideration of it for four days. During the debate which preceded this determination, Lord George frequently went into the lobby and addressed the mob. He encouraged them to persevere, as terror would force the king and his ministers to grant their petition; and told them that the people of Scotland had no redress until they had pulled down the popish chapels.

This wicked hint was not lost upon that brawling, ignorant multitude; and as they returned to their homes, they demolished and set fire to the chapels of the Bavarian and Sardinian ambassadors. The military were ordered out; but they came too late; the mischief was done, and the rabble dispersed. The following day (Saturday) passed quietly; but the excitement was only lulled, not subdued; and, on Sunday, the rioters assembled in vast numbers in Moorfields, where they destroyed a chapel and several houses belonging to the Catholics. On Monday they continued their violence, and, amongst other outrages, demolished the house and costly furniture of Sir George Saville, because that liberal-minded gentleman had moved the repeal of the penal laws against the Catholics.

As Tuesday was the day appointed by the Commons for taking the petition into consideration, the House was again surrounded by an enormous yelling and dirty mob, which insulted and severely injured several members. To give their attention to business under such circumstances was impossible; and after passing some resolutions expressive of their determination not to be driven to any decision by brute force, the members adjourned. By this time the mob had been joined by all the highwaymen, thieves, and ruffians of the metropolis. With a natural sympathy for their imprisoned companions, these wretches attacked Newgate. After many ineffectual attempts to force the iron-bound gates, they succeeded in setting the building on fire. The cries of the prisoners within, at the prospect of being suffocated or burnt to death in their cells, were fearful. Some of the mob, however, rushed in, armed with sledge-hammers and pickaxes, and, by a wonderful activity, succeeded in saving them all. More than 300 felons were let loose upon society, four of whom were under sentence of death, and would have been executed on the following Thursday. In a few hours nothing was left of Newgate except some bare, blackened stone walls, which were too strong to yield to the effects of fire. The new prison at Clerkenwell shared the same fate: many private houses, also, were given to the flames; and at midnight, the house and noble library of Lord Mansfield, the eloquent and venerable Lord Chief Justice, were destroyed. The books, pictures, and costly furniture were burnt by the barbarians; and they drank his wines until many of them, from drunkenness and excitement, became like raving madmen. The authorities had been slow to interfere; but the military were now brought into action, the mob fired upon, and many drunken ruffians were sent to their graves amid the din of musketry, the screams of the wounded, and the wild, hoarse roar of vengeance from the thousands of voices. Few eyes were closed in London that night; and people sat up in terror, wondering how this strange outbreak of bigotry would end.

All these scenes were outdone on the day and night of Wednesday. Business was at an end; the shops remained closed; and people chalked the words "No popery" on their doors, to save themselves from the fury of the rioters. Some poor foreign Jews in Houndsditch chalked up the ludicrous announcement—"This house is a true Protestant;" while an Italian clown, living in London, wrote on his door, "No religion." Men, armed with iron railings, paraded the streets, shouting, "No popery!" and robbing every decent passenger. One gigantic fellow, on horseback, refused to accept anything but gold. All the prisons in London were burnt, except the Compter in the Poultry, which seemed to have been forgotten. The Bank was attacked, but the mob was twice repulsed by the military; and written papers were circulated, naming the Mansion-house, the Tower, the Exchange, and the British Museum, as places to be destroyed. As night drew on, the premises of Mr. Langdale, a Catholic distiller in Holborn, were broken open and everything destroyed, except the enormous stock of spirits, which was brought out in pailfuls, and drank by the lowest of the rioters until many of them dropped dead from intoxication. The building was afterwards set on fire; the flames from the ignited spirits rose up into the air like the eruption of a volcano; and numbers of human brutes, too drunk to move, were burnt or crushed to death beneath the smouldering ruins. At one period during this night of terror, no less than six-and-thirty fires were blazing in different parts of London at once; and had it not been for the great serenity of the air, the whole metropolis might have been destroyed and left a ruined monument of this diabolical instance of fanaticism.

As no magistrates were to be found bold enough to read the Riot Act, the king had issued a proclamation authorising the military to disperse the mob without that formality. An immense body of military and militia was called into action, and the sound of musketry was heard in several directions. Some of the rabble had obtained arms, and returned the fire of the troops; but the sight of their dead or dying companions cooled their courage. The mob, however, did not disperse until noon on the following day. Two hundred and ten rioters had been killed by the military, and 248 wounded. Besides this, a large number died afterwards in the hospitals, and many were doubtless carried away, dead or wounded, by their friends. A young chimney-sweep, who was shot, had as many as forty guineas in his pockets.—But this was not the only retribution which descended on these ignorant fanatics. Many of the rioters had been arrested, and, soon afterwards, the law began its work of vengeance. Fifty-nine were sentenced to death; and of these unhappy wretches twenty were hanged, and the rest transported for life. When the terrible events which extended from the 2nd to the 9th of June are considered, these sentences cannot, in reason, be considered too severe; yet the ultra-Protestants raised an outcry against them, and compared Wedderburn, the Chief Justice, to Jeffreys. Lord George Gordon, the chief cause of all these sad events, was arrested, and placed on his trial for high treason. As his offence did not seem to answer that description, he was acquitted. He ought to have been confined as a dangerous madman; and he afterwards gave proof of the unsoundness of his mind, by renouncing the Christian religion and turning Jew. He passed the last year of his life in Newgate, where he had been committed for a series of libels.—As this frightful riot began without any just cause, so it failed in its avowed object; for the Commons very justly decided, that the act in favour of the Roman Catholics should not be repealed, because the grievances said to arise from it were purely imaginary.

The year 1783 was distinguished by a complicated political transaction. The famous Charles James Fox (son of that Henry Fox who had been created Lord Holland), after having been for many years in bitter opposition to the Tory Lord North, entered into an unexpected coalition with that statesman; and they succeeded in displacing the ministry, and forcing themselves upon the king as his advisers. They received the seals of office on the 2nd of April; but their triumph had but a short duration. A bill which Mr. Fox brought forward, for regulating the affairs of the East India Company, was so obnoxious to the king, that he sent a message to Earl Temple, desiring him to inform the House of Lords, that whoever voted for the India Bill, was not only not his friend, but would be considered by him as his enemy. The bill was therefore rejected by the Lords; and a strange contest began between the king and the House of Commons, in which, as usual, the majority acted according to the direction of the ministers.

A war between the prerogatives of the king and the privileges of parliament had led Charles I. to the scaffold, and driven James II. into banishment. On those occasions, however, the parliament was backed by the people; but now the people, considering Mr. Fox had abandoned his principles, held the ministry in contempt, and sided with the king. George's mind, though almost imbecile in youth, had been strengthened in manhood by his constant attention to the business of the state; and he acted on this occasion with a resolution which won for him a popularity that never afterwards altogether left him. He sent a message to the Secretaries of State, demanding the seals of their several departments, and directing that they should be delivered to him by the under-secretaries, as a personal interview would be disagreeable. A few days afterwards, on the 19th of December, the famous William Pitt, the second son of the Earl of Chatham, although only in his twenty-fourth year, assumed the elevated station of prime minister—a position he retained for the protracted period of seventeen years.

CHAPTER XCVI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE THIRD.—A.D. 1784—1795.

R. PITT was supported by the favour of the king; but the majority of the House of Commons was decidedly against him. Under such circumstances it was impossible to carry on the business of the state; and either a new parliament or a new ministry was indispensable. The king chose the former course; and, in the new parliament, the young premier had such a number of supporters as enabled him to carry out his measures. The early part of his ministerial career was tolerably tranquil, and he was disposed to pursue such a line of policy as would, no doubt, have met the approbation of his illustrious father. One of his first measures was intended to effect a reform in the mode of electing parliaments; which, however, he abandoned, in consequence of the opposition it met with from his great rival, Mr. Fox and his party. Another liberal measure that Mr. Pitt brought forward was more fortunate, and passed into a law: it was an act for restoring the estates of such Scottish nobles and gentlemen as had been forfeited in consequence of the part they had taken in the rebellion in favour of the young Pretender, in 1745. Though Mr. Pitt had advocated reform in the English parliament, yet, when the people of Ireland demanded a reform in their parliamentary representation, he not only set his face against it, but ordered a state prosecution of the sheriff who had presided at one of the meetings held to forward that object. Mr. Pitt, who was very expert at figures, also brought forward a plan which, he said, would have the effect of magic in reducing the national debt. This was his famous sinking-fund—a complicated scheme for discharging the debt by means of compound interest. It excited great admiration at the time; but its claim to extraordinary merit or usefulness is now altogether disproved. This scheme was not Pitt's own invention, but resulted from the calculations of Dr. Price, a famous mathematician and dissenting minister.

On the 2nd of August, 1786, an event occurred which exhibited the king in an amiable character. While alighting from his carriage at the entrance of St. James's Palace, a petition was presented to him by a decently-dressed woman. As George extended his hand to receive it, she aimed a blow at his breast with a knife she had concealed about her. The blade, being thin in the middle, bent, and the king stepped back without receiving any injury. The woman was about to repeat the blow, when one of the yeomen caught her arm, and the weapon was wrenched from her grasp. Not discomposed by this sudden attack, George exclaimed, "I am not hurt; take care of the poor woman—do not hurt her!" On being examined before the privy council, it appeared that she was a common needlewoman; that her name was Margaret Nicholson; and that she was insane. On being asked where she lived, she replied, "That she had been all abroad since that matter of the crown broke out." Being questioned as to what she meant, the poor creature answered, "That the crown was her's, and that if she had not her right, England would be deluged in blood for a thousand generations." When interrogated as to the nature of her right, she rejoined, "That her rights were a mystery." The idea of any legal proceedings against her were very properly abandoned, and she was sent to Bedlam, where she passed the remainder of her life.

That year (1786) was also made memorable by Mr. Burke's impeachment, in the House of Commons, of the celebrated Warren Hastings, governor-general of India, of high crimes and misdemeanors; for misconduct in his government; and especially for his treatment of the native princes and population of Hindostan. Mr. Hastings appeared before the bar of the House, and delivered a defence of himself against Mr. Burke's charges; but the vote for the impeachment was carried by a considerable majority. The trial did not take place until the year 1788: it will be as well here to mention the result. It was opened on the 13th of February in that year, in Westminster Hall, which was fitted up for the occasion with great magnificence, and crowded with the chief genius, beauty, and fashion of the age.

Mr. Burke was the first of the public prosecutors who addressed that august assembly, and his preliminary speech occupied their attention for four days—the court sitting about four hours each day. Burke's oration was filled with invective and exaggeration, and contained much brilliant description that had little or nothing to do with the case. His friends considered it a specimen of eloquence worthy of the illustrious Roman orator Cicero; but a great part of the public condemned it as injudicious, extravagant, and bombastic. The first charge was opened by Mr. Fox, and lasted for several days. A second charge was opened by Mr. Sheridan, whose speech extended over two days, and who, at its conclusion, fell exhausted into the arms of Burke. Sheridan's speech was considered one of the most brilliant and powerful oratorical efforts ever delivered by English lips. Such was the excitement to listen to him, that it is said as much as fifty guineas was paid for a sitting. Only two charges had been heard, and there were twenty to be gone into, when the trial was interrupted by the prorogation of parliament. When it was resumed, all this ardour had cooled, and it dragged its slow length along during a period of nearly eight years, when it ended with the acquittal of Mr. Hastings. It is difficult to pronounce an opinion upon the conduct of this gentleman: that he fulfilled his duties as governor with great decision and severity, there is no doubt; but he was placed in circumstances singularly trying—circumstances which, perhaps, could not be treated according to the ordinary rules of mercy and morality. As governor-general of India he displayed immense talent; but he was indifferent as to the means by which he accomplished any highly desirable object. There is no doubt, however, that, but for him, India would have been lost to England. Though acquitted, he was sentenced to pay the costs of his prosecution, which amounted to £71,080. The East India Company settled upon him a pension of £4,000 per annum for his life; which he spent in the pursuit of elegant literature, at his estate in Worcestershire; and died tranquilly in the year 1818, in the eighty-sixth year of his age.

To return to the year 1787. The king's eldest son George, Prince of Wales, was a young man of extravagant habits and dissipated character. A coldness existed between him and the king; because, as the father gave his favour almost entirely to the Tories, the great Whig statesmen rallied round the son. Fox and Sheridan were his companions, and from them he doubtless acquired much of that gentlemanly vivacity that afterwards distinguished him; but he also imbibed, from the same source, that love of licentiousness and dissipation which led him into his greatest faults. The yearly income settled upon the prince, since his majority, was £50,000; but still he had contrived to get enormously in debt. The king refused to increase his allowance, and the Whigs took up his case. Alderman Newnham gave notice that he would bring forward a motion for an address to the king, praying him to take the situation of the prince into consideration, and to grant him such relief as he in his wisdom should think fit, and pledging the House to make good the same.

In answer to this, Mr. Pitt said, that if the motion were persevered in, he should be driven to the disclosure of circumstances which he should otherwise have thought it his duty to conceal. Mr. Rolle, a member of the House, also declared, "That the investigation of the question involved in it circumstances which tended immediately to affect the constitution in church and state." These allusions referred to a reported marriage between the prince and Mrs. Fitzherbert, a very attractive lady, but a member of the Roman Catholic church. The prince, though a general admirer, loved this lady passionately: it was then universally believed that he had privately married her; and it is now known that he had; although, under the circumstances, the union was not binding in law. Yet, when the matter was brought before parliament, Mr. Fox was directed by the prince most solemnly to declare that no marriage had taken place. The rumour had filled the king and queen with alarm, and contributed to the refusal of the former to augment the income of his son. The king was deceived by this direct falsehood, and, at his desire, an interview took place between the prince and Mr. Pitt, in which it was arranged that the former was to have £10,000 a year added to his income; £20,000 to complete the repairs at Carlton House; and £181,000 for the payment of his debts!

The king had been for some time unwell; and in the autumn of 1788, he was afflicted by another attack of mental derangement. Great pains were taken to conceal his malady; and, to deceive the public, he was permitted to go to Windsor without restraint. While there, he mounted his horse and rode wildly about the forest and surrounding country, until, meeting with his second son, the Duke of York, he burst into tears, and said, "He hoped he should die, for he was going to be mad!" By night he was in a state of raving insanity, and suffering also from a severe attack of bilious fever.

Great excitement prevailed, and many debates took place in parliament about the appointment of a regent until the recovery or death of the sovereign. The affliction of George gained him the pity of the people: they contrasted his quiet, sober life with the wildness and excesses of his eldest son; his popularity rose greatly, and he was commonly spoken of as "the good old king." When his recovery was announced, there was great rejoicing, and a day of public thanksgiving was appointed. George went in solemn procession to St. Paul's, to offer to the Almighty his grateful devotions. He was much affected by the enthusiasm of the people and grandeur of the scene; and, as the peal of organs and the voices of choristers died into silence, he exclaimed, "I now feel that I have been ill!"

The remainder of the year 1789 passed away in England without producing any remarkable transaction; but it was memorable on the continent by the outbreak of that terrific convulsion, the great FRENCH REVOLUTION. A long course of tyranny and evil government had brought France to a condition of despairing wretchedness, difficult to be described, and impossible to be exaggerated. Government after the old evil fashion had become an impossibility, and the crimes of generations of bad kings and ministers had to be remedied. Louis XVI., the monarch then upon the throne, was a simple, amiable man; but extremely weak-minded, and utterly unfit for the tumultuous era in which he was placed. Had he been a man of decision, and possessed of a genius for ruling, that dark revolution would have ended very differently: as it was, his vacillation turned a necessary purification of the land into the most hideous convulsions that ever racked a nation and appalled the world. Still, with its fearful catalogue of horrors—with its tempests of popular fury, its reign of terror, its revolting massacres, its almost endless executions—it was, in spite of what timid or ill-informed people may think to the contrary, a blessing to the civilised world;—an example of the result of despotism so awful, that tyrants will ever turn pale at the bare remembrance of it.

An assembly of the States-General having been summoned in France, it assumed, on the 17th of June, 1789, the name of the National Assembly. The undecided king (leaning sometimes to the cause of his people, but far more often to the abuses of royalty) surrounded Paris with troops, and dismissed his only minister who possessed the confidence of the people. This led to violent commotions: the soldiers refused to act against their fellow-countrymen; the Bastille—a hideous state prison, whose mysterious dungeons had been a terror for ages—was, on the 14th of July, attacked and taken, the governor put to death by the mob, and the revolution was baptised in blood.

These events, as may naturally be supposed, excited great attention in England; the king and his political friends throughout the country, viewed them with alarm and indignation; but liberal politicians regarded them with feelings of pleasurable hope. In the House of Commons, Mr. Burke pronounced a bitter and intemperate condemnation of the revolution, and the principles that led to it. He was answered by Mr. Fox and Mr. Sheridan. The latter gentleman said that he was as ready as Mr. Burke to detest the cruelties that had been committed: but he inquired, "What was the striking lesson, the awful moral, that these outrages taught? A deeper abhorrence of that system of despotic government which had so deformed and corrupted human nature; of a species of government that trampled upon the property, the liberty, and lives of its subjects—that dealt in extortions, dungeons, and torture; and that prepared beforehand a day of sanguinary vengeance, when the irritated populace should possess themselves of power. The people, unhappily misguided, as they doubtless were, in particular instances, had, however, acted rightly in their great object. They had placed the supreme authority of the community in those hands by which alone it could be justly exercised, and had reduced their sovereign to the rank which properly belonged to kings—that of administrator of the laws established by the free consent of the community."

On the 4th of November, 1789, an association in London, known by the name of the Revolution Society (the members of which met once a year to celebrate the landing of William III.), gave a public dinner in honour of the old revolution in England and the new revolution in France. About 800 gentlemen, many of them of the highest rank, sat down to dinner, which was preceded by a sermon, delivered at a chapel in the Old Jewry, on "The Love of our Country." Dr. Price, the venerable preacher, who was an aged enthusiast in the cause of liberty and the brotherhood of man, concluded his discourse in the following eloquent strain:—"What an eventful period is this! I am thankful that I have lived to see it; and I could almost say, 'Lord! now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.' I have lived to see a diffusion of knowledge which has undermined superstition and error. I have lived to see the rights of men better understood than ever, and nations panting for liberty which seemed to have lost the idea of it. I have lived to see 30,000,000 of people indignantly and resolutely spurning at slavery, and demanding liberty with an irresistible voice; their king led in triumph, and an arbitrary monarch surrendering himself to his subjects. After sharing in the benefits of one revolution, I have been spared to be a witness to two revolutions, both glorious; and now methinks I see the ardour for liberty catching and spreading, and a general amendment beginning in human affairs;—the dominion of kings changed for the dominion of laws, and the dominion of priests giving way to the dominion of reason and conscience. Be encouraged, all ye friends of freedom, and writers in its defence! The times are auspicious. Your labours have not been in vain. Behold kingdoms—admonished by you—starting from sleep, breaking their fetters, and claiming justice from their oppressors! Behold the light you have struck out—after setting America free—reflected to France, and there kindled into a blaze that lays despotism in ashes, and warms and illuminates Europe!"

Inspired by this discourse—well calculated to aid the cause of revolution, which it is now known the French rebels were endeavouring, by their agents, to excite in every other European kingdom, England included—the Revolution Society presented an address to the National Assembly of France, congratulating that body on the revolution that was then in progress there. The assembly returned a grateful reply; but Mr. Burke, in the House of Commons, denounced the revolution; and described the actors in it as "an irrational, unprincipled, proscribing, confiscating, plundering, ferocious, bloody, tyrannical democracy." Shortly afterwards, he published his celebrated book, Reflections on the French Revolution, a work to which he was excited by the sermon of Dr. Price. In this book Whig principles were asserted, in opposition to the demoralising doctrines of the day; and it had a great effect in producing that division of the Whig party into Old and New Whigs, which took place about this time. The former followed in the course pointed out by Burke; the latter, headed by Fox, were disposed to support everything in the way of change, and everybody who was inclined to substitute new forms of government for the old ones which had so long prevailed.

Though Burke's book delighted the Tories and Old Whigs, it produced a feeling of alarm among the new section of the latter; and also amongst those who are always to be found, in every age and nation, opposed to all good government. Many replies were written to it. The most notorious of these was The Rights of Man, by Thomas Paine, a work penned in a bold and attractive style; and 50,000 copies of it were sold in a very short time. As Paine bitterly attacked the principles of the British constitution, the government instituted legal proceedings against him, which made his book sell faster than ever, and his principles become more widely known. Mr. Paine, however, contrived to escape to France, where he was elected a member of the National Convention.

In 1790, that celebrated assembly passed a resolution, that the French nation renounced for ever all idea of conquest, and confined itself entirely to defensive war. It also passed a decree abolishing all hereditary titles, orders, armorial bearings, and other marks of the distinction of ranks in society. On the 14th of July, the anniversary of the taking of the Bastille was celebrated on the Champ de Mars. It was called a general confederation, and was held for the purpose of a national administration of an oath of fidelity to the new constitution. The king attended, and took the oath amidst the applauses of his people; about 600,000 of whom are said to have been present.

The second anniversary of the fall of the Bastille, on the 14th of June, 1791, was celebrated, by the so-called "friends of liberty" in England, by public dinners, and other rejoicings, which were opposed by Mr. Pitt and the increasing Tory party, who got up counter-manifestations; represented even the name of reform as detestable; and shouted, from one end of the land to the other, for "Church and King!" This opposition of feeling led to a disgraceful riot at Birmingham. A tavern, where a number of gentlemen dined in honour of the anniversary, was attacked by a mob, which, after shouting "Church and King!" broke the windows, rushed into the house, and compelled the reformers to seek for safety in flight. They then destroyed and set fire to two dissenting chapels in the town; broke into the house of Dr. Priestley, the famous chemist and Unitarian minister, destroyed his philosophical apparatus, books, and manuscripts, and left his house in flames. Not satisfied with these proceedings, as disgraceful as those of the French revolutionists, the rioters continued, for four successive days, to burn the houses of other reformers who resided in and near the town; nor was order restored until the military were called out, and several lives lost. The end was, that seventeen of the parties who thus outraged law, and injured the cause they professed to support, were arrested, and four of them hanged.

This cry in favour of Toryism did not damp the efforts of the New Whigs. A demand was made for parliamentary reform, and a society, called "The Friends of the People," which included thirty members of parliament, and many other eminent characters, was instituted for obtaining it. Other societies were established, of which the most famous was the "London Corresponding Society," which recommended reformation through the means of universal suffrage and annual parliaments.

When, on the 30th of April, 1792, a motion for parliamentary reform was brought forward in the Commons by Mr. Charles (afterwards Earl) Grey, it was opposed by Mr. Pitt, who expressed his belief, that all moderate men would say it "was not a time to make hazardous experiments." A heated debate took place, Mr. Fox supporting Mr. Grey; but the great majority of both Houses was against them. On the 21st of May, a royal proclamation was issued against seditious writings. This drew down upon the minister severe reprehensions from the members of the "Revolution" and "Corresponding" Societies, who unjustly described him as one "who promised everything, but performed nothing; who never kept his word with the public; who studied all the arts of captivating popularity, without even intending to deserve it; and who, from the first step of his political life, was a complete public apostate."

In 1791, the French monarch excited suspicions of his sincerity towards his people, by attempting, together with his family, to fly from the kingdom—as many of his nobles and friends had done before him. The royal party left Paris on the 20th of June, and were stopped, the next day, on the frontiers, and brought back as prisoners. Louis defended himself on the ground of the danger and insults to which he and the queen were exposed from the mob; but as his flight was said to have been concerted with the enemies of France (who were preparing means to crush the revolution), he utterly lost the confidence of the people. Louis continued, by evasive conduct, to fall in their estimation; and the following year, Petion, the Mayor of Paris, appeared at the bar of the National Convention, and demanded that the king should be deposed. On the 10th of August, the royal palace was attacked, nearly the whole of the Swiss guards massacred, and Louis and his family fled for refuge to the National Assembly. They were sent to a prison called the Temple; and, under pretence of preventing the enemies of the country from taking advantage of the absence of the army, imprisonments and massacres of the most revolting description took place throughout Paris. During the 2nd and 3rd of September, upwards of 1,000 state prisoners were brutally murdered. Amongst them was the unhappy Princess De Lamballe, whose bleeding head was stuck upon a pike, paraded through the streets of Paris, and afterwards held up before the window of the queen, because she had been a great favourite of that unhappy lady.

It was then proclaimed that royalty was abolished, and France made a republic. Although the person of the king had been declared inviolable, yet, on the 11th of December, 1792, he was brought to the bar and placed on his trial, on the charge of tyranny and treason towards the nation. Such was the furious and frenzied state of the people, that he could scarcely have entertained any hope of escape. He defended himself with great calmness and judgment; but was found guilty by a small majority, and condemned to death!

The unhappy monarch, who had been subjected to many cruel insults during his confinement, was led to the guillotine on the morning of the 21st of January, 1793. He suffered with singular manliness and tranquillity. Having ascended the steps leading to the instrument of death with a firm tread, he began to address the vast crowd that had assembled to see him perish. "Frenchmen," he exclaimed, "I die innocent; it is from the scaffold, and when about to appear before my God, that I tell you so. I pardon my enemies; I pray that France——." Here he was interrupted by one of the officers, who cried, "Tambours! Executioners, do your duty!" Instantly the voice of the wretched king was drowned by the sound of drums, and six executioners dragged him towards the guillotine. "I die innocent," he repeated: "I ever desired the good of my people." Then submitting to the executioners, he placed his neck across the machine, the spring was touched, the heavy axe descended, and in one second Louis XVI. was a corpse. Sampson, the principal executioner, took up the bleeding head, and carrying it thrice round the scaffold, shouted, "Vive la République!" The dense crowd that swayed backwards and forwards like a vast sea of life, responded with hoarse cries of "Vive la Nation! Vive la Liberté!" This unhappy victim of the sins of his ancestors and of the frenzy of his people, was only in his thirty-ninth year. His body was placed in a deep grave, without shroud or coffin, and the pit was then partly filled up with quicklime. Such was the burial of the sixty-sixth sovereign of France.

His queen, Marie Antoinette, who was far more obnoxious to the people than poor Louis, soon shared his fate. She was charged with various offences;—with being guilty of many plots against the revolution; with entertaining an implacable and savage hatred to the French people; with corresponding with the enemies of France; and with a crime too shocking to mention, and which every one believes to have been an infamous calumny upon her. She was sentenced to the guillotine, and perished by that instrument on the 16th of October, 1793, in the thirty-eighth year of her age. She suffered with resignation, and almost with indifference. Indeed, so awful were the shocks to which she had been subjected, and so great the cruelty of her treatment, that death must have been welcome to her. She left two children; a daughter who survived the horrors that then afflicted France, and a son, a delicate boy, who, though by a mockery of etiquette regarded as Louis XVII., was apprenticed to a brutal shoemaker, and died two years afterwards of grief or ill-treatment.

To add to the distractions of France, the republican party was now divided against itself. The moderate reformers were called Girondists, while the most violent obtained the name of Jacobins; and the place where they sat in the convention was called the Mountain. The Jacobins having succeeded in enlisting the sympathy of the people, twenty-two of the most distinguished and moderate members of the convention were arrested as enemies of the nation, and sent to the scaffold. Mr. Pitt, the English minister, who had done all he could to arrest the progress of the revolution, and to prevent the introduction of its destructive principles into England, was denounced as the enemy of the whole world, and one whom every man had a right to assassinate. Such was the strange excited state of the French people, that, in their hatred of the Catholic priests, who mostly took part with royalty, and were all suspected of being traitors to the republic, they absolutely proceeded to the mad extreme of solemnly suppressing the Christian religion in France. Death was declared to be annihilation; and over the graves were placed such inscriptions as, "Death is sleep," or "Death is an eternal sleep." A new calendar was also invented, which was to date from the "First year of Liberty, or first year of the Republic." By it the year was divided into four equal seasons, and twelve equal months of thirty days each. This arrangement left five odd days in the year, which were to be celebrated as festivals, under the name of Sansculottides. The first of these days was to be consecrated to Genius; the second to Industry; the third to Noble Actions; the fourth to Rewards; and the fifth to Free Opinion. The months were to be divided into three parts, consisting of ten days each, and called décades. The Christian Sunday was to be altogether abolished, and every tenth day was to be held as a day of rest instead. Such were the excesses of some of those who had risen to notoriety during this period of revolutionary ideas!

The execution of the French king startled George III., and spread alarm amongst all classes in England, except the New Whigs, and the followers of Paine, now called "Jacobins," from their prototypes in France.—In November, 1792, the National Convention, established at Paris in the previous September, had issued a decree, in which it offered "fraternity and assistance" to the disaffected under all monarchical governments. As no explanation or disavowal of this decree could be obtained, the English government thought it necessary to increase its army and navy; but any intention to interfere with the internal concerns of France was distinctly disclaimed.—After the execution of the king, of course the relations between the two governments were not improved; and, on the 31st of December, the French Minister of Marine addressed a letter "to the friends of liberty in the seaports," in which he accused the king and his parliament of intending to make war against France; and promised the English republicans to fly to their succour, to make a descent on the island, and plant there 50,000 caps of liberty. Hostile acts were also committed; and at length, on the 1st of February, 1793, the convention declared war. This was announced to the two Houses, by a message from the king, on the 11th of February: and it was soon followed by a declaration of war by this country.

The shocking outrages in France strengthened Mr. Pitt, who was able to carry triumphantly many measures for the prosecution of the war against the French republic, and for putting down any revolutionary feelings that were shown in England. Many booksellers were sentenced to imprisonment for selling copies of Paine's Rights of Man; the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended; and prosecutions commenced against the most active members of the Corresponding Society, the Society for Constitutional Information, and other political clubs, who were charged with being guilty of treasonable and seditious practices. Amongst those who were punished, were Mr. Thomas Muir, a young Scotch advocate, who was sentenced to transportation for fourteen years, chiefly for urging his acquaintances to read Paine's Rights of Man! Mr. Palmer was sentenced to seven years' transportation, for having written an intemperate Address to the People, from the Society of Friends of Liberty at Dundee. Mr. William Skirving (secretary of a Scotch political club called the Edinburgh Convention), and two other gentlemen, Maurice Margarot and Joseph Gerald, delegates to it from the London Corresponding Society, were each transported for fourteen years. Making every allowance for the natural alarm of both king and minister at what was passing in France, still these sentences must be regarded as excessively severe, and savoured strongly of a despotic government.

In the May of 1794, Mr. Hardy, secretary of the Corresponding Society, together with Horne Tooke, a distinguished writer, Mr. John Thelwall, a political lecturer, and other gentlemen, members of political societies, were arrested, and sent to the Tower on a charge of high treason. Mr. Hardy was first placed on his trial before a judge of an unusually severe temper. He was charged with nine overt acts of high treason; and the attorney-general (afterwards Lord Eldon) opened the proceedings in a speech which occupied nine hours. Mr. Hardy had published some imprudent and very inflammatory addresses, but no crime approaching to treason could be proved against him; and, after a trial of eight days, he was acquitted, to the great joy of a large portion of the people, who thought the government was acting in a tyrannical manner. Mr. Tooke's trial came next; and that gentleman summoned Pitt himself as a witness, subjected him to a severe questioning, and endeavoured to prove that the objects of the Corresponding Society were the same as those of the meetings for reform which Pitt had himself promoted and attended in the year 1782, though pursued by different means. Mr. Tooke, together with Mr. Thelwall and the rest of the prisoners, were acquitted, and the other prosecutions were abandoned.—It is said that Mr. Thelwall, many years afterwards, did not hesitate to acknowledge that the designs of the disaffected, at the period in question, were dangerous to the peace and security of the state; and he regretted that he had been connected with them.

In 1794, Maximilian Robespierre, a man of singular talents, ambition, and ferocity, obtained such an influence over the people of France as to win from them the name of the "Incorruptible," and the position of dictator. The period during which he swayed the destinies of that distracted country, has very appropriately been called "The Reign of Terror." Fear or jealousy prompted him to send his political associates—men who, like himself, were violent republicans—to the scaffold in batches. Such was the extent of his crafty cruelty, that the guillotine was incessantly at work, the gutters of Paris flowed with blood, and that city became as one vast slaughter-house. Robespierre accused those whom he had destroyed of atheism, and then proceeded to establish a new form of religion. In pursuance of this idea, he celebrated, in person, a rite which he had the profanity to call "The Feast of the Supreme Being." But the rule of this bad man was of short duration; his cruel tyranny and mysterious denunciations alarmed many who were intimately connected with him: a conspiracy was formed against him; and, after a vain attempt at suicide, he was tried, condemned, and guillotined, amidst the execrations of the people, on the 28th of July, 1794. The wild excitement which prevailed in France seemed, however, to increase the military spirit of the nation. The French evinced almost irresistible energy against foreign foes; and in the Netherlands, in Spain, Germany, and Italy, they achieved wonderful victories.—On the 7th of September, in the previous year (1793), they had defeated the Duke of York while marching upon Dunkirk; but his royal highness defeated Pichegru on the 10th of May, 1794; and, on the 1st of June, the French fleet was defeated by the English, under Earl Howe, off Toulon. In this battle, while one French ship was sinking, the English sailors exerted themselves to save her crew; affording a great contrast to the conduct of the National Convention, which body, on the 26th of May, had, on the motion of Barère, decreed that "No Englishman or Hanoverian should be made prisoner." On the 17th of June, Corsica was captured by Commodore Nelson; and the people of that island acknowledged George III. as their king.

The spirit and successes of the French induced most of the European sovereigns to withdraw from the alliance they had entered into against that country, and to recognise the form of government which its people had chosen for themselves. But the English minister thought the resources of the enemy were rapidly decaying, and that no established government could derive benefit from negotiations; and when parliament met, on the 30th of December, 1794, he asked, and obtained, large supplies to carry on the war. To make up the amount, a long array of new taxes was laid on, and a general spirit of discontent prevailed. The London Corresponding Society held several public meetings to take advantage of this feeling; and one of them, in Copenhagen Fields, was attended by about 50,000 people. When the king went to open parliament, on the 29th of October, 1795, he was hooted and groaned at, and some missile (supposed to be a bullet from an air-gun) broke one of the windows of his carriage. The mob also rent the air with cries of "Peace! bread! no Pitt! no war!" On entering the House, George exclaimed, excitedly, to the Chancellor, "My lord, I have been shot at!" It was not without the assistance of a body of the life-guards that the king made his way back to the palace, through the dense mob which hooted him all the way, and damaged the royal carriage considerably by the stones they threw at it. Since the time of Charles I., no English sovereign had ever met with so violent an expression of the disapprobation of his people; but the lesson was lost upon King George.

A reward of £1,000 was offered for the conviction of any person concerned in this outrage upon his majesty, but without effect. Mr. Pitt also procured two bills to be passed, which were condemned as gross violations of English liberty. One professed to provide for the safety of the king's person and government against treasonable practices; and the other, to prevent seditious meetings. What they really did, was to bring many small offences under the head of treason, and to throw difficulties in the way of those Englishmen who wished to assemble to petition against any grievance. Fortunately, they were limited to three years' duration.

On the 8th of April, 1795, the Prince of Wales, though already privately married to Mrs. Fitzherbert, publicly married his cousin, the Princess Caroline, daughter of the Duke of Brunswick and the Duchess Augusta of England. This union led to sad results for the princess; and it was generally believed that the prince did not marry in consequence of any affection he felt for her, but because, by so doing, parliament again paid his immense debts, and raised his income to the sum of £125,000 a year.

CHAPTER XCVII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE THIRD.—A.D. 1795—1806.

IN France another new form of government had been established. The legislative power of the state was placed in the hands of the members of two councils, one called the Council of Five Hundred, and the other the Council of Elders. These deliberated as to what should be done; and five persons, called the "Directory," were appointed to execute their decrees. That wonderful soldier and statesman, NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, now began his extraordinary career. He was appointed to the command of the French army in Italy. In the course of five days he gained three great victories over the armies of Austria and Sardinia. Shortly afterwards he compelled the kings of Sardinia and Naples to sue for peace, overran Lombardy, drove the remains of the Austrian armies into the Venetian States, and laid siege to Mantua.

The cry throughout England for peace with France was increased, in 1796, by a failure of the wheat harvest; and Lord Malmesbury was sent to Paris to treat for a cessation of the war. He arrived on the 22nd of October, and left on the 21st of December, after a fruitless negotiation. His lordship was instructed to demand, as a sine qua non, that the independence of the Netherlands should be preserved; but the Directory maintained that the banks of the Rhine formed the natural limits of France. It was therefore resolved to continue the war, and enormous sums were added to the national debt for that purpose. But England was no longer the attacking party. The successes of the French had rendered them very formidable, and a general feeling of alarm prevailed that they intended to invade England. An attempt, also, was made to land troops in Ireland, to encourage that country to shake off the yoke of the English; but it was defeated by a storm. The general triumph of French arms induced the people of Corsica to rise in insurrection. The British, therefore, on the 22nd of October, retired from the island.

The policy of George and his favourite minister, opposed as it was by the Fox and Jacobin parties, threatened to produce national convulsions. Though they were averted, some alarming results took place. The enormous increase of the national debt, and the fear of a French invasion, produced a run upon the Bank of England. To prevent a national bankruptcy, on the 25th of February, 1797, the government issued an order to the Bank not to pay in cash until parliament had considered some means of supporting public credit. That establishment was released from its difficulties by a bill authorising it to issue notes, in payments, instead of gold. This panic was followed by alarming mutinies in the navy. No doubt they were induced partly by the general discontent; but the sailors, besides being ill-paid and badly fed, had, in many cases, been treated in an oppressive manner by their officers. The first mutiny, at Portsmouth, was put down by the government yielding to the demands of the sailors. The second mutiny, which took place at the Nore, was of a revolutionary character: captains of vessels were deprived of their command; and Richard Parker, a seaman of some education and talent, was elected as "President of the Floating Republic." Divisions, however, arose among the mutineers; most of the men returned to their duty; and Parker, with some other of the leaders, was hanged. Ireland, also, was on the verge of rebellion; and societies, under the name of the United Irishmen, for the sake of throwing off the English rule, were regularly organised throughout the country. Two events only occurred to raise the spirits of the country during this gloomy year; both of which were naval victories; one was gained over the Spaniards off Cape St. Vincent, on the 14th of February, by Sir John Jervis; and the other over the Dutch by Admiral Duncan, on the 11th of October, off Camperdown. In the month of July, England lost one of her celebrated orators and statesmen—Edmund Burke, who expired in his sixty-eighth year.

In 1798, the expected rebellion broke out in Ireland, the details of which belong to the history of that country. Although, on the information of a spy, fourteen leaders in the intended revolution were arrested, yet the Irish resolved on an appeal to arms, and the 23rd of May was appointed for a universal rising of the people. This call was not generally obeyed; but encounters between the rebels and the military took place at Wicklow, Kildare, Connaught, and other places. Though they obtained some trifling successes, the Irish were generally defeated with frightful slaughter; and when, after a struggle of seven weeks, the rebellion was suppressed, it was calculated that during it no less than 30,000 Irish had perished. The French had landed 1,800 men to assist the insurgents, but they were compelled to surrender to Lord Cornwallis; and at length peace was, to some degree, restored.

On the 1st of August, that famous naval hero, Horatio Nelson, followed the French fleet that conveyed Bonaparte to Egypt, and the celebrated battle of the Nile took place, in which, out of thirteen French ships of war, only two escaped; of the others, nine surrendered and two were destroyed. Nelson had fourteen ships; but the French fleet was superior in point of power, and moored in such a situation as would, it was supposed, enable it to bid defiance to double its force. Nelson was severely wounded during the conflict; and the loss of the British, in killed and wounded, amounted to 895: of the French, besides a great number in wounded, 5,225 perished. "Victory," said Nelson, "is not a name strong enough for such a scene." In England it was celebrated by public rejoicings, and the naval hero was rewarded with a peerage and a pension. Bonaparte was placed in great peril by the destruction of his fleet; but his extraordinary genius triumphed over so great a misfortune. Although cut off from all communication with Europe, he contrived to provide for his army; took Alexandria and Cairo, and eventually got back to France. There, in 1799, the form of government was again altered; the Directory was deposed, and the executive power placed in the hands of Bonaparte, the Abbé Sieyès, and Roger Ducos, who received the title of consuls.

In 1799, Mr. Pitt brought forward, and carried, a bill imposing a new tax upon all persons who had an income of £60 a year and upwards. If a man's income exceeded £200 a year, he was to pay a tenth part of it; if it was between £100 and £200, he was to pay a smaller sum; and if his income was only between £60 and £100, the tax was to be further reduced. This oppressive measure was called the Income-Tax, and it has, unfortunately, been revived in the present day.

Abroad a new confederacy, consisting of Austria, Russia, Naples, and Turkey, was formed against France. The English minister attempted a diversion in favour of those allies, by sending an army, under the command of the Duke of York, to attack the French in Holland. After several unsuccessful engagements, the English were compelled to purchase permission to retreat unmolested, by a promise that 6,000 French prisoners in England should be set at liberty. Mr. Pitt also commenced a war in the East Indies against Tippoo Saib, in consequence of his connection with that nation. Tippoo, after being twice defeated, fell back upon his capital, Seringapatam, which, being carried by storm, on the 4th of May, 1799, he perished; and his vast treasures, together with the chief part of his territories, fell into the hands of the victors. At the fall of Seringapatam, the late Duke of Wellington, then but a colonel in the army, won his first military laurels.

Napoleon Bonaparte, now first consul of France, and possessing almost absolute power in that country, on the 25th of December, 1799, wrote the following letter to the king:—"Called, by the wishes of the French nation, to occupy the first magistracy of the republic, I think it proper, on entering into office, to make a direct communication of it to your majesty. The war, which has for eight years ravaged the four quarters of the world, must it be eternal? Are there no means of coming to an understanding? How can the two most enlightened nations of Europe, powerful and strong beyond what their safety and independence require, sacrifice to vain ideas of grandeur, commerce, posterity, and peace? How is it that they do not feel that peace is of the first importance, as well as the highest glory? These sentiments cannot be foreign to the heart of your majesty, who reigns over a free nation with the sole view of rendering it happy."

Lord Grenville, then the foreign secretary of England, replied to this letter. He referred to the repeated changes in the French government, and to fresh aggressions following solemn treaties in consequence, which prevented any reliance on the mere renewal of general professions of pacific dispositions. The most natural pledge of reality and permanence would be a restoration of the ancient line of princes: "nevertheless, his majesty made no claim to prescribe to France what should be the form of her government." But, as there was "no sufficient evidence of the principles on which the new government would be directed—no reasonable ground by which to judge of its stability—a just and defensive war" must, for the present, be maintained.

In 1800, great distress was felt in England from the failure of the harvests and the scarcity of bread. This distress produced riots in London and other places; and an act was passed prohibiting the sale of bread that had not been baked four-and-twenty hours, because it was thought that people would eat a much smaller quantity of stale bread than of new. On the 15th of May, the king's life was twice endangered. In the morning, while attending the field exercises of the grenadier battalion of the guards in Hyde Park, a bullet from one of the muskets of the soldiers wounded a gentleman who stood within eight yards of his majesty. Whether the shot was fired by accident or design, did not appear. In the evening his majesty went to Drury Lane Theatre, when a pistol was fired at him by a person in the pit, named Hatfield. On examination, the man, who was once a soldier and been severely wounded in the head, turned out to be insane; and, after undergoing a trial for high treason, he was sent to Bedlam, where he finished his days.

But the great event of 1800 was the union of Ireland with Great Britain. It had been discussed in both parliaments the preceding year: and, in the Irish parliament, it was carried by a majority of only one vote, notwithstanding a profuse distribution of English money. The necessary bills being passed, the Act of Union received the royal assent on the 2nd of July. The Irish parliament was extinguished; and the Irish people were, in future, to be represented in the English parliament by four prelates and twenty-eight peers in the House of Lords, and by 100 members in the House of Commons.—On the 1st of January, 1801, a proclamation announced the royal title to be, "King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland:" from that time the sovereign of these islands ceased to be styled King of France.

On the 11th of February, Mr. Pitt resigned his office. To induce the Irish to consent to a union of their country with Great Britain, he had held out hopes to the Roman Catholics that they should be emancipated from the legal fetters that bound them; that is, that they should have the same privileges as Protestants, and be eligible to hold public offices and to sit in parliament. Pitt also proposed to grant the same privileges to dissenters. These promises the king refused to ratify; declaring that he should reckon any man his personal enemy who proposed such a measure. Mr. Pitt wrote to the king, desiring him to consent to Catholic emancipation, or accept his resignation. George did the latter, at the same time expressing his cordial affection for Mr. Pitt, and his high opinion of his talents and integrity. He was, however, so agitated by the loss of a minister so well calculated to carry out his ideas of government, and by a fear of the Catholics, that it brought on a brief attack of his insanity. Pitt was succeeded as prime minister by Mr. Addington, then Speaker of the House of Commons.

The war on the continent was ended; France was triumphant; and Napoleon had leisure to turn his victorious arms solely against the English. He threatened to invade our sea-girt island; large bodies of troops were collected on the northern coasts of France; ships and flat-bottomed boats were built and equipped; the ports of France, Belgium, and Holland were crowded with armed vessels; and the deeds of the victorious soldiers of the republic were vaunted in consular proclamations and manifestoes. But, in reality. both France and England were tired of the war: the former had prevailed on land, and the latter at sea; and, in spite of these preparations, and the alarm they created, secret arrangements for peace were being carried on between the two countries. After some months of negotiation, preliminaries of peace were signed at London on the 1st of October, 1801, and the peace itself was concluded at Amiens on the 27th of March in the following year. This long revolutionary war, after having doubled our national debt, and drained almost the life-blood of England, left the French triumphant, and the affairs of the continent in very much the same condition as that in which it found them. The peace was celebrated in London with public rejoicings, and Mr. Pitt described it as glorious and honourable. Mr. Sheridan said, more correctly, that it was a peace of which every one was glad, but no one proud.

Soon after the peace of Amiens, Napoleon Bonaparte was created first consul for life, with power to appoint his successor. This made him an hereditary sovereign in everything but the name. Possessed of regal power, he became himself a brilliant military despot. Extreme republicans were treated with great severity; the press was fettered, and a secret police organised. Fresh disputes broke out between France and England; and it was evident that the war would soon be renewed.

During the October of 1802, a conspiracy was discovered, the object of which was the death of the king and the overthrow of the government. The means, however, by which these traitorous designs were to be executed, were so ridiculously insufficient for so great a purpose, as to raise a doubt as to the sanity of those concerned in them. The conspirators were Colonel Marcus Despard and twenty-nine labouring men and soldiers, who were all arrested at a public-house at Lambeth. Early in the following year, Despard was placed on his trial, and, although Lord Nelson and other gentlemen of rank appeared and spoke highly in his favour, he was found guilty. Notwithstanding an urgent recommendation to mercy, Despard and six of his followers suffered the punishment of death, as awarded in cases of treason. During July, 1803, a fresh insurrection broke out in Ireland: it was a wild and senseless affair, and, after the commission of several murders, ended in confusion. Some of the leaders were executed, and among them was the talented enthusiast, Robert Emmett, whose melancholy fate has been lamented in the melodies of the poet Moore.

Bonaparte still laboured to promote the aggrandisement of France—a matter which excited the jealousy of the English ministry; and after much angry discussion and correspondence, war was once more declared between the two nations in May, 1803. Again Bonaparte threw the English into excitement by a threat of invasion. Before war had been actually declared, two English frigates had captured two French merchant vessels; Bonaparte, therefore, retaliated by arresting all English persons in France, and treating them as prisoners of war. The year 1803 closed with military triumphs in India. The French interest there was annihilated, chiefly by the genius of Major-General Wellesley, who obtained the victories of Assaye, Delhi, Laswaree, and other successes. The result was, the acquisition of an enormous Indian territory by the British.

In 1804, an unsuccessful attempt was made to destroy the French flotilla at Boulogne, by means of newly invented fire-ships, or rather great combustible floating coffins, called "catamarans." The French admiral, Linois, was repulsed by an English fleet of merchant ships; and, late in the year, four Spanish ships, richly laden from South America, were captured, although no war yet existed. In consequence of this outrage, the King of Spain declared war against England in the month of December.—In France, Napoleon had ascended the highest pinnacle of power. Addresses were got up all over that country, entreating him "to accept the crown of Charlemagne." The ambitious soldier and statesman willingly complied, and, on the 18th of May, he was crowned in the church of Nôtre-Dame, at Paris, as Emperor of France. He had, before this, restored the Roman Catholic religion; and the ceremony of coronation was performed by the pope himself.

Mr. Addington, being unequal to the difficult post of prime minister, was compelled to resign, and Mr. Pitt again took office. As England was once more at war, he could carry out his previous policy with regard to France; and he abandoned the question of Catholic emancipation, probably intending to bring it forward in the event of the king's death. That event he was destined never to see; for his own constitution was fast yielding to the effects of disease and anxiety. His disorder was much accelerated by the disgrace of his intimate friend, Lord Melville, who was convicted of a misappropriation of large sums of the public money.

The year 1805 was made memorable to England by the victory of Trafalgar, and the death of the naval hero, Lord Nelson. The French fleet, having ventured out to sea, was joined at Cadiz by a Spanish fleet, making together thirty-three sail-of-the-line and seven frigates. The English fleet, under Nelson, which had been sent out to meet them, consisted of twenty-seven sail-of-the-line and four frigates. On Monday, the 21st of October, the rival fleets came in sight of each other at daybreak, off Cape Trafalgar. The last signal that Nelson commanded to be telegraphed through the fleet, before going into action, has become a proverbial saying amongst us: it was the memorable sentence, "ENGLAND EXPECTS EVERY MAN TO DO HIS DUTY!" The conflict began about twelve o'clock, and continued to rage for four hours with tremendous fury. Then many of the enemy bore away to Cadiz: some were destroyed, others taken; and the naval power of France and Spain was almost annihilated. But before the day was won, the brave Nelson had received his death-wound. He had entertained a presentiment that, though his country would triumph in that wild scene of slaughter, yet he would perish. The mysterious presage was but too true. While walking on the quarter-deck of his ship the Victory, he was struck with a musket-ball, which entered his left shoulder, and lodged in the spine. He instantly fell, exclaiming to a captain near him, "They have done for me at last, Hardy!"—I hope not," was the reply. "Yes!" answered the hero, smitten in the hour of triumph, "my back bone is shot through." He was removed to the cockpit, and expired after more than three hours of suffering. His last words were, "Thank God, I have done my duty!" His remains were brought to England, and honoured with a magnificent public funeral in St. Paul's. Admiral Villeneuve, the unfortunate French commander, committed suicide in a remarkable manner, to avoid the disgrace of a court-martial.—The destruction of Bonaparte's fleet at Trafalgar put an end to his scheme for the invasion of England; as, without an immense navy, such a design was no longer practicable.

Though Napoleon had experienced defeat at sea, he had acquired a brilliant triumph by land. On the 2nd of December he defeated the combined armies of Austria and Russia on the plains of Austerlitz. The two defeated emperors sought for peace; and a treaty was entered into at Presburg, by which the French warrior was recognised, not only as Emperor of France, but also as King of Italy, master of Venice, of Tuscany, of Parma, of Placentia, and of Genoa.

Mr. Pitt was as much grieved by this news as he had been elated by the victory of Trafalgar. As minister, he was surrounded with difficulties, and involved in a struggle the end of which no one could foresee. Worn out by the eternal conflict and rack of mind to which he was exposed, he was obliged, in the autumn of 1805, to repair to Bath, to see if the genial air and medicinal waters of that city would restore him. It was in vain; and he returned, in a state of extreme debility and exhaustion, to his house on Putney Heath to die. He expired on the 23rd of January, 1806, in the forty-seventh year of his age. He was buried with public honours in Westminster Abbey, by the side of his illustrious father. Forty thousand pounds was also voted to pay his debts; for, notwithstanding the many means he possessed of personal aggrandisement at the expense of his country, he availed himself of none of them, and died insolvent. No one will dispute Mr. Pitt's integrity and genius; but the use he made of that genius is by some eulogised, by others condemned. Whilst he was considered, by the great majority of the English people, as the saviour of his country—"the pilot who weathered the storm" with which it was threatened by the French revolution—the followers of Fox and the Jacobins described him as an instrument of tyranny, and accused him of having used his great talents for the purpose of enslaving Europe, crushing the liberties of Englishmen, and rolling back the giant wheels of civilisation.

CHAPTER XCVIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE THIRD.—A.D. 1806—1811.

FTER the death of Mr. Pitt, a government was formed, called the ministry of "All the Talents," because it included distinguished statesmen of various opinions. Lord Grenville was the head of it, and Mr. Fox Secretary for Foreign Affairs. Fox exerted himself to reverse the policy of Pitt by bringing about a peace with France; but when he began negotiations, he found he really had the difficulties to contend with which Pitt was charged with merely pretending; and he had no success. He was not, however, long to continue his labours in this good cause. For some years his health had been declining: a few months after he became a minister, his disorder resolved itself into dropsy, and, on the 13th of September, he breathed his last at Chiswick, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. He died much lamented by the nation, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, within a few inches of his life-long antagonist, Pitt.

The ministry of "All the Talents" did not long survive Mr. Fox: it was wrecked by the king's refusal to afford some relief to the Roman Catholics; but before it broke up it carried one glorious measure, which will secure to its authors for ever the gratitude of the world. Chiefly in consequence of the unremitted exertions of the amiable Mr. Wilberforce, a bill was passed for the abolition of the eternally infamous slave-trade. This bill became law after twenty years of previous agitation, chiefly led by Mr. Wilberforce and Thomas Clarkson.

In the April of 1807, a new and very Tory ministry was formed, with the Duke of Portland at its head. So strong was the popular feeling against the Catholics, that the new ministry had no difficulty in obtaining a party in the House of Commons large enough to support it; though the professors of that faith had become so insignificant, compared with the mass of the nation, that no danger could have resulted from admitting them to political privileges.

The power of Napoleon had made France almost the mistress of Europe, with the exception of Great Britain. In his hostility to this country, and with a view to injure her in what he considered her most vulnerable point—her trade and commerce—the emperor (after having defeated the Prussians at Jena, on the 14th of October, 1806) marched to Berlin, and from thence, on the 20th of November, issued a decree declaring the British islands in a state of blockade. By the treaty of Tilsit, concluded in June, 1807, Russia and Prussia, having made peace with Napoleon, engaged to keep their ports closed against England. He then demanded that the government of Portugal should not only do the same, but seize all English property in its dominions; and, on meeting with a refusal, he poured his troops into Lisbon in November, and the Portuguese royal family emigrated to Brazil. Denmark, though desirous of preserving a neutrality, was also compelled to close her ports to the commerce of England—a measure which brought on her the vengeance of this country. Her fleet was captured, and her capital attacked and taken, on the 7th of September; and she was forced to submit to terms dictated to her by the British on her own territories. In November of that year (1807), the British government issued orders in council, declaring France and all the powers tributary to it in a state of blockade; and this led to the Milan decree, issued from that city on the 17th of December, which blockaded, verbally, the British dominions in all parts of the world, though Napoleon had scarcely a single vessel to enforce the edict.

A strange and unnatural quarrel having arisen between Charles IV., King of Spain, and his son Ferdinand, they agreed to refer the matter to Napoleon; and Bayonne was appointed as the place of arbitration. There the worthless Queen of Spain accused Ferdinand of treason, and declared that he was not the son of the king. The degraded Charles, shocked at the disclosure, and unable to sustain the cares of royalty, resigned his crown into the hands of Napoleon, who, in 1808, conferred it upon his brother Joseph. The Spanish people, indignant at being thus transferred from one sovereign to another, rose in insurrection, and appealed to England for aid—an appeal which was immediately acquiesced in. Thus arose that famous episode of British history, the Peninsular war, in which Sir Arthur Wellesley (afterwards the Duke of Wellington) won such laurels by the victories of Roliça, Vimiera, Talavera and Vittoria: and in which the brave Sir John Moore met his death at Corunna, after a skilful retreat from four overwhelming French armies.

While Sir Arthur Wellesley was assisting the Spaniards to regain their national independence, the Duke of York, the commander-in-chief of the British forces, was permitting his mistress, Mrs. Clarke, to sell for money those commissions and promotions in the army which ought to have been given as the reward of meritorious service. This shameful traffic was brought before the House of Commons by Colonel Wardle, on the 26th of January, 1809. A strict investigation followed; Mrs. Clarke was summoned to the bar of the House; and although an attempt was made to save the honour of the duke by declaring that he had no share in the profit of these transactions, and indeed no knowledge of them, yet he felt it decorous to resign the command of the army—a resignation which the king immediately accepted.

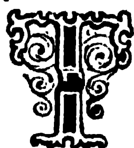
During the summer of 1800, the unfortunate Walcheren expedition sailed from England. This was a fleet of thirty-five ships of war, and about 200 smaller vessels, having on board 40,000 troops. The object of the expedition was to destroy or capture the French vessels at Antwerp or Flushing, or in the Scheldt, and to take the island of Walcheren. It was commanded by the Earl of Chatham, who, although a brother of Mr. Pitt, was a very incompetent person for such a charge. The expedition was a terrible failure. Walcheren certainly was taken; but it proved to be so unhealthy a place, and fever broke out to such an alarming extent amongst the troops, that they were compelled to abandon the island and return to England. Flushing also had surrendered; but the acquisition was purchased by the loss of 10,000 men and a large sum of money. This unfortunate affair led to a duel between Lord Castlereagh and Mr. Canning, two of the ministers. It took place on the 22nd of September, and the latter was wounded, but not fatally. The result of this hostile meeting was the resignation of the cabinet, and the elevation of Mr. Perceval, another statesman of Tory principles, to the rank of prime minister.



The 25th of October, 1809, was held as a great public festival, under the name of the Jubilee, in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the king's accession to the throne. George had, for many reasons, deserved the love of his people; and there was much rejoicing, and a great show of affection for him personally. The English people love the pomp and power of royalty; but their conduct on this occasion probably proceeded largely from pity. The aged monarch had passed his seventieth year: he was nearly blind, and still subject to attacks of insanity. His youngest daughter—his favourite child, the Princess Amelia—was slowly sinking into the grave. Every day the old king visited his dying child; and during one of these visits, she silently placed on his finger a ring containing a lock of her hair, and the words, "Remember me when I am gone." The aged father knew the meaning of that sad gift; it smote deeply both to heart and brain: he controlled the gush of agony that assailed him; but when he left the chamber, his mind was gone for ever. From that gloomy time, until the hour of his death, the King of England was a helpless, pitiable lunatic. The princess died soon after she had bestowed so fatal a gift upon her father; and the condition to which she had reduced him was mercifully concealed from her.

At this time there were many political societies in England, where the affairs of the nation were debated; and Mr. John Gale Jones, the president of one of them, called the British Forum, was committed to Newgate by the House of Commons, early in the session of 1810, because it was said he had been guilty of a breach of privilege in discussing their affairs with too much plainness. One member (Sir Francis Burdett) declared the House had exceeded its authority; but his motion to that effect was negatived by a large majority. He then addressed his constituents upon the subject, "denying the power of the House of Commons to imprison the people of England;" and published his address to them in the famous William Cobbett's Weekly Register. The Commons regarded this proceeding as another breach of privilege, and decreed that Sir Francis should be sent to the Tower. This gentleman, in a spirited manner, denied the legality of their order, and refused to surrender to the sergeant-at-arms. A body of police, therefore, assisted by the military, on the 9th of April forced an entry into his house, and conveyed him to the Tower. An immense crowd had assembled: the people were much excited at this outrage on public liberty; and as the escort which guarded Sir Francis was on its return, the soldiers were attacked with mud, stones, brickbats, and even with fire-arms. In return, the soldiers fired upon the people; two of them were killed, and six others severely wounded. From his prison Sir Francis brought an action against the Speaker for false imprisonment; but the trial was decided against the "patriot," as he was called, and the authority of the Commons thus confirmed. The captive statesman remained in the Tower until the prorogation of parliament on the 22nd of June, when his release was hailed with acclamations by thousands, who had assembled on Tower Hill to conduct him home in triumph—an honour which, to avoid mischief, he wisely declined by taking a boat at the Tower stairs, and going to Westminster by the river.

As the restoration of the afflicted old king to reason was considered hopeless, his eldest son George was declared REGENT, and empowered to exercise the royal authority in the name of his father. He was installed in this great dignity on the 12th of February, 1811, at Carlton House. George III. lingered on in darkness, both mental and bodily, during nine dreary years; but from this period he was politically dead—a king in nothing but the name.

CHAPTER XCIX.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE THIRD.—A.D. 1811—1820.

HE regent, who became George IV. on the death of his father, had been attached to that division of the Whig party called the "New Whigs;" and he still continued intimate with the brilliant but dissipated Sheridan, who had been Treasurer of the Navy in Lord Grenville's administration of 1806. The regent was desirous of seeing the Whigs again in office. That party was now reunited—those of the "Old Whigs" who still dreaded the effects of the French revolution, having joined the Tories. After he had taken the oath, his royal highness, therefore, sent for Lord Grenville, and offered to reinstate him as premier. The conditions demanded, however, the regent refused to accede to, and he retained the services of Mr. Perceval and the Tory cabinet.

While the war was being carried on in the Spanish peninsula against the generals of Napoleon with varying success, and while a new war with the American republic was threatening, England was startled by the assassination of the prime minister. On the 11th of May, 1812, as Mr. Perceval entered the lobby of the House of Commons, he was fired at with a pistol, by a man named John Bellingham. The bullet pierced the heart of the unfortunate gentleman, who fell, and expired in a few minutes. The murderer, who made no attempt to escape, was seized, and placed upon his trial a few days after the perpetration of the deed. It appeared that he was labouring under an acute sense of some real or supposed wrong he had received at the hands of the ministry. He denied, however, having any personal malice against Mr. Perceval, and declared that he would rather have shot Lord Gower. Although doubts of his sanity were entertained, Bellingham was condemned, and hanged the next Monday morning, before his counsel had time to bring the witnesses from Liverpool who, he affirmed, could establish the fact of the madness of his client. A grant of £2,000 a year was settled upon the widow of the unfortunate statesman; and a further sum of £50,000 given to his twelve children. The Tory Lord Liverpool (formerly Mr. Jenkinson) succeeded him as minister.

The Emperor Napoleon had now reached the height of his gigantic power; and he was to experience the beginning of those reverses that drove him from being the gorgeous ruler of nations—the Man of Destiny, who trampled on the old despotisms of Europe, and then strangled its new-born liberties—to waste the last years of his brilliant, stormy life, a humiliated captive on a sea-girt rock. The refusal of the Emperor of Russia to continue to enforce Bonaparte's scheme of excluding British commerce from the European continent, led to a renewal of the war between France and Russia. In the summer of 1812, Napoleon entered the latter country at the head of 600,000 men, consisting of French, Germans, Poles, Prussians, &c. The Russians fell back from this enormous army of veterans, whom constant successes had made confident of victory. Well might they recede in terror; for such a mighty host had never before been seen in Europe. Several partial actions, however, took place, and a battle was fought at Smolensko on the 17th of August, where the Russian army, 120,000 strong, after having thrice repulsed the enemy, was defeated. Napoleon continued his advance upon Moscow; and, on the 7th of September, he fought the awful and sanguinary battle of Borodino. In this, the most bloody conflict of modern history, 10,000 French and 15,000 Russians were left dead upon the field, while the wounded on either side were too many to be counted.

The victory is generally allowed to belong to Napoleon, but both sides laid claim to it. A few days afterwards the French took possession of Moscow, which they found deserted. The emperor proceeded to the Kremlin, the ancient palace of the czars, where he intended to pass the winter, which had set in with unusual severity; but on the following night Moscow was found to be in flames in a dozen places at once; the fire was spread by the high winds, and nothing could stop the conflagration until nearly 8,000 houses were destroyed. After some hesitation, Napoleon resolved on a retreat; a description of the horrors of which makes the blood freeze and the heart feel sick. The rigours of an awful winter, famine, and the sudden midnight visitations of the avenging Cossacks, swept down the wretched French by thousands. The angel of death seemed to ride upon the icy blasts of the north, and a larger number of the retreating French perished from cold, than were slain by the deadly instruments of war. Napoleon reached Paris in disguise on the 18th of December; but his great army was almost annihilated. It was estimated that 125,000 were killed in battles or skirmishes; that 132,000 had died of fatigue, disease, cold, and hunger; and that 139,000 had been taken prisoners. Other estimates make the loss of the French still greater.

But the iron will, the gigantic energy of Napoleon was unbroken. Though his misfortune had induced many of his allies to abandon him—though Austria took courage again to declare war against him, and though nearly all the powers of Europe, supported by the wealth of England, were in a league against the French empire—yet her inflexible emperor did not despair of treading every difficulty beneath his feet, and preserving the splendid majesty of his imperial power. He laid his affairs frankly before the senate early in 1813, which voted him 350,000 men to repair his losses. The campaign of that year opened with the battle of Lutzen, on the 2nd of May, gained by the French. The emperor also gained further advantages at the battles of Bautzen on the 20th, and Wurtzen on the 26th of that month. All these advantages were soon dispelled. On the 6th of September, a triple league was formed against France by Austria, Prussia, and Russia. On the 16th of October the battle of Leipsic was fought, in which the French were totally defeated, losing more than 40,000 men, and sixty-five pieces of artillery. Napoleon then retreated, and was followed by the allies on the road to Paris. Further disasters compelled him, on the 11th of April, 1814, to abdicate his imperial crown in favour of the deposed royal family, and retire to the island of Elba, with the title of ex-emperor, and a pension of 2,000,000 of livres. His Bourbon successor on the throne—Louis XVIII., the brother of the poor king who perished on the guillotine—was a faithless man, who soon disgusted his people. The admirers of Napoleon took courage to whisper everywhere, "He will return with the violets." The prediction was verified; the ex-emperor left Elba with about 1,000 men, and landed in France on the 1st of March, 1815. He was welcomed back with enthusiasm; the Bourbon king fled in dismay; and once again Napoleon was emperor. The news spread alarm throughout Europe; and Austria, Russia, Prussia, and England bound themselves never to lay down their arms until he was utterly deprived of authority. Napoleon offered terms of peace, but still prepared for the coming storm.

His new reign was a brief one: his term of power lasted but 100 days, when it was finally extinguished on the blood-red field of Waterloo. The allied armies were collected into two great bodies, one of which was commanded by the Duke of Wellington, and the other by the Prussian general, Marshal Blucher. On the 11th of June, Bonaparte quitted Paris in high spirits, saying, "I am going to measure myself with this Wellington." He marched into Belgium with an enormous army, and with the intention of separately destroying the two hosts opposed to him. Wellington, with an army of 76,000 men, was at Brussels; General Blucher, with another army of 80,000 men, was stationed at Namur. On the 16th, the Prussians were attacked at the village of Ligny by a part of the French army, led by the emperor; while an advanced body of English, stationed at a place where four roads met, and thence called Quatre Bras, were fallen upon by another detachment of the French, under Marshal Ney. At Ligny the Prussians were defeated, though not thrown into confusion; and Blucher, after having lost 12,000 men in killed and wounded, retired to Wavres. Marshal Ney was not so successful as his great master; and although he attacked 19,000 men with an army of 40,000, he was repulsed; but not until Wellington, who was present, had 350 men slain, and 2,380 wounded.

Blucher's retreat to Wavres obliged Wellington to make a corresponding retreat to the little town of Waterloo. This was executed on Saturday, the 17th, and, in the evening, the English general selected the ground upon which he would sustain the attack of the French: it was in front of the village and farm of Mont St. Jean, about a mile and a-half from Waterloo. The night that preceded the battle was a gloomy one; it rained heavily, the wind blew in stormy gusts, the horizon was illuminated from time to time by vivid flashes of lightning, and deep peals of thunder reverberated through the air. The men lay upon the soaked earth, and in the dripping corn. At length dawned that ever-memorable Sunday, the 18th of June, and about nine o'clock the rain ceased. Napoleon's army amounted to 78,000 men, chiefly veterans; Wellington had 76,000; so that (excluding the Prussian army) the contending powers were pretty nearly equal.

Soon after ten the French began the attack, and the battle raged with unmitigated fury till the evening. We have neither space nor inclination to relate the particulars of that awful carnage: they are known almost too well; for humanity is not improved by dwelling much on such matters. Suffice it to say, that after the famous Old Guard of the emperor, which he had kept as a reserve, was driven back by the deadly showers of bullets and the bristling banks of bayonets of the English infantry—thrown into irremediable confusion, and slaughtered like sheep—the Prussian army, under Blucher, made its appearance on the field; and Wellington, himself charging at the head of his troops, carried all before him. A total rout followed; and when the moon rose upon that hideous scene, the French were flying with the precipitation of despair. Wellington, in pity to his exhausted troops, resigned the pursuit to Blucher, and an enormous number of panic-stricken wretches were cut down like wild beasts, and fell dead upon the roads, or crawled into the neighbouring fields and woods, to die in solitude and agony. During this pursuit, the Prussians took about 150 pieces of cannon, Napoleon's travelling equipage, and the whole baggage of the French army. Twenty thousand Frenchmen lay dead upon the field of battle, mingled with 13,000 of the victors, among whom were no less than 600 officers and eleven generals.

Napoleon had fought his last battle, and he fled back to Paris in despair. Knowing that the enemies of France would not sheathe the sword while he retained any power, he abdicated in favour of his son, who was pronounced Emperor of the French, with the title of Napoleon II. This did not prevent the allied armies from marching towards Paris; and Bonaparte prepared to provide for his safety by proceeding to America. He embarked on board a small frigate off Rochefort; but as that port was blockaded by a British fleet, through which he was unable to pass, he surrendered to Captain Maitland, of the Bellerophon, and was conveyed to England in that vessel. Arrived at Torbay, he addressed the following letter to the English regent:—"Exposed to the factions which divided my country, and to the enmity of the great powers of Europe, I have terminated my political career; and I come, like Themistocles, to seat myself on the hearths of the British people. I place myself under the safeguard of their laws, and claim the protection of your royal highness as the most powerful, the most constant, the most generous of my enemies."

The prince-regent was not generous enough to a great fallen foe to reply to his letter. Bonaparte was not even permitted to land in England: the sovereigns allied against him feared that his liberty was incompatible with their peace—for they recollected how he had broken faith at Elba—and he was sentenced to exile in St. Helena, a solitary rocky island, 1,200 miles distant from the nearest continent. There he lived for nearly six years; and there, on the 5th of May, 1821, he died of disease in the stomach, in his fifty-second year. Thus perished one of the greatest men that modern times has produced; and who, had not his genius been stained by crimes dictated by his illimitable ambition, would have been regarded with admiration by all posterity. As it is, the Man of Destiny—as he loved to call himself—was a curse to Europe; but he might have been the regenerator of the world. His character can scarcely yet be written with impartiality.

Louis XVIII. again ascended the throne of France: that country was restored to its ancient limits; and peace was proclaimed in Europe. Yes! after a twenty years' war, which had distracted all the great European nations, the storm had subsided, the olive flourished again, and everywhere the joyful shout was raised, that "the world was at peace."

The awful struggle which convulsed Europe during this period, throws the comparatively unimportant war that had taken place in the interim with America into obscurity. In 1812, the United States of America, incensed at injuries for which they could get no redress, declared war against England. The chief cause of dispute arose out of an irritating right the English claimed to search American vessels for seamen who had deserted from the British flag; and a supplementary one sprung from the orders in council, interdicting intercourse with France; which were constantly remonstrated against; and their repeal on the 23rd of June, 1812, came too late; war had been declared on the 18th. The details of this unfortunate war are more sad than interesting. By land the English were, at first, generally successful; but though the American navy, compared with that of England, was literally contemptible, at sea our former glory seemed departed. Five different actions were fought, ship against ship, in 1812 and 1813, and the enemy (in every instance, it may be remarked, superior in the number of guns and of men) was successful in all. At length Captain Broke, in the Shannon, appeared off Boston on the 1st of June, 1813, and challenged the commander of the American frigate Chesapeake to a contest for the honour of the two flags. Captain Lawrence accepted the challenge, and, in less than half-an-hour, the British jack was flying over the American stars and stripes. From that time the British held their own at sea; but an expedition sent against New Orleans, in 1814, signally failed. Negotiations, however, were going on at Ghent; and a treaty of peace was signed there on the 24th of December, 1814, before it was known that the British army had retired from before New Orleans.

Though the great European war was at an end, its consequences remained, and were bitterly felt in England by the distress which prevailed, especially among the poor. In 1816, this distress produced serious discontents and riots. Tumults broke out in various counties; incendiary fires blazed nightly; ignorant demands were made for a fixed price for bread and meat; and in some places encounters with the military occurred. In Cambridge an insurrection broke forth; eighty unhappy men were tried for treason, and twenty-four of them condemned to death—a fate five of them suffered.

Many meetings were held to devise means of alleviating the general distress, and for a redress of political grievances. On the 15th of November, 1816, thousands of working-men assembled at Spa Fields, to prepare a petition to the prince-regent, imploring him to take into consideration the distresses of the country. Henry Hunt, a country squire and political demagogue, addressed them in a long and violent speech; in return for which, the excited people harnessed themselves to his chariot, and drew him home in triumph. Shortly afterwards (on the 2nd of December), another great meeting was held at the same place, to receive the answer to the petition, or rather to learn that it had been rejected because it was not written in language sufficiently respectful. On this occasion, a hair-brained young surgeon, named Watson, in concluding a violent speech, demanded, "If they will not give us what we want, shall we not take it?" Loud shouts of approval rising from the people, the orator continued, "Will you go and take it? If I jump down, will you follow me and take it?" "Yes, yes!" was still the excited response; and away went the madman, with a tricoloured flag in his hand, and a vast mob at his heels, to take the Tower! Entering the shop of a gunsmith upon Snow Hill, Watson demanded arms for his followers, and, on meeting with a refusal, drew forth a pistol and fired at a gentleman named Platt. Happily the wound was not fatal; and the maniac, struck with remorse, examined it and dressed it himself. After this he thought it prudent to make his escape, and his followers were persuaded by the city magistrates to retire to their homes. Watson contrived to get safely off to America; but a poor ignorant sailor was hanged for plundering the shop of the gunsmith.

Such was the discontent resulting from the distressed state of the country, that on the 28th of January, 1817, the prince-regent was hooted and pelted at in his carriage while returning from opening parliament. In alarm he sent a message to that assembly, drawing its attention to the political meetings held in different parts of the country, which, he said, tended to the overthrow of the law and the constitution. Secret committees were accordingly appointed to investigate this subject, and, on the 18th of February, they presented the result of their inquiries. It was to the effect that alarming conspiracies existed in all the great towns throughout the country, having for their object the promotion of a spirit of insubordination, a contempt of all laws, an equal division of all property, and, in short, the accomplishment of a revolution. It added, that many societies existed, called Hampden Clubs, Spencean Philanthropists, &c., which, under the disguise of constitutional proceedings, laboured to extend the plans of destruction already alluded to. In consequence of these disclosures, the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended, and three bills hurried into laws, by which the liberties of the people were much abridged.

There is very little doubt that the fears of the government magnified the intentions of the supposed conspirators in some cases, and altogether mistook them in others. Yet there certainly was cause of alarm. On the 10th of March, 30,000 men assembled at Manchester, each with a blanket strapped on his back, soldier-fashion, and with the intention of proceeding together to London to present a petition to the regent for parliamentary reform. It was called the Manchester Blanket Meeting, and was dispersed by the military after its leaders had been seized and conveyed to prison. Some few hundred poor deluded men actually set out on their march; but they were overtaken and dispersed by the yeomanry and constables—not without violence and the death of one man, who, unfortunately, happened to be only a spectator.

The disturbances continuing, the government resorted to a plan which all governments adopt when conspiracies exist, and which all conspirators denounce to be base and iniquitous: it sent spies into the disturbed districts to ascertain the motives and plans of the disaffected. These spies—and especially one amongst them, named Oliver—are said to have lured distressed people into riots and unlawful associations, that they might obtain a reward for betraying them: but there is nothing to show that this was the case, except the statements of the accused. In consequence of the many who had been committed to prison for sedition or treason in the midland counties, a special commission was appointed to sit at Derby for the trial of the offenders. Sentence of death was pronounced upon twenty-three of these unhappy men, of whom three suffered, and the rest were transported for different periods. Many of them attributed the criminal acts into which they had been led to the snares laid by Oliver, the government spy.—The close of the year 1817 was marked by the death of the Princess Charlotte, the only child of the regent; who had been married the year before to Prince Leopold, of Saxe-Coburg. Her death taking place under rather painful circumstances, associated with the fact of her being a very amiable character, and regarded as the future sovereign of England, gave rise to acute feelings of national sorrow.

On the 17th of November of the following year (1818), the princess was followed to the grave by the old Queen Charlotte, wife of George III. She died in her seventy-fifth year, having enjoyed almost uninterrupted health nearly to the close of her long life. She was much respected for her high notions of moral conduct, and her devoted behaviour as a wife and mother. Her manners, however, were extremely formal and ceremonious; and she was accused of avarice, because she was very frugal in her expenditure. But, after her death, it was found that the greater part of her income had been expended in works of charity and beneficence. She had borne her husband fifteen children, though many of them died before her. The custody of the poor secluded, insane old king, which had been entrusted to the queen, was then given to his son, the Duke of York.

The year 1819 was distinguished by a painful circum stance at Manchester. Great distress had prevailed in the manufacturing districts; and, in the previous summer, 15,000 Manchester spinners had abandoned their work, and refused to return to it without an advance of wages. The strike did not terminate until after a collision with the military, and the arrest of many of their leaders. Want induced the people to reflect on their condition, and a party arose amongst them called Radical Reformers, who declared that the absence of a true representation of the people was the great source of the misery and evils of the nation; and that annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and election by ballot, were the only means of curing them. Meetings to discuss and promote these principles were held at Glasgow, Ashton-under-Lyne, Leeds, Stockport, and other places. In Lancashire, female reform societies were constituted, the members of which addressed the wives and daughters of artisans in other districts, entreating them to follow their example, and instil into their children a deeply-rooted hatred of all tyrannical rulers. At Birmingham, the radical reformers decided on the novel step of electing Sir Charles Wolseley to represent their town in parliament, without having received a royal writ sanctioning them to do so; for Birmingham did not then return a member to the House of Commons. In the wide-spreading excitement, working-men subjected themselves, in many parts of the country, to military exercises. Their weapons, however, were only sticks; and it seems they had no more serious object than that of learning to march together in an imposing manner to the great political open-air meetings. This drilling produced a proclamation from the regent against military training, seditious meetings, and the illegal election of members, or "legislatorial attorneys," to represent otherwise unrepresented towns in parliament.

Not deterred by this proclamation, the reformers of Manchester called a meeting, for the purpose of electing Mr. Henry Hunt as their legislatorial attorney. On the magistrates declaring the object of the assembly to be illegal, it was abandoned; but another meeting was called, for the alleged purpose of petitioning for a reform in parliament. It took place on the 16th of August, in an open space in the town called St. Peter's Field, and it was calculated that more than 60,000 persons were present. They consisted of men, women, and children, in high spirits and in their holiday attire. Large bodies of men had marched in from the neighbouring towns and villages, each preceded by its own banner, bearing a motto—some of them bordering on sedition. Two clubs of female reformers appeared, bearing flags of white silk. The appearance of that vast assembly was imposing enough; but the members of it had collected with no idea of breaking the peace, or it is certain that they would have left their wives and children at home. About one o'clock Mr. Hunt took the chair, and began an address by the recommendation of peace and good order. He was interrupted by the appearance of a body of yeomanry cavalry, who advanced towards the platform with drawn swords, and telling Mr. Hunt he was their prisoner, summoned him to surrender. The intruders were backed by six troops of Hussars, and other military assistance. After enjoining the people to be tranquil, Mr. Hunt offered to surrender to any civil officer who should produce his warrant, and was taken into custody by a constable, together with several other persons who occupied the platform.

The people continued in the field, not obeying the order to disperse; and, instead of endeavouring to persuade them to retire peaceably, the yeomanry cried out, "Have at their flags!" and began to strike down the banners raised in various parts of the field. A shout rose from the multitude; and the yeomanry, with brandished swords, instantly charged amongst them. A scene of terrible confusion ensued; the flying crowds were trampled beneath the feet of the horses, or had their limbs broken in that dense mass of human beings. Such was the fury of the yeomanry, assisted by the Hussars, that in ten minutes the field was cleared; but, in that brief time, eight men, two women, and a child had been murdered, and upwards of 400 persons severely wounded. It is declared by the reformers, that the Riot Act was not read previously to this cruel and unprovoked military outrage upon a peaceable assembly of English men and women, collected for the purpose of petitioning for their political rights.

A feeling of indignation against so wanton an act prevailed throughout the country, and large meetings were held in London and elsewhere to censure the magistrates and military, and to express sympathy for the sufferers. The sum of £4,000 was immediately subscribed for their aid. Sir Francis Burdett even addressed so stringent a letter upon the subject to the electors of Westminster, that he was tried for libel, convicted, and sentenced to pay a fine of £2,000, and to suffer three months' imprisonment. Yet, at this very time, Lord Sidmouth, the Secretary of State, actually addressed a letter to the magistracy and military of Manchester, thanking them in the name of the regent. This cruel conduct did not prevent petitions being sent to that prince—petitions which must have sounded like reproaches—desiring him to inquire into the massacre that had been committed on his subjects at Manchester.

Hunt, Johnson, Knight, Healy, Bamford, and five others, arrested at St. Peter's Field, were committed to prison on a charge of being engaged in a conspiracy to overturn the government. They were admitted to bail, and tried at York during the April of the following year (1820), when the five whose names are given were found guilty, and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. Mr. Hunt was treated with the greatest severity, being condemned to imprisonment for two years and a-half in Ilchester gaol. The government also passed six bills, known as the Six Acts, for the purpose of putting down sedition and blasphemy. The training in the practice of military evolutions was prohibited; justices of the peace were authorised to search for, seize, and detain arms; public meetings placed under magisterial control; the speedy administration of justice in cases of misdemeanor was provided for; severe punishments were affixed to blasphemous and seditious libels; and certain publications were subjected to the stamp duty. These measures caused immense opposition, and excited the indignation of all the Whigs and reformers in the country. Measures of progress are seldom passed without much determined opposition. In this instance, twelve years had to elapse before the Reform Bill became law.

During the years of his affliction, George III. had been kept in the deepest seclusion; but his general health remained good until the close of the year 1819. It was then evident that the gradual decay of his vital powers would soon end in dissolution. On the evening of Saturday, the 29th of January, 1820, he expired at Windsor Castle without a pang, in the sixtieth year of his reign, and the eighty-second of his age. Only a week before he had been preceded to the grave by his fourth son, the Duke of Kent—a brave man, of liberal politics, and the father of our present amiable sovereign, Queen Victoria.

The character of George III. has been represented in very different colours. The Tory party loved to call him the "good old king," the "father of his people;" while the Whigs looked upon him as a narrow-minded tyrant. It is not to be denied that he had strong attachment to the royal prerogative, and to the effete doctrine that his people owed him the duty of an almost passive obedience. He was also, as a rule, opposed to all change; and resisted alike the proposals to repeal the penal laws against the Roman Catholics, and to modify those which related to moral crimes and offences. Personally, he was religious, sincere, and courageous, though extremely obstinate. He acted honestly on his convictions; but those convictions were tainted by his love of arbitrary power, and he had not judgment enough to arrive at enlarged and correct views. Still he had a certain solid plainness of understanding, and showed great art in the manner in which he always contrived to get rid of any minister who was obnoxious to him, and in ruling through the medium of servile parliaments. His tastes and amusements were simple; he was fond of farming and rural occupations. He established an experimental farm, and procured from Spain the most valuable specimens of the superior races of Merino sheep. Several letters in Young's Annals of Agriculture, bearing the signature of John Robinson, are said to have been written by him; though for literature generally he had neither taste nor inclination. In contrast with the pleasure he took in farming occupations was his love of dramatic entertainments; he was fond of attending the theatres, and delighted in a pantomime.

His court was conducted with a great regard to decorum and a high morality: but although George III. is usually upheld as a model of moral perfection, he was far from being so perfect in that respect as he has been represented. When very young, he seduced a pretty Quakeress, named Hannah Lightfoot. It is even asserted that he was privately married to her at Kew by Dr. Wilmot. If so, the marriage was not binding by the law of the land; and, whatever the nature of his connection with her, it ceased on his union with the queen. After that union, no one could lead a more exemplary life as a husband, father, or friend. His conduct had a great effect on society; and during his reign the country progressed in morality, as it did in wealth and prosperity, notwithstanding the expensive wars in which it was engaged.

So long a period as that over which the reign of George III. extended was necessarily adorned by men of genius in almost every branch of science, art, and literature. A very brief account of them all would make a volume. As might naturally be expected, English eloquence reached its highest excellence during a time when kingdoms were rocked to their foundations, and society shaken with the storms of revolution. The names of Chatham and Holland, Pitt and Fox, Murray, Burke, and Sheridan, will ever remain illustrious as orators, in spite of the varying opinions we must entertain of the truth or error of their principles. Nor should the noble and generous legal orators, Erskine and Macintosh, or the eloquent Irish patriots, Grattan and Flood, be overlooked.

England was rich in literary men during this period, especially during the latter part of it. With the beginning of the present century a perfect cluster of poets rose in the horizon. Chief among them were Chatterton, Crabbe, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, Scott, Burns, Campbell, Moore, Byron, Shelley, Keats, and Rogers. In the ranks of poets of less pretensions were many ladies, who acquired an honourable fame; amongst them, Miss Joanna Bailie, Mrs. Hunter, Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Opie, Miss Mitford, and Mrs. Hemans, deserve especial mention. Among our most distinguished painters were Sir Benjamin West, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Sir Martin Arthur Shee, and Sir David Wilkie; James Barry, the eccentric portrayer of allegorical and historical subjects; and Henry Fuseli, the exquisitely imaginative illustrator of Shakspeare and Milton, who, though born at Zurich, may be considered an Englishman by adoption. In sculpture, Flaxman and Chantrey made marble seem to breathe; while the stage was supported by the varied talents of David Garrick, and the dignified personations of the Kemble family.

The annals of science were rendered illustrious by the names of Dr. Herschel, the astronomer; Dr. Wollaston, Dr. Priestley, and Sir Humphry Davy, the distinguished chemists; the wise John Hunter, the anatomist; and Sir Joseph Banks, the natural philosopher. On those of art, besides the painters and sculptors we have enumerated, stands the name of James Watt, whose improvements in the steam-engine almost entitle him to be ranked as its inventor; together with those of Sir John Soane, the architect; and Telford, Rennie, and Fulton, the engineers. In the records of learning are the names of Sir William Blackstone, the celebrated lawyer and most popular writer on the laws and constitution of his country; Sir William Jones, the great Oriental scholar and linguist; Dr. Samuel Parr and Dr. Richard Porson, the profound classical scholars; Jeremy Bentham, famous for his political disquisitions; Edward Gibbon, the eloquent and learned historian of the decline of ancient Rome: together with Hallam and Lingard, both historic writers of great merit; though the History of England, by the latter, is composed with a strong bias in favour of the Roman Catholics.

Foremost in the rank of writers on religion, stand Bishops Warburton, Lowth, Hurd, Porteous, Watson, Tomlins, March, &c. There were also many eloquent writers and preachers among the dissenters; of whom Dr. Chalmers, Robert Hall, John Foster, and Edward Irving, may be mentioned. It was also during this period that the devout and industrious John Wesley founded that extensive sect known as the Methodists—a name given to them at first in contempt, but now claimed by them as one of honour. The most distinguished prose writer of fiction, during this period, was one we have mentioned also as a poet—that varied and exquisitely natural creator of imaginary beings, Sir Walter Scott; though the first of his novels did not appear until 1814. We must also mention Miss Edgeworth, Miss Owenson (afterwards Lady Morgan), Mrs. Brunton, Miss Austen, and Madame d'Arblay. Nor must Godwin and his extraordinary and most eccentric wife be forgotten—Mrs. Godwin, better known by her maiden name of Mary Wolstonecraft, famous, among other works, for her spirited Vindication of the Rights of Women. Her example, however, is one that young ladies neither should nor will feel inclined to follow.—These are some of the most distinguished of the children of genius in this remarkable age; but the list is necessarily very imperfect, and omits more than it contains. It is not, however, intended as a catalogue, but as a friendly indicator, to point out the chief fountains of learning and intellect that sprung up within that time, and contributed to the mental fertilisation and advancement of the people of England.

CHAPTER C.

THE REIGN OF GEORGE THE FOURTH.—A.D. 1820—1830.

THE prince-regent was proclaimed as KING GEORGE THE FOURTH on the 30th of January, 1820, being then in his fifty-eighth year. The following month, the startling Cato Street conspiracy was discovered. This was a plot of some desperate men to murder the ministers, and overturn the government. The leader of it, Arthur Thistlewood, a retired military officer, was chiefly actuated by a desire of revenge for an injury he had received from Lord Sidmouth, the Home Secretary. A number of poor reckless persons were associated with Thistlewood, the chief of whom were Ings, a butcher; Davison, a creole; Brunt and Tidd, shoemakers. The assassination of the ministers was appointed for Saturday, the 19th of February; but, on learning that they would all dine at Lord Harrowby's house on the following Wednesday, the shocking deed was postponed, Thistlewood exclaiming with glee, "As there has not been a dinner for such a length of time, there will, no doubt, be fourteen or sixteen there, and it will be a rare haul to despatch them all together." On that occasion, one of the conspirators was to go with a note to the door, and when it was opened the rest were to rush in secure the servants, and assassinate the guests. After bringing away the heads of Lords Castlereagh and Sidmouth, the Mansion-house was to be seized, the Bank attacked, and London set fire to in various places. Such a strange scheme of diabolical wickedness raises doubts of the sanity of its authors.

Amongst these ruffians was a government spy, named Edwards, who informed ministers of all that occurred; and it was resolved to seize the conspirators on the very evening of their intended crime at their secret place of meeting. This was a loft over a stable in Cato Street, Edgware Road. A large body of police officers proceeded there at eight in the evening, entered the loft, and summoned the conspirators to surrender. Thistlewood replied by stabbing the officer who attempted to secure him; the lights were blown out, a scuffle ensued, and the leader, with fourteen others, escaped in the darkness and confusion. Nine, however, were secured, and the next day Thistlewood also was made prisoner. In the month of April they were placed upon their trial. Five, who pleaded guilty, were sentenced to transportation for life; Thistlewood and the other four were condemned to suffer death as traitors; and the sentence was executed with all the revolting details which were the invention and disgrace even of a savage age.

We have mentioned the king's marriage, in the year 1795, to his cousin, the Princess Caroline, daughter of the Duke of Brunswick—a lady for whom he seems never to have entertained any affection. After the birth of their only child, a complete separation took place between them. It had existed some years, when the princess was accused by Sir John Douglas and his wife, Lady Douglas, of improper behaviour, and of having secretly given birth to an infant in the year 1802; which infant had been brought up in her own house, and under her own inspection. A number of noblemen were accordingly formed into a commission to examine whether this serious charge was true. They reported that there was no foundation whatever for believing that the child living with the princess was her own; that it had been born in the Brownlow Street Hospital, and adopted by her royal highness; but they were not inclined to acquit her of a certain levity of conduct which had been deposed to by some witnesses in the course of the inquiry. The princess, on her part, addressed a letter to the king, in which she solemnly asserted her innocence, not only of the criminal charge made against her, but also her freedom from the indecorums imputed to her on the evidence of Sir John and Lady Douglas and other persons. George III., in reply, declared his belief that the character of the princess was stainless; but that unhappy lady was subjected to so many indignities, and so peremptorily excluded from the society of her daughter, that in the year 1814 she went abroad, and passed her time in travelling upon the continent.

Spies and scandal followed the princess: and at length it was rumoured that she was living in a state of habitual adultery with an Italian named Bartolomeo Bergami, whom she had raised from the obscure situation of her courier to that of the first post in her household. When the prince-regent became king, he required the princess to renounce her right to the title of queen, and to absent herself from England for ever, on condition of receiving an income of £50,000 a year. This offer (which implied the guilt of the queen), together with the omission of her name from the Liturgy, and the insults to which she was subjected at foreign courts, made her resolve on coming to England, and claiming her dignity. On the 6th of June, 1820, she arrived at Dover, where she was received with enthusiasm by immense crowds of people, and escorted in triumphal procession to London, which was illuminated in her honour. The same day the king sent a message to both Houses of Parliament, accompanied by a bagful of papers, containing information respecting the alleged misconduct of the queen while abroad. Secret committees of the Lords and Commons were appointed to investigate these papers; but the queen sent a message to the Commons, boldly demanding an open inquiry. "In the face," she declared, "of the sovereign, the parliament, and country, she solemnly protests against the formation of a secret tribunal to examine documents privately prepared by her adversaries, as a proceeding unknown to the law of the land, and a flagrant violation of all the principles of justice."

Lord Liverpool, the prime minister, then introduced into the House of Lords a bill of pains and penalties to deprive Caroline of the title of queen, and to dissolve the marriage between her and the king. The preamble to the bill stated, that for a length of time she carried on a disgraceful and adulterous intercourse with Bartolomeo Bergami, by which she had brought scandal and dishonour upon the king and the kingdom. On the 17th of August the queen's trial commenced by the production of evidence in support of the assertions contained in the bill. She was bravely and eloquently defended by Henry Brougham and Thomas Denman (subsequently created Lords Brougham and Denman), by Dr. Lushington, and other gentlemen. The scene that followed is one of the most remarkable and repulsive in modern history. Day after day, for three weeks, the Queen of England sat at the bar of the High Court of Parliament, and listened to the most searching investigation of her character—to the disgusting stories of paid (and it is believed perjured) Italian witnesses—her domestic servants, who came forward to blast her reputation. If their statements were true, she had not only degraded her high station, but violated every decent usage of society, and every precept of morality. But Queen Caroline solemnly called the Deity to witness her innocence; and the nation generally believed her assertion, and regarded her as an injured woman, whom her husband sought to get rid of by a wicked conspiracy.

The Lords, who sat as judges of the queen's conduct, were not influenced by the same generous spirit that animated the nation. They voted, by a majority of twenty-eight, that the bill of pains and penalties should be read a second time. Against this decision the queen protested, and charged many of the peers with the gross unfairness of listening to the whole evidence for the charge, and absenting themselves during her defence. When the third reading of the bill was moved, there was only a majority of nine in favour of it. To pass the bill in the face of so small a majority, and in defiance of the almost universally expressed indignation of the people, was felt to be a dangerous experiment, and Lord Liverpool and his colleagues abandoned it. By this means, although the queen was not acquitted of the imputations cast upon her name, yet the proceedings against her were ended. A shout of triumph arose from the nation; for three nights, London and most of the great provincial towns were illuminated, and bonfires blazed in the streets. The queen afterwards went to St. Paul's to return thanks to God, when the concourse of people was so immense, and their congratulations so enthusiastic, that her carriage could hardly proceed, and it was feared that dangerous accidents would result.

Queen Caroline had yet to pass through another ordeal. The coronation of her husband did not take place until the 19th of July in the following year (1821). Fifty thousand pounds a year had been voted for her support; but she was not satisfied while any taint remained upon her name, and she therefore presented a memorial to the privy council, claiming to be crowned with her husband as Queen of England. On the day of coronation she even drove up to Westminster Abbey in her state carriage, and demanded admission, which was resolutely refused. Finding her efforts were all in vain, she returned home, followed by an enormous crowd, which expressed its sympathy by lusty cheers. Her troubles were soon at an end: the following month she was taken ill at Drury Lane Theatre. Her disorder was cold, followed by inflammation; and, after a week's suffering, she died on the night of the 7th of August, in the fifty-third year of her age. There can be little doubt that the illness which led to her death had its origin in the fearful excitement to which she had been exposed. She desired that her remains should be conveyed to Brunswick for interment, and that the following inscription should be placed upon her coffin:—"Here lies Caroline of Brunswick, the injured Queen of England." The day on which the funeral procession was to proceed to Harwich, turned out one of the wettest that had been seen for a length of time; still, nearly the whole population of Middlesex and the adjoining counties assembled to behold the sad spectacle. The government ordered that the procession should not pass through the city; but the populace resolved that it should pass by no other route, and actually forced it along in that direction. This led to an affray with the military, who fired upon the crowd, when many persons were wounded and two killed. At an inquest held on the body of one of the latter, a verdict of wilful murder against a lifeguardsman unknown was returned. George IV. subdued his regret or compunction (if he felt any) for the fate of his queen by the excitement of a visit to Ireland. On his return he visited his dominions in Hanover, where he was received with much ceremony; and during the following year he paid a state visit to Scotland. In spite of George's trip to Ireland, and the professions of regard he expressed for his subjects in that ever-troubled island, it was soon afterwards the scene of revolt and barbarous murders, arising from the dissatisfaction the people felt at high rents and the tithe system. The following year the disturbances and distress in Ireland, aggravated by famine, assumed a form positively awful. Cases of misery and starvation were published that thrilled the readers with horror. Subscriptions were opened in London for the wretched peasantry, and amounted to the sum of £300,000; £50,000 was also voted for the same purpose by the English parliament. Some slight excuse may perhaps be found, in the harrowing distress of the Irish, for the shocking crimes they committed; but those very crimes increased the distress that prevailed. When magistrates, landlords, and farmers were murdered, the land naturally remained uncultivated, the peasants were thrown out of work, and fresh ruffians were added to the gangs which were already sapping the foundations of society.

During the August of 1822, great excitement was caused by the suicide of Lord Londonderry, the most unpopular of the Tory ministry. Regarded as an unscrupulous advocate of despotism, perhaps no man was ever so bitterly hated by the people. Public odium, the harass of business, and a mental malady which caused him to believe himself haunted by visions, seem to have led to the fatal act. He had retired to his country seat at Foots Cray, where he cut his throat with a penknife. His doctor entered the room almost at the same instant, and the unhappy nobleman had merely time to say, "Bankhead, let me fall upon your arm—it is all over," before he expired. The English people are usually too generous to war with the dead; but they received the news of this event with a shout of exultation, and the deceased statesman was buried in Westminster Abbey, amidst the execrations of the populace. Such was the end of one who had used the power of the law to coerce opinion and to fetter a nation. Lord Londonderry was succeeded as Foreign Secretary of State by Mr. Canning, one of the most talented men of the day.

Many commotions took place abroad; but in England affairs were tolerably tranquil. The blessings of peace were beginning to be felt; taxation was reduced, and returning prosperity brought with it returning tranquillity. Statesmen had arisen who understood the true principles of commerce, and government began to be conducted on better principles. In 1824, great public excitement was caused by two remarkable cases of crime. The first was the murder of a gentleman named Weare by John Thurtle, a gambling acquaintance. He had invited his victim to have a few days' shooting with him, and having driven him into a retired place, called Gill's Hill Lane, there murdered him for the sake of his property; and, in conjunction with Probert and Hunt, two accomplices, threw the body into a pond. Suspicion having been aroused, Probert turned king's evidence, and, in consequence, Thurtle was executed, and Hunt transported for life. Probert, however, did not long escape the hands of justice, as he was afterwards hanged for horse-stealing.—The other case was that of Henry Fauntleroy, a partner in the banking-house of Marsh and Co. This man, by means of forged powers of attorney, had disposed of Bank of England stock to the amount of £170,000—a proceeding which caused distress and ruin to numbers of persons, who were thus defrauded of their property. Great efforts were made to save him, and many respectable persons came forward to bear witness to his character. Their efforts were in vain; Fauntleroy was found guilty of forgery, and suffered the last penalty of the law.

The attention of the government was now chiefly occupied by the affairs of Ireland and the struggles for Roman Catholic emancipation: The grievances of the Roman Catholics were many and serious. They were excluded from parliament, from public employment, from all posts of trust and distinction, and even from the jury-box. They had long hoped that the time was at hand when they should have the same civil rights granted to them that were enjoyed by their Protestant fellow-subjects. Mr. Pitt would have long since yielded this, but for the resolution of George III. upon the subject; and it now began to be felt that it would be impossible to govern Ireland without removing the laws which oppressed her Catholic people. A powerful society had arisen in Ireland, called the Catholic Association, which raised large sums of money, and excited the people by its immense public meetings, at which its leaders, Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Sheil, denounced Protestant ascendancy with a fiery eloquence. These orations were made the more bitter by the violence of the Orange party, or extreme Protestants, who irritated the Catholics by the most biting insults. It was found necessary to pass an act of parliament expressly to dissolve an association which had attained an enormous influence over the people. Several measures were attempted on behalf of the Roman Catholics, but without success. Mr. Canning moved for leave to bring in a bill to admit Roman Catholic peers to the House of Lords; but the latter rejected the application. Sir Francis Burdett also brought forward a Relief Bill, the objects of which were to repeal Catholic disabilities, make some state provision for the Catholic clergy, and deprive an ignorant class of the Irish peasantry—the forty-shilling freeholders—of their votes. This bill passed the House of Commons, but was rejected by the Lords, partly on account of the vehement opposition of the Duke of York, the heir-presumptive to the throne.

The duke, however, was not to ascend the throne he looked forward to. During the Midsummer of 1826 he was attacked by dropsy; and, on the 5th of the following January, he expired, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. Though a dissipated man, he was liked by the people on account of his attachment to the army, and the reforms he effected in it. Some years before his death he had been reinstated in the command of the army, and was succeeded as commander-in-chief by the Duke of Wellington. The death of his royal highness was speedily followed by a breaking-up of the Tory ministry. The following month, Lord Liverpool, the premier, was seized with an apoplectic fit, from which he never recovered sufficiently to resume his public duties. The helm of state was then confided to Mr. Canning, who formed a ministry composed of the members of both parties. The Duke of Wellington, Lord Eldon, Mr. Peel, and others, refused to serve under Mr. Canning because he was favourable to Roman Catholic emancipation: still, the new ministry was supposed to be the strongest and most talented that had existed since the time of William Pitt; and the prospect of a comparatively liberal government was hailed with delight by the nation.

The hopes entertained of Mr. Canning's ministry were defeated by the unexpected death of that gentleman. Soon after the close of the session, the mental anxiety to which he had been subjected brought on a severe fit of illness. In the hope that tranquillity and a change of air would restore him, he went to the seat of the Duke of Devonshire, at Chiswick. Change of scene, however, failed to benefit the jaded statesman: he was seized with internal inflammation, and expired on the 8th of August, 1827. His decease was regarded as a national loss; and his remains were honoured with a funeral in Westminster Abbey. Mr. Canning was succeeded as premier by Lord Goderich, and very few alterations were made in the cabinet.

The ministry of Lord Goderich was very short-lived; and, on the resignation of that nobleman, the king sent for the Duke of Wellington, and desired him to form a new ministry. But a year before the duke had declared that he should be mad if he accepted a position for which he was so unfit as that of prime minister. Still he did accept it, and gave as a reason for doing so, that the emergencies of the state called for his assistance, and that he was ever ready to serve his country. Most of the Whig party were turned out of the new cabinet, and Mr. Peel returned to office. The first measure carried under the duke's ministry was the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, which, in the time of the Stuarts, had been made to exclude dissenters from parliament and public employments, by compelling every one admitted into corporations, or accepting any office, civil or military, to receive the sacrament according to the rites of the church of England. The proposal for the repeal of these laws had been brought forward by Sir Samuel Romilly and Lord John Russell: it was left for Mr. Peel to carry out.

The repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts was only a prelude to the far more important point of Catholic emancipation. Again did Sir Francis Burdett bring forward a resolution that "The House resolve itself into a committee, for the purpose of taking into consideration the state of the laws affecting his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in Great Britain and Ireland, with a view to such a final and conciliatory adjustment as may be conducive to the peace and strength of the United Kingdom, to the stability of the Protestant establishment, and to the general satisfaction and concord of all classes of his majesty's subjects." After a debate, which lasted three nights, Sir Francis Burdett's motion was carried by a majority of six. A conference was then held with the House of Lords on the subject, and the Lords expressed themselves decidedly against the adoption of the resolution. But the clamours from Ireland were too loud to be suppressed; and the government became convinced that Catholic emancipation was the only means of restoring law and order to that country.

The ministry, especially the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Peel, had resolutely declared against granting the relief desired by the Catholics. Now that they felt that rebellion and civil war might be the result of a continued refusal, they made up their minds to yield. On the opening of parliament, in 1829, the king recommended the members of both Houses to take into consideration the condition of Ireland, and the laws which imposed civil disabilities on his Catholic subjects. At the same time, Mr. Peel, who sat in parliament as member for the university of Oxford, resigned his seat, because he said he felt himself obliged to advise the king to grant claims to resist which he had been elected. The members of the university, in indignation, sent Sir R. H. Inglis to represent them in the Commons; and Mr. Peel was elected as member for the borough of Westbury. A cry of anger arose from the Tories, and from a large body of the Protestant clergy; and the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Peel were denounced as "arch-apostates." The Marquis of Winchelsea was so violent in his condemnation of the duke, that the latter demanded satisfaction, and a duel was the result. It took place on the 21st of March. The duke having fired without effect, the marquis discharged his pistol in the air, and then admitted that he regretted having charged the duke with disgraceful and criminal motives.

The Roman Catholic Relief Bill was introduced into the House of Commons on the 5th of March, 1829, by Mr. Peel, in a speech that lasted for nearly five hours. In it he referred to his own reluctant change of conduct, and justified it upon the grounds of an inevitable state necessity. He urged that it was impossible for government to avert any longer a decision upon the subject. This question had poisoned the civil intercourse of Ireland; family was divided against family; the bonds of civil life were burst asunder; the tranquillity of the country was disturbed; and the fountains of justice were turned from their proper direction. The principle of the measure, he said, was the abolition of civil distinctions, and the equality of political rights. He proposed to substitute for the oath of supremacy, on entering parliament, an oath of fidelity to the existing institutions in church and state: to admit Catholics to all offices except those of Regent, Lord Chancellor, Viceroy of Ireland, and such as were connected with the church, its universities and schools. In conclusion, he said—"I trust that, by the means now proposed, the moral storm may be appeased, the turbid waters of strife may subside, and the elements of discord may be stilled and composed. But if these expectations shall be disappointed—if, unhappily, civil strife and contentions shall survive the restoration of political privileges—if there be something inherent in the Roman Catholic religion which disdains equality, and will be satisfied with nothing short of ascendancy—still I am content to run the hazard of the change. The contest, if inevitable, will be fought with other objects and with other arms. The contest then will be, not for an equality of civil rights, but for the predominance of an intolerant religion. We shall be able to fight that battle more advantageously after this measure shall have passed, than we could do at present. We shall have dissolved the great moral alliance that has hitherto given strength to the cause of the Catholics. We shall have ranged on our side the illustrious authorities which have heretofore been enlisted on theirs; the rallying cry of civil liberty will then be all our own. We shall enter the field with the full assurance of victory—armed with the consciousness of having done justice, and of being in the right—backed by the unanimous feeling of England, by the firm union of orthodoxy and dissent, by the applauding voice of Scotland—and, if other aid be requisite, cheered by the sympathies of every free state in either hemisphere, and by the wishes and prayers of every free man, in whatever clime, or under whatever form of government, he may live." This speech was deservedly much applauded; the bill was debated vigorously on each of its three readings, and finally carried by a majority of 178.

It had next to be debated by the House of Lords, and it was brought forward in that assembly by the Duke of Wellington the very day it had passed the Commons—the 31st of March, 1829. On the debate following the second reading of the bill, the duke made some remarks which have gained him much celebrity. "It has been my fortune," said he, "to have seen much of war—more than most men. I was constantly engaged in the duties of my profession from boyhood until I grew gray. My life has been passed in familiarity with scenes of death and human suffering. Unfortunately, I have been chiefly engaged in countries where the war was internal, where a civil war was maintained by conflicting factions. I must say, that at any sacrifice I would avoid every approach to the horrors of a civil war. My lords, I would do all I could—I would run any risk—I would sacrifice my life to prevent such a catastrophe!" He added, that unless the Irish people were conciliated by the grant of Catholic emancipation, a civil war must be the result.

Very little doubt can be held that the fears of the duke were well founded. Still the bill was opposed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Primate of Ireland, the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of Durham, Salisbury, and London, by Lord Eldon, and nearly a dozen other lords. Lord Eldon, who was always opposed to every change, however slight, and to every concession to either dissenters or Roman Catholics, was quite sure that, sooner or later, the bill would overturn the aristocracy and the monarchy. His statement, however, was only received with ironical cheers by the Duke of Wellington, which was just the sort of reception it deserved. The bill was debated in the House of Lords for four nights, and passed by the immense majority of 204.

It was then necessary for the measure to receive the assent of the king, which it was known he had the strongest objection to give. It is said that he hesitated, bewailed his hard fate, and even shed tears, exclaiming, "What can I do? what can I fall back upon? I am miserable, wretched; my situation is dreadful; nobody about me to advise with. If I do give my assent, I'll go to the baths abroad, and from thence to Hanover; I'll return no more to England. I'll make no more Catholic peers. I'll return no more; let them get a Catholic king in Clarence." After all, the king sanctioned the bill. Indeed, when any measure has been passed by the Houses of Lords and Commons, the assent of the king is little more than a state ceremony. As a result of the bill, eight Roman Catholic peers took their seats in the House of Lords, and the famous Irish agitator, Mr. Daniel O'Connell, took his seat in the House of Commons. The government placed some petty obstructions in his way, for which he had his revenge by raising a cry for the repeal of the union between England and Ireland, and pledging his life for the accomplishment of that object.

The subject of parliamentary reform—that is, a better and purer representation of the people in parliament—had many times been brought before the notice of the Commons. Soon after the passing of the Catholic Relief Bill, the Marquis of Blandford moved a series of resolutions on the subject. It was necessary to abolish the shameful custom of buying seats in that assembly; but as yet the attention of the nation was not aroused to the subject, and the Commons decided, by an overwhelming majority, that they did not need any reform, and that they would not have any. A very different story was told a few years afterwards.

During this year (1829) every branch of trade was much depressed, and working-men throughout the country suffered great privations. A committee, appointed to inquire into the subject, reported that, in several townships in the neighbourhood of Huddersfield, there were as many as 13,000 weavers who had no more than 2½*d.* a day to live upon. Such frightful distress soon led to serious disturbances. The weavers of Spitalfields and Bethnal Green set the example by refusing to work except at an increased rate of wages, and by destroying the webs in the looms of their masters, until the latter acceded to their demands as the only means of saving their property. The silk-weavers of Macclesfield, Coventry, Nuneaton, Bedford, and other places, followed the same mischievous examples, and with the same success—a success which was only temporary; for though masters yielded to save their property, they had no intention of continuing an increase of wages wrung from them by intimidation. The sufferings of the poor weavers, added to their ignorance, will plead their excuse; but the silk trade had declined, and the masters shared in the distress felt by the men. Parliament interfered, and a bill was passed for the relief of the trade, by reducing the duties imposed on the importation of raw silk.

In the February of this year, the noble cathedral of York narrowly escaped destruction. It was set on fire by a religious fanatic of the name of Martin. On his trial, this man said that he had a dream, which induced him to set fire to the Minster. He had written five letters to the clergy; but as he received no answer to any of them, he prayed to the Lord to direct him what to do. Upon that he had another dream, in which he saw a cloud hanging over the Minster, and afterwards come and settle above the place in which he lodged. Then he said he thought himself destined to destroy all things, and he prayed again to God for direction. Suddenly he heard a voice proclaiming that he was to destroy the cathedral, on account of the sins of the clergy; and then he had no rest, night or day, until he accomplished his design. That design he effected so far, that the conflagration was not stopped until the falling-in of the roof of the building; and an amount of damage was done which it was estimated would cost £60,000 to repair. Martin was acquitted of the crime on the ground of insanity.

The distress which prevailed throughout the country, and the feeling that a wise government could alleviate it, gave rise, in 1830, to societies called Political Unions. Their object was to procure a proper consideration of the national grievances, and to obtain such a reform in the House of Commons as would ensure a representation of the lower and middle classes of society. The principles of these unions may be understood from an address put forth by the most important of them, that of Birmingham. "We use no violence," it said, "and we allow none. We only seek justice for ourselves and for our country. We put in force two constitutional rights—the right of meeting together peacefully and legally, and the right of petitioning parliament. We only meet, consult, resolve, and petition. We discuss the effect of public measures upon our own affairs, and we take the proper legal steps for securing our own redress. In a great national emergency, when the legislature has lost its landmarks and its guides to the national welfare, we bring forward the intelligence, the public spirit, and the practical knowledge of the industrious classes, to the aid of the legislative council." These political unions, started in nearly every large town in the kingdom, had no trifling share in helping forward that famous measure, the first Reform Bill, which was passed in the following reign.

On the 4th of February, 1830, George IV. opened his last parliament. Various debates followed—upon the state of the country, on reductions in the national expenditure, on the currency, and upon reform in parliament. Lord Blandford again moved for leave to bring forward a bill for that purpose. On this occasion, Sir Francis Burdett made some amusing disclosures of the corrupt system by which members of parliament were then returned for small boroughs. He said—"Early in life I came into this House in order to defend the constitution of England. I purchased my seat of a boroughmonger. I purchased it of the Duke of Newcastle. He was no patron of mine; he took my money, and by purchase I obtained a right to speak in the most public place in England. With my views, and my love of the liberty of my country, I did not grudge the sacrifice I made for that commanding consideration." Although Lord Blandford's motion was lost, so open an exposure of the secrets of the old corrupt system, was regarded as an omen of its approaching destruction.

The advocates of parliamentary reform were determined that it should not be lost sight of; and Mr. O'Connell next moved for leave to bring in a bill for a radical reform of the Commons' House of Parliament. It was useless: the motion was defeated by an enormous majority; but a purification of parliament had now become a topic of conversation over all England. Among the other measures brought before this parliament, were proposals for a revision of taxation; for the reduction of the interest of the public debt; for inquiries into the land revenues of the crown; for the repeal of the corn-laws; for inquiry into the state of Ireland; for reforming the church of Ireland; and for abolishing the office of lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Mr. Brougham brought the defects of the English courts of law before the notice of the House of Commons in a brilliant speech, which lasted for six hours. A very interesting debate also followed a motion of Mr. Robert Grant to admit Jews into parliament. The bill at first was favourably received, but defeated on the second reading.

For some time the king had been suffering from illness, and living in seclusion in what he termed his "cottage at Windsor." A life of selfish pleasures had led to a desolate, debilitated, and peevish old age. At the commencement of 1830, he had an attack which made those around him think that his days were numbered. However, he partially recovered, and was able to take the air in his carriage. But, on the 15th of April, the royal physicians issued a bulletin, saying that the king had a bilious attack, attended with difficulty of breathing. On the 24th of May, the Duke of Wellington informed the House of Lords that the king was unable, without great pain, to write his name to those public papers which required his signature. Arrangements were accordingly made for affixing his name to such documents as required it by means of a stamp.

In the meantime the king got rapidly worse; and on the morning of the 26th of June, 1830, he ruptured a blood-vessel in the stomach, and expired almost immediately. He was in his sixty-eighth year, and had ruled England ten years as king, and for nine years previously in the character of regent.

As a king, George IV. was a sort of negative character, and can scarcely be said to have done either good or harm. He was neither soldier, statesman, or scholar, nor distinguished by any brilliant qualifications. Yet he possessed good natural qualities, a knowledge of the world, particularly of the gay and vicious part of it, and his urbanity of manners obtained for him, from his admirers, the title of "the first gentleman of the age." His reign was favourable to liberty and national progress, because the mind of the people was awakened; and the king, from indolence and a love of pleasure, permitted—at least to a considerable extent—things to take their own course. He did not possess the high notions of kingly power entertained by his father. He never made any harsh or shameful use of his regal prerogative, but was contented to govern constitutionally through his ministers. The latter were almost exclusively of the Tory party, to which George naturally leaned, though he sometimes showed a faint desire to conciliate his early friends, the Whigs. A serious charge against him was his laxity of principle, and the little value which he placed upon his word. It seems to have cost him no struggle to condescend to falsehood. Prodigal in his nature, he had a passion for expensive pageantries; but his taste has been ridiculed as being rather gaudy than either correct or magnificent.

The private character of George IV. was stained by many vices: but censure towards him should be mixed with a forbearing pity, as he was, undoubtedly, drawn into habits of vice and licentiousness by the leading Whigs of the day—especially Fox and Sheridan—who aimed at making him their leader in opposition to his father's government. The greatest blot upon his character was his cruelty to his unfortunate queen. Her accusation, exile, sufferings, and death, are generally attributed to his bitter dislike. She was less his wife than a bride-decked sacrifice to his creditors. He married her to induce the nation to pay his debts; and cast her off and slandered her that he might readily amuse himself with others of her sex. He was punished for his cruelty: death deprived him not only of the wife he hated, but of the child he loved. His early associates had long since gone to the grave; and he died, notwithstanding his magnificence and his throngs of attendants, a peevish, worn-out, solitary man, alike unloving and unloved by the people generally.

The most illustrious men and women in science, art, and literature that adorned this brief reign, have already been enumerated in the last chapter. A circumstance, in connection with education and the people's progress, may here, however, be mentioned, as, for its importance and the good it is doing, and will continue to do, it deserves to stand by itself. That circumstance was the foundation, in the year 1823, by Dr. Birkbeck and Mr. Brougham, of the London Mechanics' Institution. Its object was to educate the working classes, especially in those scientific principles which are connected with their daily avocations. The idea was so admirable, that similar societies were, in a short time, established in nearly all the great towns of England. From that time to this, the good work has been going on; and now almost every little town, and even many villages, have their Mechanics' Institution, or Mutual Instruction Society; with its library, lectures, discussions, and classes for acquiring useful branches of knowledge. Certainly the support bestowed upon them has been rather precarious; while some flourish, others drag on a meagre and languishing existence. This is to be expected until the people learn the inestimable value of such societies. Unfortunately, the majority of our working classes are as yet too ignorant to show a desire to participate in advantages intended especially for their welfare. It will be otherwise in time: "the schoolmaster is abroad" among the people, teaching them that education, bare and imperfect as it may sometimes be—self-education, if no better is to be readily had—is the best safeguard for good government; the best protector of national freedom; the best nursery of wise laws; the best preventative of misery and crime; and the best means of making a people prosperous, happy, and intelligent.

CHAPTER CI.

THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE FOURTH.—A.D. 1830—1832.

EORGE THE FOURTH was succeeded on the throne by his brother William, Duke of Clarence, and third son of King George the Third. The new monarch was immediately proclaimed as WILLIAM THE FOURTH. He was born on the 21st of August, 1765 and being a stout, hardy lad, his father had destined him for the navy. He entered that service as a midshipman, and was present in one or two engagements, but had no opportunity of acquiring distinction. On some occasions, while passing through his nautical probation, he presumed on his high birth to excuse neglect of duty; and when he had gained the command of a ship, he twice quitted a foreign station without leave. He was generous, but thoughtless, and his early life was stained by many jovial irregularities. Eventually, he withdrew from the active exercise of his profession; but was, notwithstanding, advanced in rank until he obtained the office of Lord High Admiral, and was created Duke of Clarence, with an allowance of £12,000 a year. In early life he became attached to Mrs. Jordan, an erring but amiable and attractive actress, with whom he lived for a period of twenty years, and by whom he had a large family. He left her about the year 1810; and the unhappy lady died in poverty, some years afterwards, in France. William's object in abandoning her was a selfish one; it was, that he might marry a wealthy heiress, named Sophia Long; but the rich young lady preferred some one else. He was at last, in 1818, allied to the Princess Adelaide, eldest daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen. By this lady he had two daughters, but they both died in infancy.

William, who obtained the name of the "Sailor King," was sixty-six years old when he ascended the throne, and could not hope to enjoy it very long. His little niece, the Princess Alexandrina Victoria, the heiress-presumptive, was but eleven. The new king was supposed to be very liberal in his political opinions; but he kept his late brother's Tory ministers.

On the very day on which George IV. breathed his last, a startling insurrection broke out in Paris, and shortly terminated in another revolution. Louis XVIII. had died on the 16th of September, 1824. His successor, Charles X., had for his chief minister Prince Polignac, a man whose extravagant attempts at despotism ruined his master. By his advice, Charles resolved to govern by his own decrees; or, in plainer language, to do just as he pleased in defiance of law. King and minister thought they could rule as they liked if they put down all the newspapers that did not approve of their conduct. Consequently, on the 26th of July, 1830, they issued six ordinances, by which they destroyed the liberty of the press, dissolved the Chamber of Deputies, or French parliament, and altered the number of deputies and mode of electing them in such a manner as to place that right only in the hands of wealthy people. These ordinances were resolutely resisted by the nation: the tyrannical king endeavoured to enforce them with the aid of the military; the famous three days of revolution, called the Three Days of July, followed; the people were victorious, and Charles X. was driven from France to end his days in exile in England. The government of this country, however, had learnt wisdom from the past; they would not adopt his cause, or even recognise him as king; but they gave him an asylum as a private gentleman, and addressed him only by his former title of the Count Ponthieu. He was succeeded on the throne by another member of the Bourbon family, Louis Philippe, the Duke of Orleans, who ruled, not as a sovereign of France, but as "King of the French;" by which was meant, that he derived his title from the people, and could therefore be deposed by them if he betrayed his trust.

These events in France, occurring on the eve of a general election in England, greatly aided the liberal character of the new parliament, and helped forward the reform question. The Duke of Wellington was considered as a domineering and despotic minister (which he was not), and the elections went so far against him, that he tried to strengthen himself in the House of Commons by uniting with the followers of the late Mr. Canning. That party was represented by Mr. Huskisson, a gentleman of great talent as a financier. It was therefore arranged that the duke and Mr. Huskisson should meet at an approaching ceremony of great importance; no less than the opening of the first railway in England—a line from Manchester to Liverpool. This great triumph of art and industry took place on the 15th of September, 1830, in the sight of astonished thousands, amongst whom were many of the most noble and illustrious persons in England. The glorious experiment was perfectly successful; but the general satisfaction was damped by a melancholy incident.

The terrific power of steam was not understood, or not reflected upon, by the gentlemen engaged in the experimental trip. When the train stopped at Parkside, the thoughtless passengers got out, and stood talking in little groups upon the line. The result was, that Mr. Huskisson was overtaken by an engine coming in an opposite direction, knocked down, and had his left thigh broken and lacerated in a frightful manner. The unfortunate statesman, who bore his sufferings with heroic fortitude, expired in the evening. The contemplated union between the Duke of Wellington and the Canningite party was thus broken off, and the latter leant rather to the Liberal than the Tory cause.

The new parliament opened on the 26th of October, 1830, when Earl Grey declared the people throughout the country to be anxiously waiting for a reform in parliament, and asked whether ministers were prepared to bring forward any measure of that character. The reply of the Duke of Wellington sealed the fate of his ministry. He said the noble lord alluded to something in the shape of parliamentary reform. The noble lord had, however, been candid enough to acknowledge that he was not prepared with any measure of reform; and he would have as little scruple to say, that his majesty's government was as totally unprepared as the noble lord. Nay, he on his own part would go further, and say he had never heard or read of any measure, up to the present moment, which could in any degree satisfy his mind that the state of the representation could be improved or rendered more satisfactory to the country at large than at that moment. He would not, however, at such an unreasonable time, enter upon the subject, or excite discussion; but he should not hesitate to declare unequivocally what were his sentiments upon it. He was not only unprepared to bring forward any measure of this nature, but he would at once declare that, as far as he was concerned, as long as he held any station in the government of the country, he should always feel it his duty to resist such measures when proposed by others.

This speech gave rise to so much dissatisfaction, that the duke considered it prudent to postpone an engagement which the king and queen had made to dine with the Lord Mayor and citizens of London at Guildhall. He feared that an attack might be made upon him by the people, and that perhaps, in the general excitement, insult or outrage might be offered to their majesties. Great excitement followed this postponement; the stocks fell nearly three per cent. in little more than an hour, trade was at a standstill, and the timid believed the country was on the eve of a revolution.

On the 15th of November, the ministry was left in a considerable minority in the House of Commons; and that evening the Duke of Wellington and his colleagues resigned their offices. Great was the dismay of the Tory party; but greater still was the joy of the English people. The feeling of triumph rose higher when it was known that the new ministry was to be formed of statesmen who had been the most ardent and unwearied advocates of parliamentary reform. Earl Grey was the new prime minister; Mr. Brougham became Lord Chancellor. The other most distinguished members were—Lord Durham, Sir James Graham, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Holland, Lord Althorp, Lord Melbourne, Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston, and Mr. Denman.

Petitions in favour of reform poured in upon the new ministry from all parts of England. The political unions throughout the country evinced extraordinary activity. It was even rumoured that 100,000 men would march to London in a body to demand reform. The Tory party feared a revolution which should end in the destruction of property. Unhappily, in the rural districts, where the people are always most ignorant, there were some wicked, desperate men whose actions gave a colour to these fears. The close of the year 1830 was distinguished by the frequent burning of hayricks, farmhouses, and agricultural machinery. These conflagrations were effected in so mysterious a manner, that the incendiaries were scarcely ever detected. A blue speck was seen in the air, which soon ran along the ridge of a stack, and presently it was enveloped in flames. This wickedness (probably dictated by the distress of the ignorant labourers) arose in Kent, and spread from thence into Hampshire, Wiltshire, Buckinghamshire, Sussex, and Surrey. The military were called out, and large rewards offered for the detection of offenders, but with very little result.

Parliament reassembled on the 3rd of February, 1831, when Earl Grey said his majesty's government had succeeded in framing a measure upon the subject of reform, which he trusted would prove satisfactory to the country, without transgressing the bounds of well-considered and just moderation. On the 1st of March, application was made to the House of Commons, by Lord John Russell, for leave to bring forward the bill. The Speaker had never remembered the House so full as it was that night: the galleries, also, were crowded with strangers; and the building was thronged around by dense masses of excited people. According to the bill brought forward by Lord John Russell, sixty boroughs—rotten boroughs they were called, which returned such members to parliament as their owners bid them do—were to be disfranchised; that is, deprived of the right of returning members to parliament for the future. Forty-seven other small boroughs were only to return one member each. On the other side, populous places were to send members to parliament insead of the rotten boroughs; the suffrage was to be extended to the inhabitants of houses rated at £10 a year; and by this means the voters were increased half a million.

Most of the reformers among the people thought that this measure was not much to boast of, and that it did not effect so great an improvement as was desirable; but they consented to be satisfied with it notwithstanding. After seven nights of debate, leave was granted to bring in the bill. In a short time, shouts rang through the land of "The bill, the whole bill, and nothing but the bill!" On the second reading, however, ministers experienced a defeat. Sir Richard Vyvian urged upon the House the danger of introducing into the legislature a strong democratic influence which, he said, would ere long overpower the other branches; and he moved as an amendment that the bill be read that day six months; which meant, that it should be altogether abandoned. This amendment was lost, in a House of 600 members, by only one vote; and ministers, feeling that, under such circumstances, they could not pass the measure to which they had pledged themselves, offered to resign. The king declined to accept their resignation, and begged them to proceed with the public business, and carry the Reform Bill as well as they could. In reply, they requested him to dissolve the parliament, and appeal again to the excited people, whose loud clamours for reform seemed to herald the storm of revolution. William hesitated, until he was told that some of the peers had spoken of a dissolution as a step he dared not hazard. This roused the temper of the Sailor King, and he resolved instantly to proceed to the House of Lords for that purpose. An order was given for the royal carriages to be prepared. "Never mind the carriages," exclaimed the impatient sovereign; "send for a hackney-coach."

Parliament was prorogued and dissolved the next day, in spite of the passionate bitterness and excitement of the Tory peers and commoners. Very different, however, was the feeling of the people: by them the dissolution was celebrated by illuminations; and in London an immense mob paraded the streets, and broke the windows of those houses that were not lit up. The dwellings of the Bishop of London, the Marquis of Cleveland, the Marquis of Londonderry, and Lord Grantham, were assailed. That of the Duke of Wellington was subjected to a shower of stones; but the mob retired on being informed that the Duchess of Wellington then lay dead in the house.

The election for the new parliament proceeded rapidly. Such was the feeling of the aroused people, that the Tories scarcely dared show themselves on the hustings. The new House of Commons, which met on the 14th of June, was therefore purged of many of the opponents of reform. On the 24th, Lord John Russell brought forward a new Reform Bill, or rather the old one again with a few alterations. After a great deal of debating and excitement, it was carried, on the 22nd of September, by 345 votes against 236. This news was received by the anxious crowds around the House with loud and prolonged shouts, which were repeated all over London, and through the livelong night. Soon the glad tidings reached the country, where they were received by the ringing of the church bells in merry triumph, by the waving of banners, and the dull booming of cannon.

But all this joy was premature; the bill had yet to pass the startled House of Lords; the members of which looked upon all reform as revolution, and were resolved to oppose the measure to the last. Lord Grey brought it forward, and earnestly appealed to the bishops in its favour. It was in vain; they all, with the singular exception of the Bishop of Norwich, voted against it. Petitions poured into the House of Peers in favour of the bill; and one came from the political union of Birmingham, signed by 100,000 names. Lord Wharncliffe moved that the bill be rejected—a mode of refusing the sanction of the House intended to imply contempt; but his motion was overruled. Lord Eldon spoke mournfully, and the Duke of Wellington bitterly, against the bill. One statesman, however—a newly-created peer, the reform Chancellor, Lord Brougham—made a noble and most impassioned oration on its behalf. For four hours he reviewed the opinions of the various speakers against the bill, in a strain of mingled reasoning and sarcasm, and concluded by imploring their lordships, on his knees, not to reject it. Notwithstanding the eloquence of the Chancellor, the efforts of the ministers, and the fear of the people, the Lords, after a debate which lasted for five nights, rejected the bill by a majority of forty-one!

This information was received by the country with a storm of passionate excitement. A majority of the House of Lords was able to defeat a measure which the people, the Commons, and the king all considered imperatively necessary. Public meetings were held all over England, and petitions sent to the king, praying him to stand by his present ministers, and to create such a number of Liberal peers as would be necessary to carry the bill through the House of Lords. Amongst the lowest of the people excitement led to violence: the windows of Apsley House were pelted with stones; the Marquis of Londonderry was assailed in a similar manner; while the obnoxious Duke of Cumberland was dragged from his horse by the mob, and would, perhaps, have lost his life had he not been rescued by the police. At Birmingham a meeting of the political union took place, at which not less than 150,000 persons were said to be present. All pledged themselves not to pay any taxes until the bill had passed. At Bristol a very serious riot took place on the public entry of the Tory recorder, Sir Charles Wetherell, into that city to hold the sessions. In spite of the presence of the military, he was groaned at, hissed, and pelted with so much fury, that, having reached the Mansion-house and opened his commission, he was glad to escape in disguise.

His flight did not calm the excited feelings of the mob, which, the next morning—a Sunday—broke into the Mansion-house, took possession of its wine-cellars, and drank themselves either furious or insensible. The colonel of the military, a humane but timid man, refused to let the soldiers act. The result was, that the drunken mob broke open the gaols, liberated the prisoners, and burnt down the bishop's palace, the Custom-house, the Excise Office, and two sides of Queen's Square. Many of the ruffians, too drunk to move from the scene of destruction, were consumed in the blazing ruins. The citizens hastened to repress these scenes of outrage; the military were authorised to act; and after several charges had been made upon the mob, and about 100 persons killed or wounded, tranquillity was restored. About 200 prisoners were taken and tried by a special commission; eighty-one were convicted, and four suffered the penalty of death. The conduct of Colonel Breton, who commanded the troops in the first instance, was submitted to the inquiry of a military court, which excited the unhappy gentleman to such an extent, that he shot himself through the heart.

At Nottingham, also, great riots took place, and its castle was fired and plundered by a mob. This was in consequence of the extreme unpopularity of its owner, the Duke of Newcastle, who not only steadily opposed the Reform Bill, but dictated to the inhabitants of the boroughs on his estates who they should elect to represent them in parliament, and asked the insolent question, "May I not do as I like with my own?" His own! as if the people who rented his land were his property as well as the land itself. The leaders of the rioters who burnt Nottingham Castle escaped detection; but nine persons were convicted for other serious riots, and three of them suffered the last and most solemn penalty of the law. Great efforts were made to save them, on the ground that the crimes of which they had been guilty were not the result of premeditation, but of violent political excitement.

On the 31st of October, a large meeting of the London Political Union assembled in Lincoln's Inn Fields. On this occasion a division took place among the members, as many considered that the proposed Reform Bill did not go far enough. An immense number of working-men seceded from the London Political Union, and established a Metropolitan Union, which demanded universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and the abolition of all hereditary distinctions. To promote these objects, a meeting of all the working-men throughout the country was summoned at White Conduit House. The government took alarm, surrounded the city with troops, swore-in large bodies of special constables, and directed the magistrates to inform the most active leaders of the union that the proposed meeting was illegal. Deputies from the latter accordingly waited upon Lord Melbourne, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to explain their views. That nobleman received them with much politeness, and, in a kindly manner, pointed out to them that many parts of the address they had issued were seditious, if not treasonable, and might subject all who attended the meeting to serious consequences. The manly frankness of the minister made such an impression on the deputies, that the idea of the great meeting was abandoned. A proclamation was soon after issued against political unions in general; but in the then excited condition of the country, little notice could be taken of it.

The king advocated the reform of parliament so far, that the people, in good-humoured allusion to his name of William, had given him the title of "Reform BILL." Immediately after that great measure had been thrown out by the House of Lords, he prorogued parliament, to give an opportunity for the bill to be again brought forward. On the 6th of December, parliament was re-opened, and on the 12th, Lord John Russell once more moved for leave to introduce a new Reform Bill. It was, of course, the old bill containing only some alterations in detail, founded upon the recent census. In consequence of the Christmas recess, the third reading did not take place until the 19th of March in the following year, the memorable 1832. It was then determined that the measure should have the milder title of "A Bill to Amend the Representation of the People of England and Wales;" and it was carried by 355 votes against 239, giving a majority of 116.

Once again was the Reform Bill brought before the House of Lords; and the nation generally awaited their decision with that strange, ominous silence which so often, in nature as in society, precedes a storm. Many of the Tory peers began to waver; and, after a debate of five nights, the second reading of the bill was carried by nine votes. The Duke of Wellington, however, who had been its most unrelenting opponent, entered a vehement protest against it on the books of the House—a protest which was signed by seventy-four other peers.

Parliament then adjourned for the Easter recess, and the country was literally convulsed with exultation and political excitement. The Birmingham Political Union convened a large meeting of all kindred associations of the neighbouring counties, to be held at the foot of Newhall Hill. It took place on the 7th of May, when the greatest public meeting ever known in England was assembled. The people formed a procession of four miles in length, accompanied by 700 banners and 200 bands of music. A popular production in favour of liberty, called the "Union Hymn," was then sung by that vast multitude. The people uncovered their heads, and, in a solemn manner, repeated, after one of their leaders, the following words:—"With unbroken faith, through every peril and privation, we here devote ourselves and our children to our country's cause." In conclusion, a petition was presented to the House of Lords, imploring their lordships not to drive to despair a high-minded, generous, and fearless people, or to urge them, by neglecting their claims, to make demands of a more extensive nature; but rather to pass the Reform Bill into a law, unimpaired in any of its provisions, and more especially uninjured in the clauses relating to the £10 franchise. Other great meetings were held at Liverpool, Manchester, Sheffield, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Paisley, and Dundee. In London the National Union held a meeting, and got up a petition to the Lords, which declared that if the bill were rejected or mutilated, "there was reason to expect that taxes would cease to be paid, that other obligations of society would be disregarded, that the authorities would be powerless, and that the ultimate consequence might be the utter extinction of the privileged orders."

But the Lords still protracted the struggle; and, on the 7th of May, on one clause of the bill, then in committee, they obtained a majority of thirty-five against the ministry.* The defeated reform statesmen held a council, and at length resolved on advising the king to overcome the obstinacy of the Lords by the creation of a sufficient number of new peers to allow the bill to pass. William hesitated. Such an act was considered the most important use he could make of the royal prerogative. He had, besides, been alarmed by the representations of his queen, and other female relatives, who were strongly attached to the aristocratic cause, and adverse to reform. It is even said that the king shed tears; at any rate he refused to accede to the request of his ministers, and they resigned. William desired time for reflection; but the next morning they were informed that their resignation was accepted.

It was instantly reported that the king had abandoned the popular cause, and dismissed his reform ministers. Indignation, sorrow, and astonishment seized the people, and business was at an end. The streets were filled with mobs; church bells tolled dismally; public-house signs of the "King's Head" were hung with crape, and those of the "Queen" blackened. The National Union met; declared its sessions permanent; enrolled 1,200 members that evening, and 2,000 more the next day. Resolutions were passed expressing confidence in Earl Grey and his colleagues, and proclaiming any one a public enemy who should advise the dissolution of parliament. A petition was addressed to the House of Commons, praying that body to withhold all supplies until the bill should be passed. The common council and livery of London pursued a similar course; and enormous public meetings took place in all the suburbs of the metropolis. At Birmingham the excitement was most alarming, and printed placards were placed in many of the windows, stating that no taxes would be paid until the passing of the bill. Another gigantic meeting was held at Newhall Hill, when the people resolved on arming and marching upon London to demand their rights. Everywhere it seemed as if a terrible revolution was about to burst forth, and that an attempt would be made to obtain, by force of arms, that which was denied to right and reason.

The king, lately so popular, could no longer pass between London and Windsor without insult, and the fear of something worse. But the Duke of Wellington was the chief object of the national wrath. He was the leader of the anti-reformers, and had resolved upon military government. Yes! it was said, he who had once declared that he would sacrifice his life sooner than see his country the prey of civil war, was now, in his blind opposition to a just and necessary change, ready to bring down that awful infliction upon the land. Officers were ordered to join their regiments; and the Scots Grays, located at Birmingham, were employed in grinding their sabres. Immense bodies of men were expected to march from the northern and southern counties, and to encamp near London. The Scots Grays, it was rumoured, were to oppose their march; and all minds were excited and alarmed; moderate reformers blaming the steps taken, by inflammatory speeches, pamphlets, articles in newspapers, and placards, to goad on the populace to violence if their demands were refused. Providentially, the storm was at its height. The Tory peers, finding what was the state of the public feeling, refused to take office when solicited by the king, and advised him to recall the "reform ministry." He did so; and, on the 18th of May, Earl Grey and his colleagues were reinstated. A cry of joy rose up from the people, and national mourning was converted into national enthusiasm. No news of a great victory—no new Trafalgar or Waterloo—could have excited such delight. The king and Earl Grey were quite besieged with congratulatory addresses. The Lords now had only the alternative of passing the bill, or submitting to the creation of a number of new peers. To save the dignity of their order they abandoned all opposition. The Duke of Wellington and about 100 peers left the House; and, on the 4th of June, 1832, the Reform Bill passed the Lords, received the royal assent three days afterwards, and thus became the law of the land!—Separate bills were afterwards passed for Scotland and Ireland.

Great was the joy, and brilliant the illuminations, that followed the passing of the bill. No men were so popular as Earl Grey, Lord Brougham, and Lord John Russell—no man more unpopular than the Duke of Wellington, who had won so much honour and glory for his country. When the calm came, there was disappointment with it. It was found that the Reform Bill was framed—as its opponents always declared it was—more to benefit the Whig party than the people; and, after the lapse of a very short period, the cry was raised for a further, a greater, and a more decisive change, which the Whigs shrank from making.

CHAPTER CII.

CONCLUSION OF THE REIGN OF WILLIAM THE FOURTH.—A.D. 1832—1837.

DURING the excitement which prevailed in England, in 1831, about the Reform Bill, the people were visited by that much-dreaded plague, the cholera morbus. Arising in Asia, this mysterious scourge (the nature of which medical science has not yet comprehended) proceeded, like some invisible giant, along the banks of the Ganges, through the north of Europe, and from thence to England. The rapidity with which its victims were carried off created much gloom and alarm. In some cases, men who had gone to their business in apparent health in the morning, were smitten and dead before the evening. The accounts of its ravages, however, seem to have been exaggerated, and the visitation was not so severe as people had been led to expect. Fear was found to be the greatest means of spreading this disease; temperance and a tranquil mind the best mode of avoiding it.

Soon after the passing of the Reform Bill, and before the excitement had cooled down, the Duke of Wellington, in paying a visit to the Mint, was not only shamefully hooted by the mob, but pelted with stones and mud. One man even seized the bridal of his horse, and endeavoured to throw the duke from his seat—an outrage he would have succeeded in but for the interference of the police. At first the duke treated the insults of the mob with stolid indifference, saying he did not mind what was going on; but he was afterwards compelled to take refuge in the chambers of Sir Charles Wetherell, in Lincoln's Inn, until the assistance of a body of police could be procured to see him safely to Apsley House. His grace covered the windows of that house with iron, to protect them and himself from the unthinking violence of the metropolitan populace; and these iron safeguards remained till after his death. This last outrage upon the duke occurred on the 18th of June, the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo—a day when his services ought to have been remembered, and at least have protected him from insult. The next day, the king, while attending Ascot races, had some stones thrown at him by a discharged and wooden-legged Greenwich pensioner. The act did not proceed from political motives, but because the man had sent a petition to the king, to which no attention had been paid. Collins, the pensioner, was placed on his trial for high treason, but declared to be insane, and sent to a lunatic asylum.

During the Midsummer of 1832, the son of the great Napoleon went to his grave. As his mother, Maria Louisa, was an Austrian princess, the lad had been brought up in that court with the title of the Duc de Reichstadt. He was kept in extreme seclusion, and educated in a manner calculated to make him forget the startling and gorgeous career of his father. He knew something, however, of the greatness of that extraordinary man. On one occasion, the young prince, while at his lessons, appeared lost in thought, and, on his tutor drawing his attention to the subject before him, he struck his forehead impatiently, and exclaimed, "What do they want with me?—can they imagine I have my father's head?" In the autumn of the year 1831, he was attacked by a prevailing epidemic, and died on the 22nd of July in the following year, having, shortly before, reached his twenty-first birthday.

The English people were gratified with a new election, that they might see the Reform Bill in action; and the first reformed parliament met on the 29th of January, 1833. A number of members of Liberal politics were elected, and great hopes were entertained of the good that was to be done. Catholic emancipation had not succeeded in producing tranquillity in Ireland. It was, indeed, scarcely to be supposed that it should;

and that distracted country was in a wretched condition. The maintenance, by force, of a Protestant established church, in a country almost entirely Catholic, was a source of constant violence, amounting nearly to civil war. In many places it was found impossible to obtain payment of the tithes, and not a few of the collectors were murdered. The perpetrators of outrages of this kind were not only concealed, but applauded by an ignorant and savage peasantry. To remedy this, the government determined upon strong coercive measures; but, to render them palatable, it also brought forward an act for a reform of the Irish church. Two archbishoprics, ten bishoprics, together with the sinecure deaneries, chapters, and benefices attached to them, were to be abolished. Means were, however, taken that spiritual teaching should be attended to by the amalgamation of dioceses. This could easily be done; for there were 200 benefices, each containing less than twenty-five Protestants; and 157 others, in which there were no congregations at all. After much opposition, and some alterations, this bill passed.

Earl Grey introduced his Coercion Bill by an account of many shocking murders and cruelties that had occurred in Ireland: and he showed that juries dared not convict assassins, for fear of the vengeance of the mob. At Kilkenny, he said, a jury had manifested such apprehension, that they were assured their names should be concealed as much as possible. A list of their names, however, had been obtained, and, within half-an-hour of their retiring from the jury-box, a placard was put forth containing that list, headed with the words, "Blood! blood! blood!" To put an end to these proceedings, Earl Grey asked for such a bill to be passed as, under other circumstances, might be considered an attack on the liberties of the people. It was intended, however, only for the preservation of life and property, and to cease when tranquillity was restored to Ireland. Long and fierce debates followed; and the bill was violently opposed by the Irish members, especially by Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Shiel, the latter exclaiming, "Forbear! while there is yet time, forbear! With the same staff with which you strike our liberties to the core, you will commit suicide upon your own." On the ministerial side, it was represented that, to withhold the required power, was to offer encouragement to violence and murder. Sir Robert Peel truly remarked, that to make the wealthy feel they were safe, would afford more relief to the labouring classes, than confiscating all the property in the country. The bill was eventually carried, though in a milder form than at first proposed.

Trading in slaves by English vessels had been abolished in the year 1807; but, unhappily, negro slavery still existed in our colonies in the West Indies. The negroes had risen in insurrection, and demanded their emancipation—a demand which was re-echoed by the people of England. The ministers proposed that the slaves should acquire their liberty by degrees, that they might not fall into excesses from the too sudden possession of so inestimable a blessing. They proposed that negro children born after a certain day, and all who were then under six years of age, should be free; but that all others should be compelled to labour for a fixed period for their present owners, under certain conditions. Twenty millions of money were voted for the compensation of the planters for the loss of their human property. This was much censured by many, who considered that the planters had no right to compensation, because slavery was unnatural; for, as all men were equally regarded by the Deity, no man could have a property in the person of another. The twenty millions, however, was voted; and, on the 1st of August, 1834, the slaves of the West Indies were declared free men. It says much for the moderation and intelligence of the negroes, that that day was passed by them in thanksgivings to God for their deliverance, and not in frantic revelling, or the formation of plans of vengeance against their late owners.

One of the great advocates of negro emancipation was Lord Brougham, who assisted the cause by some brilliant and eloquent orations. But while advocating the cause of humanity abroad, he did not forget that of reform at home. He endeavoured to make law cheap and accessible to the poor man as well as to the rich one; and he laboured zealously in behalf of national education. He also addressed himself to the abolition of the abuses of the court over which he presided—a court whose very name has become associated with the ruin of suitors and the indefinite postponement of justice;—we need scarcely say, the "eternal" Court of Chancery. He procured a bill to be passed, by which thirteen offices in that corrupt court were abolished;—thirteen unnecessary offices, which cost, together with some other evils he put an end to, no less than £70,000 a year!

Many other good measures were passed by the first reform ministry; among the most important of them being the act for amending the poor-laws. Those then existing, though very humanely meant, had been the cause of a great deal of mischief. While they encouraged pauperism, they degraded the independent labourer, and nearly caused the ruin of tradesmen by exorbitant and oppressive rates. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, a statute had been made to provide for the poor, who, before the destruction of the monasteries, during the reign of her father, had been fed at the gates of those establishments. This had remained unaltered until the thirty-sixth year of the reign of George III. An act was then framed, on the principle that relief to paupers ought to be given in such a manner as to place them in a situation of comfort. To magistrates and overseers was granted the power of giving relief to the poor at their own dwellings. This humane regulation was abused in the most disgraceful manner. Numbers of stout, hearty, agricultural labourers preferred living in idleness, on what they could obtain from the parish, to working for their bread like honest men. Farmers beat down the wages of their labourers by telling them to go to the parish, and obtain as charity a part of that sum which they ought to have received as payment for their toil. The morals of the poor were also seriously affected, because every woman of loose behaviour received a small sum per week for each of her illegitimate children. To such an extent was this carried, that some worthless women actually lived upon the offspring of their guilt. The result of this misplaced benevolence was, that poor-rates had risen to such a height, that they came to be regarded as a second rent, which pressed so heavily upon the industrious, that many parishes were abandoned; tradesmen fell to the grade of servants; servants fell back upon the parish: and pauperism was growing more extensive every day.

To put an end to these evils, the new act proposed a central commission, which should possess authority to make general rules and orders as to the mode of relief, and for the regulation of workhouses. Out-door relief was to cease; and those who were old, sick, or destitute, were to be provided for within the workhouse. These establishments were to be regulated in such a manner, that they would no longer be perverted from their true use. They were to be a refuge for the really destitute, and not a home for idle vagabonds. Parishes with only a small number of paupers were to be joined to neighbouring ones with many, that, by means of these unions, rates might be equalised.—The act met with much opposition; but it was passed into a law in August, 1834.

Some altercations arising out of the Irish Coercion Bill, together with the impatience of the people for rapid reforms, and his own advanced age, induced Lord Grey to resign his post as prime minister. The venerable statesman said that, in the preceding March, he had completed his seventieth year; and at that period of life, a man, though he might be able to discharge the duties of office under ordinary circumstances, must feel, in a state of affairs like the present, that they were too much for his strength. The premier had disappointed the expectations of the people, and lost much of his popularity, especially with the dissenters. They had supported him zealously in the struggle for reform, and, in return, expected relief from certain odious restrictions to which they were subject. Their expectations were not realised. The reform ministry was not so powerful as the high-church party; and dissenters were still excluded from the universities, subject to church-rates, and compelled to celebrate their marriages in the parish church.

Lord Melbourne, a Whig nobleman, succeeded Earl Grey as prime minister, and England had still a Liberal government. Lord Melbourne was to guide the vessel of state but for a brief period. In August, 1834, parliament was prorogued.

An incident that occurred in the preceding spring had done much towards bringing the reform ministry into odium with the poorer sort of people. Trades' unions had become formidable associations, and the fashion had extended itself even among the agricultural labourers. The ministry resolved to strike a blow at the system; and accordingly six Dorchester labourers were indicted, under an obsolete statute, and sentenced to seven years' transportation, for being members of an illegal society; that is, a trade union, as officers of which they had administered unlawful oaths to their companions. This circumstance created great excitement; and a meeting of the trades' unionists of London took place in Copenhagen Fields, to prepare a petition to the king for a recall of the Dorchester labourers. The same day, the petition was taken to Lord Melbourne at the Home Office, by a procession of 30,000 men, decorated with ribbons, and bearing banners. That nobleman declined to receive a petition presented in such a way; but added that, if it were brought forward another day, in a becoming manner, he would lay it before the king. Great fear had been entertained that such an enormous assemblage of working-men would break into riot; but they all separated peaceably. The petition was afterwards quietly presented, and the Dorchester labourers were pardoned.

In the autumn of 1834, on the evening of the 16th of October, a fire broke forth, which terminated in the utter destruction of both Houses of Parliament. The conflagration spread with such rapidity and fury, that it was feared the noble and venerable edifice of Westminster Hall would also be destroyed. By great efforts it was saved, together with a portion of the library and records of the House of Commons; but many documents of historical interest were lost. The principal work of destruction was accomplished in a few hours; but it was a week before the fire was quite extinguished. Suspicions were entertained that it was the work of an incendiary; but, upon inquiry, it was proved that the fire arose from over-heating the stoves. St. Stephen's chapel, or the old House of Commons, was a mean, dingy apartment, by no means large enough to accommodate all the members comfortably. Its loss was therefore not much regretted, especially as some attempts had already been made for the erection of a new one. The present gorgeous pile, which seems to rear its richly-carved walls and towers out of the river that washes its base, looks a building fit to contain the assembled representatives of a great and free people.

Before parliament reassembled Lord Melbourne was no longer prime minister, and the reform cabinet was broken up. Lord Althorp, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having, by the death of his father, been called to take his seat in the House of Peers as Earl Spencer, it was necessary to appoint a new Chancellor. Lord Melbourne informed the king that he should have some difficulty in doing so, when William unexpectedly told him that he would take that trouble off his hands, as the services of his party were no longer required. It was on the 14th of November, 1834, that the Whig ministry was dismissed.

King William applied to the Duke of Wellington, who recommended that the post of first minister should be offered to Sir Robert Peel. Special messengers were sent to that gentleman, who was on a tour in Italy, and, until his arrival, the duke conducted the affairs of the country, much to the alarm and astonishment of the Whig party, who thought such conduct both arrogant and dangerous. But Wellington's popularity was returning; and public affairs never worked more smoothly than during the short time (from the 15th of November to the 9th of December) that the duke stood alone at the helm. When the new cabinet was completed, Sir Robert Peel was First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer; Lord Lyndhurst became Lord Chancellor; and the Duke of Wellington presided at the Foreign Office. Other members of the ministry held Tory opinions; but the term Tory—at the suggestion, some say, of Sir Robert Peel, while others attribute it to Dr. Southey, the poet-laureate—was changed for that of Conservative. Under the new title, the leaders professed that their policy was, to conserve or preserve our institutions in church and state, and to promote the progress of improvement in every way.

Sir Robert Peel published a letter to his constituents at Tamworth (intended for the whole country), containing a programme of his principles. In it he denied that he had ever been a defender of abuses, or an enemy to judicious reforms. Having alluded to his efforts for the amendment of our criminal law, and for other reforms, he said—"I appeal to these as a proof that I have not been disposed to acquiesce in acknowledged evils, either from the mere superstitious reverence for ancient usages, or from the dread of labour or responsibility in the application of a remedy. But the Reform Bill, it is said, constitutes a new era; and it is the duty of a minister to declare explicitly, first, whether he will maintain the bill itself; and, secondly, whether he will act upon the spirit in which it was conceived. With respect to the Reform Bill itself, I will repeat now the declaration which I made when I entered the House of Commons as a member of the reformed parliament—that I consider the Reform Bill a final and irrevocable settlement of a great and constitutional question—a settlement which no friend to the peace and welfare of this country would attempt to disturb, either by direct or insidious means."

Parliament was dissolved; a general election took place; the new House of Commons was unfavourable to a Conservative ministry; and the legislature assembled on the 9th of February. The Conservatives had been considerably increased by the elections: still the Whigs and Liberals (as the more advanced party was called) outnumbered them; and Sir Robert Peel and his colleagues, being repeatedly left in minorities, and finding themselves unable to carry on the government, resigned on the 7th of April, having held office for a few months only. Sir Robert retired with graceful dignity, and Lord Melbourne once again became prime minister; the leading members of his late cabinet resumed their places; and Lord John Russell became leader in the House of Commons.

After much discussion, a bill was carried to provide for municipal reform; the Irish church was talked about; and parliament was then prorogued. Many other matters of little interest occupied the attention of government during 1836; but one important act was passed concerning the church of England. It was for regulating the great inequalities of ecclesiastical incomes. Lord John Russell said that the income of the see of Canterbury amounted to £18,090; that of Durham, £19,480; London, £13,890; while those of Llandaff, Oxford, and Rochester, only amounted to £1,170, £1,600, and £1,450. The new bill arranged that no bishop should receive less than £4,500 a year; and that, with a few exceptions, none should receive more than £5,500. The exceptions were—that the Archbishop of Canterbury should receive £15,000 a year; the Archbishop of York and the Bishop of London, £10,000 each; the Bishop of Durham, £8,000; and the Bishop of Winchester, £7,000.

Early in 1837, it was known that the health of the king was declining. For some years he had been subject to an asthmatic disease called the hay fever—a disorder, however, from which he had been free since his accession until that year. So feeble had be become, that his physicians were kept in constant attendance upon him, and he became at length aware that his death was not very distant. The latter part of his life was occupied with devotion; and his last act as a sovereign was to sign a pardon to a condemned criminal. He desired to see his illegitimate children; received the sacrament from the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury; and at length, sinking into a lethargy, expired so tranquilly, that the attendants could not tell the precise moment at which he breathed his last. He died on the 20th of June, 1837, in the seventy-third year of his age, having reigned seven years all but a few days.

William IV. was a well-disposed, good-natured, and easy prince, who loved his people, and did his best for their prosperity. With regard to the Reform Bill, he was liberal beyond what might have been expected of a sovereign, until the conduct of the violent demagogues of the day caused him to believe that reform meant revolution. Then, for a brief time, he wavered; but he yielded sooner than hazard the peace of the nation.

No serious charge has been brought against William, except that of permitting Mrs. Jordan to die in poverty. The sternest morality, or the most severe economy, could scarcely have been offended by his bestowing such a moderate pension on the mother of his children as would have allowed her to spend her last days in comfortable retirement. William also wanted firmness and consistency; but no English sovereign ever lived whose character was more free from the dark spots of tyranny and cruelty. His manners were simple and open; he was devoid of that austerity and dignity which is generally considered almost necessary to royalty; and the memory of William IV. will not be remembered with the less respect or kndly feeling because he was a bluff, plain, outspoken, hearty old sailor.

CHAPTER CIII.

THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1837, 1838.

N the same day that King William breathed his last, his niece, the PRINCESS ALEXANDRINA VICTORIA, then virtually Queen of England, met the privy council in the state apartments at Kensington Palace. Having taken the usual oaths, and received the homage of her uncles and other nobles, she read an address, in which, after referring to the solemn responsibility that had devolved upon her, and expressing a hope that Divine Providence would give her strength for the performance of it, she continued—"Educated in England, under the tender and enlightened care of a most affectionate mother, I have learned from my infancy to respect and love the constitution of my native country. It will be my unceasing study to maintain the reformed religion as by law established, securing, at the same time, to all the full enjoyment of religious liberty; and I shall steadily protect the rights, and promote, to the utmost of my power, the happiness and welfare of all classes of my subjects."

The following day—the 21st of June—she was proclaimed Queen of England. As she could not succeed to the crown of Hanover because the Salic law, which excluded women, prevailed there, that kingdom fell to her eldest uncle, the Duke of Cumberland, the most unpopular member of the royal family. Few persons regretted his departure from England.

The new sovereign was not only popular, but generally beloved by her people. It was long since the English throne possessed so interesting an occupant. The queen had attained the eighteenth anniversary of her birthday on the 24th of May—scarcely a month before her accession to regal honours. She had some claims to be considered beautiful, and was both amiable and accomplished. She soon, also, gave indications of an intelligence and self-possession not commonly possessed by young ladies of her age. On attending the House of Lords to prorogue parliament, she read her speech with a composure and dignity which created both pleasure and surprise in her listeners. Shortly afterwards she took up her residence at Windsor Castle, when a lady of rank, who held a high situation about her person, was on more than one occasion a few minutes behind the hour at which her official duties required her presence. One day the laggard found the queen waiting her arrival with her watch in her hand. The noble attendant expressed a fear that she had kept her majesty waiting. The queen replied that such was the case—told her how many minutes she had been expected, and, adding that she required punctuality in those about her person, desired that it might not be again lost sight of. The lady seemed hurt by the reproof, and became embarrassed in the arrangement of the queen's shawl, when the latter assisted her attendant, and said kindly, "We are new to our situations; we shall all become more perfect in our parts, I hope."

Other incidents occurred, which showed not only the intelligence of the young queen, but her desire justly to discharge the important duties connected with her exalted station. Lord Melbourne, the prime minister, presented eighteen documents for her to sign, having previously given in a list containing only sixteen. The queen noticed the difference of the numbers, and was informed by the minister that a necessity had arisen since the list was handed in for two additional papers. "Then I must retain them," promptly replied her majesty; "I sign nothing without being fully aware of its purport." On another occasion, a nobleman having submitted something to her, was urging its expediency, when he was stopped by the queen's exclaiming, "My lord, I have been taught simply to consider what is right and wrong. Expediency is a word which I do not wish to hear or understand."

Though the Whig ministers were restored to office, they were not restored to popularity. The people were dissatisfied with them, as they found them as unwilling as the Tories had been to grant the additional reforms called for, or to sanction such changes and innovations as the Liberals deemed beneficial. Consequently, in a general election which took place, the Conservatives gained strength considerably. When the new parliament met, on the 17th of July, a violent party contest began. Sir Francis Burdett, the once fiery advocate of liberty, abandoned his principles in his old age, and, amidst much laughter, took his seat among the Conservatives. Early in this session also, a young orator, who had previously distinguished himself as a writer of fiction, made his first speech in the House of Commons, and was received with an amount of ridicule and gross rudeness of which it is hardly possible to suppose an assembly of gentlemen could be guilty. The speaker was Mr. Disraeli, who, after in vain contending with groans, hisses, laughter, and incoherent cries, sat down with the assertion that the time would come when they would listen to him. That prediction he has worthily fulfilled.

Before the close of the year 1837, news arrived of a rebellion in the colony of Canada. Many unredressed grievances had induced the Canadians to appeal to arms against their rulers; and the colony was then in military occupation. Many members of parliament justified the proceedings of the Canadians, and believed the struggle would end by their imitating the conduct of the Americans, and declaring their independence. Lord John Russell defended the English government; declared that the case of the Canadians bore no resemblance whatever to that of the Americans; and protested against abandoning the colony, as the enemies of England would then exclaim that its sun was sunk in clouds and darkness.—Ultimately, an adequate force was employed; the rebellion was suppressed; and there are now no more loyal subjects of the British crown than the Canadians.

In the spring of 1838, a circumstance occurred more in harmony with the events of the rude ages of English history than with those of this country in the nineteenth century. Some years previously, a mysterious-looking man had taken up his residence at an inn at Canterbury. He dressed in an Oriental costume, wore a long beard, arranged his hair in imitation of that of the Saviour, and called himself Sir William Courtney, though it afterwards appeared that his name was John Thom. Wonderful stories were told of his unbounded wealth and generosity. These, together with some wild religious addresses which he made to the common people, gained him so much popularity, that he started a weekly publication called The Lion; offered himself to represent Canterbury in parliament; and obtained 350 votes in the Conservative interest. Subsequently he was convicted of perjury, and sentenced to seven years' transportation; but, on its being discovered that he was not in his right mind, he was removed from gaol, and placed in the county lunatic asylum.

For some years nothing more was heard of Thom, when, to people's surprise, he again made his appearance in Kent. He soon won the favour of the farmers, by stating that he was a man of high birth, entitled to some of the finest estates in the county, which, when he obtained, they should live upon rent free. The madman added, that they were oppressed by tyrants, against whom he would lead them, and accomplish, not only political, but religious reform. In consequence of these assertions, nearly 100 persons, most of them farm labourers, consented to march under his banners. This success induced him to advance his pretensions, and he actually declared himself the Saviour of the world. To support this profane assumption, he asserted that he was invulnerable; that neither sword or bullet could injure him; and he pointed to some scars in his hands, which, he said, had been caused by the nails that held him to the cross on Mount Calvary.

On the 28th of May, Thom and his followers started from the village of Boughton, and marched about the country without any apparent object. At length a farmer, whose labourers he had driven away from their work, obtained a constable to induce them to return to their duties. When the poor officer made his appearance, Thom, after a short conversation, shot him with a pistol, then stabbed him with a dagger, and finally threw the body into a ditch. This shocking event caused general alarm, and the military were sent for from Canterbury. Thom and his followers, in the meantime, retired to Bossenden Wood, where they were found by the soldiers and the magistrates. As Lieutenant Bennett advanced at the head of the military, Thom deliberately drew out a pistol and shot him dead also. The soldiers instantly avenged the deed by firing; the madman was mortally wounded, and expired, exclaiming triumphantly, "I have Jesus in my heart." Ten of the ignorant labourers who followed him were also killed, and others severely wounded. Such was the besotted superstition of these people, that one of them who was taken prisoner, declared that he and his associates would not have hesitated to attack 2,000 soldiers, such reliance did they place in Thom's assurance, that those who believed in him could not be shot. The belief of others was not shaken even by his death, and for some weeks they expected he would rise again. He had predicted that such would be the case if some water was put between his lips, in the event of anything happening to him. Accordingly a poor woman washed his face, and poured water into his mouth, as he lay upon the ground, immediately after receiving the bullet that put an end to his mischievous life. She had followed him for that purpose, for more than half a mile, with a pail of water. Twenty-three of the maniac's followers were captured, and committed to Feversham gaol. Of these, three were transported, and six suffered a year's imprisonment.

It is pleasing to turn from this event to one which has been an incalculable blessing to the nation—the adoption of Mr. Rowland Hill's scheme of a uniform postage of 1*d.* The circumstances which led to the adoption of this new postal system were rather curious. We will tell them in the language of that delightful authoress and noble-minded lady, Harriet Martineau:—"It is related that Mr. Rowland Hill, being one day walking through the Lake district, saw a postman present a letter to a female at a cottage door, who, having looked at the superscription, said it was from her brother, but declined taking it in, as the postage, which came to 1*s.*, she was unable to pay. Mr. Hill kindly paid the postage, though the woman was not willing that he should do so; and, when the postman had retired, she told him what he had done was useless, and, opening the letter, she showed it was merely a blank sheet of paper, sent by agreement from her relation, as was his practice once a quarter, to intimate that he was well, without expense to her, as it was understood she would decline to receive it. This incident led Mr. Hill to think that the postage system was defective; and subsequent inquiries more than confirmed the impression thus produced. To save postage numerous artifices had been resorted to. In some cases, paper of a particular colour gave a sort of telegraphic hint, for which the recipient took care not to pay. As newspapers were sent post free, parties in town corresponded with their friends in the country by marking different words, so as to make known what they desired to indicate. Several letters were frequently written upon one sheet, which, sent from the country, were to be separated and delivered to various individuals in London; and numerous letters, in various ways, were smuggled to town in coaches, passage boats, and parcels."

Mr. Hill first published his plan in 1837. In 1838, a committee of the House of Commons declared in its favour. The bill, substituting the penny for the old rates of postage, was passed in 1839; and, on the 10th of January, 1840, it came into operation.

The coronation of the Queen, which had been for some time deferred, took place at length on the 28th of June, 1838. The day was observed as one of national rejoicing by all ranks of people, and the fineness of the Midsummer weather contributed to the general enjoyment. The ceremony was performed with great magnificence, and throughout the Queen behaved with much grace, self-possession, and dignity. A grand fair was held in Hyde Park, in honour of the event. It was continued during several days, and honoured by a visit from her majesty. On the evening of the day of coronation all the theatres were opened gratuitously, and brilliant exhibitions of fireworks took place in the parks.

Notwithstanding all the loyalty displayed towards the Queen, discontent was at work among the working classes of the kingdom. Poor men were told that the Reform Bill had done little or nothing for them, and taught to accuse the government of legislating for classes instead of for the whole nation; considerable distress prevailed; the action of the new poor-law (just and necessary as it was) produced much discontent; great numbers of people entered into political combinations, and demanded a new, more extensive, and, indeed, sweeping Reform Bill, to be called the People's Charter. This document consisted of five propositions, called the five points of the charter: they were—annual parliaments, universal suffrage, vote by ballot, no property qualification, and the payment of members. A sixth point—the demand for equal electoral districts—was afterwards added.

On the 6th of August, 1838, an immense open-air meeting of Chartists was held at Holloway Head, near Birmingham. Delegates from the working-men of London, Liverpool, Leeds, Lancashire, and Yorkshire attended, and it was supposed that as many as 200,000 persons were present. The proceedings opened with a prayer; and after the adoption of what was called a "national petition" to parliament, that the People's Charter should become the law of the land, the crowd separated in peace. Other vast meetings succeeded this; and it was at length understood, that if what were called the people's rights were not yielded to them, they were to be wrested from the government by force. Mr. Feargus O'Connor, an Irish barrister (who subsequently became an inmate of a lunatic asylum, where he died), was a very active speaker at these assemblies. At a meeting of the London Chartists in Palace Yard, Westminster, he declared that, "rather than see the people oppressed—rather than see the constitution violated with impunity while the people were in want—if no other man would do so, he would himself lead them to death or glory. Let the moral-force men take that, and let it set them a good moral example." This mischievous boasting was, however, outdone by the Rev. J. Stephens, a Wesleyan minister, at a Chartist meeting at Kersall Moor, Manchester. After a great deal of nonsense, which could only be palatable to very ignorant men, he said—"I am speaking to hundreds of thousands, three out of four of whom have, in all probability, left their arms at home to-day. And why have you left them at home? Because you were afraid to bring them?" To this unfair and unnecessary question, the excited people not unnaturally cried out, "No! no!" and the orator continued in the same inflammatory manner.

To demand even the most reasonable thing in this violent and unreasonable way, was the best mode of alarming people hitherto indifferent, and of exciting the opposition of the government. As the winter approached, these meetings, instead of being discontinued, were held by torch-light, the glare of which added a solemnity to the proceedings, and excited fears of incendiarism and insurrection in the minds of all moderate men. In November, Lord John Russell desired the magistrates in the north to notify that such meetings were illegal; and the following month the Queen issued a proclamation, warning all peaceful subjects to keep away from them. The Chartists replied, that they had no place to meet in but the open air, and no time except in the evening, after their daily labour.

At the time of these Chartist movements, a serious dispute broke out between the English and the Chinese. The government of the latter people was much opposed to the injurious practice of smoking opium, which was very general among them. This opium was a principal article of traffic between them and our East India merchants. The Chinese authorities had frequently complained of the importation of opium; but, as this produced no effect, in 1838 they prohibited our merchants from continuing the trade. This they had a perfect right to do; but the tone of their edicts was regarded as extremely bombastic and insulting. As a warning, also, two unfortunate native dealers in opium were strangled in front of the English factories. An angry feeling was speedily generated between the Chinese government and the merchants; and a report was presented to the emperor, gravely proposing to destroy the foreigners in their dens in England, by not allowing them to buy any tea or rhubarb, without which they believed the barbarians, as they called them, would soon perish. The Chinese, in all their dealings with the English, treated them as an inferior race, and spoke of them as "barbarians," destitute of both reason and honesty.

The haughtiness and pretended contempt of the Chinese was laughed at by the merchants, and opium continued to be smuggled into the Celestial Empire, till, in 1839, Commissioner Lin issued an edict, demanding that all the opium on board the British ships should be delivered up to the government, that it might be destroyed. He at the same time intimated, that if this demand was not complied with, the barbarians would be overwhelmed by numbers and massacred. The supplies of provisions, also, were cut off, and the English factories placed in a state of blockade by an arc of boats, filled with armed men. Under these circumstances, the English merchants, at the advice of their superintendent, Captain Elliot, surrendered upwards of 20,000 chests of opium. The state of blockade then ceased, and the English were commanded to retire. Captain Elliot, however, wrote to Lord Auckland, the governor-general of India, for such ships of war as he could spare for the protection of life and property.

In an affray between some English sailors and Chinese villagers, one of the latter was killed. Commissioner Lin demanded that the man who caused the death of the Chinese should be delivered up, that he might be put to death also. This was refused, and Lin issued an edict prohibiting any provisions to be supplied to the English; and, shortly afterwards, another against the importation of any British goods. Other differences followed; and, in November, 1839, Admiral Kwan, with a fleet of twenty-nine Chinese war-junks, prepared to attack the English. This fleet was fired upon by the Volage and Hyacinth, two English ships of war, when, after a brief conflict, one junk blew up, three were sunk, and the rest retired, having had quite as much fighting as they cared for. The Chinese, however, had the impudence to represent that they had obtained a victory.

Though the English government could not approve of smuggling opium into China, yet the ministers considered it was their duty to demand reparation for the destruction of so great an amount of property belonging to English merchants. An expedition was therefore sent to China, in the spring of 1840, to enforce this demand, and also to compel the Chinese government to respect those international laws which are observed by all civilised countries. When the English fleet, consisting of fifteen ships, besides transports, arrived, the Chinese made an attempt to burn it by means of fire-rafts. As this failed, they proposed to employ expert divers, who should climb up the English ships at night and massacre every one they found. This daring scheme was not put into practice. Another attempt of this kind very nearly produced fatal results. The Chinese prepared a boat-load of poisoned tea, in small parcels, which they sent off to be sold to the English sailors. It so happened, however, that this tea was seized by Chinese pirates, and sold to people of their own nation, many of whom died in consequence of using it.—The events of the war in this year were unimportant. A truce was agreed to at the close, and negotiations for peace commenced. While these proceedings were being settled, an imperial decree was issued by the emperor on the 6th of January, 1841, ordering all British ships and men to be destroyed; and offering rewards and honours to any of the Chinese who should capture an English man-of-war, or to any one who should cut off an Englishman's head. This edict caused the war to be resumed. We will give the result in another chapter.

CHAPTER CIV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1838—1846.

LET us look back to an event which took place in London early in 1838. One bitter winter's night—the 10th of January—a part of the Royal Exchange was discovered to be on fire. In consequence of the high wind, and the difficulty of procuring water, the flames spread rapidly, and the destruction of the whole building soon became inevitable. At midnight the old peal of bells chimed, for the last time, the tunes of "There's nae luck about the house," "Life let us cherish," and "God save the Queen." Shortly afterwards, the blazing tower in which they were contained fell with a dismal crash, and the ponderous bells, weighing eighteen hundredweight, were hurled through the roof, carrying everything before them. The inner walls soon after fell with a terrific noise, burying beneath them the statues of the kings and queens of England. During the conflagration, the flames rose to such a height as to be seen at Windsor Castle; and before the end of the following day, the great pile was reduced to bare blackened walls, and heaps of still-burning ruins.

The English had become engaged in war with a people in India, whom they found to be a very different sort of enemy to the Chinese. These enemies were the Seiks and the Afghans, the most warlike races of India. The dispute arose out of a contest between two native princes, Dost Mahomed and Shah Sujah, for the monarchy of Afghanistan, in which the English espoused the cause of the latter, the unpopular candidate. The quarrel was complicated by the interference of both Persia and Russia, the latter being suspected of intriguing to obtain an entrance into our Indian possessions. The usual military successes of the English seemed, for a time, to have deserted them; and the retreat of 17,000 persons, consisting of soldiers and camp followers, from Cabul to Jellalabad, in January, 1842, through a chain of mountain passes, is one of the most awful events chronicled in the blood-red annals of war. The most dreaded of the defiles alluded to was the Khyber Pass, through which, it was reported, Akbar Khan (the second son of Dost Mahomed, who was at the head of a numerous force) had threatened only one man should go alive, and that he should be set down there with his limbs chopped off, and a letter in his mouth warning the infidel foreigners never again to set foot in Afghanistan. Akbar Khan nearly kept his word: the women and children were consigned to him on a solemn promise of protection; but of the men, on the seventh day of the retreat, only one arrived—and he more like a spectre than a man—at the English garrison at Jellalabad. With the exception of a few who returned to Cabul, all the rest had perished.

General Sale, who commanded the English at Jellalabad, was at length relieved by General Pollock, who fought his way through the Khyber Pass, in September, 1842. Akbar Khan was defeated; Shah Sujah was murdered; Dost Mahomed became sovereign of Afghanistan; the English abandoned Cabul; peace was restored, and then broken; other battles were fought; and at length, after a frightful loss of life on both sides, the enemy was vanquished, a great tract of land annexed to the British dominion, and the famous diamond, called the Koh-i-nor, or Mountain of Light (the symbol of Indian empire), taken among the spoils, and brought to England.

Early in 1838, the attention of the government was called to the state of Ireland by the unprovoked murder of Lord Norbury, an amiable nobleman and kind landlord, who was shot from behind a hedge while walking in the shrubbery on his estate at Kilbeggan. The assassination was not committed from a desire of revenge or of plunder, but appeared to be part of a diabolical plot, in which the great body of the Irish peasantry were concerned, to wrest the land from its rightful owners, and abolish rent by murdering the landlords, or whoever dared to assert his right to his own property by ejecting tenants that would not pay. It is very shocking to have to relate, that the fearful and irrevocable crime of murder was actually approved of by immense masses of the people; that no one would inform or give evidence against the ruffians who committed it; but, on the contrary, screened them from the hands of justice, and even applauded their crimes. An awful catalogue of murders of this character was brought before the notice of parliament, and the appalling statement made that twenty murders were committed, in the county of Tipperary alone, in the brief space of a single month. Lord Morpeth, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, vindicated the government from the charge that the state of Ireland was the result of the legislation of the existing ministry. Property, he said, had its duties as well as its rights; and he felt bound to warn those who possessed it, that there were provocations which, while the condition of Ireland continued to be what it had long been, would arouse resistance. There were sufferings which would defy endurance. It was the opinion of his colleagues that no unusual mode of strengthening the law in Ireland ought to be resorted to without great caution: and he felt they must first alter the condition of the people before they could improve their morals.

For many years a duty had been imposed on foreign corn, when imported into this country; and as this tax had the effect of raising the price of bread, and also, it was asserted, of reducing employment in manufacturing districts, the "corn-laws" became very unpopular. Great discontent was raised, and the cry became general that the people were denied cheap bread to add to the wealth of the landed aristocracy. In September, 1838, fifty or sixty gentlemen at Manchester formed themselves into an association called the "Anti-Corn-Law League." When parliament opened in 1839, numbers of petitions were presented for the repeal of the corn-laws; and Lord Brougham moved that the Lords should hear evidence upon the subject, and inquire into it. But it was supposed that, although a repeal of the corn-laws might benefit the people, it would lower the rent of land; and, as nearly all the Lords were land-owners, the motion was rejected at once. A similar motion was then brought forward, by Mr. Villiers, in the House of Commons; but it was strongly opposed by Sir Robert Peel, and rejected there, also, by a large majority. The members of the Anti-Corn-Law League, however, were not discouraged, and they resolved to appeal from parliament to the people. They sent lecturers and tracts about the country explaining the subject; they held great public meetings for the same purpose; and even enlisted the ladies in the cause, by means of immense tea parties. So great was their activity, that, in a little while, the Anti-Corn-Law League became a power in the land; and the question, complicated as it seemed at first, was becoming clearly understood by the millions.

The demand of the working classes, that the document they called the People's Charter should become the law of the land, was not lost sight of. The agitation for the People's Charter was kept up with that for the repeal of the corn-laws. In May, 1839, a body of delegates from the working-men of Great Britain commenced their sittings in London, under the title of the National Convention. These people encountered much obloquy; but they seem to have been earnest in a desire to benefit their class, by obtaining for them the political privileges enumerated in the charter. Under their direction, an enormous petition—a "national petition"—was prepared, carried in procession, and presented to the House of Commons on the 14th of June. It was said to have contained 1,200,000 signatures, and it prayed that the charter should become law. It was so large, that it was obliged to be rolled into the House by half-a-dozen Radical members, who were its advocates. There it was received with respect; but the House declined entering upon a consideration of its various points at once, because it would occupy too much time.

Meanwhile the violence of the people prevented it from being paid attention to. The Chartists of Birmingham broke out into such a serious riot, that sixty armed police were sent from London to assist in keeping the peace. On their arrival, they immediately proceeded to an open space called the Bullring, and dispersed a large body of Chartists—a feat they were unable to accomplish without a violent conflict, and the assistance of the military. This event caused great excitement, and the Chartist Convention at London issued an inflammatory resolution, expressing its conviction that a wanton and unjust outrage had been made upon the people of Birmingham by the employment of the metropolitan police. For issuing this resolution, which the ministry regarded as a libel, Messrs. Lovett and Collins, secretaries of the Chartist Convention, were arrested, and each eventually suffered a year's imprisonment.

The refusal of the House of Commons to take the charter into consideration, caused a renewal of the disturbances at Birmingham. Great meetings were dispersed by the military; some of the crowd received serious wounds, and their excited feelings rose to madness. At first, windows and street lamps were smashed; then houses, belonging to persons obnoxious to the Chartists, were broken into; and, finally, several were burnt. The town was thrown into the greatest alarm.

and it was some days before order could be restored. Large assemblies leading to riots took place in other towns, especially at Sheffield, where the Chartists marched through the town in solemn silence, and afterwards broke out into riots, which, fortunately, did not end so seriously as those at Birmingham. Many foolish means were taken by the Chartists to intimidate the government into granting them their demands; a run upon the savings' banks was recommended; and it was agreed to keep a "sacred month," during which the people were to abstain from their customary labour. As, however, they had sense enough to see that such a proceeding would injure them more than it would perplex the government, the mad scheme was abandoned.

The ministry succeeded in procuring the imprisonment of most of the Chartist leaders; and, in the month of September, 1839, the "National Convention" was dissolved by consent of its town members. It was then supposed that Chartism was at an end; but that was not the case. Unfortunately some of the most moderate men had been sent to prison, and the leadership fell to more violent persons.

Chartism soon appeared at Newport in Monmouthshire, in the form of insurrection. The inhabitants of that district were ignorant miners, and greatly under the influence of a Mr. Frost, a linendraper, who also fulfilled the duties of a magistrate. Lord John Russell having heard that Frost had made some violent speeches at a meeting at Pontypool, and that he had been elected a member of the National Convention, caused him to be written to, saying that, if this were the case, it would be his lordship's duty to recommend the Lord Chancellor to erase his name from the commission of the peace. Frost, in reply, sent a long and insulting letter to Lord John Russell, questioning his lordship's authority to assume a power over that part of his conduct which did not refer to his duties as a magistrate, and denying that he knew any body calling itself a Convention. Lord John Russell disclaimed having any wish to interfere with the opinions of Mr. Frost; was glad to hear the existence of the National Convention denied, except as a committee to watch over the fate of petitions; and stated that no immediate steps would be taken with respect to his position as a magistrate.

Mr. Frost's conduct, however, became so turbulent and threatening, that he was ultimately removed from the bench; and he then engaged the poor workmen of South Wales in an attempt to overturn the existing order of things. On the evening of the 3rd of November, 1839, news was brought to the magistrates of Newport, that Frost was marching upon the town with a body of 4,000 or 5,000 men. The magistrates prepared for the attack, obtained a body of military, police, and special constables, and took their station in the principal inn of the town. Frost and his rioters entered the town in two divisions, and headed an attack upon the hotel. The rioters first discharged an irregular fire, and, driving in the door, rushed into the house. The soldiers were then ordered to fire down the passage, and, at the same time, a cross-fire was opened from the bow windows of the hotel. After a few discharges the insurgents took to flight. Frost, together with two other firebrands, named Williams and Jones (his associates), were soon afterwards arrested, and placed on their trial for high treason. They were found guilty, and sentenced to be hanged and quartered. The day was even fixed for their execution; but public feeling revolted from so shocking an event: petitions were presented to the Queen praying for a mitigation of the punishment, and the sentence was commuted to that of transportation for life.

Public attention was soon directed to a very different kind of event. On the 10th of February, 1840, her majesty was united in marriage to his serene highness Albert Francis Augustus Charles Emmanuel, of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, the second son of the reigning Duke of Gotha. Several royal personages had been spoken of as candidates for her hand; but it was understood that Prince Albert was her choice, and the union not the result of state policy, but of affection. Before the arrival of the wedding-day, it is said, the Archbishop of Canterbury inquired whether her majesty wished any alteration to be made in that part of the marriage service which includes the promise of obedience. She replied, that it was "her wish to be married, in all respects, as any other Englishwoman might be, according to the usages of the church of England; and though not as Queen, yet, as a woman, she was ready to promise all that was required in the Liturgy." The ceremony took place in the Chapel Royal, at St. James's Palace; and, in the afternoon, the distinguished pair took the road to Windsor.

A few months after the marriage of the Queen, the nation was thrown into a state of excitement by an attempt upon her life. On the evening of the 10th of June she left Buckingham Palace with Prince Albert, in a low, open phaeton, to take a drive in Hyde Park. As they drove up Constitution Hill, a young man advanced to within a few yards of the carriage, and fired a pistol at her majesty. She instantly rose from her seat, but was pulled down into it by the prince, who loudly called to the postilions, who had stopped in surprise, to drive on. Before the order could be obeyed, a second pistol was fired, but happily, like the first, without effect. Though somewhat agitated, the Queen drove to the mansion of her mother, the Duchess of Kent, to assure that parent of her safety, and then returned in the same open carriage, confidently reposing on the loyalty of her people, notwithstanding the infamous outrage that had just been perpetrated.

The intended assassin, who made no attempt to escape, was immediately taken into custody. He was a youth of about seventeen or eighteen, of the name of Edward Oxford. On inquiry, it turned out that he had lately been a barman at a public-house, the landlord of which spoke well of his general conduct, but said he had been obliged to discharge him on account of a habit he had of laughing in the faces of customers. Oxford was placed on his trial for high treason, and found guilty; but as it was doubted whether there were any bullets in the pistols he fired, and as other circumstances tended to excite doubts of his sanity, he was committed to confinement in Bedlam.

Louis Philippe, the King of the French, felt, or, it is generally supposed, pretended to feel, a great admiration for the character and genius of the late Emperor Napoleon Bonaparte. France mourned for the fate of that extraordinary man; and, to gratify the people, Louis requested and obtained permission from the English government to remove the corpse of the hero from St. Helena, that it might be honourably deposited amongst the sepulchres of the ancient kings of France. The body of the emperor, after having laid nineteen years in the grave, was exhumed with a feeling of almost idolatrous veneration, under the direction of the Prince de Joinville, and some of the few surviving generals of the great soldier. On account of the masonry by which the coffin was surrounded, it had been preserved uninjured; and when it was opened, the spectators were struck with astonishment to behold the emperor lying in his uniform, scarcely touched by the hand of corruption—indeed, hardly changed from the time when, nineteen years before, he had been committed to what was then supposed to be his eternal resting-place. The body was carried to France, where, on the 14th of December, 1840, it was reinterred in the church of the Invalides, among the mouldering remains of royalty. The ceremony was performed with gorgeous magnificence, which gratified France, and excited the admiration of surrounding nations.

At this time the Whig ministers had long lost the popularity they once possessed. In May, 1839, they had felt it necessary to resign, because an important bill they brought forward with respect to Jamaica was only carried by the slender majority of five votes. The Queen entrusted Sir Robert Peel with the formation of a new ministry; but she regretted losing her late advisers, and very frankly told him so. Sir Robert, observing that the principal ladies about the Queen were the sisters or wives of his political opponents, insisted on their resigning their places. Her majesty refused to part with her ladies, as such a course was, she said, repugnant to her feelings, and, she believed, contrary to custom. Upon this Sir Robert resigned the authority that had been entrusted to him; the late ministers were recalled, and got on as well as they could.

Still the Whig ministers sank in public estimation, until at length, in May, 1841, they attempted to raise a deficiency in the exchequer of £2,400,000, by imposing some objectionable duties on sugar. This proposal excited so much dissatisfaction, that, when it was put to the vote, there was a majority of thirty-six against the government. As ministers still showed a reluctance to resign, Sir Robert Peel brought forward a motion that they did not possess the confidence of the House of Commons to an extent sufficient to enable them to carry on the public business, and that their continuance in office, under such circumstances, was at variance with the spirit of the constitution. This motion was carried by a majority of 312 to 311; still the Whigs did not resign, but procured a dissolution of parliament, and appealed to the country.

The new parliament met on the 19th of August, 1841; and, in a fierce party debate which arose on the address, Mr. Cobden, the leading member of the Anti-Corn-Law League, made his first address to the House. Notwithstanding the attempts to laugh or cough him into silence, he made an eloquent appeal to the feelings of his brother legislators, as Christian men, against the corn-laws. In both Houses amendments were moved to the address, and carried, in the Lords, by a majority of 72; in the Commons, by 91. Lord Melbourne and the Whigs were thus compelled to resign, and a Conservative ministry, with Sir Robert Peel at its head, came into office. This time the Queen made no objection to parting with the ladies of her household; but it was reported that the circumstance was very painful to her. Sir Robert Peel asked for time to mature his plans for the restoration of prosperity, and, on the 10th of November, the parliament adjourned until the following year.

Just before the prorogation of parliament, a destructive fire broke out in the Tower. It reduced a great part of that ancient building, so rich in historical associations, to ruin; nearly all the military stores and trophies were destroyed, or much injured; and the regalia and crown jewels only saved by being carried off to a place of safety by the wardens, surrounded by groups of soldiers, police, and firemen. This unfortunate fire took place on the 21st of October; and a few days afterwards, on the 9th of November, the Queen presented the nation with her first son, the Prince of Wales.

The agitation against the corn-laws continued to be carried on with wonderful activity, and the cry for their repeal became loud and general. One of the great offences of the late Whig ministry was, that it trifled with and neglected this important question. Parliament reassembled on the 3rd of February, 1842, and great curiosity prevailed to see what Sir Robert would do about the corn-laws. The great landowners, or protection party, believed that he would not yield to the national demand, because he had always been in favour of the corn-laws as they stood; but, on the other side, there was an expectation that perhaps the Conservative ministers might, after all, act with more liberality than the Whigs.

Sir Robert soon brought forward his plan. It consisted of a sliding-scale of duties, by which, when corn was cheap in England, the duty on importing foreign grain was to be high; but it was to be gradually reduced as corn rose in price, and was to cease altogether when it reached 74s. a quarter. The plan was approved by the protectionists, who felt they must yield something, and were glad it was no worse. The free-traders denounced it, but it finally passed into law. It gave so little satisfaction, however, that, in some manufacturing towns, Sir Robert Peel was burnt in effigy, and the Anti-Corn-Law League became more active than ever. The minister next brought forward a property and income-tax, for making up the deficiencies the Whigs had left in the public revenue. This disagreeable tax had never been considered justifiable, except in times of war; but Sir Robert promised that it should not be continued longer than three years; and, to make amends, he passed a new tariff, by which a reduction of duty took place on as many as 750 sorts of goods. The result, he said, would materially reduce the charge of living. In the course of his speech on this occasion, he made some observations which implied a change in his opinions, and gave great hope to the free-trade party. It was capable of demonstration, he said, that a selfish policy was not always a wise one for a great nation. He believed that, on the general principle of free trade, there was now no difference of opinion. All agreed that we should purchase in the cheapest, and sell in the dearest market.

The amiable character of the Queen, and her uprightness as a ruler, was insufficient to preserve her from dangerous attacks by evil-disposed or half-insane people. A second attempt was made on her life on the evening of the 30th of May, 1842, by a young man named John Francis, who fired a pistol at her. The ruffian—a machinist employed at Covent Garden Theatre—appeared to have no motive for the atrocious act, and it is therefore reasonable to imagine that he was not of sound mind. He was sentenced to death for high treason, but her majesty graciously commuted his punishment into transportation for life. This merciful conduct did not prevent a miserable-looking, sickly, deformed, and dirty youth, named Bean, from presenting a pistol at the carriage of the Queen the very next day. The weapon was an old, worthless thing, that would not go off, and the act of presenting it was unobserved by the Queen; so that she was saved the agitation that must necessarily have resulted from the explosion. Bean, who seems to have been weak in his intellect, was convicted of a misdemeanor, and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment. To protect her majesty from such wanton acts of malignant and half-witted miscreants, a law was passed, by which, instead of being tried for high treason, they should be committed to prison, and severely whipped.—Another attempt at assassination terminated very differently. Mr. Drummond, the private secretary and friend of Sir Robert Peel, was shot at by a decently-dressed man, of the name of M'Naughten, under the impression that he was the premier himself. The unfortunate gentleman received a severe wound, from the effects of which he expired a few days afterwards. Great sympathy was shown for the fate of the sufferer, not only by Sir Robert and the public, but by the Queen and Prince Albert. Upon the trial of M'Naughten the jury declared him to be insane, and he was very properly consigned to imprisonment during her majesty's pleasure.

The activity of the Anti-Corn-Law League was wonderful: they sent out more lecturers, and distributed tracts by the million. It is no wonder, then, that when parliament reassembled in January, 1843, the subjects of national distress and the corn-laws were resumed. Long and vehement debates took place; but the session passed without any further alteration of those statutes which made bread dear and labour scarce.

At the close of the last chapter, the Chinese were left fully determined to destroy the English fleet, and extirpate the English people. Hostilities recommenced by the capture of Chusan. The Chinese had been uttering most extravagant boasts; but their troops all took to their heels after a cannonade of about seven or eight minutes from some of our war steamers. Negotiations then took place; but the arrogance and insincerity of the Chinese led to a renewal of the conflict. Several other encounters occurred, in which the Asiatics showed themselves so incompetent to contend with the power they had provoked, that they were slain almost like sheep. Preparations were made for storming Canton; but on the 20th of January, 1841, a treaty was signed with Ko-shen, the mandarin who ruled there; and the city was ransomed by the promise to pay 6,000,000 dollars.

The Emperor of China refused to ratify this treaty, and war was resumed on the 25th of February, as the money was not paid. His imperial majesty was much enraged by his losses, and he issued a pompous proclamation, commanding a thorough extermination of the "English rebels." He could not, however, maintain his own against the "Barbarians." In February, 1841, the important forts and war-junks on the Canton river were destroyed; the city was besieged, and only saved from the English by the payment of the large sum demanded. In the summer the operations of the war were confined to the sea and rivers; but, on the 27th of August, Amoy, and in October, Tinghae, Chinhae, and Ningpo were captured.—In June, 1842, Woosung and Shanghae were taken; and the English, who had evacuated Ningpo, were preparing to besiege Nanking; and Ching-kiang-foo, one of the strongest and most important cities of China, was taken. The Chinese fought there with a desperation they had never shown before, and, when defeated, committed suicide, after having destroyed their wives and children. The scenes witnessed by the English troops, on entering the city, were perfectly appalling. In the streets and houses were children dead or dying from the effects of broken spines —a hideous mode of death, inflicted on them by their unnatural parents, to save them from the profanation of the victor's touch. In one house, seven dead or dying persons were found in a single room. One of them was a beautiful young woman, lying on a bed as if in sleep, with a silk scarf thrown over her neck, to conceal the gash which had deprived her of life. Hailing, the chief who defended the city, had raised a funeral pile, of wood and his official papers, and burnt himself to death. The fall of Ching-kiang-foo brought the emperor to reason, and he was at length glad to enter into a peace. This was consented to on several conditions, the chief of which was, that the emperor should pay 21,000,000 of dollars for the expense of the war, besides 6,000,000 he had already been compelled to pay for the opium that had been destroyed. British subjects were to be allowed to reside at certain cities, and to carry on trade without molestation; and in all future transactions between the two nations, the Chinese were always to treat the English as equals. Odd as this last condition may seem, the intolerable boasting of the Chinese had rendered it necessary.

Chartism had again broken into activity; the National Convention was revived; and in May, 1842, a second petition for the charter, twice as large as the first, and containing as many as three million and a-half of signatures, was presented to the House of Commons. It was too large to be got through the door without being cut into five pieces. To the old prayer for the enactment of the five points of the charter, this petition added a desire for the abolition of the national debt, the established church, and the union between England and Ireland. It was not likely that such extensive demands would meet with consideration, and the ministry made an excuse for avoiding the subject. During the following summer and autumn great meetings were held on the Lancashire moors and other places, and many tumults occurred. A disposition was shown amongst the people to raise an insurrection; strikes took place, workhouses were broken into, and bread was sometimes carried off from the bakers' shops. The talk about the month of idleness, or sacred month, as it was called, was revived, and affairs wore a melancholy and threatening aspect. The government at length interfered in a resolute manner; many arrests of the Chartists were made; and, at a special commission at Stafford, 274 of them were placed on their trials. Of these, fifty-four were acquitted, thirteen transported for life, and the rest imprisoned for different periods. Other trials took place, and many more Chartists were condemned to imprisonment or transportation.

About the same time some singular disturbances broke out in Wales. The farmers of Carmarthenshire and Pembrokeshire were much irritated, in 1833, by some heavy turnpike tolls, which were not only considered illegal, but became so oppressive as sometimes to eat up the profit of the goods they carried to market. The simple Welshmen, unable to procure redress, or ignorant how to set about obtaining it, came to the resolution to demolish all the obnoxious gates. From the 24th chapter of Genesis they selected a text, which they fancied sanctioned their intention—"And they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, Let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them." Choosing one of their number for a chief, they dressed him as a woman, and in a short time toll-gates were destroyed in every direction. To the most rigid inquiries after these offenders, no answer could be obtained but that the gates were destroyed by Rebekah and her children. The work of destruction was carried on with great art; and Rebekah and her daughters baffled all attempts of the military and police to discover them. When these riots began (in the winter of 1842-'43), they were unattended with violence to the toll-keepers or any other persons. But as the following autumn approached, incendiarism and even murder was added to the destruction of gates. A proclamation was therefore issued against Rebekah and her followers, large rewards offered for their apprehension, and a commission appointed to inquire into the cause of the disturbances. Upon the report of these commissioners the offensive tolls were removed, and Rebekah and her daughters were seen no more.

Almost as a matter of course, Ireland continued in a state of disorder and agitation. Mr. O'Connell laboured unceasingly to obtain a repeal of the union between that country and England. In 1843, his agitation was rendered extremely formidable on account of his being joined by the Irish Roman Catholic priests. Immense assemblages of the people, called "monster meetings," frequently took place. The greatest of these was held on the 15th of August, at the Hill of Tara, where the ancient kings of Ireland were crowned. It is said not less than half a million persons were present. O'Connell appeared in a cap made something like a crown, and in the course of a violent speech he declared the union to be null—to be only obeyed as an injustice may be obeyed, until it is destroyed; and he promised that, within a twelvemonth, they should have an Irish parliament on College Green. It was announced that another "monster meeting" would be held at Clontarf, near Dublin, at which a party of horsemen was to attend, with the title of the "Repeal Cavalry." Government was alarmed; the intended meeting was prohibited by proclamation; and Mr. O'Connell and other gentlemen arrested on a charge of sedition and conspiracy. They were released on bail, and their trial did not take place until the following year, when Mr. O'Connell was sentenced to suffer a year's imprisonment, and to pay a fine of £2,000. His political associates were sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of £50 each. On account of some legal error in the proceedings against Mr. O'Connell, the House of Lords reversed the judgment against him, and he was set at liberty, to the enthusiastic joy of the Irish people, who celebrated his liberation by wild demonstrations of joy. He was carried home from prison in a triumphal car drawn by six horses, and attended by a procession of such a length, that it was two hours in passing over one spot.

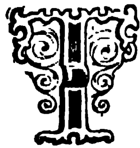
Let us return to the corn-laws. Nothing was done in parliament concerning them during the session of 1844. The following year a deficient harvest made the consideration of the subject inevitable; and many Conservative statesmen declared they could no longer uphold the tax on bread. Still the question was carried forward into the session of 1846. Sir Robert Peel had, before that period, become convinced that the corn-laws could not be maintained longer, and that he must abandon his former policy, and yield to the demands of the people. The failure of the potato crop in Ireland added to the necessity. In the cabinet Sir Robert proposed a suspension of the corn-laws; but, as his colleagues would not agree to that arrangement, he resolved on resigning the premiership. His resignation was accepted by the Queen, who confided to Lord John Russell the task of forming a new ministry. This he was utterly unable to do; Sir Robert Peel therefore resumed office, Lord Stanley (the late Earl of Derby) retired from the cabinet, and the other members of it consented that the premier should be allowed to take his own course.



When parliament met in January, 1846, Sir Robert Peel confessed that his opinions on the subject of protection had undergone great change. He did not feel himself humiliated by making that confession; on the contrary, he asserted and claimed for himself the privilege of yielding to the force of reason and argument, and of acting upon his enlarged experience and a more matured conviction. A few days afterwards, the premier proposed the extinction of the corn-laws within three years. The protectionists had formed themselves into a party, of which Lord George Bentinck was regarded as the leader, and Mr. Disraeli the orator; and a great parliamentary contest took place, which lasted for twelve nights. At its close, the majority in favour of a first reading of the bill granting a free trade in corn amounted to ninety-seven. The protection party still opposed the progress of the measure, and four nights more of dreary discussion was raised on the second reading. Three adjournments took place, also, on the third reading; but yet the bill passed. The resistance to it in the House of Lords was rather noisy than powerful, and, on the 25th of June, 1846, it was read a third time, and passed. Resistance to it was, to some extent, disarmed by the Duke of Wellington, who gave up his own convictions, and voted in its favour, to preserve the peace of the nation.

Great was the joy of the people; for it was felt that a commercial revolution had been effected—that an impetus had been given to manufacturing industry, and famine price for food rendered, in future, almost an impossibility. The Anti-Corn-Law League was dissolved; its chairman rewarded by a testimonial of £10,000, and Mr. Cobden with £80,000. Sir Robert Peel, though honoured by the nation, was violently assailed by the party he had deserted. Fierce attacks were made upon him; he was called a traitor, a renegade, and his conduct described as base and dishonest. The protection party sought their revenge in driving him from office: they joined the Whigs in voting against the ministry on a bill for the better protection of life in Ireland; the government was defeated; and Sir Robert resigned the premiership on the 29th of June, 1846. In making that event known in the House of Commons, he delivered a farewell address to power. He exulted in the triumph of the free-trade principle; but generously admitted, that the name which ought chiefly to be associated with that great measure was the name of Richard Cobden. In conclusion, he said — "I shall surrender power severely censured by those who, from no interested motive, adhere to the principle of protection, considering the maintenance of it to be essential to the welfare and interests of the country. I shall leave a name execrated by every monopolist who, from less honourable motives, clamours for protection, because it conduces to his own individual benefit. But it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good-will in the abodes of those whose lot it is to labour, and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, when they shall recruit their exhausted strength with abundant and untaxed food—the sweeter because it is no longer leavened by the sense of injustice."

CHAPTER CV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1846—1850.

HE Whigs again came into office in July, 1846, and Lord John Russell became prime minister. The new government, however, was so weak, and so far from possessing the confidence of either parliament or the country, that it could not have stood but for the forbearance of Sir Robert Peel, who declined to lead an opposition against it.

The early proceedings of the new ministers do not possess much interest. But, before the end of the year, the state of Ireland excited universal sympathy, and even awe. The usual wretchedness of that distracted land was fearfully increased by famine—a wide, sweeping, hideous famine, followed by pestilence. The failure of the potatoes and oats, in 1846-'47, caused a loss of food valued at sixteen millions of money. Many of the wretched peasantry, who had been used to living on one meal a day, were often unable to obtain that, and driven to appease the agonies of hunger by feeding on seaweed and wild herbs. The multitude of deaths from starvation was awful, in some places amounting to a tenth of the inhabitants; while Skibbereen, in the county of Cork, was depopulated. It is said that, in the madness of their agony, starving wretches gnawed the emaciated bodies of the dead. The English government made immediate and noble sacrifices for the relief of the sufferers. Not only was instant aid given, but immense sums were voted for the employment of the Irish poor on works of public utility. Nor were the people of England idle in this charitable cause; benevolent contributions were poured out, for the assistance of afflicted Ireland, with a ready and unsparing hand. Before the famine ceased, and the usual state of things was restored, the voluntary contributions amounted to £1,048,246 13s., and the sums advanced by the government to £7,132,286. One-half of the latter sum was to be repaid, in ten years, out of the poor-rates; the other moiety was a free grant.

There are reports that attempts were made to divert the sums thus liberally given from their proper channel; that gentlemen of ample means suffered their labourers and dependents to apply for rations; whilst farmers were known to ask for, and obtain, supplies. Let us hope these rumours are not true. From official reports, it appears that the national bounty was fairly administered by those to whom it was entrusted. Mr. Trevelyan, who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time, says—"It is a fact very honourable to Ireland, that, among upwards of 2,000 local bodies to whom advances were made," under the act passed to facilitate the issue of grants, called "The Temporary Relief Act," "there was not one to which, so far as the government was informed, any suspicion of embezzlement attached." [Edinburgh Review, January, 1848.]

While speaking of Ireland, the death of Mr. Daniel O'Connell should not be overlooked. He departed this life on the 15th of May, 1847, in his seventy-fourth year. Since his imprisonment he had become more cautious, and his popularity had greatly declined. Still his death caused an extraordinary sensation throughout Ireland; the whole people mourned for him, and the procession that followed him to the grave was a mile and a-half in length. He was a man of extraordinary talents and eloquence—both, unfortunately, misdirected; his agitation for a repeal of the union between Great Britain and Ireland being very injurious to the latter country.

A new parliament assembled on the 18th of November, 1847: just before, there had been an extraordinary commercial panic; many great houses failed, and confidence seemed on the eve of perishing. It was attributed chiefly to over-speculation in railways, and to the drain of gold from the country caused by late deficient harvests. Government took the proper steps to restore public confidence, and soon the great stream of trade rolled on again in its usual channels.

Crime had fearfully increased in Ireland during the famine. On the 29th of November, Sir George Grey, the Home Secretary, brought in a bill giving the lord-lieutenant power "to proclaim" disturbed districts; to increase the constabulary force; and to take other measures of precaution to prevent crime; while he was invested with more effective means to punish it. The bill passed, but not without great opposition: other measures followed for the relief of the distress that still existed.

The year 1848 was distinguished by a circle of revolutions in the continental states; only one, however—that of France—requires to be noticed in this history. Louis Philippe had certainly failed to fulfil the expectations of the people, who placed him on the throne by the revolution of July, 1830. His measures caused great discontent; and a strong opposition was formed in the Chamber of Deputies. After the legislature opened on the 28th of December, 1847, debates were raised on the state of the country, which extended over a month; and then it was arranged, that, on the 22nd of February, 1848, a great reform banquet should be held in Paris. This banquet was prohibited by the police, and the committee appointed to make the arrangements, announced that it would not take place. The populace of Paris, however, rose on the 22nd; on the 23rd, there was fighting between it and the soldiers in most of the streets; in the night, barricades were formed in all the principal thoroughfares, the trees in the Boulevards being cut down for the purpose; and eventually the mob was triumphant. Louis Philippe formed a new ministry, substituting M. Thiers for M. Guizot as its chief. This failed to conciliate the populace, who, on the 24th, took possession of the palace of the Tuileries, which they plundered; and the king, in a moment of fright, signed an abdication of the throne in favour of his eldest son, the Count de Paris. But the cry of "Vive la Republique!" overbore that of "Vive le Roi!" and Louis Philippe and his family, with difficulty, escaped from the capital. On the 3rd of March they landed at Newhaven, on the coast of Sussex. On the 4th, they took up their residence at Claremont, by invitation of Queen Victoria. A republic was from that time established in France; first under the influence of M. Lamartine; then General Cavaignac became dictator; and finally, Charles Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, a nephew of the great Napoleon, was elected president, taking the oath of office on the 20th of December, 1848; his term to cease in May, 1852.

This revolution encouraged the repealers in Ireland, and the Chartists in England; and commotions took place in both countries. In the former, a party called "Young Ireland" had been formed in 1842. Its organ was The Nation, a newspaper edited by Thomas Davis, Charles Gavin Duffy, and John Mitchell. The leaders of this party went further than O'Connell, who only demanded a repeal of the union between Great Britain and Ireland, and the establishment of an Irish parliament. The "Young Irelanders" demanded national independence; that Ireland should be a separate kingdom, completely independent of England and the English sovereign. This party was very active from 1842 till 1846. During that time differences arose, occasioned by the religious question. Duffy was a Roman Catholic, Mitchell a Unitarian; and whilst the former wished to maintain the spiritual and temporal power of the Roman Catholic priesthood, the latter was opposed to all ecclesiastical interference in civil or political matters. This difference of opinion led to a division of the Young Ireland party; and, in 1846, Mitchell, joined by William Smith O'Brien, a member of parliament, Thomas Francis Meagher, and some others, established the "Irish Confederation;" Mitchell seceding from The Nation, and starting a journal called The United Irishman, to advocate the views of the new body. When the revolution took place in France, the trio above-named thought it time for action in Ireland. On the 30th of March, a meeting of the confederates was held at the North Wall, Dublin, at which treasonable speeches were made, and an address to the French republic adopted. Mr. W. S. O'Brien, Mr. Meagher, and Mr. R. O'Gorman were appointed a deputation to present this address to Lamartine, with whom they had an interview on the 3rd of April. Their object was, to induce the French authorities to give material aid to an Irish insurrection. Lamartine received the deputation and the address very graciously, but positively refused to extend any assistance to the Irish Confederation. That body, however, persisted in its insurrectionary career. Its agents purchased arms, established a manufacture of pikes, and formed clubs in various parts of the island, which the lord-lieutenant (the Earl of Clarendon) declared illegal. Mitchell, Smith O'Brien, and Meagher were apprehended, and tried for sedition. In the cases of the two latter the juries could not agree, and they were discharged; but Mitchell was found guilty, sentenced to be transported for fourteen years, and was sent to Bermuda. His paper, The United Irishman, was, in consequence, discontinued; and another paper, The Irish Felon, replaced it.

In July, Lord Clarendon obtained from parliament extraordinary powers, which he had demanded, to enable him to put down the insurrection. Numerous arrests were made; and rewards were offered for the capture of Smith O'Brien, Meagher, and other leaders, who escaped. O'Brien himself, armed with a short pike, and several pistols fastened to a belt, succeeded in collecting the peasantry around him near Ballingarry, on the confines of Tipperary and Kilkenny; and, on the 29th of July, he went, at the head of his force, to the house of a widow, named M'Cormack, on Boulagh

Common, near Ballingarry. The house was occupied by police, whom he summoned to surrender. The answer was a volley of musketry. After a brief struggle, in which the insurgents lost seven killed, and several wounded (the police remaining unhurt), the men who were to have established the independence of Ireland, ignominiously dispersed. A number of arrests were made, including Smith O'Brien and Meagher; the Nation and Irish Felon were suppressed, and the type and presses seized. There were no further attempts at violence on the part of the members of the "Irish Confederation:" of that body no more was heard. Many of the prisoners were sentenced to brief terms of imprisonment, or discharged on entering into recognizances to keep the peace. In October, four of the leaders—Smith O'Brien, Meagher, M'Manus, and O'Donoghue—were tried for high treason, found guilty, and sentenced to death; but the sentence was mitigated to transportation. After enduring that punishment a few years, they received the Queen's pardon. Gavan Duffy was also arrested, and tried twice for high treason, in January and April, 1849, the jury, on each occasion, not agreeing in their verdict. Mr. Duffy was ultimately discharged on his own recognizance of £1,000 to appear again if called upon. He subsequently emigrated to Australia, where he became a member of the government; and, on a visit which he paid to England in 1866, he appeared to have abjured his former violent and disaffected principles.

In England and Scotland the movements of the Chartists were going on at the same time with those of the Irish Confederation; the object being to obtain the "Five Points," already enumerated. [See ante, p. 543.] The first manifestation was made in Scotland, where a complete organisation appears to have prevailed in the manufacturing towns in the west. Glasgow took the lead; an insurrection was to take place there; and, if successful, all the other towns were to follow. In Glasgow, serious riots were committed on the 5th and 6th of March, by numerous bodies of men, amounting to several thousand; who made weapons for themselves out of the iron railings, attacked the shops of the gunsmiths and jewellers, which they pillaged, and did other damage. On the second day, about 10,000 men assembled on the Green of Glasgow, intending to march on the suburb of Calton, and turn out all the millworkers there, who it was expected would join them. They then intended to return to Glasgow, cut the pipes, and thus lay the city in darkness, under the protection of which they meant to break open the gaol, and liberate the prisoners; and then set fire to, and plunder the city. On their way to Calton, they encountered some pensioners escorting a deserter to prison. The rioters attempted to disarm these brave veterans, who, undaunted by numbers, fired amongst them, and killed two of the assailants. This raised the fury of the latter; and, probably, not one of the pensioners would have escaped, had not a squadron of cavalry arrived on the spot just at the moment when its presence was most necessary. The soldiers dispersed the rioters, and Glasgow was saved.

In London, there were serious riots on the 6th of March, lasting from 8 P.M. till midnight. They originated at a meeting in Trafalgar Square, called for the ostensible purpose of petitioning for a repeal of the income-tax. There was much fighting with the police before quiet was restored; and the riots were renewed the next day, when about eighty persons were taken into custody.—At that time, the Chartist National Convention, re-modelled, and comprising only those who were recognised as leaders of the party, was sitting; and held its meetings at a hall in John Street, Fitzroy Square. By that body another (so-called) national petition had been prepared, to which it was stated that upwards of 5,000,000 signatures were attached. The petition was to be presented to the House of Commons on the 10th of April, when a great Chartist demonstration, with Mr. Feargus O'Connor as president, was to take place on Kennington Common; and the men assembling there were to march to Westminster with the petition. The recent convulsion in France caused the ministers to take alarm, and every precaution was taken to preserve the public peace. Bodies of horse and foot police were ordered to be posted on the approaches to the bridges; additional guards to be placed at the Bank, Tower, and other important public buildings; and as many as 170,000 special constables were sworn-in; whilst troops and cannon, under the direction of the aged Duke of Wellington, were in readiness for action in and around London.

On the morning of the 10th of April, the great thoroughfares in the metropolis presented the appearance of Sunday; all the shops being closed, and business suspended. None of the military were to be seen, but the police and special constables were stationed along the route from Kennington to Westminster: Prince Louis Napoleon, who was at that time residing in London, served in the ranks of the latter. Early in the morning, the members of the National Convention assembled at their hall in John Street, from whence they were taken to Kennington in an immense car, drawn by six horses, which had been constructed for the occasion. It was followed by another car, bearing the huge petition, and drawn by four horses. Between 1,000 and 2,000 Chartists accompanied this procession to the common; and other detachments arrived in various directions, till a large number assembled—certainly not fewer than 30,000. The chief commissioner of police, Sir Richard Mayne, was at the Horns Tavern, opposite the common; and as soon as the great car arrived (in which Messrs. Feargus O'Connor and Ernest Jones, a barrister, were conspicuous), he sent for the Chartist leader, and told him that there was no intention to interrupt the meeting if it were conducted peaceably; but that the persons assembled would not be suffered to go in procession, with the petition, to the House of Commons. Mr. O'Connor undertook to see that the meeting dispersed; and he then returned, and assumed his place as chairman. When he explained the result of his interview with Sir Richard Mayne, the greatest disappointment was manifested. Dispersion began immediately. Some fiery orators briefly addressed groups of listeners; who were very emphatic in their threats against the authorities, but did not attempt to carry them into execution. These groups soon left the common; and by 3 P.M. the crowds had vanished, and the metropolis was at peace.

But what became of the petition? is a question which will naturally be asked. As there were numerous rolls of signatures, they were divided, put into three cabs, and so conveyed to the House of Commons when the members assembled. Mr. Feargus O'Connor (who was one of the representatives for Nottingham) presented it, and alleged that it had been signed by 5,706,000 persons. It was read at length by the clerk, and, subsequently, the signatures were examined and counted, thirteen clerks being employed, in addition to the regular staff, to go through that duty. It was then discovered that the number of signatures was 1,975,496—a large number certainly, though it was less than that stated by Mr. O'Connor, by 3,730,504 names. If all the signatures had been genuine, however, a petition so signed would have been entitled to much weight. But many were in the same handwriting; and, therefore, it is doubtful whether they were really attached with the consent of the parties; and others were notorious forgeries. Thus there were found the pretended signatures of Victoria Rex, Prince Albert, the Duke of Wellington (affixed thirty times), Colonel Sibthorpe (twelve times), Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and of other persons quite as unlikely to sign such a document. Evidently fictitious names were also affixed; and, in some instances, slang expressions, such as "No Cheese," "Pug Nose," "Flat Nose," &c., were written. These disclosures covered the Chartist cause with ridicule, and contributed to its extinction. Ministers, also, took measures to prevent the agitation from extending to the lengths contemplated by the National Convention. On the 7th of April, Sir George Grey brought in a bill, "for the better security of the crown and government;" which passed both Houses by large majorities, though violently opposed. In the course of the discussion, Lord John Russell contended that it did not contain a single syllable which could be justly said to impair the rights of free discussion. To support those rights, on the 13th of April, fifty-one members of parliament met at 14, St. James's Square, and instituted the Reform League, with Mr. Joseph Hume as chairman, Mr. Cobden as vice-chairman, and Sir Joshua Walmesley as honorary secretary. The object of the new society was declared to be, to advance reform principles throughout Great Britain and Ireland.

The Chartist organisation extended through England and Scotland, the head-quarters of the movement being in London; and that violent measures were contemplated, there can be no doubt. Inflammatory placards were posted, especially in Glasgow. In those displayed on the walls of that city, the multitudes were called upon to rise, and put an end to the vile government of the oligarchy; the soldiers were exhorted to join them; £10 and four acres of land being offered to every one wearing her majesty's uniform, who would turn traitor. Several meetings were held in London after the failure on Kennington Common. They were more frequent in the country, and disturbances took place at several towns in the west, where the police had to interfere. The Irish also formed Confederate Clubs, and joined the Chartists. At length, the government having sufficient evidence to act upon, five of the Chartist leaders—Messrs. Ernest Jones, John Fussell, Joseph Williams, Alexander Sharpe, and G. Vernon—were arrested, and held to bail for sedition. Spies were at work for the government—a course of proceeding that should never be resorted to except in the last extremity, when the public peace and the safety of the nation are at stake. Through the disclosures of those employés, it was ascertained that there were nightly meetings of Chartists at the Angel Hotel, in Webber Street, Blackfriars; and at houses in Orange Street, Holborn, and York Street, Westminster. These three places were visited on the night of the 16th of August, and several arrests were made at each. Some of the prisoners wore iron breastplates; and stores of pistols—some loaded to the muzzle—swords, pikes, daggers, spear-heads, and ammunition were found; one of the prisoners having seventy-five rounds of ball-cartridge on his person. Tow-balls were also discovered, by which any building might have been in a few minutes enveloped in flames. —In September, twenty-five of the men thus arrested were tried, convicted, and sentenced to various periods of imprisonment.

There were few events of importance in our domestic history in the year 1848, unconnected with the reform question. Before the year closed, Chartism may be considered to have become extinct; but the Reform League kept the defective state of the representation, together with its anomalies and injustice, before the public in a more constitutional manner than had been done by the followers of Feargus O'Connor. A thoroughly constitutional step was taken to forward the cause by endeavouring to secure greater interest to the popular party in county elections. In the month of December, public meetings were held at Dudley, Cockermouth, and other places, with a view of establishing freehold land societies; through whose agency land was to be purchased for the purpose of enabling working-men to become 40s. freeholders. The scheme proved successful : ere a very long time elapsed, it gave the Liberals the command of more than one county, owing to the votes which the society had created and distributed. Then the Conservatives, who had had the subject pressed upon their attention, but unavailingly, early in 1849, established the Conservative Freehold Land Society; and the two societies are still actively engaged in promoting the interests of their respective parties, and, as each believes, the cause of the country.

In the autumn her majesty went to Balmoral, where she has a beautiful and attractive residence. During that season, one of the first of those international displays took place, of which we have, subsequently, had several on a larger scale, but not of more interest. On the 25th of October, the Lord Mayor of London gave a reception in the Mansion-house to 300 national guards of Paris, whose commandant expressed his gratitude, and that of the gallant body he commanded, for the hospitable reception they had met with in London.

Since the Afghan war [see ante, p. 545], there had been several other wars in the East, besides those with China. The gallant garrison of Jellalabad, which, under General Sale, had, in the words of Lord Ellenborough (who assumed the office of governor-general in February, 1842), "saved the name and fame of the British empire in India," and General Pollock's army, had scarcely returned to the British dominions, than the Indian government was involved in another contest —one with the Ameers of Scinde, an extensive and important province of Western India, so called, probably, from the river Scinde, or Indus. These Ameers, while professing friendship, had behaved most treacherously to us during the Afghan war. Lord Ellenborough had ordered that all such faithless allies should be so signally punished, as to effectually deter others from similar conduct. Sir Charles Napier was sent against the Ameers; but before he fought he tried negotiations. The Ameers of Lower Scinde signed a treaty with him on the 14th of February, 1843; and the very next day the residence of the British commissioners at Hyderabad was attacked by a large force, and those officials were driven out to seek safety elsewhere. Sir Charles immediately advanced to give battle to the Ameers' forces; and, on the 17th, he won the victory of Meeanee, though his force was not more than 2,600 men of all arms, opposed to 30,000 foot and 5,000 horse. The next day six of the Ameers surrendered themselves prisoners; and, on the 5th of March, the governor-general announced, in a proclamation from the palace of Agra, that Scinde was annexed to the British dominions. The Ameer of Meerpoor still stood out; Sir Charles Napier defeated him at Dubba on the 24th of March; and that victory completely annihilated the power of those Indian chiefs. Wars that began with the Seiks in December, 1845, when they invaded the British territory, ended, in 1849, in the annexation of the Punjaub, "an extensive territory on the north-west of India, so called from two Persian words, signifying 'five waters,' the name having reference to five great rivers which flow through it." During the three years the following battles were fought: —Moodkee [December 18], and Ferozeshah [December 21 and 22, 1845]; Aliwal [January 28], and Sobraon [February 10, 1846]; Ramnuggur [November 2, 1848]; Chillianwallah [January 13], and Goojerat [February 21, 1849]. The latter was one of the most decisive victories ever won in India. The English force of 25,000 men, and 100 guns, was under Lord Gough; the Seiks, numbering 60,000 men, with 59 guns, were commanded by Shere Singh, who, at the close of the battle, escaped to the Salt-range hills with only 8,000 men. On the 8th of March, the Seik chief appeared in the British camp, and endeavoured to procure an advantageous capitulation. He was told that nothing but an unconditional surrender would be accepted. On the 14th, the entire Seik force laid down their arms, and surrendered unconditionally; and, on the 29th, the Marquis Dalhousie (then the governor-general) issued a proclamation, announcing that the family of Runjeet Singh had ceased to reign; and that the country of the Five Rivers was incorporated with the British dominions. The results which followed the annexation were most propitious. The army was quietly disbanded; the turbulent soldiery settled down to industrious pursuits, and the amount of crime greatly diminished.

The year 1849 was ushered in with a demonstration made by the Liberal party. On the 10th of January, a large public meeting was held in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, on the subject of financial reform. A few months previously, a society had been established in Liverpool, called the Liverpool Financial Reform Association, with the object of substituting direct for indirect taxation, and of procuring a reduction in the public expenditure. At the Manchester meeting, a resolution, moved by Mr. Cobden, was adopted, pledging those present to co-operate with the Liverpool Society, "in its efforts to reduce the expenditure to at least the standard of 1835; and to secure a more equitable and economical system of taxation." A resolution, proposed by Mr. Bright, was also adopted, for the formation of an association to extend the franchise by the 40s. freehold qualification, and a careful attention to the registration in boroughs and counties.

The parliament was opened on the 1st of February, by the Queen in person. In her speech her majesty recommended the legislature seriously to consider the navigation laws, with a view to "the repeal or modification of their provisions." The aspect of affairs, she said, would enable large reductions to be made in the expenditure; but she regretted that the state of Ireland called for a continuance of the powers which, in the last session, were deemed necessary for the preservation of the public tranquillity. Commerce, her majesty said, was reviving; and the revenue showed signs of progressive improvement. She referred, "with pride and thankfulness, to the loyalty of her subjects during a time of commercial difficulty, want, and foreign political revolution;" and asked for the divine blessing to favour our continued progress.

During the session debates were raised on many public questions; one of the most important and interesting, which continued through several evenings, being upon the oaths taken by members of parliament. It was introduced by Lord John Russell, who, on the 19th of February, moved that the House should go into a committee to consider those oaths; his object being to procure such a modification in them as would permit Jews to become members of the legislature. After the House had sat in committee, and the question had been discussed, Lord John Russell introduced a bill "for the relief of her majesty's subjects professing the Jewish religion;" which passed the Commons by a large majority, but was rejected by the Lords. There were, also, animated debates on the bill for the repeal of the navigation laws, of which Mr. Labouchere, President of the Board of Trade, took charge, and which passed the Commons, on the 25th of April, by a majority of 275 votes to 214.—In the Lords there was a majority, on the third reading, of 13. On the 12th of June, there was an animated debate on a resolution moved by Mr. Cobden—after a speech in which he eloquently expatiated on the expense and horrors of war, and the blessings of peace—in favour of the settlement of international questions by arbitration instead of war. Lord Robert Grosvenor, Mr. Ewart, Colonel Thompson, Mr. Roebuck, Mr. M. Gibson, and Mr. Hume supported the motion: it was opposed by Lords Palmerston and John Russell, Mr. M. Milnes, and Mr. Urquhart. Lord Palmerston moved the previous question, which was carried.

The bill for continuing the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, caused angry discussions; but it was carried through its different stages by large majorities. With respect to Ireland, a vote granting £50,000 for the relief of Irish distress in those unions where, owing to the severity of that distress, a sufficient rate could not be collected, was adopted; and a bill to facilitate the sale of encumbered estates in Ireland, and to enable persons having perpetual and limited interests in land in that country to make grants in fee, or demises for long terms of years, was passed. This act—generally known as the Encumbered Estates' Act—established a board of commissioners, possessing the powers of the Court of Chancery, which could be exercised in a summary manner, with no unnecessary delay, and at little expense.—The act has operated most beneficially for Ireland. It was passed, originally, as a temporary measure; but, in 1858, it was made a permanent enactment, and the three commissioners were constituted a court called the Landed Estates' Court, and were declared to rank with the judges of the law courts. Before the session closed, the Commons, in a committee of supply on the 4th of May, resolved that the government should be empowered to advance a sum, not exceeding £300,000, to facilitate the improvement of landed property in Ireland; and £200,000 to carry out arterial drainage in that country.

The finances and commerce of the country have regularly progressed in the last twenty years, and have attracted more of the public attention than formerly. From this time, therefore, we shall, each year, include the state of our revenue and of our foreign trade in the historical sketch. The financial questions were discussed, in the session of 1849, without any acrimony. The revenue for the year ending January 5th, amounted to £53,388,717 3s. 3d., and the expenditure to £54,185,136 17s. 9d., leaving a deficiency of £796,419 14s. 6d. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Charles Wood) made his financial statement on the 22nd of June, he estimated the revenue for the ensuing year at £52,252,000; and the expenditure at £52,157,696; leaving a surplus of £94,304. In the expenditure there were reductions, amounting, in the whole, to £1,511,455; and the consolidation of the Excise Board with that of stamps and taxes, caused a saving of £247,000. The actual surplus of revenue, however, was too small to allow of any reduction of taxation.—All the right honourable gentleman's propositions were agreed to, with little opposition; and the two Houses were prorogued, by commission, on the 1st of August. A few days before the prorogation (on the 21st of July), the Liberal members of the House of Commons assembled in one of the committee-rooms, under the presidency of Mr. Bright, and resolved, in the next session, to pursue a united course of action upon all questions connected with the Irish church, the English and Irish franchise, and the tenure of land in Ireland.

While the session was in progress, the metropolis was alarmed by a report, which soon spread amongst all classes of its inhabitants, that another attempt had been made to assassinate the Queen. On Saturday, the 19th of May, her majesty was returning to Buckingham Palace from a drive in Hyde Park, when an Irish labourer out of employ, named Hamilton, discharged a pistol at her. The fellow was immediately seized by some of the attendants on her majesty, who had great difficulty in preserving him from the fury of the by-standers. He was of course lodged in prison, and was subsequently tried, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to seven years' transportation. The affair was mentioned in both Houses when they met on the following Monday, and an address to the Queen was suggested; but the Marquis of Lansdowne in one House, and Lord John Russell in the other, said the act, though disgusting and odious in the extreme, was too contemptible to call for an address of congratulation; and the subject dropped amidst a general expression of loyal affection for her majesty.

The Queen had, for some time, entertained a wish to visit Ireland, and arrangements were made for her doing so in the summer of 1849. On the 1st of August, the day that parliament was prorogued, her majesty embarked at Cowes, on board the royal packet Victoria and Albert, accompanied by Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice. The royal party arrived the next day at Cove—a seaport and market town on the south side of Cove island, in Cork harbour—where they landed, and were received with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of loyalty. From Cove her majesty went to Cork, and then to Dublin and Belfast; at each place she met with the same hearty welcome; and her presence seemed to imbue the Irish people with a new feeling. To commemorate the royal visit, the name of Cove was, at the request of the inhabitants, changed into Queenstown. It is much to be regretted that the royal family do not oftener visit Green Erin. If they would go a little more amongst them, they would nowhere find a more loyal people than the Irish.

The Queen and royal family left Ireland on the 13th of August; landed at Lough Ryan, on the Argyllshire coast; and proceeded, by Glasgow, to Balmoral; where, on the 26th, Prince Albert's birthday was celebrated by the Highlanders with great festivity. On the 29th of September, the Queen again arrived at another favourite residence—Osborne, in the Isle of Wight. In the following month Prince Albert was in London; and, on the 17th, his royal highness attended a meeting at the Mansion-house, held under his auspices, as president of the Society of Arts, at which the subject of an International Exhibition of Works of Art and Industry was discussed; and it was resolved that such an exhibition should be held in the year 1851, in a building to be erected for the purpose in Hyde Park.

That terrible Asiatic pest, the cholera, again occasioned great alarm in England during the summer of 1849. It first appeared at the close of 1848; increased during the following spring; and reached to its greatest height in July and August. So general and so fatal were its ravages, that, on the 16th of September, by order of the Queen, prayers were offered up in all the churches for its removal. The total number of deaths in London, in the previous week, had been 3,183; the ordinary weekly average being 1,008: the number of deaths from the disease throughout England, in the summer quarter, was 60,492.—On the 13th of October, the cessation of this disease in the metropolis was announced; and it soon disappeared in other parts of the kingdom.—On the 2nd of December, the Queen-Dowager, Adelaide, the widow of William IV., died. Since the death of her husband, Queen Adelaide had chiefly resided at Bentley Priory, near Stanmore, in the county of Middlesex, where she expended a very large portion of her income in works of charity. At her own request she was interred at Windsor, in a private and unostentatious manner. "I die in all humility," said her majesty, shortly before she breathed her last, "knowing well that we are all alike before the throne of God; and I request, therefore, that my mortal remains be conveyed to the grave without any pomp or state. I request not to be dissected or embalmed; and desire to give as little trouble as possible."

During the year, there was an attempt at rebellion in Canada, where the liberal policy of Lord Elgin displeased many of those who are known as the Orange party. The first symptoms of a disposition to revolt against the constituted authorities, was shown on the passing of an act to recompense the sufferers from the rebellion of 1837-'8. At Montreal the state of affairs was, for some time, very threatening; the disaffected gaining the upper hand, assaulting the governor-general in the streets, burning the parliament-house, and destroying the residences of the ministers, after having plundered them of their most valuable contents.—On the 15th of October a meeting was summoned at Bytown, near Montreal, by the supporters of Lord Elgin, to prepare an address to his lordship, approving of his policy. The Orangemen, however, intruded; a fight ensued, which resulted in severe personal injuries to both parties; and, finally, the chairman was driven from his seat, the intruders took possession of the platform, and resolutions quite opposed to the sentiments of the promoters of the meeting were passed.—Earl Grey was then the secretary for colonial affairs. He sent reinforcements to the governor-general, who was soon enabled to put down the disturbance and restore order; which has not since been interrupted in that colony, where great loyalty to the Queen, and love of the mother country, is evinced.

On the 1st of January, 1850, a paper appeared, which showed the effects of the repeal of the corn-laws. It gave the total amount of corn-duties collected from 1828 to 1848 (both years inclusive), when the sliding-scale was in force; and the amount collected from February 1, 1849, to the close of the year, under the law imposing the 1*s.* per quarter duty. In the twenty-one years the amount was £12,024,578; being an average of £572,599 per annum; in the eleven months of 1849, the sum paid into the exchequer was £615,814; the importations averaging 1,000,000 quarters per month. Other public documents which appeared about the same time, or shortly after, showed that the general state of the country was favourable. The revenue exceeded the expenditure by upwards of £2,000,000. The foreign trade had increased; the exports rising from £48,846,325 in 1848, to £58,848,042 in 1849; whilst the cheapness of provisions and the increase of employment had caused pauperism to decrease materially. On the other hand, the farming interest suffered severely; and in the agricultural districts there was much distress.—Another official paper, that appeared on the 3rd of January, was a proclamation, issued by the Queen, for the purpose of carrying out the proposal first made by her consort, Prince Albert. By this document a commission was appointed to promote an exhibition of the works of industry of all nations, to be held in the year 1851: soon after, the commissioners nominated, with the Prince Consort at their head, entered upon the discharge of their duties.

Parliament assembled on the 31st of January; and during the long session—the prorogation did not take place till the 15th of August—many important bills were passed; and both Houses were the scene of many animated debates. In her opening speech, the Queen dwelt, with pleasure, upon her recent visit to Ireland; and regretted "that the effects of former years of scarcity were still painfully felt" in that country. Her majesty congratulated parliament on the improved condition of commerce and manufactures; and, in allusion to the complaints of the owners and occupiers of land, "lamented that any portion of her subjects should be suffering distress." She expressed "sincere gratification at witnessing the increased enjoyment of the necessaries and comforts of life, which cheapness and plenty had bestowed on the great body of her people."—Several measures which were to be brought before parliament were mentioned; and her majesty concluded by acknowledging the "favour of Divine Providence, in having hitherto preserved this kingdom from the wars and convulsions" which, during the last two years, had prevailed on the continent of Europe.

Of the bills passed this session, one for restraining party processions in Ireland, and the exhibition of any banner, emblem, flag, or symbol, calculated or tending to provoke animosity between different classes of her majesty's subjects, has had a good effect in that country; and would be more beneficial were it impartially enforced. Another act extended the privileges of self-government to the colonies of Australia and Tasmania. A bill was also brought in to abolish the office of lord-lieutenant of Ireland; but it was dropped without any decision being come to upon it: and though the question of abolition has been several times revived, the office still exists, and is likely to continue.—One act of the session was intended to promote the intellectual improvement of the working classes. It empowers town councils, with the consent of two-thirds of the rate-payers, to establish free public libraries and museums.—"An act for improving the condition of masters, mates, and seamen, and maintaining discipline in the merchant service," has proved very beneficial to the mercantile community.—Of the debates, those on the foreign policy of the government, and on altering the oaths for the purpose of admitting Jews to seats in parliament, excited the most interest. The first arose out of a difference with the Greek government. A Jew named Pacifico (who, however, claimed to be a subject of her majesty by birth), had been assaulted and injured by a mob at Athens, and he made demands on the Greek government for compensation, which that government refused to comply with. Pacifico applied to the English ministry; and Lord Palmerston insisted that he should receive the compensation he demanded; and he also united to the claims of Pacifico those of some other English subjects. As the Greek government continued obstinate in its refusal, his lordship ordered the Mediterranean fleet to blockade the Greek ports—a blockade which commenced on the 18th of January, and was not known to have been raised when the debate took place. The subject had been generally discussed out of doors; and public opinion was against Lord Palmerston, whose conduct with respect to Greece was contrasted with that he had observed towards France and the United States; and he was charged with bullying the weak, and submitting to the strong. On the 17th of June, Lord Stanley (the late Earl of Derby, who had been called to the House of Lords by the former title during the lifetime of his father) discussed at great length the blockade of Greece, censuring the harsh proceedings of the foreign minister. He also entered minutely into the conduct of Lord Palmerston, as connected with our foreign affairs; and moved a resolution strongly censuring his policy. The motion was supported by the Earls of Aberdeen and Cardigan, Viscount Canning, and Lord Brougham. The Marquis of Lansdowne, Lords Ward, Beaumont, and Eddisbury opposed it. The House divided—

Majority for the resolution, 39.

When questioned as to what course the government meant to pursue after this dispute, Lord John Russell, on the 20th of June, proceeded to show, by precedents, that an adverse vote in the House of Lords did not render a resignation imperative. He then declared that the vote would not alter the course the ministers had deemed it right to pursue with respect to foreign powers; and said, so long as he and his colleagues continued the government of this country, he could answer for his noble friend, that he would not act as a minister of Austria, or of Russia, or of France, or of any other country, but as the minister of England. Mr. Roebuck then gave notice of his intention to move the following resolution:—"That the principles which have hitherto regulated the foreign policy of her majesty's government, are such as were required to preserve, untarnished, the honour and dignity of this country; and, in times of unexampled difficulty, the best calculated to maintain peace between England and the various nations of the world."—The debate on this motion commenced on the 24th of June, and was continued on the 25th, the 27th, and the 28th. The House divided on the latter day, when the numbers were—for the resolution, 310; against it, 264: majority, 46. After the division, a deputation of nearly ninety members of the House of Commons, headed by Lord Patrick James Stuart, the member for Ayr, waited upon Lady Palmerston, and presented her ladyship with a full-length portrait of the noble lord, purchased with the proceeds of a subscription entered into by the members on the liberal side of the House. It was presented as a tribute to his lordship's public and private character, and as testifying the subscribers' approval of the firm and independent policy with which, as foreign minister, he upheld the honour, and maintained the interests of his country. Her ladyship was much gratified by this presentation; and the same evening, a telegraphic message was received, announcing that the Greek government had complied with the demands of his lordship, and that the blockade was raised.

The discussion on the admission of the Jews to seats in the House of Commons, arose out of Baron de Rothschild's claim to take the oath without repeating the words, "on the true faith of a Christian." At the general election in August, 1847, the baron had been returned as one of the members for London. Lord John Russell's attempt, in the previous session, to procure an alteration of the oaths having failed, the friends and supporters of the baron met at the London Tavern on the 25th of July, and resolved, unanimously, that he should go to the House the next day, and claim his seat as one of the representatives of the city of London. Accordingly, on the 26th, the baron, at a morning sitting, presented himself at the table, and the usual question being put by the clerk, he replied, "I desire to be sworn on the Old Testament." Sir Robert Inglis said he should object to the request; and the baron was desired to withdraw. Sir Robert then moved "that the House refuse its assent to the request of Baron de Rothschild." On the motion of the Right Hon. James Stuart Wortley, the House adjourned without coming to any decision on the subject.—On the 29th, the baron again attended in the lobby; he was called in, and the Speaker asked him, "Why he demanded to be sworn on the Old Testament?" "Because it is most binding on my conscience," was the reply. The baron having withdrawn, Sir F. Thesiger moved, and the Right Hon. James Stuart Wortley seconded, a resolution that he should be recalled, and asked which oath he desired to take—the Protestant or Roman Catholic? After a debate this motion was negatived by 118 to 104 votes. Mr. Hume then moved that the clerk be directed to swear the baron on the Old Testament. After another debate, this motion was carried by 113 ayes to 59 noes. The next day the baron appeared at the bar, and took the oaths on the Old Testament; substituting the words, "So help me God," for "On the true faith of a Christian." He was then about to sign the parliamentary roll, when the Speaker interfered, and said, before he could be admitted to the rights of membership of the House of Commons, that House must decide whether it assented to this mode of taking the oath of abjuration.* Sir F. Thesiger then moved that a new writ issue for the city of London; and Mr. P. Wood moved an amendment, declaring the seats for the city of London to be full. Both motions were negatived; the amendment by 221 to 117 votes, and the original motion without a division.—On the motion of Lord John Russell, the subject was then postponed till the 1st of August. On that day the attorney-general moved two resolutions. The first denied the baron's right to vote or sit in the House till he had taken the oath of abjuration according to law: the second pledged the House, in the next session, to pass a resolution for the relief of the Jews. These resolutions were carried; and the subject dropped for the present.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer made his financial statement very early in 1850—on the 15th of March. He said that such was the improvement in the revenue, that the receipts for 1849 had left a surplus of two millions and a-half over the outgoings, instead of the small sum he had calculated upon. For the coming year, he estimated the receipts (at the then rate of taxation) at £52,285,000; the expenditure at £50,613,582: he might expect, therefore, a clear million and a-half surplus on the year ending April 5th, 1851. He proposed to dispose of that sum by applying £750,000 to the reduction of the national debt; to repeal the brick duty, which produced £450,000; and to make such a reduction of the stamp duties as would cause their produce to be £300,000 less. The surplus on the past year he proposed to keep on hand, so as to enable him to issue loans, to the amount of £2,000,000, to England and Scotland, for the purpose of carrying out drainage, and some other works on the land; to advance £20,000 to Ireland, for land improvements to be effected there; and the remainder to complete works of arterial drainage.—Many members spoke, some approving of, others dissenting from, Sir Charles Wood's views; but, ultimately, the House sanctioned all his proposals.

It seemed as if the just and amiable sovereign of this country was to be exposed to outrages from which many of its greatest tyrants had escaped. On the 27th of June, as her majesty was leaving Buckingham Palace, a lunatic pressed forward, and struck her with a small cane so violently as to draw blood, and cause a considerable swelling. The fellow, whose name was Robert Pate, was the son of a gentleman who had been in the army, but had sold his commission, and led a wild, irregular life. It was considered that, though his mind was unsound, he knew the criminality of his conduct, and he was therefore sentenced to seven years' transportation.

The outrage on the Queen was speedily followed by an event which caused gloom and mourning throughout England. This was the violent and melancholy death of Sir Robert Peel. On the evening of the 29th of June, he called at Buckingham Palace to inquire about her majesty's health, after the violence to which she had been subjected. He was on horseback, and, on returning, the animal became restive, and threw him sideways on his left shoulder. Some gentlemen ran to Sir Robert's assistance: on being raised he groaned heavily, and though at first conscious, was conveyed, in a state of insensibility, to his house at Whitehall Gardens. The accident happened on Saturday evening, and Sir Robert lingered in acute pain until the following Tuesday night, the 2nd of July, when he expired. He had been treated only for a fracture of the clavicle; but, on opening the body, it was found that the fifth rib was broken, and, by pressing upon the lung, had produced the cause of death. The sad event was regarded as a national calamity. Tributes of respect and admiration were uttered, in both Houses of Parliament, by men who had been the right honourable baronet's political opponents; a public funeral was offered by the ministry, but declined, as it was known to be the wish of the departed statesman to be buried without pomp in the parish church of Drayton Bassett. The rank of a peeress was offered to his widow, but that lady answered that she wished to bear no other name than that of her illustrious husband. Another reason probably influenced her; Sir Robert, with a noble pride, desired that none of his family should accept any title or public reward for the services he had rendered to his country.

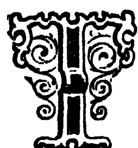
The death of Sir Robert Peel was followed by that of the venerable and respected Duke of Cambridge, who died at Gloucester House on the 8th of July. He was the tenth child and youngest son of George III.; and having been born on the 24th of February, 1774, was in his eighty-third year. Both Houses sent addresses of condolence to the Queen and the Duchess of Cambridge; and the Commons, on receiving a message from her majesty recommending that provision should be made for the honourable support of the present Duke of Cambridge and the Princess Mary, voted a grant of £12,000 a year to the former, and £3,000 to the latter. Mr. Hume twice moved that the Duke of Cambridge's annuity should be only £8,000 per annum; but was defeated—the first time by 206 to 53 votes; the second, by 111 to 52. Mr. Bright, after this second division, moved to limit the duke's income, from all sources, to £12,000 per annum: this was negatived, only 39 "ayes" being given against 108 "noes."

This year, on the 21st of August, the Queen and Prince Albert embarked at Osborne pier for Ostend, on a visit to the King and Queen of the Belgians. On the 24th, her majesty and the prince returned to England, landing at Portsmouth, and proceeding to Osborne. On the 27th, the royal family left the Isle of Wight for Balmoral, taking Holyrood House by the way.—The amiable Queen of the Belgians (a daughter of Louis Philippe) died shortly after the Queen's visit—on the 11th of October: the royal exile (her father) had died at Claremont on the 26th of August previously.

The Roman Catholic question created immense excitement throughout the country at the close of the year 1850; the cause being a bull, issued by Pope Pius IX. on the 29th of September, reviving the episcopal order among the Roman Catholics of England. That order had long been, among the professors of popery in this country, practically a thing of the past.

Instead of episcopal sees, England was divided into vicariates, under the government of vicars apostolic. Till 1840 there were only four of these vicariates. In that year, the then pope, Gregory XVI., increased the number to eight—viz., 1, London; 2, the Western; 3, the Eastern; 4, the Central; 5, the Lancastrian; 6, the York; 7, the Northern; and 8, the Welsh. In nine years more, Roman Catholicism, it was alleged, had made further advances in this country; and the members of that church, both ecclesiastics and laymen, had a great desire that the episcopacy should be revived. Pius tells us that the vicars apostolic were unanimous in their wishes upon this point; and that petitions for the appointment of bishops "had been presented to him by very many among the clergy, and by laymen, distinguished by their virtues and their birth." Therefore, he continues, "we invoke the most blessed Virgin Mary, mother of God, and the saints who shed the lustre of their virtue on England, that they would aid us, by their intercession before God, in bringing this matter to a happy issue." A passage this, which sets forth two of the unscriptural and superstitious practices of the church of Rome—prayers and invocations to the Virgin (who was the mother of the man Christ, not of the divinity with which he was invested) and to the saints—in a forcible light. Besides invoking the Virgin and saints, Pius consulted the cardinals who formed his council—a much more practical method of proceeding. Acting upon their advice, he divided England into one metropolitan and twelve episcopal sees, to which he appointed bishops; creating the Rev. Nicholas Wiseman, who was vicar apostolic of the London vicariate, Metropolitan and Archbishop of Westminster, who was to preside over all his episcopal brethren; and who was also created a cardinal. Deans and canons were likewise appointed; and the entire ecclesiastical system of Rome was introduced into this country.

The bull, accompanied by a pastoral letter from the new cardinal—who styled himself "Nicholas, by the divine mercy of the holy Roman church, by the title of St. Pudentiana, Cardinal Priest, Archbishop of Westminster, and Administrator Apostolic of the Diocese of Southwark"—was circulated throughout England, and it is impossible to over-rate the excitement and indignation to which it gave rise. The power claimed by the pope, of dividing England into bishoprics, and appointing ecclesiastics to preside over them, was considered alike an aggression upon the prerogatives of the crown and the liberties of the people. The 5th of November came quick upon the appearance of the bull; and the ridiculous exhibitions of that day—which have no good effect upon any one, and only serve to revive and augment feelings of acerbity and hatred that ought not to be excited by religious differences, and which the good sense and really tolerant spirit of the present generation were causing to fall into desuetude—were never displayed with more gusto. To the effigies of Guy Fawkes and the Pope, usually displayed on that day, that of Cardinal Wiseman was added; the trio were carried about the streets of the metropolis, and in most of our large towns: crowds of grown-up persons accompanied them—not mere boys begging for halfpence, as is mostly the case; and at night they were hanged and burned amidst cheers for the Queen and Protestantism, and execrations against popery and the pope. From the pulpit and the platform, denunciations against the act of papal aggression were alike fulminated; and the Protestant press was also heartily engaged in the same cause. Scarcely a parish in England but had its meeting and its petition against this assumption of a power by the pope which he certainly had no right to exercise; parliament was implored to vindicate the exclusive prerogative of the crown to appoint bishops; and addresses to the Queen, resenting the invasion of her regal privileges, were presented by the city of London, the universities, and by most great public bodies throughout the kingdom. The excitement was, if possible, increased by the publication of a letter addressed, on the 4th of November, by Lord John Russell, who was then in the north, to the Bishop of Durham. In this letter his lordship was very severe on the pope, whose conduct he described as an aggression equally insolent and insidious, and as an assumption of superiority even beyond what was claimed when Roman Catholicism was the religion of the state. He described that religion as a faith that "confined the intellect, and enslaved the soul;" but said there "was a danger which alarmed him much more than any aggression of a foreign sovereign"—viz., those practices of a section which he termed unworthy sons of the church of England; practices which, he said, were "openly reprehended by the Bishop of London in his charge to the clergy of his diocese."



Notwithstanding these manifestations, which were made in all parts of the kingdom, the feeling displayed by them was not universally entertained. Only one section of the church—the Evangelical—took part in them; and a very large proportion of the people stood aloof; for whilst they condemned the act of the pope as one which he had no right to commit, they did not believe that Roman Catholicism would be more effectually propagated or developed by bishops than it had been by vicars apostolic; and they thought it better not to promote an agitation which must have the effect of irritating Roman Catholics and Protestants still more against each other.

Thus the year 1850 closed; and the meeting of parliament was eagerly anticipated by those who take part in the popular expressions of opinion; as they confidently expected, from the tone of the "Durham Letter"—as the missive of Lord John Russell to the bishop is popularly styled—that an act would be passed positively prohibiting such authority and power as Pope Pius had assumed, from being exercised in England by any foreign priest or potentate whatever.

CHAPTER CVI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1851.

HE excitement caused by the pope's bull had somewhat subsided when the year 1851 opened, though meetings on the subject continued to be held. The political economists and financial reformers were also actively at work, promoting agitation, and holding meetings in most parts of the country; their immediate objects being to procure the repeal of the window-tax, and of the paper, newspaper, and advertisement duties.—In Ireland, there were strong expressions of public opinion against the abolition of the office of lord-lieutenant, which had been proposed by the premier in the last session.—Parliament assembled on the 4th of February. The session was opened by the Queen in person; who—after alluding to the state of the continent—to recent measures taken by Brazil for the suppression of the slave-trade—to the satisfactory state of the revenue—and to the flourishing condition of the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom—lamenting, at the same time, the severe distress that existed among the owners and occupiers of land—thus spoke on that topic which was the prominent one in the minds of many of her subjects:—

"The recent assumption of certain ecclesiastical titles conferred by a foreign power has excited strong feelings in this country, and large bodies of my subjects have presented addresses to me, expressing attachment to the throne, and praying that such assumption should be resisted. I have assured them of my resolution to maintain the rights of my crown, and the independence of the nation, against all encroachment, from whatever quarter it may proceed. I have, at the same time, expressed my earnest desire and firm determination to maintain, unimpaired, the religious liberty which is so highly prized by the people of this country. It will be for you to consider the measure which will be laid before you on this subject."

On the 7th of February, Lord John Russell moved for leave to bring in a bill "to prevent the assumption of certain ecclesiastical titles, in respect of places in the United Kingdom." There was an animated debate, extending over four nights—Feb. 7, 10, 12, and 14; and ending in the motion being carried by 395 "ayes" to 63 "noes."—The attorney-general produced the bill immediately after the division. It imposed a penalty of £100 for the assumption of any ecclesiastical title, under the papal rescript for any place in the United Kingdom; made void any act done by persons assuming such titles; and declared the endowment of such sees illegal, and all gifts to the holders forfeited to the crown. It was read a first time that evening.—Before the second reading a ministerial crisis took place.

On the 11th of February, Mr. Disraeli had moved a resolution, to the effect, that the severe distress which continued to exist among the owners and occupiers of land, as lamented in her majesty's speech, rendered it the duty of the government to introduce, without delay, measures for their effectual relief. The debate continued through that sitting, and was adjourned to the 13th; when, after another long discussion, the motion was negatived by 281 votes to 267—a majority of 14. On the 17th of February, the House went into a committee of ways and means, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir C. Wood, made his financial statement. The government had long made up its yearly accounts for a term commencing April 6th in one year, and ending on the 5th of April in another, calling the twelve months between the two periods the "financial year." On this occasion, the Chancellor stated, that the income for "the financial year" 1850-'51, ending April 5 in the latter year, would be about £52,656,000; the expenditure, £50,134,000, leaving a surplus of £2,522,000. For the financial year ending April 5, 1852, the right honourable gentleman estimated the revenue at £52,140,000; the outgoings at £50,247,171; the surplus at £1,892,829. He proposed to continue the income-tax and the Irish stamp duties for three years longer; to reduce the window duty one-third; to equalise the duty on foreign and colonial coffee (at that time 6d. and 4d. per pound), and reduce it to 3d.; to reduce the import duty on foreign sawn timber, from 20s. to 10s.; and on hewn timber, from 15s. to 7s. 6d.; to make seeds imported for agricultural purposes subject to a mere registration duty of 1s. per cwt.; and to transfer the charges for pauper lunatic asylums from the poor-rates to the consolidated fund. He estimated the loss to the revenue, from these alterations, at £1,280,000. The only vote Sir Charles asked, after making his statement, was that for continuing the income-tax for a further period of three years. This proposition, and the general mode in which the financial minister proposed to deal with the surplus, were received with great dissatisfaction. So numerous were the objections, and so urgently were they pressed, that no determination was come to before the House adjourned.—On the 20th of February, Mr. Locke King, one of the members for East Surrey, moved for leave to bring in a bill reducing the £50 household qualification for the county franchise to £10, the amount required in boroughs. Lord John Russell, on the part of the government, opposed the motion. He did not object so much to the reduction of the franchise as to the time at which it was proposed; as there were many reasons why it was undesirable to bring forward a Reform Bill in that session. If the motion were withdrawn, he would himself, he said, at the commencement of the next session, bring in a bill embodying his views on the subject. Mr. Locke King refused to withdraw his motion; and on a division, it was carried by 100 votes to 52.

In consequence of this defeat, the narrow majority on Mr. Disraeli's resolution, and the dissatisfaction manifested, both in and out of the House, at the financial proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the ministers resolved to resign. On the 22nd of February, Lord John Russell had an interview with the Queen, and tendered the resignation of himself and colleagues, which her majesty accepted, and sent for Lord Stanley, who, on consulting with his friends the next day, found that, although he could undertake to form a ministry, he could not secure the necessary parliamentary support; and he was obliged to decline the commission with which her majesty had entrusted him. Lord John Russell was then requested by the Queen to make the attempt to reconstruct the cabinet; but he also failed; and the Queen sent for the Duke of Wellington, who, on considering the state of parties, advised her majesty to reappoint the late ministry. Her majesty took the advice of his grace; and, on the 3rd of March, the Marquis of Lansdowne in the Lords, and Lord John Russell in the Commons, announced their intention, and that of their colleagues, to remain in office, and continue to administer the affairs of the country to the best of their ability.—The cause of the failure of Lord Stanley to form a ministry, and of Lord John Russell's attempt to reconstruct his cabinet, arose from the position taken up by the Earl of Aberdeen, Mr. Gladstone, Sir James Graham, Mr. Sidney Herbert, and other members of both Houses, who formed a party called the "Peelites," as they were followers of the late Sir Robert Peel. If the leaders of this party would have accepted office with Lord Stanley, they would have given him a majority in the House of Commons, and enabled him to carry on the government; but they refused, partly from the still-existing protectionist tendencies of the Conservatives, and partly from personal motives, as they did not forget the attacks which had been made on their lamented leader by several of Lord Stanley's party, especially by Mr. Disraeli—attacks which induced Mr. Gladstone to say that he never would accept a seat in a cabinet of which that gentleman was a member.—When Lord John Russell attempted to reconstruct his cabinet, he also requested the Peelites to join him; but they refused, because they could not support the "Ecclesiastical Titles Bill."

On the 7th of March that bill was again brought forward. It was considerably modified; and weak and inefficient as many members considered it at first, it was rendered more deserving of that character by the alterations.—After Sir George Grey, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, had stated the modifications proposed, and explained the purport and object of the measure, the further consideration of the subject was adjourned for one week. It was resumed on the 14th of March. On that evening, the 17th, the 18th, 20th, 24th, and 25th, it formed the subject of debate; and the discussion frequently trenched on the very bounds of moderation, so earnest were most of the defenders and opponents of the measure. The speakers were numerous, and almost each member who addressed the House had some peculiar view of his own; but the bill was defended on the broad ground that it was intended to prevent an assumption of power, and an interference with the royal prerogative, by the pope, which, if permitted to be exercised, would entail dangerous, if not fatal consequences; and it was opposed as an interference with religious liberty, and a violation of the Emancipation Act of 1829. Notwithstanding that all the Peelites, with Mr. Bright, Mr. Roebuck, and a few more of the Radical party, joined the Roman Catholic members in voting against the bill, the second reading was carried by 435 votes against 95.—During the month of April the bill was not proceeded with, and many supposed it was dropped. On the 9th of May, however, the motion was made, that the House should go into committee upon the measure. This motion was before the House on the 9th, 12th, 15th, and 16th of May, being carried, on the latter evening, by 116 to 35 votes. The bill was in committee on the 19th, 23rd, and 26th of May; the 1st, 2nd, 6th, 20th, and 23rd of June. During the discussion, efforts were made to exclude Ireland from its operation on the one hand, and to render the enactments more stringent on the other. All the amendments proposed were negatived, except three proposed by Sir F. Thesiger, which excluded from the kingdom, not only the bull of the 29th of September, 1850, but all papal bulls and rescripts; subjected persons procuring such bulls, &c., to the penalty of £100, as well as those who assumed ecclesiastical titles; and provided for the recovery of the penalty at the suit of any person, with the consent of the attorney-general. —On the 4th of July, the bill was passed by 263 votes to 46. In the Lords, it was read a first time on the 7th of July, without any division. The debate on the second reading occupied two nights; and, on a division, there were 265 for, to 38 against, its passing through that stage. It passed through committee at one sitting, on the 25th of July; was read a third time on the 29th; and received the royal assent on the 1st of August. The following is an abstract of the measure as finally passed:—

The preamble set forth the assumption, by divers of her majesty's Roman Catholic subjects, of the titles of archbishop and bishops of pretended sees or dioceses, "under colour of an alleged authority given to them by certain briefs, rescripts, or letters apostolical from the See of Rome;" and the clauses enacted—1st. That all such briefs, &c., and any authority they pretended to confer, should be unlawful and void.—2nd. That any person procuring or publishing such bull, briefs, &c., and any person (if unauthorised by law) assuming the style or title of archbishop, bishop, or dean of any city, town, or place in the United Kingdom, should incur a penalty of £100, to be recovered at the suit of any person having the consent of the attorney-general in England or Ireland, and the advocate-general in Scotland.—3rd. That the act was not to apply to the assumption or use of the title by any bishop of the Protestant episcopal church of Scotland.

The proceedings connected with this measure have been given somewhat in detail, because, since the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832, no measure that came before them caused so much excitement amongst the English people; and no measure was ever brought forward with so much pretension which has, apparently, so miserably failed. The act has not prevented the assumption of ecclesiastical titles by the Roman Catholic priests; but no penalty has been enforced: and it literally remains a dead letter on the statute-book. It is, however, certain that the events which preceded and attended the passing of that act were not without a beneficial effect. The Roman Catholic episcopacy has, since 1850, been re-established in England; but there have been no other attempts to introduce the papal authority, or to interfere with the prerogative of the sovereign; which there very likely would have been, but for the strong expression of popular feeling, and the large majorities which voted for the bill in both Houses; and the assumption of the episcopal title has not given the priest any prestige or power which the vicars apostolic did not enjoy.—In Ireland, the episcopacy was never abolished. But there, as in England, the Protestants consider the archbishops and bishops as merely "titular" prelates: they have no authority, but that spiritual jurisdiction over their followers, which, if not submitted to voluntarily, cannot be enforced; and they take no rank or position from their becoming, nominally, archbishops or bishops. If the "Ecclesiastical Titles Act" is a dead letter, so are the titles themselves; and, in England, no disposition has yet been shown by those on whom they are conferred, to violate the law of the land by an attempt to unite solid power to the mere shadow of dignity which they enjoy.

Next to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, the subject that attracted most popular attention was the financial policy of the government: and, in London, the citizens took great interest in the attempt made during the session to procure the admission of Jews into the legislature.—With respect to the finances, after the army and navy estimates had been voted, Sir Charles Wood, on the 4th of April, brought forward, in a committee of ways and means, a revised budget. He proposed to abolish the window duty entirely; substituting a duty of 9*d.* in the pound on inhabited houses whose rent exceeded £20 per annum; and 6*d.* in the pound on shops, inns, taverns, and farm-houses; thus one object of the political economists and financial reformers —the repeal of the window duty—was obtained. In other respects the right honourable gentleman adhered to his first proposals, and they were ultimately sanctioned by the House, with the exception of that for continuing the property and income-tax for three years. In committee, on the 2nd of May, Mr. Hume carried, by 244 "ayes" to 230 "noes," a resolution that its term should be only for one year, and that it should expire on the 5th of April, 1852. The question of the admission of the Jews was brought forward on the 3rd of April, by Lord John Russell. On that day, his lordship, in a committee of the whole House, carried, by 166 votes to 98, a resolution for considering the mode of administering the oath of abjuration to the people of that nation. The same day he obtained leave to bring in a bill for allowing a Jew who might be elected a member of that House, to be sworn on the Old Testament; and to omit from the oath the words, "On the true faith of a Christian."—On the 1st of May, this bill was read a second time; the votes in its favour being 202; against it 177.—It passed through its other stages, being strongly opposed, both in committee and on its third reading; but the majority remained in its favour. In the Lords there was a different result: their lordships, on the 17th of July, by 144 votes to 108, refused to sanction the second reading; and the bill was lost.

While the fate of this measure was in suspense, another Jew had been returned a member of the House. After the session commenced, Mr. E. Barnard, one of the representatives of the borough of Greenwich, died; and David Salomons, Esq., an alderman of the city of London, had been elected to fill the vacant seat. On the 18th of July, the day after the bill for the relief of the Jews had been thrown out of the Lords, the worthy alderman presented himself at the table to take the oaths. He was permitted to be sworn on the Old Testament, but refused to repeat the words, "On the true faith of a Christian." The Speaker ordered him to withdraw: instead of doing so, he took a seat on the right of the chair; on being again told that he must leave the House, he removed to a seat behind the bar. During this time the House presented a scene of the greatest excitement; and Alderman Salomons was loudly cheered by those who were anxious for the removal of the Jewish disabilities.—On the 20th, Mr. Salomons again entered the House, and took his seat on one of the ministerial benches, between Sir B. Hall and Mr. Chisholm Anstey.—As he refused to withdraw when ordered by the Speaker, the right honourable chairman appealed to the House to enforce his order. Mr. Bernal Osborne then moved, that Mr. Salomons, having taken the oath according to the form most binding on his conscience, was entitled to take his seat. This motion was negatived by 229 votes to 81; as was a motion that the House adjourn, by 237 to 76: on both motions Mr. Salomons voted. Then the House divided on the motion that "the honourable gentleman be ordered to withdraw." This vote was carried by 231 votes against 81. He would not comply with the order till the sergeant-at-arms approached, and laid his hand on his shoulder; then he left the House. The next day, Lord John Russell moved, "That David Salomons, Esq., is not entitled to vote in this House, or to sit in the House during any debate, until he shall take the oath of abjuration in the form required by law."—On the 28th of July, this resolution was carried by 123 votes to 68.—The day the House came to this decision, the Speaker received a letter from the alderman, informing him that two actions for penalties had been brought against him, for sitting and voting in that House. Those actions were decided against him in the Court of Exchequer, and he was fined £500. He appealed against this decision on a writ of error; but the court, presided over by Lord Chief Justice Campbell, unanimously, in a judgment given after Hilary Term, 1852, confirmed the decision of the Court of Exchequer; decreeing that the words, "On the true faith of a Christian," formed an essential part of the oath; and that Jews could not sit in either House of Parliament.

The two Houses were not prorogued till the 7th of August; but though much business came before them, and numerous bills were passed, few were of historical interest. The most important was "An Act to improve the Administration of Justice in the Court of Chancery, and in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council." By this act, the sovereign is empowered to appoint, from time to time, two barristers, of not less than fifteen years' standing, to be judges of the Court of Appeal in Chancery; the two sitting together to act, or one sitting with the Lord Chancellor. These functionaries, styled Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, take rank after the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and receive salaries of £6,000 per annum. The same act fixed the Lord Chancellor's salary at £10,000 per annum, clear of all reductions; and that of the Master of the Rolls at £6,000.—By another act, the salary of the Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench was reduced from £10,000 to £8,000; and that of the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, from £8,000 to £7,000.

Before the session closed, the great International Industrial Exhibition was opened—one of the most successful undertakings of the age; and for which, as already stated, England was greatly indebted to the late Prince Consort, who acted as president of "The Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce," instituted in 1753. That society commenced its career by offering "honorary rewards"—we now call them "prizes"—"for works of merit, inventions, discoveries, and improvements." In 1761, the society held its first exhibition of "works of art and useful inventions;" and, since that period, those exhibitions have frequently been held at the society's rooms in the Adelphi, London. The immediate idea of the great Exhibition of 1851 was derived from the Parisian exhibitions, which, originating in 1797, had been continued, at no stated interval, to the present time. Those exhibitions were confined to "the productions of France in art, science, manufactures, mechanics, and agriculture." One of them was announced for 1849; and M. Buffet, then minister of agriculture and commerce, proposed that it should not be confined to France and Frenchmen, but that all the nations of Europe should have the privilege of sending specimens of their productions in art and industry. The proposal, rejected by the French authorities, was taken up by the president and fellows of the Society of Arts. In 1848, the council of that society had proposed to his royal highness that there should be a permanent quinquennial exhibition of works of British industry, to be self-supporting, and under the control of a royal commission. The prince undertook to submit this plan to the government, and promised his support. Before any decision was arrived at on this proposal, the failure of M. Buffet's plan to throw the Paris Exhibition open to all Europe became known. Then Prince Albert suggested that the proposed Exhibition in London should be an international one. The council at once assented; the plan was developed and determined upon on the 30th of June, 1849, when it was resolved that an exhibition of raw materials, machinery, manufactures, and sculpture should be held in 1851; and that it should be open, not only to Europe, but to the world. A royal commission was issued on the 3rd of January, 1850; and, soon after, it was decided that the sum of £20,000 should be distributed in prizes; that the expenses should be defrayed by the receipts and by public subscriptions; and that a guarantee fund should be established to secure the directors from loss. Hyde Park was fixed upon as the locality for holding the Exhibition; and there, between Knightsbridge Road and Rotten Row, on a site extending over eighteen acres, the most remarkable building of modern times was erected, principally of glass and iron, from a design of the late Sir Joseph Paxton, who was then head gardener to the late Duke of Devonshire; for whom he had built the magnificent conservatory which adorns the Devonshire estate at Chiswick: from that building the idea of the beautiful edifice in Hyde Park, known as the "Crystal Palace," was derived. This building was 1,848 feet long, and 456 feet broad. It formed a parallelogram of five aisles. The central aisle was seventy-two feet high, and 120 feet across; the two adjoining, on the north and south sides, were forty-eight, and the outer aisles twenty-four, feet in height; each of the four being seventy-two feet wide. In the centre, the aisles were intersected by a transept, seventy-two feet wide, whose arched roof rose 108 feet from the floor. Galleries ran round each of the aisles and the transept; and—the centre aisle being appropriated to sculpture, painted glass, and models of several large and remarkable buildings—the remainder of the palace was divided into courts, in which the various "nations" exhibited their specimens. In front of each court was displayed the name and banner of the nation to which it was appropriated; and there were very few indeed that did not send contributions.—The effect of this edifice on the eye was wonderful. The colours used in decorating it were blue, white, and yellow; and the roof was shaded with white satin, to exclude the heat. When the sun shone brilliantly, this shade softened and subdued the light, and greatly improved the effect. The palace was built in a remarkably short space of time. The contractors—Messrs. Fox and Henderson—only obtained possession of the site on the 30th of July, 1850; on the 26th of September the first column was raised; and on the 1st of January, 1851, it was handed over to the commissioners; to whom the Queen had previously granted a charter, constituting them a permanent body, it being contemplated to hold a similar Exhibition once in ten years.—It was arranged that season tickets should be issued, at two guineas for ladies, and three guineas for gentlemen. That only the holders of those tickets should be admitted on the opening day; that, on the 2nd and 3rd of May, the fee for admission should be £1; subsequently, 1*s.* on the first four days of the week, 2*s.* 6*d.* on Fridays, and 5*s.* on Saturdays.

The Exhibition was opened on the 1st of May; the Queen, with the Prince of Wales and the Princess Helena, going to Hyde Park in state, attended by the lords and ladies of the household, and a long procession of the aristocracy and gentry of both sexes, in carriages or on horseback. At the palace her majesty was received by the Prince Consort and the royal commissioners, and conducted to a dais erected at the south end of the palace, where a throne and chairs of state were placed; all surmounted by a splendid canopy of crimson velvet. Appropriate prayers were offered up by the Archbishop of Canterbury; an address was read to her majesty by the prince; a selection of chorale music was performed; and the Exhibition was declared, by the Queen, "to be opened." Then her majesty passed through the courts, followed by the royal commissioners, and a long procession of ladies and gentlemen; and great admiration was expressed by all the visitors at the wonders which met the eye. The most distant nations were contributors as well as those which were near at hand; and specimens of everything rich and rare, from all parts of the world, were displayed. Groups of statues; gigantic and glittering fountains; tropical plants; flowers in luxuriant profusion; the beautiful porcelain of China and of France; the fine ceramic ware of our own country; the glass of Bohemia; the velvets, silks, satins, linens, poplins, and cottons of our own and other climes; jewelry; cutlery, and other hardware; cabinet and carved work; metals and minerals, together with drugs, dyes, and perfumes were tastefully arranged in the various courts. Nor was the press forgotten: its productions were collected in a court appropriated for the purpose; and there was seen type of various kinds; whilst the old printing-press stood side-by-side with the modern Stanhope, and the still more novel steam-engine printing machine. Her majesty seemed reluctant to leave, even when she had had a glimpse of all; and she was a frequent visitor during the time the Exhibition continued open.

It was closed on the 15th of October, with great ceremony, by Prince Albert, having been open 144 days. During that time there had been 6,169,016 admissions; the greatest number on one day being on Tuesday, the 7th of October, when 109,915 persons passed the several entrances; and it is computed that 93,000 persons were, on that day, under the glass roof at one time.—The receipts amounted to £505,107; the expenditure to about £350,000; leaving a surplus of something more than £150,000. The guarantee fund amounted to £250,000; that, of course, was untouched. —One event connected with the Great Exhibition ought to be noticed before we dismiss it from our pages. At the close of July, the Lord Mayor of London, the royal commissioners, and numerous other distinguished persons, went to Paris, in consequence of an invitation received from the municipality of that city; and they were fêted for several days, the greatest good-feeling and cordiality being evinced.

In the autumn, the Queen again visited Balmoral, leaving Osborne on the 28th of August. Her majesty this year returned to Windsor by the western route. She arrived at Croxteth Hall, the seat of the Earl of Sefton, near Liverpool, on the 8th of October. The next day her majesty visited Liverpool, where the inhabitants were very cordial and enthusiastic. The same evening she arrived at Worsley Hall, on her way to Manchester, which city she visited on the 10th, and was received with great demonstrations of loyal attachment. The royal party arrived at Windsor the next day. Her majesty's uncle, the King of Hanover, and Duke of Cumberland (the fifth son of George III.), died this year, on the 18th of November, in the 81st year of his age. He was succeeded by his son, who ascended the throne of Hanover as George V.

On the 31st of March, 1851, the census of the United Kingdom was taken. The returns gave the number of inhabitants as follows:—

	Males.	Females.	Total.
England and Wales ..	8,762,588..	9,160,180..	17,922,768
Scotland	1,363,622..	1,507,162..	2,870,784
Islands in the British seas	66,511..	76,405..	142,916
Grand Total..........			20,936,468

This was an increase of 2,271,707 since 1841. In Ireland, on the 31st of March, the population comprised 3,176,727 males, and 3,339,067 females: total, 6,515,794. This was a decrease of 1,659,330 in the ten years.

The returns from the Board of Trade showed the foreign commerce of the country to be still increasing; the amount of exports for the twelve months ending January 5, 1852, being £68,531,609.

Our colonies, as a rule, partook of the prosperity of the mother country; and the foundation of Australia's greatness was laid by the discovery of gold, which caused numerous emigrants to leave England, to dig for bullion in the "gold-fields." The first discovery of the ore was made in the vicinity of Bathurst. The governor of New South Wales, on the 22nd of May, issued a proclamation, claiming the precious metals which might be found in the newly-discovered auriferous district; and threatening with punishment all who "should search or dig for gold in and upon such territory," unless they first took out a licence, for which they were to pay 30s. per month. Early in June there were above 20,000 persons at the "diggings;" and the gold was found abundantly in the beds of streams, and in veins of quartz; in grains, in scales, and in lumps of various weights. A despatch from the lieutenant-governor of Victoria to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated the 25th of August, announced that a rich gold-field had also been found in that province.—At the Cape of Good Hope, a war with the Kaffirs broke out early in the year.—At the close of 1850, a new constitution, investing the colonists with self-government, had been drawn up and sent to the Queen by Sir Andries Stockenstrom and Mr. Fairbairn. This affair was scarcely settled when the Kaffirs made hostile demonstrations against the colonists; defeating the troops, who were much inferior to them in numbers, in several instances, and making murderous raids on the villages of the frontier. On the 31st of December, the governor (Sir Henry Smith) issued a proclamation from King William's Town, establishing martial law in the colony, and ordering all males, between fifteen and twenty years of age, to rise en masse, in order to defend the frontiers against the savages. The war continued through the year; and the British troops displayed great powers of endurance, their usual bravery, and, as a rule, generosity and forbearance, in dealing with their enemy.

The familiar and friendly intercourse between England and France was strengthened during the year by the laying of a submarine electric telegraph cable between Calais and Dover, and the establishment of the rapid communication between the two countries which that medium affords. The laying down the line commenced in September; on the 25th of that month it was submerged to within two miles of the French coast, when it was found that the cable was too short by about a quarter of a mile. So expeditious were the parties employed in supplying the deficiency, that, on the 27th, messages were sent to and fro across the channel. The line was not declared open, however, for the conveyance of messages by the public till the 13th of November; on which day, as one result of the modern discovery, guns were fired at Dover, by means of electric sparks communicated from Calais.

In the month of December another change was effected in the constitution of France, by Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, and his immediate adherents in the army and the national assembly. For some time there had been a strong antagonism between him and the majority of that body. Whilst the latter suspected the president of a design to ruin the republic, his friends spread a report through France—which was repeated in a fierce political article in the Paris paper, the Constitutionnel, on the 23rd of November—to the effect, that the majority of the legislative assembly were conspiring against the prince-president, with a view to declare General Changarnier military dictator. The enemies of the prince say that there was no foundation for this report, which was merely got up to afford a colourable pretence for the steps he was evidently prepared to take, when the article in the Constitutionnel appeared. That article was followed by the immediate displacing of several ministers and officers. Their places were filled with men devoted to the president. General de St. Arnaud, an officer who had distinguished himself in Algeria, was appointed Minister of War; M. Maupas, who had been a prefect in the provinces, and whose character was far from pure, was nominated Prefect of Police; and General Lawerstine was commander of the national guards, superseding General Perrot. General Magnan, the commander-in-chief of the army of Paris, was disposed to obey any orders he received; and MM. de Morny and de Persigny were kept in attendance on the president to advise with him, and to convey his orders to those who were to put them in execution.—On the 27th of November a number of generals met at the house of General Magnan, for the purpose, said rumour, of learning the nature of the plans they were to assist in carrying out. On the 1st of December, the president had an assembly at the Elysée, the greater part of his guests being ignorant of what was about to take place; and it included all who were likely to have actively endeavoured to thwart his designs. While this assembly was held, the gendarmerie surrounded the state printing-office, where the men were compelled to remain, and print several proclamations of the president. In these documents—which were found placarded all over Paris on the morning of the 2nd—it was declared that the council of state and the national assembly were dissolved, and universal suffrage established. The charges of the Constitutionnel against the assembly were repeated; Paris was declared to be in a state of siege; and the plan of another constitution, comprising a president elected for ten years, a council of state, a senate, and a legislative body, was submitted to the people.—On the 2nd, M. de Morny, at the head of a body of troops, first took possession of the Hôtel of the Interior, and then made a number of arrests, including MM. Thiers, Changarnier, Bedeau, Cavaignac, Lamoricière, and Charras. All the parties arrested were immediately conveyed to prison.

The members of the assembly opposed to Louis Napoleon attempted to meet at the Hôtel de Ville; but, being expelled, they assembled at the mairie of the 10th arrondissement, where they agreed to resolutions declaring Louis Napoleon Bonaparte deposed from the office of president, depriving him of all authority, and calling upon the citizens to withhold their obedience. The mairie, however, was soon surrounded by troops; all the members assembled there were arrested, and taken to the barracks in the Quai d'Orsay, and the city was occupied by the military. The High Court of Justice also met to denounce the acts of the president, upon whom the judges ordered a notice of impeachment to be served. Whilst they were proceeding to take such other steps as they considered the time required, they were expelled by a corps of gendarmerie. On the 3rd, the authorities appointed by the president were taking steps to maintain their position; and the few members of the assembly who were at liberty, endeavoured to engage the Parisians to resist the new régime. In the night barricades were thrown up in various parts of Paris, and, on the morning of the 4th, the capital appeared in a state of great excitement. There were large bodies of troops in the streets; and the footpaths, as well as the windows and balconies of the houses, were filled with people; many females appearing in the latter. A few musket-shots, fired from the populace, occasioned a fierce discharge of musketry and cannon from the troops. It did not last long, but the effect was fearful; many being killed and wounded. In the evening, Marshal de St. Arnaud published the following "order of the day:"—"Soldiers! you have, to-day, accomplished a great act of your military life. You have preserved the country from anarchy and pillage, and saved the republic. You have shown yourselves what you will always be—brave, devoted, and indefatigable. France admires and thanks you."

Quiet was now restored; order was soon re-established; a consultative commission was appointed by the president, to act with him; and the French people were called upon to say "Yes" or "No" to the following plebiscite:—

"The French people desire the maintenance of the authority of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, and delegates to him the powers necessary for establishing a constitution, upon the basis proposed in his proclamation of December 2nd, 1851."

The voting took place on the 20th and 21st of December; and on the 1st of January, 1852, it was announced, in the Moniteur, that there were 7,439,216 affirmative, and 640,737 negative votes; 30,820 tickets tendered were annulled as irregular.—That day the prince was installed at the cathedral of Notre Dame, and took up his residence at the Tuileries. The same day a decree appeared, re-establishing the imperial eagle on the French flag, and on the cross of the Legion of Honour. Thus ended the movement since known as "the coup-d'état of December, 1851."

CHAPTER CVII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1852.

THE events connected with the coup-d'état in Paris formed the chief topics of conversation and comment in England during the last few days of 1851, and at the commencement of 1852, especially as it was understood that Lord Palmerston had been dismissed from his office of Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, on account of his having declared, in a conversation with the French ambassador, and without the authority of his colleagues, that the English government approved of the proceedings which had taken place in Paris in the early part of the month of December. Public opinion was divided on those proceedings; but generally the conduct of the president was condemned; and it was confidently predicted that, following the example of his uncle, Louis Napoleon would establish a complete despotism in France.

There was, at that time, throughout England, a very general belief that, ere long, we should be at war with France. It was a popular rumour that the prince-president had frequently declared that "Waterloo and St. Helena must be avenged;" and that in his person the avenger would be found. His accession to supreme power in France, thousands imagined, would be the precursor of an invasion of England; and it was felt that neither our army nor navy were in a condition, at that time, to repel an attack made by such a force as it was anticipated would be sent against us. Our relations with other foreign powers were, also, believed to be so unsatisfactory, that, were the country involved in war, it would stand isolated and alone. In the year just expired, the International Exhibition had been hailed as the harbinger of universal peace; and public speakers and writers contrasted the gloomy and desponding feeling of 1852, with the glowing anticipations entertained in 1851.

A domestic strife was, at the same time, producing a complete stagnation in some most important branches of labour. The progress of many modern works—of railways especially—had contributed very much to the prosperity of the engineers and machinists generally. The nature of the employment in which these classes are engaged compels an attention to intellectual pursuits; they are, therefore, amongst the best educated of our working-men, and receive the highest wages. Soon after Mr. Hume attained that end for which he contended through many successive years—the repeal of the combination laws—the workmen began to enrol themselves into societies for the protection of their interests, or what they conceived to come within that category. The engineers and machinists formed a great many of these societies in the provinces; and a short time before the period of which we are now writing, they commenced those efforts to obtain an increase in their already high wages, and other objects, which ended in the strike of January, 1852. In the progress of the contest with the masters, the managers of that contest imbibed the opinion that it would be most likely to contribute to their success were the provincial societies united into one body, with its head-quarters in London. The "Society of Amalgamated Engineers" was accordingly formed, which represented about 120 local bodies, comprising upwards of 12,000 members, whose contributions formed a large yearly revenue; part of which was devoted to the beneficent object of assisting the aged and infirm, the sick and the destitute members; providing for the burial of the deceased; and also aiding the widows and orphans. The remainder was appropriated to other purposes—purposes which the managers and members thought equally praiseworthy; but on that point public opinion differed greatly. At the close of 1851, the Amalgamated Engineers were pressing their demands for increased wages upon the masters; and they also required the abolition of piece-work—i.e., payment in proportion to the quantity of work performed, instead of for the number of hours employed; and of over-hours. At a meeting held at the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle Street, on the 30th of December, it was determined to make these demands on the masters, who refused to comply with them. The men, accordingly, refused to work, but not generally; certain masters being selected, whose men were to strike; and those who continued at work were to contribute to their support. It was expected the masters would be compelled to yield, and then the strike was to be extended to others. The employers, however, thought they had as much right to combine as the employed. A "Masters' Union" was formed; and, on the 10th of January, 1852, all the large engineering firms closed their works and discharged their men. More than 10,000 men were thus obliged to stand idle; to rely, for the support of themselves and families, upon the accumulated funds of the Amalgamated Society, and upon the contributions of other trades. This contest of "labour with capital," as it was termed, caused a feeling of ill-will between the workmen and their employers to become very generally diffused. Numerous meetings were held in different parts of England, connected with the wages question; and, for a time, the movements of political economists and financial reformers, though not discontinued, were thrown into the background. We may add here, that after remaining out of employment nearly four months, necessity compelled the engineers to succumb to their masters. On the 26th of April, the executive committee of the "Amalgamated Society" issued a manifesto, in which they confessed the inutility of their previous efforts, and the uselessness of continued resistance. In May, the workshops were again reopened. By this strike a very large sum was lost to both masters and workmen; but the result has not had the effect of discouraging trade unions, or causing strikes to be discontinued.

Amidst the general gloom caused by the fear of invasion (which, though ridiculed by many, was generally entertained), and the state of the working classes, parliament met on the 3rd of February, 1852; the two Houses assembling, for the first time, in the new building which had replaced the one destroyed by fire on the 16th of October, 1834. This building, called the New Westminster Palace, is the largest public edifice erected in England for several centuries. It covers eight acres of ground, or 16,000,000 cubic feet; is 870 feet long, from north to south; and contains eleven courts, and 500 rooms. The east front next the river has a very imposing appearance. It terminates, to the north and south, in two projecting wings, with handsome towers, each wing being 120 feet long; a noble terrace runs between them, thirty-three feet wide, and 700 feet in length. The building is in the Tudor style, some picturesque features of the town-halls of the Low Countries being introduced. A magnificent tower, called the Victoria Tower, standing on an area eighty-five feet square, and rising to the height of 340 feet, terminates the edifice on the south. In the centre is a large cupola, or dome, with an open lantern and spire, about 300 feet in height. The clock tower, which rises at the north-west angle, is forty feet square, and 320 feet high. These are the principal exterior features of the building. In the interior, the best artists have been employed in the decorations; and the large halls in which the Lords and Commons meet, are very magnificent. The late Sir Charles Barry was the architect; and the cost, originally estimated at £707,104, has exceeded £2,000,000.

The Queen opened the session in person; and the royal speech did not, on one point, accord with the feeling out of doors, as it spoke favourably of the friendly relations with foreign powers. Her majesty also expressed great satisfaction that the late reduction of taxes, which had contributed so much to the relief and comfort of the people, had not caused a diminution of the national income; and thanked Almighty God for the continuance of peace and order throughout the country. The Queen concluded by recommending the time as a fitting one for calmly considering whether it might not be advisable to make such amendments in the Reform Act of the late reign, as would be calculated to carry into more complete effect the principles upon which that law is founded.

The debates on the address would have been unimportant, but for the explanation which was asked, and given, of the reasons for the dismissal of Lord Palmerston, who was succeeded at the Foreign Office by Lord Granville. Sir B. Hall asked, why the noble lord was dismissed? And Lord John Russell replied, that it was in consequence of the approval expressed by the late foreign secretary, and conveyed to the French government, of the coup-d'état of December, contrary to that system of non-interference between the different parties in that country which had been the policy of this government. After that step had been taken, there was no other alternative but that he or Lord Palmerston should retire. The late foreign secretary justified his conduct. He had to decide between the president and the assembly; and whilst the course pursued by the latter must have resulted in civil war or anarchy, the president had the means of establishing a good and permanent government. He also asserted, that the premier and other members of the cabinet had expressed to the French ambassador opinions similar to his own. In the course of the debate in both Houses, several members censured the intemperate language of the press upon the occurrences in France, which was calculated to produce an interruption of our amicable relations with that country. In speaking upon this subject in the lower House, Lord John Russell alluded to some recent discoveries and inventions, which had produced great effect on the public, though the government appeared to disregard them; and said that some of the letters published, and some of the language used, appeared to indicate, that "two nations so wealthy, so civilised, so enlightened" as England and France, "were going to butcher one another merely to see what would be the effect of percussion-shells and needle-guns." His lordship also noticed the hospitality accorded to political refugees, which was "but pursuing the ancient and known policy of this country;" the apprehensions expressed of an invasion; the inadequacy of our forces; and the necessity of improving and increasing them, as it was "at all times wise to take precautions against contingent and possible danger." At the same time, he declared "that there was no reason to suppose that any danger threatened," as "there was, in fact, no dispute between England and any other power." In both Houses, the addresses as proposed by the government were carried.

On the 9th of February, Lord John Russell called attention to the passages in her majesty's speech referring to parliamentary reform, and introduced his bill on that subject. In taking that course, we learn, on the authority of Earl Grey, then the Secretary of State for the Colonies, that his lordship was opposed to his colleagues, and forced his measure upon them. In that measure, his lordship proposed—1. To disfranchise any small borough against the constituency of which bribery and corruption were proved.—2. To substitute a £5 rated value for the existing franchise of £10 rental in boroughs.—3. To reduce the county household franchise from £50 rental to £20 rated value; and the qualification by copyhold tenures, or long leases, from £10 to £5.—4. To create a new class of voters, in both counties and boroughs, of persons who paid 40s. per annum in direct taxes, and were not otherwise qualified.—5. To extend the boundaries of small boroughs with fewer than 500 electors, by adding places in their neighbourhood.—6. To abolish the property qualification required for members.—7. To abolish the invidious distinctions in the oaths taken by Protestants and Roman Catholics; and the adoption of one form—omitting the words, "On the true faith of a Christian"—to be taken by all members.—8. To render, on the change of office under the crown, a vacation of the seat held in that House, and re-election, unnecessary.—9. To continue the county franchise for Ireland as it then stood; but to reduce that for cities and boroughs from £8 to £5.

Leave was given to bring in this bill, and also another, for the more effectual inquiry into the existence of bribery at elections. These bills were again to be brought forward on the 1st day of March. In the interval, on the 16th day of February, Lord John Russell—to carry out, in part, his declaration in the debate on the address, that "it was wise at all times to take precautions against contingent and possible danger"—introduced a bill for reviving the old constitutional militia force, which had not been called out for some years. In his speech, his lordship used language somewhat stronger than that of his previous address; describing the subject as one of vital importance; war and even invasion being apprehended as the result of the recent occurrences in France. He therefore proposed to enrol a local militia, in the first year, of 70,000 men, at a cost of £200,000; to be increased in the second year to 100,000 men; and in the third and following years, to 150,000; with a proportionate increase of expenditure. The services of the men were to be confined to the counties to which they belonged, and in which the corps was raised; the officers to be appointed—two-thirds by the lord-lieutenant of the county, the rest by the crown; and the qualification of landed property required for the officers, to be dispensed with. The bill was to be confined to England and Wales. A separate measure was to be brought in for Scotland, if considered necessary; but his lordship did not propose to extend it to Ireland.

The introduction of this measure was unanimously agreed to by the House, as it was evident, and indeed undisputed, that the national defences of the country loudly called for some radical improvement. That England, for the time being, had no quarrel with any other power was certainly true; but it being considered that preparation for war is the best security for promoting a permanent state of peace, no radical objection was made to the principle of the bill. Criticising the details, however, Lord Palmerston objected to the militia being local; and gave notice that he should move an amendment to make the force a national one; not for England only, but for all parts of the United Kingdom. He also replied to, and confuted an assertion of Mr. Cobden, that the navy was sufficient for the purposes of defence, by showing on how many points an army might be landed, and that it was impossible to cover them all.—His lordship, accordingly, on the 20th of February, when the bill was before the House, moved his amendment; which was carried by 136 votes against 125. This division, and the coldness with which his Reform Bill was received, caused the premier to announce his determination to resign—an announcement which was followed by loud and repeated cheers.—The Queen sent for Lord Derby (Lord Stanley had succeeded to that title in 1851, by the death of his father, the thirteenth earl), who undertook to form a Conservative government. On the 27th of February, the noble earl announced that he had completed his cabinet; and, at the same time, gave an outline of the system of policy he meant to pursue. His great object would be the maintenance of peace. A calm and temperate course of conduct would be observed towards other nations, whose independence would be respected, and all intermeddling in their internal affairs avoided, especially with respect to the form of government which each nation had a right to choose for itself. Whilst observing this conciliatory conduct, and deprecating the attempt to create a panic by the alarm of an invasion, his lordship announced his intention to proceed with the Militia Bill; and said, while the navy was never in a better condition than it was at that time, he considered it advisable to place the military force of the country under better organisation and discipline. When alluding to commerce and finance he spoke with caution; and with respect to the much-vexed question of protection, said, he saw no reason why foreign corn should be the only article of import free from duty. He thought the system adopted by the United States, of taxing those foreign articles which came into competition with home production, worthy of consideration. It was a question, however, which "could only be solved by the intelligent portion of the community."—The same evening, in the Commons, Mr. Forbes Mackenzie and Mr. Bramston moved for the new writs rendered necessary through the acceptance of office by several members, and both Houses adjourned to the 12th of March.

Lord Derby's first cabinet was thus constituted:

First Lord of the Treasury and Premier	The Earl of Derby.
Lord High Chancellor	Lord St. Leonards.
Lord President of the Council	The Earl of Lonsdale.
Lord Privy Seal	The Marquis of Salisbury.
Chancellor of the Exchequer	The Right Hon. Benj. Disraeli.
Secretaries of State — Home Affairs	The Right Hon. S. H. Walpole.
Secretaries of State — Foreign Affairs	The Earl of Malmesbury.
Secretaries of State — Colonial Affairs	The Right Hon. Sir J. S. Pakington.
First Lord of the Admiralty	The Duke of Northumberland.
President of the Board of Control	The Right Hon. J. C. Herries.
President of the Board of Trade	The Right Hon. J. W. Henley.
Commissioner of Woods and Forests	Lord John Manners.

Other offices (not of the cabinet) were filled as follows:

Lords of the Treasury	The Marquis of Chandos, Lord H. G. C. G. Lennox, and T. Bateson.
Lords of the Admiralty	Rear-Admirals H. Parker and R. Hornby; Captains Sir T. Herbert, Hon. A. Duncombe, and Alexander Milne.
Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster	Right Hon. A. Christopher.
Vice-Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster	R. Bethell.
Postmaster-General	The Earl of Hardwicke.
President of the Poor-Law Board	Sir John Trollope.
Chairman of the Board of Health	Right Hon. Lord Seymour.
Attorney-General	Sir F. Thesiger.
Solicitor-General	Sir Fitzroy Kelly.
Lord Advocate of Scotland	John Inglis.
Ireland — Lord-Lieutenant	The Earl of Eglinton.
Ireland — Lord Chancellor	The Right Hon. F. Blackburne.
Ireland — Chief Secretary and Keeper of the Privy Seal	Lord Naas.
Ireland — Attorney-General	Right Hon. J. Napier.
Ireland — Solicitor-General	James Whiteside.

The resignation of the Russell ministry was followed by a numerous meeting of the Manchester free-trade party, held at Newall's Buildings, in that town, at which Mr. Cobden moved the reconstruction of the Anti-Corn-Law League; and Mr. Bright a memorial to the Queen, praying for the immediate dissolution of parliament, in order that the opinion of the country might be ascertained as to the re-establishment of protection. Both resolutions were carried unanimously; and a subscription being opened to defray expenses, in twenty-five minutes names were put down for sums amounting, in all, to £27,520.—The new league carried on its operations very actively; and at a free-trade dinner got up under its auspices, and held at Manchester on the 2nd of November, 3,000 guests were present.

The two Houses reassembled on the 12th of March; and on the 15th, Lord Beaumont in the Lords, and Mr. C. Villiers in the Commons, put the question, whether ministers meant to reimpose a duty on foreign corn? In the upper House, the Earl of Derby replied that it was impossible to remove the uncertainty which existed on this point till after the general election. An appeal to the country, he said, should be made as soon as the necessary business of the session could be got through; and "the next election must decide, at once and for ever, the great question of our commercial policy." Mr. Disraeli's reply was precisely to the same effect; and, on a subsequent evening (the 15th of March), in reply to a question of the Duke of Newcastle, as to when parliament would be dissolved, the Earl of Derby said the next autumn should not pass without an appeal to the nation to pronounce a verdict on the conduct of her majesty's government. With a view that (the people having given their decision) no time should be lost in ascertaining the opinion of parliament, one of the first measures of the Conservative government was "An Act for Shortening the Time required for Assembling the Parliament after a Dissolution thereof." This act reduced the time required by law to intervene between the date of the proclamation for assembling parliament, and the day appointed for the meeting, to not less than thirty-five days.

The ministers proceeded with other useful measures; and they met with general support, though the Whigs and Liberals formed a majority of the House of Commons. We may enumerate, amongst the acts added to the statute-book, chiefly through their efforts, "An Act to Legalise the Formation of Industrial and Provident Societies;" "An Act to Amend the Laws relating to the Certifying and Registering Places of Religious Worship for Protestant Dissenters," which simplified the proceeding and reduced the fee; the Militia Act, as amended by Lord Palmerston; "An Act to provide for the more Effectual Inquiry into the Existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections;" "An Act[3] to grant a Representative Constitution to New Zealand;" a very important "Act to Amend the Process, &c., in the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, and in the Superior Courts of the Counties Palatine of Durham and Lancaster;" another Act equally important, "to Amend the Practice and Course of Proceedings in the High Court of Chancery;" and an Act for "Extending the Jurisdiction of the County Courts." These are only a very few of the "useful measures" of the session; and, on the 30th of June, in a conversation between Lords Lyndhurst, Beaumont, and Brougham and the Earl of Derby, on the immense amount of business transacted since March 12th, the first-named noble lord said that, "during the four months that had elapsed since Lord Derby came into office, bills of greater importance had been passed than in any session since the commencement of that parliament."—Besides passing these bills, several committees were sitting during the session; one of which, appointed on the 19th of April, on the motion of Mr. Herries, "to take into consideration the act of 1833, for the better government of her majesty's East Indian possessions," had not finished its inquiries when the session closed.

The parliament was prorogued on the 1st of July. Since 1848 war had been raging between Denmark and Prussia—arising out of the disputed right of the former to the German duchies of Schleswig and Holstein. Peace had been concluded; and on the 8th of May, 1852, a treaty was signed by the five great powers—England, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia—which subsequently received the assent of most of the German states of the second and third class, securing the two duchies to Frederick VII. of Denmark and his successors. In the speech, when closing the session, the Queen expressed her satisfaction at "the final settlement of the affairs of Holstein and Schleswig;" little anticipating how that treaty would be violated by two of the powers in after years.—On the 2nd of July, a proclamation dissolving the parliament appeared in the Gazette. Writs were at the same time issued convoking a new one, which were made returnable by the 20th of August; and the public immediately became interested in the elections. In consequence of the declarations of the Earl of Derby and Mr. Disraeli, the question of free trade was prominently brought forward, and the opinion of the majority of electors could not be mistaken. It was unequivocally in favour of the doctrines of the political economists; and from that time the question of protection has ceased to be one for the hustings. There were those, however, who still thought that to admit the produce and manufactures of foreign countries, either free of duty or very slightly taxed, into competition with those of England, on which heavy duties still continued to be levied in those very states, however beneficial it might be to capital, did not afford the labour of England fair play.

The elections were scarcely over before England was called upon to mourn the loss of one who was, according to Talleyrand, "the most capable man" in the kingdom; and who, though the heat of political strife rendered him for a brief space unpopular, had, long before this period, regained all his former hold on the respect and affection of the people. The venerable Duke of Wellington—who was regarded not merely as the illustrious military hero, who, in the words of Mr. Disraeli, "had fought fifteen pitched battles, captured 3,000 cannon from the enemy, and never lost a gun;" but also as a statesman to whom length of days had imparted so much wisdom that he had become a sort of connecting link and balance of opinion between parties—was suddenly called away. The hardy veteran was in his eighty-fourth year, and age had for some years been leaving its traces on his iron constitution. He was in the habit latterly of spending a great part of every parliamentary recess at his seat of Walmer Castle, near Dover. There, on Monday night, the 13th of September, the duke retired to rest at about ten o'clock, after having spent the day with more than usual cheerfulness. Kendall, his valet, called him the next morning at half-past six, but the duke did not rise. At half-past seven the summons was repeated; he then seemed restless and unwell, and exclaimed abruptly, "Send for Mr. Hulke." The doctor soon arrived; his patient complained of uneasiness in his chest and stomach, attended with nausea; but Mr. Hulke did not consider the attack as at all serious, and desiring that his grace should take some tea and a little dry toast, promised to send some medicine, and left the castle without any apprehensions. Soon afterwards he was again summoned: the duke had had several fits. Mr. Hulke found him propped up in an easy chair and quite unconscious. Telegraphic messages were sent to London, to Dr. Hume, Dr. Ferguson, and Dr. Williams, but they were all absent from home. Dr. M'Arthur, of Deal, was then called in; but the noble patient was beyond the aid of medical skill. For some hours he remained perfectly insensible, breathing with difficulty. At about a quarter-past three it was discovered that his pulse had ceased to beat; he had expired so tranquilly that his attendants were unable to discern the moment of his dissolution.

Thus, on the 14th of September, 1852, died the illustrious soldier—the hero of India and the Peninsula, and the conqueror of Waterloo;—one who was not only the greatest and most successful warrior of the age, but whose civil career—again to quote Mr. Disraeli—"was scarcely less splendid and successful." And he died "at the head of that army to which he had left the tradition of his fame." The Queen, who had visited the continent in August, was at Balmoral when the duke died; and her majesty immediately wrote to the Earl of Derby, expressing her desire that his grace should have a public funeral. This occasioned the ceremony to be delayed till parliament could assemble. The corpse was embalmed, and remained at Walmer Castle till the 10th of November, when it was removed to Chelsea Hospital, where it laid in state in the great hall, in a rich coffin of gilt and crimson, placed on a daïs covered by a carpet of cloth of gold, and surmounted by an elegant canopy. It was surrounded not only with the insignia of that mourning which all the nation felt, but with many memorials of the victories gained by the armies under the command of the deceased. Grenadiers of the regiment he had led to victory, now stood, as mutes, at the approaches to the spot where the corpse was deposited. The daïs was inclosed by a silver balustrade, on which the heraldic devices borne by the late duke were displayed; and also the marshal's batons which he had borne. The stars of the numerous orders of knighthood conferred on his grace were affixed to the pall at the foot of the coffin.—On the 11th of November, the Queen, the Prince Consort, and the young princes and princesses visited the hall privately. Her majesty evinced great emotion at the sight of the coffin; and no wonder—the Duke of Wellington having been, since the death of Lord Melbourne, the counsellor on whom she had relied when any difficult question presented itself. After the royal party left, the pensioners living at the hospital, and the troops, were admitted; and, on the 12th, the nobility and gentry, who were supplied with tickets from the Lord Chamberlain. The next day, Saturday, the 13th of November, the doors were opened to the public at large: and so ill-adapted and insufficient were the arrangements for preserving order, and preventing unnecessary crowding, that the greatest confusion took place; and the papers of the day tell us, that there were "struggles for bare life, frightful shrieks, and screams of agony, such as will never be forgotten by those present." Two females and one male were crushed to death in this mêlée—sad private calamities, added to the national loss. At length order was restored; and on the Monday and Tuesday it is estimated that about 60,000 persons passed through the hall each day.—In the night of Wednesday, the 17th, the corpse, escorted by a squadron of cavalry, was removed from Chelsea to the Horse-Guards; and on the 18th it was conveyed to St. Paul's, attended by a grand procession, which included the Prince Consort and the officers of her majesty's household; numerous military and civil functionaries; the ministers and officers of state; the judges; the Lord Chancellor representing the House of Lords, and the Speaker the House of Commons; the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the metropolitan clergy; the chief mourner, the present Duke of Wellington, with numerous relatives and friends in his train; and the Lord Mayor and corporation of London, who joined the funeral cortége at Temple Bar. In slow and solemn step, the accompanying band playing the Dead March in Saul, the procession marched to the cathedral, where 20,000 persons were collected; amongst them a number of the Lords and Commons, who had proceeded there, in steamers, from the New Palace stairs.* When the procession had entered, and the parties composing it had taken the places assigned to them, the sacred service was read, and all that remained of Arthur Wellesley, the first Duke of Wellington, was deposited by the side of the great naval hero, Nelson, under the cathedral dome. While the procession was on its way, and on its return, there were countless multitudes in the streets. The line of route was three miles in length; and, said Earl Derby, addressing the House of Lords on the subject on the following evening—

"When, throughout the whole of that length, not only was a perfect decorum preserved, and a perfect and ready assistance given to the efforts of the police and military, but there was no unseemly desire to witness the magnificent spectacle; no light and thoughtless applause at its splendour; and that the people of England, in the awful silence of those vast crowds, testified, in the most emphatic manner, the sense in which every man among them felt the public loss which England had sustained—I know not, my lords, how you may have looked upon this manifestation of public feeling, and good sense and order; but I know this, that as I passed along those lines, it was with pride and satisfaction I felt that I was a countryman of those who knew so well how to regulate and conduct themselves."

The funeral was indeed a sight of which, in every sense, an Englishman might be proud: and a foreigner viewing it could not but feel admiration alike for the warrior who was borne to his last home, and for the people who so well knew how to regulate and control their feelings: and who evinced, on that melancholy occasion, their great love for propriety and order.—The House of Commons subsequently passed a resolution for the erection of a national monument to the duke in St. Paul's cathedral. The present duke, and the tenants, servants, and labourers on the Strathfieldsaye estate, Hampshire, entered into a subscription to raise a memorial to his memory on that estate. It was not completed till July, 1866, being inaugurated on the 31st of that month. It consists of a column of grey Cornish granite, surmounted with a statue of the duke, executed by Baron Marochetti. The column and base, something more than eighty-two feet high, consists of one solid block of granite.

The new parliament had assembled on the 4th of November; and after the members had taken the oaths, and Mr. Shaw Lefevre had been re-elected Speaker, the Queen, on the 11th, again opened the session in person. In her speech, her majesty expressed deep sorrow for the death of the Duke of Wellington; and her reliance that parliament would adopt means to give expression to the sense of "the irreparable loss which the country had sustained by his death."—Amongst other measures, the reappointment of the East India committee was recommended; and a comprehensive scheme for the advancement of the fine arts and of practical science promised.—Ireland was represented as still "insubordinate and turbulent;" but a "liberal and generous policy towards that country" was recommended, in order "to enable her to rally from the depression in which she had been lately sunk."—With respect to the question of protection, her majesty, having congratulated parliament on the results of free-trade legislation to the country in general, and to the working classes especially, continued—

"If parliament should be of opinion that recent legislation, in contributing with other causes to the happy result, has, at the same time, inflicted unavoidable injury on certain important interests, I recommend you dispassionately to consider how far it may be practicable to mitigate that injury, and to enable the industry of the country to meet successfully that unrestricted competition to which parliament, in its wisdom, has decided that it should be subjected."

Though the Earl of Derby declared that, after the opinion pronounced by the country, in the recent elections, on the policy of free trade, he was prepared to bow to its decision in both Houses, the language of the speech, and the declarations of the ministers, were considered unsatisfactory. In the debate on the address, Mr. Villiers gave notice that he should move resolutions on the subject, which he laid on the table on the 17th of November. Those resolutions declared it to be the opinion of the House, that the improved condition of the country, and especially of the working classes, was mainly the result of recent legislation; especially of "that wise, just, and beneficent measure," the act of 1846, which established a free trade in corn: "that the maintenance and extension of the policy of free trade, as opposed to that of protection," would best enable the property and industry of the nation to bear the burdens to which they were exposed; and that the House was ready to take into consideration any measures consistent with the principles of those resolutions which the ministers might bring forward.—On the 18th, Mr. Disraeli laid on the table an amendment which he intended to move, stating that "unreserved competition having been adopted as the basis of our commercial system, the House is of opinion that it is the duty of government unreservedly to adhere to that policy."—When the debate took place, on the 23rd of November, Lord Palmerston, saying that he could see little difference between the original resolutions and the amendment, except in the especial praise awarded to the act repealing the corn duty in the former, moved another amendment, consisting of three resolutions, expressing the same opinion of free trade as those proposed by Mr. Villiers, and the readiness of the House to consider any measures to carry out its principles, but leaving out the words describing the act of 1846 as "a wise, just, and beneficent measure." The debate was adjourned to the 26th; when Mr. Disraeli, having withdrawn his amendment in favour of Lord Palmerston's, Mr. Villiers's resolutions were negatived by 336 votes against 256; and the noble lord's carried by 468 to 53.—On the 3rd of December, in the Lords, the Marquis of Clanricarde laid on the table a resolution he intended to move on the commercial policy of the country. It was met by the following amendment, moved by Earl Derby:—"This House adheres to the commercial system recently established, and would view with regret any attempt to disturb its operations or impede its progress." The noble marquis withdrew his resolution in favour of this amendment, which, on the 6th of December, the peers adopted unanimously. By this decision, the Earl of Derby hoped the question was finally disposed of; and, bowing to the opinion of the majority, the Conservatives have not, since that period, sought to revive it.

On the 3rd of December, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in an able speech which occupied five hours, brought forward his budget; and though none of his propositions were carried, it is only fair to lay them before the reader, that the financial policy of the Conservatives may be thoroughly understood. They were—

1. To relieve the shipping interest of a portion of the dues it paid for the support of lighthouses.—2. To establish the system of refining sugar in bond.—3. To repeal one-half of the malt-tax, and one-half of the hop duty; removing, at the same time, the existing prohibition on foreign malt, and allowing that article to be imported on paying a duty equal to the excise on home-made malt.—4. To reduce the tea duty from 2*s.* 2¼*d.* per pound to 1*s.* 10*d.*; and by a further reduction of 2*d.* in the pound each year, for five years, to bring the duty, by the end of 1857, to 1*s.* per pound.—5. To continue the income and property tax at 7*d.* in the pound, on real and funded property; on farmers, trades, professions, and public salaries, at $5\frac{1}{4}d$. in the pound; to limit the exemptions of industrial incomes to those under £100, and upon those derived from the funds, to £50 a year; to charge farmers upon one-third of their rent, instead of one-half; and to extend the tax to Ireland, as far as regarded incomes received from the funds and public salaries.—6. To extend the house duty to houses of £10 a year rent; and the existing rates, of 6*d.* in the pound on shops, and 9*d.* on dwelling-houses, to be doubled.

A great opposition was manifested to this financial scheme out of the House. Though the repeal or modification of the malt and hop duties was the natural consequence of free trade—it being most unjust to leave a heavy tax on those articles, when the duty on foreign produce was so greatly reduced; though Mr. Cobden had declared that the repeal of the malt-tax must follow in the wake of free trade; and though the reduction of duty would have also reduced the price of the working-man's beverage—that reduction was opposed by the political economists, and the ultra-liberals generally, as being intended to benefit the landed interest, and not the public at large. The reduction of the duty on tea was also opposed, if it were to be replaced by an increase of the house duty. The latter impost was very unpopular with all parties, and met with an unusual amount of vigorous opposition, large and influential meetings being held in London and elsewhere to denounce it.

The resolution respecting the house duty was brought before the House on the 10th of December. The debate was adjourned to the 16th, when the proposal was negatived by 305 votes to 286. The next day the ministry resigned.—The Queen sent for Lord Aberdeen, who succeeded in forming a coalition ministry from the little band of "Peelites" and the Whigs. The following is a list of the cabinet, and of the principal officials who had not seats in the council; the noblemen and gentlemen with a * affixed to their names being members of the Peel party; those with a † Whigs.

Ireland — Attorney-General	*Right Hon. A. Brewster.
Ireland — Solicitor-General	*W. Keogh.

The Houses of Lords and Commons met on the 27th of December, when the Earl of Aberdeen announced, in the former, the circumstances under which the new administration had been formed; and the new writs required being ordered in the latter, both Houses adjourned to the 10th of February, 1853.

During the year, the revenue and the foreign trade of the country again increased. For the twelve months ending January 5, 1853, the amount of the public income was £53,210,071; and the expenditure, £50,792,511 13*s.* 9*d.*; leaving a surplus of £2,417,559 6*s.* 3*d.* — The amount of exports was £71,429,548, being an increase of £2,897,947 over 1851. The imports increased in a larger proportion. Notwithstanding the gloom cast over the industrial world by the strike of the Amalgamated Engineers, which had its effect on most other trades, the social condition of the country also improved rather than deteriorated during the twelve months. In that period, the volunteer movement, which has become so popular, and now extends all over the kingdom, had its origin; taking its rise from the rumours so prevalent for several months, of the probability of an invasion from France. The first rifle corps was formed in Cheltenham, in February. Early in the year there were two terrible events at sea, and great destruction of property on land by the bursting of a reservoir. The first disaster at sea took place on the 4th of January. On that day, the West India mail steam-packet Amazon, was destroyed by fire in the Bay of Biscay, about 110 miles W.S.W. of the Scilly Isles. There were 156 persons on board, of whom twenty-one were saved in the life-boat, twenty-five were picked up by a Dutch vessel, and carried into Brest, and thirteen were taken on board a Dutch galliot. The rest perished, either in the flames or by drowning; and all the property on board, as well as the vessel, was destroyed — On the 7th of January, the Birkenhead left England with reinforcements on board for various regiments serving in the Cape Colony. She arrived in St. Simon's Bay on the 23rd of February, where she took on board some horses, and landed several invalids, women, and children. She sailed for Algoa Bay on the 25th; and on the 26th, a long swell setting-in from the shore, the ship struck on a rock, and soon filled with water. The devotion and calm courage and discipline of the soldiers on board the vessel at this trying time, has frequently been made the subject of the highest praise, and most deservedly; for greater heroism never was displayed. They obeyed the orders to go to the pumps; they attended to the word of command as readily as if they were on parade in the field, instead of encountering the raging sea, and being in peril of their lives. Whilst efforts were making to lighten her, and get out the boats, the ship parted nearly in the centre; the women and children having just been placed in a cutter alongside. There were only three boats, and the soldiers could have taken possession of them for their own purposes, had they pleased. But though one-half of the ship had gone down, and the other was sinking, "there was not a murmur or cry," writes Captain Wright, "until the vessel made her final plunge." When she was going down, the commanders cried to the soldiers, "All those who can swim jump overboard, and make for the boats!" "We," says Captain Wright, "begged the men not to do this, as the boats with the women might be swamped;" and "not more than three made the attempt!" There were 630 persons on board the Birkenhead when she struck. Of these, 194 were saved, and 436, mostly soldiers, drowned.—The reservoir which burst was that of Bilberry Dam, at Holmfirth, near Huddersfield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. This accident caused disastrous floods, in which entire families perished; and a vast amount of milk and other property was destroyed.—The provinces were subsequently visited by violent storms and overwhelming floods, causing great damage to houses and crops. —At the close of the year, during the night of the 26th of December, a hurricane, more violent than any that had been experienced for many years, swept over London and a great part of England and Ireland; inflicting vast injury upon buildings and shipping, and occasioning the loss of many lives.

The unhappy disputes between Protestants and Roman Catholics were revived this year, in greater intensity than had prevailed since 1850. The latter had grown bolder since the failure of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act; and had renewed their religious processions in a style so offensive to those who differed from them, that several riots arose in various parts of the kingdom, though they were of no great consequence. On the 15th of June, a royal proclamation appeared, prohibiting Roman Catholic processions in the streets; and also forbidding the priests of that religion from wearing their ecclesiastical habits in public. A few days after this proclamation was issued, some Roman Catholic demonstrations at Stockport caused the Protestants of that town to rise in a body, and considerable tumult and disgraceful rioting prevailed. On the 29th of June, two Roman Catholic chapels were destroyed, the houses of several Roman Catholics gutted, and the contents broken to pieces, and partly burned.

Scotland was very quiet during the year; but in Ireland, the strife occasioned by the religious and land questions continued without intermission.—On New-year's Day, a series of statutes, passed at a Roman Catholic synod held at Thurles in the previous year, was read in all the Roman Catholic churches and chapels in Ireland; they regulated the administration of the sacraments in that country, and prohibited the Roman Catholic clergy from holding offices in the Queen's colleges.—On the 28th of January, a society called the [Roman] Catholic Defence Association, issued a manifesto in Dublin, insisting on perfect religious equality, and the abolition of the established church of Ireland. In September, a Religious Equality Association was formed, for the purpose of procuring that abolition, and the application of the revenues of the establishment to purely secular purposes, leaving all sects to support their own ministers; or, as an alternative, "an equitable apportionment of the church revenues between the several religious denominations of the country." At the first meeting of this association, held in the Rotunda, Dublin, on the 28th of October, a resolution was passed requiring the Irish Liberal members to continue independent of, and in opposition to any government which would not concede perfect religious equality.—With respect to the land question, Mr. Sharman Crawford, of Crawfordsburn, county Down (who, in the parliament that was dissolved in July, 1852, represented Rochdale), brought in a Tenant Right Bill, the object of which was, to prevent a tenant from being ejected from a farm while he continued to pay his rent; and it also provided for tenants being reimbursed by the landlord for any buildings erected, or improvements made, during their tenancy. A society was formed, and numerous meetings were held, to promote this measure, which was opposed by the landlords, as most destructive of their rights and property.—The Protestants generally opposed these movements, and held meetings to protest against the endowment of Maynooth, and the granting of any further concessions to the Roman Catholics. Out of the land question many disputes arose; and several landlords were assassinated during the year.

In 1852, the "gold-fields" of Australia continued to be very productive; and considerable quantities of gold were brought to England. Some of the towns in the colony were almost depopulated, so many of the inhabitants rushing to the "diggings."—In South Africa, our colony at the Cape was still engaged in the Kaffir war. The government at home, thinking that Sir Harry Smith did not conduct it properly, recalled that officer. He was succeeded by Major-General Cathcart, who appears to have carried on the contest with greater success. On the 13th of May, he issued a proclamation recognising the independence of the emigrant Boers of the Vaal river; by which a free state was raised in the neighbourhood of the English colony, which has not been the best possible neighbour.—We were also engaged in a war with Burmah. It arose out of injuries inflicted upon the commanders of two British vessels, for which redress was demanded in vain. The terms required were, the payment of £990 to the officers, and the reception of a British agent according to the treaty concluded at Yandaboo on the 26th of February, 1826. As these terms were rejected, war was declared. It was carried on with great vigour. A British naval force had arrived before Rangoon—a town of Pegu, situated on a branch of the Irrawaddy—on the 29th of October, 1851, with a view to support the negotiators in their demand for compensation. When war was declared, the Burmese viceroy erected stockades and batteries, with a view of preventing the British vessels from communicating with the shore, or leaving the harbour. On the 4th of January, 1852, the British commodore ordered the batteries to be attacked. They were soon rendered unserviceable, and the stockades were forced. No time was then lost in sending a competent military and naval force to the Irrawaddy, under Major-General Godwin, who knew the country, having been engaged in the previous Burmese war. The first place attacked was Martaban. Her majesty's steamer Rattler opened a fire on that town on the 4th of April. Very little resistance was offered, and, on the 5th, the British flag was flying upon the walls. Rangoon was attacked a few days after the fall of Martaban, by a body of troops under General Godwin. On the north side, a pagoda formed a strong defensive post. It was carried by storm on the 14th of April; but not without a considerable loss of officers and men; and the town immediately surrendered. A force was then sent against Bassein—a town situated on one of the main arteries by which the Irrawaddy discharges itself into the sea. This town surrendered on the 19th of May; and with Rangoon and Martaban, formed a base for future operations. Pegu and Prome were next taken—the former on the 4th of June, and the latter on the 9th of July. Both were evacuated soon after; but they were recaptured, Prome on the 9th of October, and Pegu on the 21st of November, and garrisons placed in them. A Burmese force immediately invested the latter place, which was attacked, on the 3rd of December, by the Madras Fusiliers, under Major Hill, and gallantly repulsed.—As the Burmese had been several times tried, and found faithless, and not to be relied upon for the observance of any engagement into which they might enter, the governor-general of India (the Marquis of Dalhousie), in a council held on the 20th of December, resolved to annex the province of Pegu to the British dominions, and we have ever since held it. It extends from N. lat. 15° 49′ to 19° 30′, and from E. long. 94° 11′ to 96° 55′; being 240 miles long, and 170 broad; the number of inhabitants is about 600,000. It was the richest and most fertile of the Burmese provinces, and has greatly improved under British rule. Hostilities were continued; and, early in January, 1853, a small British force, under Captains Nuttall and Sunderland, attacked the stockade of Nariengain, at the summit of the Aeng Pass, a part of the great route leading over the Yoomadoung mountains at Ava, the capital of the Burmese empire. The stockade was captured by surprise on the 7th of January, and was deemed a very gallant action: the capture opened the route to Ava to the British. About the same time the King of Ava was deposed, and his brother mounted the throne. He sent proposals of peace to General Godwin: no further affair of consequence took place between the hostile forces; and, on the 20th of June, the governor-general issued a proclamation announcing the termination of the war.

There were some stirring events on the continent in 1852; but except those which occurred in France, they were not of any great interest to the English people. In that country there had been another coup-d'état, and the former prisoner of Ham, whose life was at the mercy of Louis Philippe, became the occupant of the French throne, and had made what appears to be a very ungenerous return to the Orleans family for the lenity shown him in 1840. The events of 1851, previously narrated [see ante, p. 569], were followed by a decree from the Minister of the Interior, issued on the 7th of January, 1852, ordering the erasure of the words "Liberty, Fraternity, Equality" from public buildings, monuments, and wherever else they might be inscribed; and the restoration of the old names of streets, &c.—On the 9th, Generals Changarnier, Lamoriciere, Bedeau, and Le Flo, Colonel Charras, and M. Baze, who had been imprisoned in the castle of Vincennes since the 2nd of December, were conducted to the Belgian frontier, and ordered immediately to leave France, and not to return. The next day, eighty-three members of the late legislative assembly were also expelled the country; and 575 persons, arrested for resistance to the troops on the 2nd of December, were sent off to Havre, from whence they were transported to Cayenne.—On the 12th, the national guard was disbanded, and ordered to be re-organised; the officers to be appointed by the president, and the force to be entirely under the control of the executive.—On the 23rd, a decree of the prince-president appeared, directing the Orleans family to sell all their real and personal property in France within a year. Another decree annulled the settlement which Louis Philippe made upon his family of the property in his possession previous to his accession to the throne in 1830, and annexed that property to the domain of the state. These decrees against the Orleans family, induced the Count de Montalembert and several others to withdraw from the consultative commission. A decree issued on the 25th of December, restored the titles of the French nobility. Another, of the 3rd of February, established the French representative system. It set forth, that deputies were to be elected to a corps legislatif, one deputy to be returned for every 35,000 electors; each department to be divided into as many electoral districts as it returned deputies; and if there should be a surplus in the department of 25,000 electors, or upwards, those electors were also to choose a deputy. All Frenchmen, twenty years of age, not disqualified for the possession of civil and political rights, to enjoy the suffrage; candidates must be twenty-five years of age, and the voting to be by ballot. On the 17th of February, a decree was promulgated, abolishing all political anniversaries except the birthday of the Emperor Napoleon I. (August 15th), which was ordered to be the only national holiday in France. The new chamber was installed by the president on the 29th of March: in his address he disavowed all intention of restoring the empire, unless he was compelled by the conduct of the factious. "Let us," he said, "keep the republic; it menaces nobody, but reassures every one."

Whether the factious did set themselves to work, without provocation, against one who certainly appeared to be the "man of the people," by the way in which he was supported by them, and the enthusiasm with which he was hailed whenever he appeared in public, we have no means of knowing. But his friends were not idle. After, apparently, much private whispering and caballing, on the 14th of September a petition to the French senate was published, praying for the re-establishment of "the hereditary sovereign power in the Bonaparte family." At that time the sessions of the departmental councils-general had just closed; and in the usual addresses which each sends to the government at Paris, there was a universal prayer for the stability of the prince-president's power; and the majority expressed a wish for the re-establishment of the empire.—On the 14th, the prince-president left Paris for a tour in the centre and south of France. He was received with the greatest enthusiasm at the places he visited; and at Lyons, where, on the 20th, he inaugurated a statue of his uncle, he was hailed with shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!"—At Marseilles, on the contrary, there appears to have been a conspiracy against him; and on the 23rd, an infernal machine, intended for his destruction, was seized by the police in that city. What subsequent intrigues or negotiations took place is not known; but, on the 4th of November, the senate met, summoned by a decree, "to deliberate on a change of government for France." The message of the prince-president, addressed to the senate on this occasion, was rather long. It was decidedly in favour of the re-establishment of the empire; although the prince "did not disguise from himself all that was formidable in accepting and placing on his head the crown of Napoleon." But his "apprehensions were diminished by the feeling, that, representing the cause of the people, and the national will by so many titles, it would be the nation which, by raising him to the throne, would crown itself."—A proposition to modify the constitution, made by ten senators, was assented to by the rest; who resolved that the people should be consulted respecting the re-establishment of the empire; and a commission was appointed to prepare a senatus-consultum.—On the 7th, this senatus-consultum, calling the prince-president to the empire, was agreed to by eighty-six out of eighty-seven senators present; who all proceeded in full costume to St. Cloud, and placed it in the hands of the president. The result was the issuing a decree, convoking the people, in their comices, for the 21st and 22nd of October, to accept or reject the following plebiscite:—

"The French people wills the resuscitation of the imperial dignity in the person of Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, with heredicity in his direct legitimate or adoptive descendants; and gives to him the right to regulate the succession to the throne in the Bonaparte family as mentioned in the senatus-consultum of this day."

Accordingly, on the 21st and 22nd, the people gave their votes in the different districts. The legislative body met on the 1st of December, and reported that the ayes were 7,864,169; noes, 253,145; neuter, 63,326. That assembly and the senate, as soon as the numbers were ascertained, proceeded to St. Cloud, to present the result to the prince-president, who accepted the empire, and took the title of Napoleon III. The next day the establishment of the empire was proclaimed at the Hôtel de Ville, and the new emperor entered the capital in triumph. The senate assembled that day, and voted him a civil list of 30,000,000 francs (£1,200,000): and a few days after, an imperial decree appeared, appointing the ex-king Jerome (the emperor's uncle), and his male heirs, successors to the throne.

CHAPTER CVIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1853.

HE opening of the year 1853 found the people, generally, exulting in the advent to power of a new ministry, which they were told comprised the "first administrative talent" of the country; and great and beneficial results were expected from its measures. Nothing of importance occurred till parliament met on the 11th of February; and it being a continuation of the session of 1852, there was no royal speech.—Lord John Russell, who, though he held no office, was the ministerial leader in the House of Commons, enumerated the principal measures which he and his colleagues meant to bring forward during the session. Several of those measures became law. The most important were—"An Act substituting Stamp Duties, varying from £2 to £100, for Fees on passing Letters Patent for Inventions; and a duty of 2*d.* for every ninety words of office copies of documents."—"An Act to enable the Legislature of Canada to dispose of the Clergy Reserves:" that is, the seventh part of waste lands sold by the crown; which, by an act passed in 1791, was ordered to be kept for the support of the Protestant clergy.—"An Act for the better Regulation of Metropolitan Stage and Hackney Carriages," fixed the rate for the metropolitan cabs at 6*d.* per mile. The introduction of this measure led to a "strike" among the owners of cabs, who for several days withdrew their vehicles from the public streets. Some of its provisions were meliorated, and a clause was introduced, enabling the driver to charge an extra 6*d.* for every person above two the cab conveyed. The strike was then withdrawn; owners and drivers submitted to the law, which has since regulated the cab-fares in all parts of the metropolis.—"An Act to substitute, in certain cases, other Punishment in lieu of Transportation," authorised judges to sentence prisoners to what is termed "penal servitude"—i.e., imprisonment with hard labour, instead of transporting them, when the term awarded would be less than fourteen years. It also empowered the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in cases where the behaviour of the prisoner warranted the adoption of such a course, to grant licences to convicts under sentence of transportation or penal servitude, which, until revoked, were to protect the holder from any imprisonment in consequence of his sentence. These "licences" are familiarly known as "tickets-of-leave," and the holders of them as "ticket-of-leave-men."—Another important act was that "to Extend and make Compulsory the Practice of Vaccination." It imposes a fine of 20*s.* in all cases where an infant is not vaccinated before it attains the age of three months, unless the medical officer certifies that it is not able to bear the operation; and then it must be performed as soon as the health of the child permits. The enforcement of this regulation is intended to prevent the spread of that fatal disease the small-pox, which, when it breaks out in a confined neighbourhood, being contagious, usually causes numerous deaths.

There is no country in the world where there are so many charitable institutions, intended to promote the education of the young, and to render assistance, under nearly every circumstance in which it may be required, to young and old, as England. Great complaints had been made, for many years, of the mismanagement of these institutions; and, in the session of 1853, an act was passed "for the better Administration of Charitable Trusts." By this act, four commissioners, with a secretary and two inspectors, were appointed, and empowered to inquire into the condition and management, and the value of the property, of any charities in England and Wales; and to make such regulations as might be required for the better government of those institutions, and the administration of the property. And as, previously, the Court of Chancery was the only court that had jurisdiction in the affairs of charities, by this act that jurisdiction was given to District Courts of Bankruptcy and the County Courts, as regarded charities where the income did not exceed £30 per annum; and with respect to charities whose incomes were above that sum, the power hitherto vested solely in the Lord Chancellor, was extended to the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors.—By "An Act for the Establishment of a Body of Naval Volunteers," the Admiralty was empowered to raise a body of men, not exceeding 10,000 in number, to be called the "Royal Naval Coast Volunteers," for the defence of the coast; who were to be trained for twenty-eight days in each year, when they were not to be sent more than fifty leagues from the shore; and in time of national danger, or great emergency, they are to be called into actual service, but not to be sent above 100 leagues from the coast.—An act to remove the disabilities of the Jews was passed in the House of Commons; 288 voting, on the 15th of April, for the third reading, to 230 against it. In the Lords, on the 29th of that month, the motion that the bill be read a second time, was negatived by 164 votes to 115. An attempt to pass a bill regulating tenant-right in Ireland also failed.—The question of reform was deferred to the following year.

The religious question, which, unfortunately, agitated society out of doors, was the subject of several animated debates in the House of Commons. The case of a Miss Talbot, who had been improperly, it was said, confined in a convent, increased the prejudice that, in the Protestant mind, always exists against those institutions; and they were denounced as prisons and mad-houses, in which the inmates were subjected to the strictest coercion, and often to cruelty. At length, the subject was taken up in the House of Commons. Mr. Thomas Chambers, one of the representatives of Hertford, moved, on the 10th of May, for leave to bring in a bill "to facilitate, in certain cases, the recovery of liberty;" the cases being those of the inmates in convents and monastic institutions. Lord John Russell condemned the motion; and able and clever speeches were made both for and against it. The proposal in the bill was, that parties who suspected they had friends confined, or otherwise improperly treated, in convents, might apply to a magistrate, and, with him, visit the institution, and personally ascertain what were the real facts. The opponents of the bill denied its necessity altogether. They alleged, that neither coercion nor cruelty existed in the convents, the inmates of which could always see their friends; and it was much better that the female Roman Catholics of England, if they wished to embrace a conventual life, should be enabled to do so at home, rather than be obliged to go to France, or some other Roman Catholic country on the continent; which they would be, if this bill passed. Notwithstanding the opposition of the government, leave was given to bring in the bill by 138 votes to 115. When, however, its second reading was moved, on the 22nd of June, by Sir Robert Inglis, it was negatived by 207 noes to 178 ayes; and the bill was lost.—While this bill was before the House, one of the outworks of the church of England was assailed by Dr. Phillimore, the member for Tavistock; who, on the 26th of May, moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the law relating to church-rates. Sir William Clay, who sat for the Tower Hamlets, moved as an amendment, that a select committee should be appointed to consider the propriety of abolishing church-rates altogether. Both these proposals were negatived after a long debate; the amendment by 207 votes to 185; and the original motion by 220 to 172.—An attack was also made on the Protestant church of Ireland by Mr. George Henry Moore, one of the members for Mayo; who moved for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland, and determine how they could best be made applicable to the benefit of the Irish people. The basis for this motion was, that the property of the Irish church, originally intended for the use of Roman Catholics, was entirely diverted from them for the benefit of the Protestants; and its supporters wanted to disendow the established church, and apply its property for the benefit of the population at large. Lord John Russell also opposed this motion; and, in the course of his speech, said, the Roman Catholic clergy, if more power or control, and greater political influence were given to them, were not likely to exercise it in accordance with the spirit of freedom that prevailed in this country. On a division, there were only 98 votes for the motion, whilst 260 were given against it.—In consequence of what was said about the Roman Catholic religion by the ministerial leader of the House, Mr. Keogh, the Solicitor-General for Ireland; Mr. John Sadlier, the Irish Lord of the Treasury; and Mr. William Monsell, Clerk of the Ordnance, resigned their offices the day after Mr. Chambers's motion was rejected; but they soon after resumed them.

The financial scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, this year, included a proposal for reducing the annual charge of the national debt by the voluntary conversion of the stock called Three per Cent. Consols, and the Reduced Three and a-half per Cents.—making together a capital of near £500,000,000—into a permanent irredeemable stock, bearing 2½ per cent. He also proposed to issue exchequer bonds to the amount of £30,000,000, bearing an interest of 2¾ per cent. till 1894, when it would be reduced to 2½ per cent., and be subject to redemption.—These bonds were to be issued to enable the government to liquidate the South Sea Annuities and some minor stocks. The Chancellor's proposals met with great opposition at the time. They, however, obtained the sanction of both Houses, and the royal assent. But the scheme was an utter failure, as Mr. Disraeli and other speakers predicted it would be; for the public would neither take Mr. Gladstone's exchequer bonds, nor transfer their 3 and 3½ per cent. stock into one bearing 2½ per cent., though certain advantages were offered them. After an attempt to carry it out through three or four years, the scheme was suffered to drop, and no more was heard of it.—In introducing his budget on the 18th of April, Mr. Gladstone said, the income for the year ending on the 5th of that month, was £53,089,000; the expenditure, £50,782,000; the surplus, £2,307,000. The estimated revenue of the current year, 1853-'4, was £52,990,000; the expenditure, £52,183,000; the surplus, £807,000. His propositions were—

1. To continue the income-tax till 1860, including all incomes between £100 and £150, and extend the tax to Ireland.—2. To extend the legacy duty to real as well as personal property.—3. To increase the duty on Scotch spirits from 4*s.* to 5*s.* per gallon; and on Irish spirits from 3*s.* to 3*s.* 8*d.* per gallon.—4. To abolish the duty on soap.—5. To reduce the stamp duties on life insurance to 6*d.* per cent.; on receipts, to a uniform rate of 1*d.* on all sums exceeding 30*s.*; on advertisements, to 6*d.*, and on newspapers, to 1*d.*—6. To reduce the tea duty immediately to 1*s.* 10*d.* per pound, and to still further reduce it every year, till, in 1856, it stood at 1*s.* Several minor alterations were also proposed in other custom duties, and in the excise. The duty on licences to brewers, maltsters, dealers in tea, coffee, tobacco, and soap, was increased.

By his various reductions the right honourable gentleman estimated that the public would be relieved to the extent of £5,315,000; whilst the duties imposed or increased would raise £2,500,000: the clear gain to the public, therefore, would be £2,815,000.—The right honourable gentleman's resolutions were adopted with little opposition; but in the passage of the bills founded on them through the House, it was resolved to abolish the advertisement duty entirely. Soon after the last of the financial measures was carried, on the 20th of August, parliament was prorogued.

The royal family was increased this year by the birth, on the 7th of April, of a prince, the youngest son of Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, who was baptised on the 28th of June, by the names of Leopold George Duncan Albert. The kings of Belgium and Hanover were his royal highness's godfathers; the former appearing by proxy, the latter in person; having arrived, with the Queen, on the 16th.

For some time the state of the army had occupied the attention of ministers; and to render the troops more effective if called into active service, it was resolved to accustom them to camp life. The first camp of 10,000 men, infantry and cavalry, was opened at Chobham, in the county of Surrey, on the 14th of June; the common at that village affording ample space for the tents and parading-ground. Those troops which first took possession of the encampment, after going through a course of strict discipline, were replaced by others; and before the camp was broken up, on the 19th of August, most of the regiments at that time in the kingdom had served their term of camp life. On the 21st of June, the Queen, Prince Albert, the King and Queen of Hanover, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, who was also in England, with a numerous and splendid attendance, went to Chobham, where the troops were reviewed, not fewer than 100,000 spectators being present. All the evolutions prescribed for the day were gone through most efficiently; and, says an eye-witness, "It may be fearlessly asserted, that there is no country in the world, from whose army, however large, 9,000 men could be brought together, that, either in height, size, strength, vigour, health, or appearance, would bear comparison with those who passed before Queen Victoria on that occasion on Chobham Common."

The same cause that led to this temporary encampment—viz., the differences between Russia and Turkey, which appeared to be then tending to a culminating point, and which, it was apprehended, would involve Europe in war—also led to the assembling of a fleet at Spithead, to go through naval evolutions. There were nine ships of the line, one of them the largest vessel then constructed—the screw-steamer Duke of Wellington, carrying 131 guns—and sixteen frigates; twenty-two out of the twenty-five being steamers, and three sailing vessels; the complement of horse-power was 9,780; the number of men, 10,825; of guns, 9,780; and the total amount of tonnage, 44,146. Besides these vessels, there were at Spithead, nine men-of-war steamers; eleven yachts and steam-tenders; with some smaller vessels—making a grand total of more than fifty; all of which were collected off Spithead on the 11th of August. On that day, the Queen and Prince Albert, with their household, arrived from Osborne in the Albert and Victoria steamer, which anchored in view of this large fleet. The lords of the Admiralty, the two Houses of Parliament, and the corps diplomatique, having been conveyed from London by rail, repaired to the "wide sheet of waters" in steamers provided for them, to witness the naval evolutions that took place. The day was fine; and, says a popular chronicler, "the coup d'œil was one which no language can convey, for it was instinct with motion—teeming with energetic life." The evolutions were effective, and gone through admirably. The Queen remained afloat until all was over, at seven o'clock, and then returned to Osborne. The Lords, Commons, and ambassadors were landed, and proceeded to London; and, by all present, the spectacle of that day was often spoken of as one of the most brilliant ever seen, and one which no other nation could produce.

There were a few other domestic events of the year which deserve a brief mention. A "Society for Improving the Dwellings of the Working Classes" had been formed, under the auspices of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and other philanthropists.—On the 12th of April, the foundation-stone of the first model lodging-house erected by this society was laid by the Duke of Cambridge, in New Street, Golden Square.—In that month, an expedition, consisting of the Phœnix steam-ship, and another vessel, under the command of Captain Ingerfield, was despatched in search of Sir John Franklin, who, on the 24th of May, 1845, sailed with two ships—the Erebus and Terror—on a voyage of discovery in the Arctic seas, and never returned. Lieut. Bellot, a French officer, volunteered to join Captain Ingerfield. The expedition was unsuccessful in its search; and the gallant Frenchman was, on the 18th of August, blown into a deep crack of the ice, where he perished.—On the 4th of November, a meeting was held in Willis's Rooms, St. James's Street, London, at which it was resolved to raise a memorial to his honour. This resolution was carried out by the erection, on the north side of the Royal Hospital, Greenwich, of a handsome obelisk, dedicated to Bellot.

Since the passing of the Municipal Reform Bill in 1835, there had been many complaints made that the corporation of London was left untouched, and in possession of all those powers which certain parties represented as being so much abused. Very little way was made in the city, however, by the corporate reformers, as most of the Liberals of London were in favour of preserving their municipality—now the only one existing of the old institutions of that class. Gradually, however, the innovators grew stronger; they formed a "City of London Municipal Reform Association;" and had influence enough to procure the issuing of a royal commission, directing an inquiry to be made into the state of the corporation of London. The commissioners—the Right Hon. Mr. Labouchere, Sir J. Patteson (a retired judge), and Mr. Cornewall Lewis—held their first meeting on the 1st of November, to receive oral evidence on the subject. The inquiry produced no result; and the corporation of London still remains "unreformed."

During the year, the provinces were again agitated with the "strikes" of workmen; which at Preston—where, on the 17th of October, 30,000 operatives assembled—and at Wigan assumed, at one time, an alarming appearance. In the night of the 28th of October, there were desperate riots in the latter town, in which a large amount of property was destroyed, but no lives were lost. The mob extinguished the gas-lights; and for four hours employed themselves in breaking open houses, and breaking-up the furniture, and other effects, of those who were obnoxious to them.—On the 31st, the riots were renewed at the coal-pits at Haigh, the property of the Earl of Balcarres. The rioters beat off the police, and the military had to be called out. They fired upon the mob, seven or eight of whom were wounded, and the rest fled. Quiet appears to have been then restored.

In 1853, the Scotch people, usually very quiet, except at election times, entered the arena of agitation, and formed a "National Association for the Vindication of Scotch Rights." Conservatives and Liberals were enrolled as members, under the presidency of the Earl of Eglinton; the objects sought to be attained being, the appointment of a Scotch Secretary of State, and a larger number of representatives in parliament: complaints were also made of the injustice inflicted on Scotland by its exclusion from the advantages of participating in the public expenditure. The first public meeting of this society was held in the Music Hall, Edinburgh, on the 2nd of November, the noble president in the chair; when some able speeches were delivered. The association was not very long-lived; and it did not excite much attention beyond the boundaries of North Britain.

In Ireland, the Tenant-Right League, and the Religious Equality Association, continued their efforts to enlist the public in support of the objects for which they were contending; and they succeeded in spreading ill-will amongst the Irish people, and in increasing discontent with the government, but failed to produce any good effect. These societies were not entirely under Roman Catholic influence; for there were a few Protestants mixed up with the Tenant-Right League, and many dissenters joined the association for obtaining religious equality—the great object being to procure the downfall of the Irish church. This year, another society, exclusively Protestant, appeared on the scene, called "The Irish Church Missions," which held its opening meeting at Dublin, on the 16th of September in the old quarters of the Roman Catholic Defence Association. The great aim of this society is proselytism; to induce the members of the Romish church to abandon its errors and superstitions; and to embrace the truths of the Bible. Much of the attention of the public was drawn from these societies by the attractions of the great "Industrial International Exhibition," which was opened at Dublin on the 12th of May. It was preceded by an "Exhibition of Arts and Industry," held at Cork, from the 10th of July to the 11th of September, 1852. This Cork exhibition was well conducted, and gave great satisfaction. It was, however, little more than a local display; and, before it opened, a move had been made to hold one in the Irish capital, of a more comprehensive character. Dublin boasts its Royal Society, of which many eminent men have been, and are, members. It had, for the last quarter of a century, held a triennial exhibition of Irish art and manufactures at Dublin. The year 1853 was the time for holding the ninth of these exhibitions; and, on the 24th of June, 1852, Mr. Dargan, an eminent railway contractor, wrote to the society, offering to place in its hands the sum of £20,000, provided it would make the exhibition of the following year available for the manufactures of the three kingdoms. Whether Mr. Dargan was to be repaid, depended entirely upon the success of the undertaking: if it failed, that gentleman was to lose his money; if it succeeded, he was to take what it might produce beyond the expenses: should that sum however, exceed £20,000 and interest from the time it was advanced, the surplus, whatever it might be, was to remain in the hands of the society. The offer was accepted; and as the necessary preparations progressed, the council of the society resolved to make the exhibition, like the London one of 1851, open to all nations; and to include in it paintings, which were excluded from the English exhibition, that it might not interfere with that of the Royal Academy, which was open at the same time. The building was erected on the lawn of the Royal Society. It consisted of a central hall 425 feet long, 100 feet wide, and 105 feet high, with smaller halls, both as wings, and attached to the sides. Its exterior appearance was considered by many to be unfavourable; but in the interior, it was not only artistically fine, but admirably suited to its purposes.—Before it was completed, Mr. Dargan had advanced £50,000 to the society.—The contributions to this exhibition were very numerous and very valuable; and it was opened on the 12th of May, by the lord-lieutenant, upwards of 15,000 persons being present. In August, the Queen resolved to visit the exhibition. Her majesty left Holyhead very early in the morning of Monday, the 29th of August, and arrived in the Bay of Dublin that evening. The next day her majesty proceeded to the building, accompanied by the Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, and Prince Alfred. The royal party entered the building by the great central door, "amidst a tremendous chorus of human voices," and the "waving of handkerchiefs and hats." The committee, headed by their chairman, Mr. George Roe, preceded the Queen to the daïs prepared to receive her; and when her majesty reached it, and looked around, "she stood in evident admiration of the magnificent scene before her."—The principal features of the exhibition were carefully examined; and the royal personages expressed themselves pleased and delighted with all they saw. On retiring, the Queen was as loudly cheered as when she arrived. With that gracious urbanity for which her majesty is distinguished, before she re-embarked she visited Mr. Dargan at his own house, and expressed to him her sense of the disinterested munificence of his conduct in advancing the funds necessary for the preliminary expenses of the undertaking. The exhibition remained open nearly six months, till the 31st of October, when the lord-lieutenant again attended, and it was closed in the presence of one of the most numerous assemblies that had been seen in the building—about 22,000 persons being then collected there. His excellency made a brief, but highly appropriate address; and concluded by calling for "three cheers for Mr. Dargan," to whom Dublin was indebted for the brilliant display then terminated; and knighting Mr. Cusack Roney, who had been the hard-working and indefatigable secretary of the committee. At the opening, his excellency had knighted Mr. Benson, the architect; the same honour was offered to Mr. Dargan, but declined.—On the 21st of November, the exhibitors entertained that gentleman and the executive committee at a grand banquet, held in the King's Room of the Dublin Mansion-house. Six hundred guests were present, amongst whom, the peerage, the professional classes, the merchants, and the traders of Ireland were represented; and a pleasanter evening could not be spent than was experienced, apparently, by all present on that occasion. On the 15th of December, the Great Hall, cleared of the peculiar adornments prepared for the exhibition, and properly furnished for the occasion with a fine shrubbery, and beautiful plants and flowers, was opened as a Jardin d'Hiver, with a grand ceremonial, in which the lord-lieutenant and the Countess St. Germains participated.—The receipts, during the time the exhibition was open, very little exceeded the expenditure, and Mr. Dargan lost nearly all the money he advanced. He was subsequently honoured by the foundation of the "Dargan Industrial College," for the instruction of young men of talent, but of limited means, in the practical arts of industry.

Another memorable event of 1853, was the return to England, on the 9th of October, of Lieutenant Creswell, of H.M.S. Investigator, which, under the command of Captain M'Clure, had left England in 1850, with a view to discover the "North-west Passage," or communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, through Baffin's Bay to Behring's Straits, by the north of the American continent. It was to find this passage that the Cabots sailed from England in 1496, having had a patent granted to them by Henry VII. to effect settlements in any land they might discover in the Arctic Ocean. From their day the attempt to discover this passage was repeatedly made; and, in the first half of the present century, several expeditions for that purpose were sent out by the British government; the most memorable being that of Sir John Franklin, who, in May, 1845, sailed from Sheerness with two ships—the Erebus, commanded by Captain Fitzjames, and the Terror, Captain Crozier. From this expedition not one man returned: all perished in the vast Arctic wilderness. Several vessels were sent in search of them; and it was ascertained, at last, that after being blocked up there twenty months, Sir John Franklin had died at King William's Island, in 1847: and that the crew abandoned the vessels in the spring of 1848, their aim being to reach the Hudson's Bay territories by the Great Fish River. Some did reach Montreal Island, which lies at the mouth of that river; but no European ever encountered any of them; and what is known as to their fate was derived from some papers found on the two islands, and from the accounts of the native Esquimaux, who appear to have treated kindly the wanderers they fell-in with.—The Investigator was sent on one of these expeditions. It left England in January, 1850; and in the course of the following year, the fact of a communication existing between the two rival oceans was established; Melville Sound, Barrow's Strait, and Lancaster Sound, being the connecting links between Baffin's Bay and the Arctic Ocean. Behring's Straits divide Asia from America, and fall into the Arctic Ocean.—The arrival of Lieutenant Creswell with the news that the passage had been effected, occasioned almost as much excitement amongst commercial men as did the laying of the Atlantic cable a few years after. When Captain M'Clure arrived, he was duly honoured; nor was the officer who preceded him with the intelligence forgotten. The expected commercial advantages from the discovery of the passage have not, however, been realised; and except that it solved a geographical problem, the good effected by the discovery of the north-west passage—an object that had been pursued for three centuries and a-half, and on which so much money was expended, and so many lives lost—has been nil.

There was little in our colonial affairs that require notice during 1853, except in connection with the Cape Colony and the island of Jamaica.—In the former, on the 22nd of February, the submission of the Kaffir chiefs, Macomo, Sandilli, and Kreili, and the virtual termination of the war which had so annoyed and harassed the colonists, were announced. On the 9th of March, a conference was held between General Cathcart and those chiefs near King William's Town, and the terms of peace were ratified, the Kaffirs retiring across the Kei.—In June, the impoverished state of the island of Jamaica was brought prominently forward; and it occasioned serious disputes between the governor and his council and the House of Assembly; as the latter, on the ground that it was impossible to pay the same salaries as were attached to offices in the days of slavery and protection, passed a bill reducing all those salaries 30 per cent. It also passed an import duties bill, with appropriating clauses; and a bill laying a duty on rum, for the support of hospitals, the prisons, and the police. The council rejected these three measures; and the governor, siding with that body, prorogued the assembly. —This state of things did not continue long; economy, at last, was established; but Jamaica appeared still to decline, and exhibited no symptoms of prosperity.

The interest of the foreign news of 1853, and of the two following years, was chiefly connected with the Crimean war, of which a connected account will be given in a subsequent chapter.—In France, the people appeared to acquiesce cheerfully in the restoration of the empire; and the emperor's marriage, on the 30th of January, to a Spanish lady, Madlle. de Montijo, Duchess of Teba, was hailed with great satisfaction. It was followed, on the 4th of February, by a decree pardoning 4,312 persons who were in prison for political offences. On the 28th of the same month, a deputation, headed by Sir John Duke, one of the representatives of London, had an audience of the emperor at the Tuileries, to present an address, signed by about 4,000 merchants of the metropolis, expressive of the desire of themselves and their fellow-citizens for continued friendship with France.—On the 5th of July, several persons were arrested at Paris, on suspicion of being engaged in a conspiracy to assassinate the emperor on his return from the Opera Comique. The performances that evening took place under his majesty's command, and were attended by him and the empress. The trials of the prisoners commenced on the 7th of November, and continued till the 15th, thirty-three appearing before the Court of Assize. All were found guilty: ten were sentenced to transportation for life; the rest to be imprisoned for terms varying from three to ten years.—On the 6th of February, an insurrection broke out at Milan, instigated by Mazzini, an Italian insurgent; and Kossuth, a Hungarian, who in 1849 had been at the head of a revolution in his native country, which Austria required the aid of Russia to suppress. The movement in Milan was promptly put down; injuring none but those concerned in it. A similar movement at Rome, through the agency of Mazzini, had the same result; the conspiracy being detected; and all the leaders were arrested on the 15th of August.—Across the Atlantic, at New York, an exhibition, which it was confidently anticipated would far excel that of London of 1851, was opened on the 14th of July. There was little ceremony on the occasion; "the proceedings of the hour being," according to a New York paper, "in harmony with the simplicity of republican manners."—It was kept open several months, though the receipts did not pay expenses; and it closed abruptly at last. The articles sent by English exhibitors were so carelessly packed when sent back, as to be rendered nearly worthless; and the owners had, contrary to the agreement made with them, to pay the carriage, the directors having no funds.—The connection of England with South America was, in 1853, improved and strengthened by the conclusion of treaties of commerce with Peru, Ecuador, and Paraguay. The king of the Sandwich Islands also consented to sanction a similar treaty with this country.

In the year 1853, the failure of the harvest increased the price of food, and caused much distress amongst the poor; but it was borne nobly and cheerfully; and notwithstanding this drawback, the revenue and commerce of the United Kingdom were again greatly augmented. For the year ending the 5th of January, 1854, the public income amounted to £54,430,344 9s. 6d.; the expenditure to £51,174,839 14s. 11d.; leaving a surplus of £3,255,504 14s. 7d.—For the same twelve months, the exports reached the then unprecedented sum of £87,357,306; being £5,982,240 in excess of 1852. The home trade and industry of the kingdom also improved; and would have been still more prosperous but for the bad harvest, and if the strikes in several trades had not put a stop to labour in no inconsiderable degree.

CHAPTER CIX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1854, 1855.

IN the years 1854 and 1855, the war in the Crimea occupied a great share of the public attention; and it must form the prominent feature in any history of the period. A brief sketch of the home and colonial history of those two years, in this chapter, shall therefore precede a connected narrative of the war.

As the question of reform had not been taken up in the session of 1853, but was deferred till the following one, the reformers had pursued their system of agitation, by meetings and through the press, during the recess; and soon after 1854 opened, two important assemblages took place—at Sheffield, for the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the 19th, and at Manchester, for the county of Lancashire, on the 24th, of January. Most of the leading men of the party were present; and eloquent speeches advocating reform, and urging the people to persevere in pressing that subject on the attention of the government, were made by Lord Goderich, Messrs. Bright, Cheetham, Cobden and others. The Conservatives, also, had their associations in many of the large towns; but they took little or no share in the public agitation of the question, thinking their interests were best attended to in the Registration Courts.

Parliament was opened on the 31st of January. The Queen was present, and, in her speech, expressed regret that her efforts to settle the differences between Russia and Turkey, made in conjunction with the Emperor of the French, had failed.—Her majesty alluded to the unsuccessful harvest, and the prosperous state of commerce and the revenue; praising the poor for the patience they evinced under the former.—The principal measures which government intended to bring forward were enumerated; amongst them being bills "for checking bribery and corrupt practices at elections, and giving more complete effect to the principles of reform adopted in the last reign."—The debate on the address in both Houses was very animated. Independent of the policy of the government—which was, as usual, criticised by its foes, and defended by its friends—a personal question connected with the Prince Consort was raised; and gave additional interest to the discussion in both Houses. His royal highness had been distinctly charged, in some of the Radical publications of the day, with an improper interference in the foreign policy of the country; and also in the patronage of the army, and the transaction of business at the Horse-Guards. Explanations were demanded and given; and it was the general opinion that the character and conduct of the prince were triumphantly vindicated.

Although the two Houses sat till the middle of August, and passed upwards of 100 public bills, there were only a few of those measures which, having a general and permanent effect, require notice. One of these bills was introduced by Mr. Cardwell on the 3rd of February, and was passed on the 23rd of March. It threw open the coasting trade of the United Kingdom to foreign vessels, which were to be subject to the same laws and rules as British ships.—Another act provided, that any person under sixteen years of age, convicted of an offence against the laws, may, after the expiration of his sentence, be sent, for not less than two, nor more than five years, to one of the reformatory schools for juvenile offenders, which are established, by voluntary contributions, in various parts of Great Britain; the expense to be defrayed by the Treasury. The effect of this act has been to rescue many a boy and girl from the paths of vice, and to render them capable of becoming good and valuable members of society.—"An Act to Consolidate and Amend the Laws relating to Bribery, Treating, and undue Influence in Elections of Members of Parliament," was introduced by Lord John Russell on the 10th of February; and the third reading was carried, on the 28th of July, by the narrow majority of 107 to 100. In the Lords it was considered as a case of urgency; and the standing orders were suspended, to allow it to be passed without delay. It subjects every voter convicted of taking bribes, or of accepting meat and drink, to the loss of his vote; treating by a candidate is forbidden under a fine of £50; the use of force or coercion to voters is visited with the same penalty; and persons guilty of these offences are to be struck out of the list of voters; no cockades, or other marks of distinction are to be given, nor bands engaged; and voters are not to serve as special constables during an election. All bills for election expenses are to be sent to the candidate within three months after the election, and to be referred to the election auditor; and no payments are legal that do not receive his sanction. Candidates guilty of bribery are to be incapable of sitting in the parliament to which they may be elected. This act has done very little to prevent bribery, which is always found to prevail to a certain extent; and when party spirit runs high, immense sums are spent in the corruption of voters.

On the 13th of February, Lord John Russell moved for leave to introduce the bill alluded to in her majesty's speech, as tending "to give more complete effect to the reform principles of the last reign." As it is interesting, and of some importance, to know what the different ministers have proposed on this subject, we subjoin the heads of his lordship's measure:—

1. The disfranchisement of small boroughs containing less than 300 electors, or 5,000 inhabitants.—2. The subtraction of one member each from places with less than 500 electors or 10,000 inhabitants; by which sixty-two seats would be gained.—3. The West Riding of Yorkshire and South Lancashire to be severally divided into two electoral districts, each returning three members; all counties and towns having more than 100,000 inhabitants to return three members instead of two; to create Birkenhead, Barnsley, and Staleybridge into electoral boroughs, returning one member each; to constitute Kensington and Chelsea into an electoral district, returning two members; to give an additional member to Southwark; to confer the electoral privilege on the inns of court, which were to return two members; the London and Scotch universities to return one member each.—4. To make provision for the representation of minorities, in districts returning three members, by giving each elector two votes only, so that any section, comprising not fewer than two-fifths of the gross electorate, would secure the return of their candidate.—5. To confer the franchise, in boroughs, upon all residents who received a salary of £100 a year, paid quarterly; or £10 per annum in dividends; or who paid 40*s*. yearly to the income-tax or the assessed taxes; or who possessed £50 in a savings' bank for three years uninterruptedly; also on graduates of universities.—6. To reduce the borough franchise to a £6 rating.—7. To abolish the right of voting by freemen (as such), after the expiration of existing interests.—8. To repeal the statute of Anne, by which a member vacates his seat on accepting a government office.

These propositions were embodied in a bill, which the noble lord obtained leave to bring in. It was read a first time on the 16th of February; and the second reading was fixed for the 13th of March. All parties, however, were found to be either so indifferent or so opposed to the bill, that the second reading was postponed to the 27th of April. Before that day had arrived, however, on the 11th of the month, Lord John Russell, finding that, from various causes, the measure would meet with such a sturdy opposition that there would be no chance of success, announced his intention to withdraw it. In making this announcement, his lordship was evidently labouring under great emotion; and he shed tears over the fate of his measure.

Before the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced his budget Sir J. Graham, on the 24th of February, laid the navy estimates upon the table, which amounted to £7,487,948, being an increase of £1,202,455 over the previous year. The number of seamen was raised from 31,000 to 41,000; and that of marines from 10,500 to 15,500. The army was increased from 102,283 men to 112,977; and the estimates from £6,025,016 to £6,287,486. Mr. Gladstone made his financial statement on the 13th of March. The revenue for the current financial year, estimated at £52,999,000, had actually produced £54,025,000; the expenditure had been only £51,174,000, instead of £52,183,000, as estimated; making the financial position of the country better by more than £2,000,000 than he had ventured to anticipate.—For the year 1854-'55, the estimated ways and means amounted to £53,349,000; the expenditure would be increased in a larger proportion, being estimated at £56,189,000; thus there would be a deficiency of £2,840,000, instead of a surplus of £1,660,000, which the right honourable gentleman calculated upon, had the peace of Europe remained undisturbed. He proposed to supply the deficiency, not by increasing the indirect taxes, but by doubling the income-tax for the first half of the financial year. He calculated this would add £3,307,000 to the revenue, and leave a surplus of £467,000.—There was no difficulty in carrying the Income-Tax Bill, which was read a third time in the House of Commons on the 30th of March, and passed the House of Lords on the 2nd of May. But a week after, owing to the almost certainty of the country being involved in war, which had caused additional votes for the army, navy, militia, and ordnance, amounting, in all, to about £6,000,000, the Chanceller of the Exchequer had to make a supplementary financial statement.—After enumerating the additional votes, he said he also had to ask for £850,000 for incidental expenses; making a gross sum of £6,850,000 to provide for. This he proposed to do by—

1. Providing that the income-tax should be doubled to the end of the war.—2. By laying a further duty on Scotch and Irish spirits, or 1*s.* per gallon on the former, and 8*d.* on the latter.—3. By readjusting the sugar duties, making the duty equal on all sugars, irrespective of their origin, and fixing the tariff at 11*s.*, 12*s.*, 14*s.*, and 16*s.* per cwt., according to the quality of the articles.—4. By increasing the malt-tax from 2*s.* 9*d.* to 4*s.* a bushel.

These different items of increased taxation, the right honourable gentleman estimated, would produce the amount required; but as he could only expect to realise about £2,840,000 in the current financial year, he proposed to create £4,000,000 of exchequer bonds, and £2,000,000 of exchequer bills; and thus he calculated the government would be enabled to pay all charges, and leave £3,500,000 in the exchequer.—Mr. Gladstone carried all his propositions—the only opposition being made to the increase of the malt duty. Two motions were made, on the 9th and 15th of May, with a view of preventing this increase; but on the first the numbers were 224 to 143, and on the second, 303 to 195, in favour of the original motion. A proviso was, however, introduced, that the increase of the duty should cease with the war, which was declared against Russia on the 27th of March.—After the bills authorising these financial measures had been carried, Lord John Russell, on the 24th of July, obtained a vote of credit for £3,000,000.

The prime minister made another effort, in this session, to alter the oaths taken by members of parliament. On the 6th of February, the House, on the motion of the noble lord, went into committee in order to consider that subject. After an historical review of the oath question, Lord John, contending that the operation of the words, "On the true faith of a Christian," in excluding Jews from parliament, was most unjust, said he should frame an oath which all members might take, whether Protestant, Roman Catholic, or Jew.—At that sitting a resolution was passed, on which to found a bill; and was introduced and read a first time; but, on the second reading being proposed, on the 25th of May, an amendment, that it should be read a second time that day six months, was carried by 251 votes to 247.—The religious question as between Roman Catholics and Protestants was raised several times during the session. First, by Mr. T. Chambers moving for a select committee, to inquire into the increase of conventual and monastic establishments. Though the government opposed this motion—Lord John Russell saying the proposed committee would be both useless and offensive—it was carried by 186 to 119 votes. When the House proceeded to name the committee, however, there was so much opposition to several of the members proposed, and so much disturbance created, that on the 18th of May, Mr. T. Chambers moved that the order for appointing the committee should be discharged; which was carried; 100 "ayes" being given, and only a solitary "no!"—Next, in committee of supply, on the 12th of June, when the vote for the expenses of prisons and convict establishments was taken, Mr. Spooner moved that the miserable sum of £550, proposed to be appropriated for Roman Catholic chaplains, should be omitted; and he carried his motion by 158 votes to 136.—His attempts, however, to remove the grant to Maynooth from the consolidated fund, failed. He made a motion to that effect on the 3rd of July, which was rejected—ayes, 90; noes, 160.—The enemies of the established church in England and Ireland were also active during the session. On the 23rd of May, Sir William Clay, by 129 to 62 votes, obtained leave to bring in a bill for the total abolition of church-rates. On the motion for the second reading, on the 21st of June, Mr. Goulburn opposed the measure as a commencement of a severance of church and state, and he carried an amendment, that the bill should be read a second time that day six months, by a majority of 27—ayes, 209; noes, 182.—With respect to the Irish church, Mr. Shiel, on the 13th of June, moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to the temporalities of that establishment. The debate was twice adjourned; and, on the 18th of July, leave to bring in the bill was refused by 117 votes against 31.—On the 13th of June, Mr. H. Berkeley made his usual motion for leave to bring in a bill directing the votes at elections to be taken by ballot: the House refused to grant leave by 194 to 157 votes.

Many other subjects came before both Houses; but those enumerated are all that it is necessary to mention. They either embody the views of the government, or develop the principles of the different parties in the state; and with them it is necessary the reader of history should be familiar. Most of the other topics debated, though exciting, many of them, great attention at the time, had no permanent interest attached to them. All were not disposed of till near the middle of August, the prorogation not taking place, till the 12th of that month.

While the legislature was sitting, some alteration took place in the personnel of the ministry. The two offices of Secretary of State for the Colonies and Minister of War were held by the same person. The duties of each had, for some time, been greatly upon the increase, till it became quite impossible that a single individual could perform them. In May the offices were divided; Sir George Grey took the colonial department; and the Duke of Newcastle, being allowed his choice, retained that of Minister of War. There was a Secretary at War, but that minister had really little or nothing to do with war measures; his duties were chiefly confined to the financial administration of the army. The office was subsequently abolished, and the war minister is now termed Secretary of State for War. About the same time Mr. Strutt retired from the chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster; and Lord Granville took that office, vacating the presidentship of the council, which Lord John Russell accepted. The Marquis of Lansdowne still retained a seat in the cabinet without office. The Irish lordship of the Treasury had been previously vacated. Mr. Sadlier was charged with most improper proceedings respecting a bank with which he was connected in Ireland: he resigned his office; and soon after was found dead on Hampstead Heath. He was succeeded by Mr. C. S. Fortescue. There was also a change in the Board of Admiralty; Captain Peter Richards becoming one of the naval lords, in the place of Vice-Admiral H. Parker.

The strikes which had such an evil effect upon industry in 1853, were continued in 1854. In Lancashire, the factory operatives congregated in great numbers at Preston and Blackburn—30,000, at least, assembling in a field near the former town on the 5th of March, to receive delegates from distant places, who brought money to support the strike. The weekly expenditure of the strike committee in Lancashire at that period exceeded £3,200. The number of the unemployed was increased on the 17th of April, when above 10,000 operatives declined to work at Stockport, their masters having reduced their wages 10 per cent. Masters and men were at length tired of this state of things, which was ruinous to both; and mutual concessions brought about an agreement, after both had sustained great losses; the effect on the employed being infinitely more deleterious than it was upon the employers. The privations which many of the families of the former suffered may be imagined better than they can be described.

A much pleasanter subject to revert to than the strikes is the opening of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. This beautiful "palace," erected on as pleasant a spot as can be found in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, owes its origin to the exhibition of 1851. Great regret was felt and expressed at the demolition of the building in which that exhibition was held. An attempt was made to retain it for the public, but the government declined to interfere. On the 29th of April, 1852, Mr. Heywood, one of the representatives of South Lancashire, moved, in the House of Commons, that the building should be purchased with the public money; but only 103 members supported that motion to 221 against it. A company, however, was formed, for the purpose of purchasing the materials, and transferring them to another locality; there to raise a second Crystal Palace, in the midst of extensive grounds in which a park and garden could be formed; with a view that this "palace for the multitude" should be the means of raising the character of "the enjoyments and amusements of the English people; and especially to afford to the inhabitants of London, in wholesome country air, amidst the beauties of nature, the elevating treasures of art, and the instructive marvels of science, an accessible and inexpensive substitute for the, sometimes, injurious and debasing amusements of a crowded metropolis." — The first column of the new building was raised on the 5th of August, 1852; on the 28th of January, 1853, a royal charter was granted to the "Crystal Palace Company;" and on the 10th of June, 1854, the palace was opened by the Queen, who was accompanied by the Prince Consort, the King of Portugal, and the Duke of Oporto, who were, at the time, visitors at Buckingham Palace; the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred; the Princesses Royal and Alice; the Duchesses of Kent and Cambridge; several Indian princes, who were then in England; the Duke of Cambridge; the members of the royal household; the corp diplomatique; the members of both Houses of Parliament; and officers of the army and navy. Numerous distinguished foreigners, representing, as commissioners, foreign governments, were also present. The ceremony was a most imposing one; and from that day "the Crystal Palace at Sydenham" has been one of the most popular places of resort in the kingdom, and it is unequalled in the world.

The revenue for the year ending January 5th, 1855, considerably exceeded that of the previous year; the net sum being £56,737,132 18*s.* 3*d.*: but the expenditure exceeded that amount by £3,209,059 4*s.* 5*d.*; the sum required for all the services being £59,946,192 2*s.* 8*d.* This was owing to the increased expenses for the army, navy, and ordnance, which the war rendered necessary.—The commerce of the country continued still further to develop itself; the total declared value of British and Irish produce exported in 1854, being £97,092,308. The imports were also proportionately augmented.—Notwithstanding the increased prosperity of the people, a universal feeling of gloom and depression prevailed throughout the land at the close of the year, owing to the accounts from the Crimea: but that feeling passed away as the aspect of affairs improved; and it is to be hoped that similar causes will never more exist, to carry sorrow and anguish of heart to so many families.—In the course of the summer, the cholera, which had visited England partially in 1853, broke out with great violence.—The number of deaths from the disease was returned as 26,722; those in the metropolis amounting to 11,777. As winter approached, the violence of the disease subsided; and, before the year closed, it disappeared altogether.—On the 6th of October, a terrible event occurred near Newcastle-on-Tyne, which caused deep and long-felt distress. A fire broke out in a hosiery manufactory at Gateshead, attended by a terrible explosion of gaseous materials, by which nearly fifty people were killed, and many more severely injured. The fire extended over a vast area, and destroyed property to a large amount.

Little of moment occurred in our colonial history in 1854. Perhaps the most important event was the conclusion of a treaty at Washington, by Lord Elgin, governor-general of Canada, with the United States, by which the British American coast fisheries were thrown open to the fishermen of those States; the free navigation of the St. Lawrence and the Canadian lakes was guaranteed to their merchants; and the products of those States and of British America (with the exception of sugar and tobacco) were reciprocally admitted duty free. This "Treaty of Reciprocity," as it was termed, was signed at Washington on the 7th of June. It was productive of the best effects; for it not only put an end to frequent disputes between the colonists and the authorities of the United States, caused by the encroachments of the fishermen of the latter upon the Canadian waters, but it gave a great impetus to the trade of each country, to the profit of both.

When the year 1855 opened, the coalition ministry was at the height of unpopularity, owing to the unfortunate events in the Crimea, which will be narrated in a subsequent chapter. But the war was not unpopular, as Mr. Cobden ascertained. He attended a meeting of his constituents of the West Riding of Yorkshire, at Leeds, on the 14th of January, and addressed them with his usual ability, but not with his usual success. He denounced the war, defended the conduct of the Russian emperor, and strongly advocated a return to peace. He was listened to impatiently; and, at the close of his address, a resolution, in favour of the continuation of hostilities, and calling upon the government to prosecute the war with vigour, was carried.

Parliament, which met on the 12th of December, 1854, and adjourned on the 22nd for the Christmas holidays, reassembled on the 23rd of January; and most of the debates and proceedings were intimately connected with the events that took place in the Crimea. Of course that war had a great effect on the finances; and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his financial statement, he had to announce a large deficiency in the revenue, which had to be supplied, partly by new taxes, partly by a loan, and partly by an issue of exchequer bills and bonds. The right honourable gentleman "opened his budget" on the 20th of April. The revenue for the financial year 1854–'55, ending on the 5th of that month, had produced £59,494,144; which sum, by the issue of exchequer bills and bonds, had been increased to £66,621,000; the expenditure was about £1,000,000 less.—For the financial year 1855–'56, the army, navy, ordnance, and civil service estimates amounted to £50,675,000; the interest of the debt to £27,947,000; making a total of £78,622,000. But a loan which had been promised to Sardinia, and other extraordinary items, raised the grand total to £86,339,000. The year's revenue was estimated to produce £63,339,000; leaving £23,000,000 to be provided by other means. To raise this sum, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed—

1. To increase the duty on tea from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 1*s.* 9*d.* per pound; when peace was concluded, to reduce it to 1*s.* 3*d.*; and, at the end of twelve months, to 1*s.*—2. To raise the income-tax 2*d.* in the pound.—3. To increase the sugar duty 3*s.* per cwt.; that on coffee, 1*d.* per pound; and the spirit duties, by 1*s.* 10*d.* per gallon on Scotch, and 2*s.* on Irish spirits.—4. To raise £16,000,000 by way of loan.—5. To issue exchequer bills to the amount of £3,000,000.

These various items, the right honourable gentleman estimated, would produce a larger sum than the deficiency amounted to; and he carried all his propositions, except that respecting the income-tax, which was slightly modified; the duty being increased by 2*d.* in the pound on all incomes above £150 per annum; and on those between £100 and £150, only by 1½*d.*—The taxes mitigated were—the mileage duty on stage carriages, which was reduced from 1½*d.* to 1*d.* per mile; and the charge for each supplementary licence, from 5*s.* to 1*s.*; the stamp duty on newspapers was also entirely abolished, except on those passing through the post, on which a stamp with a 1*d.* duty was still retained, or a 1*d.* postage-stamp had to be affixed to an unstamped sheet. A newspaper with the tax-office stamp could be sent backwards and forwards, any distance, by virtue of that stamp, for fifteen days after the date of publication; but if a postage-stamp was applied, that would only pass it once through the post-office.—The army and navy caused the great increase of expenditure. A foreign legion and a corps of Bashi-Bazouks had been added to the former; and the total number of additional men voted was 793,595.

Out of the House, a movement had been made by some independent Liberals in favour of what they called "administrative reform;" and an "Administrative Reform Association" had been instituted in the metropolis, at the head of which were some of the most influential men in London and the metropolitan districts. They professed to care nothing for party; to set at nought the distinctions of Conservative, Whig, and Liberal; and contended, that the most clever working-men, no matter what party they might belong to, should have the "administrative" or the "executive" office placed in their hands. In their programmes and manifestoes this association promised to effect great things for the people, by introducing good management and the utmost economy into every department: the public were for a time inclined, from the high respectability of many of the men engaged in the movement, to place reliance upon their pretensions and promises; and, to forward their views, Mr. Layard, on the 15th of June, moved the following resolution in the House of Commons:—

"That this House views, with deep and increasing concern, the state of the nation; and is of opinion, that the manner in which merit and efficiency have been sacrificed in public appointments, to party and family influences, and to a blind adherence to routine, has given rise to great misfortunes, and threatens to bring discredit upon the national character, and to involve the country in grave disasters."

This resolution found few supporters; most of the speakers contending that the failures and disasters of the last few months were attributable entirely to an incapable and divided government, and not to the system. The resolution was negatived, on the 18th of June, by 359 votes to 46; the amendments moved by Sir E. B. Lytton and Mr. Disraeli were dropped; and soon after, the "administrative reform" movement, though supported by many able and influential men, collapsed.

A few of the acts passed during the session may be briefly noticed. The act "to provide for the Education of Children receiving out-door relief," is important, as it allows the guardians of the poor to grant relief to poor persons, to procure education for any of their children from four to sixteen years of age, at any school approved of by the said guardians.—An "Act to Consolidate and Amend the Laws relating to Friendly Societies," was intended, according to her majesty's speech at the close of the session, to "encourage habits of industry and thrift among the labouring classes of the community." It provides for the security, judicious regulation, and good management of such societies; which may be instituted for securing annuities; granting relief to the aged or sick or infirm, in money or kind; and for the payment of a sum of money on the death of a member: no annuity to be contracted for a sum exceeding £30 per annum; nor any sum secured to be payable after death, to exceed £200. By one of the acts of the session, the acts of William and Mary and George III., which prohibited assemblies of Protestants for religious worship in private houses, if they consisted of more than twenty persons beyond the members of the family and servants, were repealed; and also the Act 15 and 16 Victoria, cap. 36, as far as it applies to religious assemblies. Religious meetings may now, therefore, take place in a private dwelling-house, without any limitation as to number; and congregations or assemblies may be held for religious worship, and conducted by the clergyman of the parish, or by dissenting ministers. Roman Catholics and Jews are placed, for the purposes of this act, upon the same footing as Protestant dissenters.—"An Act for Limiting the Liability of Members of certain Joint-Stock Companies," provides that shareholders in such companies shall not be liable to creditors beyond the amount of their shares: if a company becomes insolvent, and the amount of the shares is not paid up, process may issue to enforce payment of the deficiency.—The "Act for the better Local Management of the Metropolis" is very important, as far as that large and populous district is concerned. It provides for the establishment of the Metropolitan Board of Works, composed of members elected by the rate-payers, and who are, themselves, rated to the relief of the poor at not less than £40 per annum; unless the assessment to that amount should, in the district they represent, be less than one-sixth of the whole number, then the qualification is to be a rating of £25. To this board is entrusted the local government of the entire metropolis, except the city of London, as far as the sewerage, lighting, cleansing, paving, draining, and improvement of the streets are concerned. Under its auspices, the drainage of the metropolis and the embankment of the Thames have been effected, besides other less important improvements; and, although it has expended large sums of money, it has unquestionably effected much good.

Several bills, respecting which agitation was excited outside of the House, were lost: amongst them a bill to open the British Museum on Sundays; and one to abolish church-rates. The attempts to abolish the vote for Maynooth, and to introduce the ballot, were also defeated; as was a tenant-right bill for Ireland.—In June, Lord Robert Grosvenor introduced a bill to prevent the shops in the metropolis from being opened on Sunday, and to put down the open-air markets which are held in several parts of the metropolitan districts on the morning of that sacred day. Violent demonstrations were made against this measure. On Sunday, the 24th of June, many thousand persons assembled in Hyde Park, resorting more especially to the "Drive," where they offered every possible insult to the ladies and gentlemen who were riding or driving there; the windows of the houses belonging to some of the supporters of the bill were also broken.—On the following Sunday, the 1st of July, it was calculated that 100,000 persons collected in the park, for the purpose of manifesting their disapproval of Lord Robert Grosvenor's measure. They had the vast arena almost entirely to themselves, very few carriages appearing in the "Drive." Upon the inmates of those few the popular displeasure was vented. There were several encounters between the police and the crowd, and many persons received injuries, but none were serious. Above 10,000 persons collected in Greenwich Park the same day, also to protest against the measure.—After the first meeting, Lord Robert Grosvenor, in reply to a question put to him in the House on the 28th of June, said he should press the bill; but, on the 2nd of July, he consented to withdraw it. This concession did not terminate the assemblages and riots. On Sunday, the 8th of July, most disgraceful outrages took place, the mob again assembling by thousands, and making indiscriminate attacks upon the houses in Belgrave Square, Eaton Square, and the adjoining streets. Great damage was done; and the rioting was with difficulty suppressed.—These tumultuous assemblages first caused the question to be discussed—have the people a right to hold large meetings in the royal parks? A commission was appointed to inquire into and consider the question; and that commission reported—

"That it was fit that measures should be taken to enable all persons to ride and drive in the parks uninterrupted; and that warning should be issued, that such proceedings as had recently taken place were illegal, as being novel, and not sanctioned by usage; Hyde Park not being a proper arena for large assemblages of persons for political discussions."

There was, during the year, an interchange of amenities between the Queen of Great Britain and the Emperor and Empress of the French; the latter making the first advance by coming over to England. Their imperial majesties arrived at Windsor Castle on the 17th of April; and, on the same day, the prefect of the Seine, accompanied by members of the university of Paris, arrived in London, on a visit to the Lord Mayor.—On the 19th, the emperor and empress came to London, on the invitation of the Lord Mayor and the corporation, by whom and by the citizens their reception was most enthusiastic. They received addresses from, and were fêted by, the civic body; being entertained with the usual magnificent hospitality of the city.—On the 20th, the Queen, the Prince Consort, and their illustrious guests, visited the Crystal Palace at Sydenham; and it was the general remark, by those who saw them there, that four happier-looking faces never were seen. The Queen leaned on the arm of the emperor, and the empress took that of the Prince Consort, as they promenaded over the grounds and through the building; and when they presented themselves in the balcony, above the entrance to the centre transept of the palace, the cheering was tremendous. During this short personal acquaintance with a portion of the English people, the Empress Eugénie, from her beauty, and her cordial, yet elegant manners, became quite a popular favourite; and her name was a standing toast long afterwards. Their majesties left England on the 21st of April, being accompanied to Dover by the Prince Consort; and they expressed themselves, before leaving, as highly gratified with their visit. Before he left, her majesty conferred the Order of the Garter upon the emperor.

On the 3rd of July, the King of the Belgians, the Princess Charlotte, and the Count of Flanders, arrived at Buckingham Palace; and they were followed by the King of Portugal and the Duke of Oporto. Soon after the departure of the latter royal personages, the Queen, accompanied by the Prince Consort, returned the visits of the Emperor and Empress of the French. It was the 18th of August when they arrived at Paris, where they spent several days; a magnificent fête and ball being given in their honour by the municipality on the 23rd.—On the 24th, there was a grand review of 50,000 men in the Champ de Mars, by the emperor, at which the Queen and Prince Albert were present. The men assembled on this occasion were smart soldiers; they marched well, and went through their evolutions without a fault; but they wanted the dash and the noble appearance of the English soldier, which makes him the first in the world.—In the evening of the 25th, there was a grand ball at the palace of Versailles, with a display of the magnificent fountains, illuminations, and fireworks.—On the 26th, the Queen and her husband accompanied the emperor to the resting-place of Napoleon I., and paid a visit to his tomb—a striking sign of the cessation of that hostile feeling which the name of the exile of St. Helena once gave rise to in every English breast.—On the 27th, the royal party embarked at Boulogne for England, having been accompanied to that port by their imperial host. Before she left Paris, her majesty conferred the Grand Cross of the Bath on Prince Napoleon and General Canrobert.—On the 6th of September, the court went to Balmoral, where their arrival is always hailed with the greatest joy by the peasantry in the vicinity.—The Queen and royal family returned to London on the 17th of October; and, on the 30th of November, Victor Emmanuel, the King of Sardinia, arrived on a visit to our court. He was not then known as Il Re Galantuomo, the epithet applied to him in subsequent years; and he attracted much less notice than our imperial visitors had done. The intent of the journey to England of this prince was, to strengthen the alliance which had been recently concluded between England, Sardinia, and France—an alliance calculated upon, to enable Victor Emmanuel to carry out those plans he was then forming with his minister Cavour against Austria; plans which finally ended in the expulsion of Austria from Italy, and the recognition of the King of Sardinia as the sovereign of the Peninsula, "from the Alps to the Adriatic." Before his departure—which took place on the 6th of December, the Prince Consort accompanying him to Folkstone, where he embarked—Victor Emmanuel, like the Emperor Napoleon, was invested with the insignia of the Garter; and he partook of a splendid civic banquet given by the Lord Mayor of London—David Salomons, a Jew, then filling that office; the first time that a member of the Hebrew race, and a professor of the Hebrew religion, had sat in the civic chair, and presided at the Mansion-house.

An event of 1855, which deserves mention, was the closing of Smithfield cattle-market, which had, for so many years, been frequented by cattle-dealers from all parts of England. It was the work of some philanthropists, at the head of whom was the Earl of Shaftesbury, who contended, that the area of Smithfield was too contracted to receive the number of cattle which the increase of the population now required to be brought there; that this caused the animals to be treated with great inhumanity; whilst their being driven through the streets was, in many ways, offensive to the inhabitants. The corporation of London, to whom Smithfield belonged, had a plan prepared for enlarging the market: nothing, however, would satisfy the opponents but its removal. They had influence enough to obtain an act of parliament for that purpose; and the requisite buildings for a new market were erected on a large space of ground in the parish of Islington, called Copenhagen Fields.—Smithfield was closed on the 11th of June, and on the 13th the new market was opened. A grand déjeuner was given on the occasion, in a magnificent marquee, erected on an area left between two buildings, palatial in size, intended for taverns; but for which the corporation was not able to find tenants. The Prince Consort presided at the déjeuner, at which the Lord Mayor and corporation, and most of the eminent men of the city and their families, were present. Amongst the toasts, "Prosperity to the new market" was heartily pledged. It has, however, been a losing concern to the corporation; and, whilst the accommodation for the cattle is much superior to that which Smithfield afforded, the scenes in the streets from the over-driving and ill-treatment of the cattle still occur, the locality being somewhat changed. The removal ruined most of the tradesmen then living in the neighbourhood of Smithfield; who, of course, regarded those who had been its promoters with an evil eye.

Two statesmen whose names had been constantly before the public for many years—Mr. Joseph Hume and Sir Robert Inglis—died in 1855; the former on the 20th of February, the latter on the 24th of April. The first, who represented the Montrose district of boroughs at his death, was a distinguished economist. His constant aim was to reduce the public expenditure; and some say that great benefits were derived from his exertions, whilst others describe him as "penny-wise and pound foolish;" and attribute to his perseverance many of those reductions in the military department which were the basis of the privations and misery the British soldiers were subjected to in the Crimea.—Sir Robert Inglis was of a very different school. He was no advocate of extravagance, but the reverse. Unlike Joseph Hume, he was a staunch Conservative, and, as a representative of Oxford University, always opposed those innovations which he deemed injurious to church or state—On the 21st of July, a statue, erected by the city of London at the west-end of Cheapside, to commemorate the services of another statesman—Sir Robert Peel—was uncovered. It is the work of Mr. Behnes, an eminent sculptor of the day; is eleven feet high; and stands on a noble pedestal of Peterhead granite, twelve feet in height.

There was a striking disproportion between the revenue and expenditure for the year ending December 31st, 1855. The former produced a larger sum than was anticipated—£63,364,605 2*s.* 8*d.*; but the latter amounted to £84,505,788 10*s.* 9*d.*; leaving a deficiency of £21,141,183 8*s.* 1*d.*; which had to be provided for by a loan, and the issue of exchequer bills and bonds.—Our foreign trade fell off during the year—the natural effect of war; but not so much as might have been expected. The total declared value of British and Irish produce exported in the twelve months ending December 31st, was £95,669,380; which was £1,422,928 less than in 1854. The imports also showed a decrease of £8,741,668; the real value having reached the large sum of £152,591,513 in 1854, and fallen to £143,850,505 in 1855. Notwithstanding this decrease, our foreign and home trade appeared to be in a satisfactory state; and the workmen were industrious and quiet for the greater part of the year. The winter was very severe, the month of February being the coldest on record, and large bodies of labourers were in that month thrown out of employ. They paraded the streets of most of the large cities and towns, with a view to excite compassion; and in Liverpool, on the 19th, and in London on the 22nd, there were serious riots, which were suppressed without loss of life, but not without injury to person and property.—In the autumn, the price of bread and flour being advanced—the result of the war—there were, on the 14th of October, and several succeeding Sundays, tumultuous meetings in Hyde Park, the police being unable to prevent the gatherings. On the 28th, the mob became outrageously violent. Many windows were broken, and property damaged in other ways to a considerable extent. But the firm conduct of the police at length suppressed the riots, and the populace became more peaceable; though they could not reconcile themselves to "dear bread," which they supposed the repeal of the corn-laws was to render a thing unknown. This was a mistake; the average price of corn for a series of years being higher than it was for a corresponding series, when those laws were in existence.

One of the first responses to the free-trade measures of the British government was made early in the year by Prussia. On the 16th of January, a bill passed the legislature of that power, admitting to its coasting-trade, upon an equality with the native craft, the vessels of those nations which extended the same privileges to Prussian ships.—Towards the close of the year, a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, between Great Britain and Chili, was duly signed and exchanged at Santiago.

As the year progressed, accounts were received of great loss of life and destruction of property abroad, from natural causes.—On the 1st and 2nd of January, more than half the city of Hamburgh was inundated by the Elbe, the waters of which were driven back by a high north-west wind; and the tide rose to the extraordinary height of twenty feet and one inch. Very serious damage was the result of this calamity.—On the 28th of February, the city of Broussa, in Asia Minor, was nearly destroyed by an earthquake; and about 2,000 lives were lost. There were 125 mosques in the city, and nearly all were injured. The shock was also felt at Constantinople, where its violence caused great alarm, but did little damage.—In Holland, as in England, the winter was very severe; and the sudden breaking up of the ice, on the 25th of March, caused all the rivers and dykes to overflow, carrying away houses and trees, cattle and people, in great numbers. Many of the latter, whose lives were saved, had to take refuge in churches till their houses were restored. The telegraph was destroyed; the railway injured; and the distress occasioned prevailed for some time before it was thoroughly relieved.—On the 25th of July, about 1 P.M., a violent shock of earthquake was felt all along the east coast of France, from Valence to Metz. It extended to Italy, Switzerland, and Germany; the oscillation, in several places, having the effect of shaking windows, ringing bells, and stopping clocks: in the department of Doubs, houses were shaken, walls cracked, and chimneys tumbled to the ground. The next day the shocks were renewed in the Valais: they were more violent than on the 25th; masses of rock were rolled down from the hills; and the villages of St. Nicholas, Viègo, and Stalden destroyed.—On the 22nd of October, New Zealand was visited by an earthquake, which ruined several buildings at Taranatki.

Paris, in 1855, had its "exhibition of the manufactures of all nations," the result of the English exhibition of 1851, which the Parisians were resolved to surpass. A "Crystal Palace" was raised in the great square of the Champs Elysées, to receive the various articles from the exhibitors; and much the same arrangements were adopted as were seen at Hyde Park. The exhibition was formally opened on the 15th of May, by the emperor and empress, in the presence of about 8,000 spectators, the ceremony very much resembling that of 1851. After their imperial majesties had taken their seats on a handsome daïs erected for the occasion, an address, setting forth the origin, progress, and character of the undertaking, was read to them; to which the emperor briefly replied, saying, at the close of his speech—"In inviting all nations hither, I have desired to open here a Temple of Concord." The display was scarcely equal, as a whole, to that at Hyde Park; still it was very satisfactory, and very attractive. Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort visited it during their sojourn at the Tuileries; and the Lord Mayor of London crossed the Channel, on the invitation of the prefect of the Seine; and also inspected the really beautiful show in the Champs Elysées. The exhibition continued open till the 15th of November, when it was closed, with the most imposing ceremonies, by the emperor; who, on that occasion, was accompanied by the Duke of Cambridge, then on a visit to the Tuileries. As a commercial speculation, it was not so successful as that of England; but it was another proof of the great progress made by art and industry in the nineteenth century.

CHAPTER CX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA—"THE EASTERN QUESTION."—A.D. 1825—1853.

HE Crimean war—the only European contest in which England has been engaged since the signature of the treaty of Vienna in 1815—was the result of Russian ambition mixed up with a dispute respecting the right of the Greek and Latin Christians to the "holy places," as the Church of the Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and that of the Nativity at Bethlehem, are called. The Russian empire—that vast territory on the north of Europe, which extends into Asia, and comprises also a large tract of North America—has been increasing in power since Peter I., towards the close of the seventeenth century, laid the foundation of its greatness. There is no doubt, that a document said to be the "Will" of that monarch—first published in 1836, in the Memoirs of the Chevalier D'Eou, who professed to have discovered it when residing in Russia from 1752 to 1758, on a mission confided to him by Louis XV.—lays down a policy which has been that of Peter's successors; all of whom have endeavoured to extend the boundaries of the empire; and most of them succeeded in the attempt. "It is expedient," the great czar is represented as saying in the document referred to, "to draw as near as possible to Constantinople and the East Indies: whoever rules in these two countries is the sovereign of the world." And, when not engaged in war with some European power, Russia has constantly been advancing her frontiers to the east. Even the present emperor, Alexander II.—certainly the least aggressive of any monarch who ever filled the throne of St. Petersburg—has his armies actively employed in that direction. — There is good reason to believe that this alleged "Will" is a forgery: a Saxon nobleman, Count C. F. Vitzthurn, having discovered, in 1866, among the diplomatic papers of Herr von Pezold, a Saxon statesman of the early part of the seventeenth century, a document, said to be Peter's recommendations and instructions to his successor; which, in many points, especially with respect to Poland, prescribes a policy directly the reverse of that recommended in the alleged "Will." But whether true or false; whether the policy of the Russian autocrats has been based upon the "Will," or that paper has been drawn up to impress the world with a belief that the course they have taken is the one prescribed by their famous predecessor, or for what other purpose it has been forged, if forged it is—it is certain that it faithfully sets forth Russian policy, both of the past and the present; and that, when Nicholas I. was taking those steps which terminated in the Crimean war, he was following the advice given, and the rules laid down in the so-called "Will of Peter the Great."

The Emperor Nicholas, who succeeded his father, Alexander I., in December, 1825, found disputes existing with Turkey when he came to the throne. They were ended by the treaty of Ackermann, signed on the 9th of October, 1826. It was a humiliating treaty for the Porte. A subsequent war was ended by the treaty of Adrianople, concluded on the 14th of September, 1829. By this treaty the czar surrendered most of his conquests, and thus assumed the appearance of moderation. But, by the terms of the 7th article, Lord Aberdeen (then foreign minister of England), in a letter to Lord Heytesbury, the English ambassador to Russia, declared the independence of the Ottoman power was utterly subverted; and Count Nesselrode, the Russian chancellor, in a letter to the Grand Duke Constantine (brother to the emperor), written in February, 1830, said, "the provisions of the treaty of Adrianople have consolidated the power of Russia in the East;" and the Ottoman monarchy, "reduced to exist only under the protection of Russia," must "henceforward listen only to her desires." Though greatly reduced, Turkey was not sunk quite so low as this; but Nicholas appears never to have given up the idea of becoming the real master of Turkey, while the grand seignior remained its nominal sovereign.

In 1844, Nicholas visited England, arriving on the 1st of June. Sir Robert Peel was then premier; and the Earl of Aberdeen, who was a personal friend of the emperor, was the foreign secretary. There were long and confidential interviews between the imperial visitor and the noble earl, at which the affairs of Turkey were discussed. There is no record of what passed on these occasions; but if Nicholas urged his right acquired by treaty, to make Turkey listen only to his desires, he was apparently met by calm but firm remonstrance on the part of the English minister, which caused him, for a time at least, to veil his real designs under the mask of friendship and forbearance. This appears from a "memorandum," which was drawn up by Count Nesselrode, of the results of these interviews, in which we find the following passage:—

"Russia and England are mutually penetrated with the conviction, that it is for their common interest that the Ottoman Porte should maintain itself in the state of independence and of territorial possession which, at present, constitutes that empire; as that political combination is the one most compatible with the general interest and with the maintenance of peace."

Whilst, therefore, the two powers were to respect that independence, they mutually agreed, "that, if anything unforeseen occurred in Turkey," they "would previously concert together as to the course they should, in common, pursue;" and that, if they foresaw the empire "must crumble to pieces," they would "enter into previous concert as to everything relating to the establishment of a new order of things, intended to replace that then existing." That Russia had her own views, however, and meant to pursue them, even if necessary to do so by war, appears from a letter, written by Prince Lieven, about the time—certainly not long after —the "memorandum" just quoted was drawn up. In this letter, the prince says—

"Our policy must be to maintain a reserved and prudent attitude until the moment arrives for Russia to vindicate her rights, and for the rapid action which she will be obliged to adopt. The war ought to take Europe by surprise. Our movements must be prompt, so that the other powers should find it impossible to be prepared for the blow that we were about to strike."

Several years passed away, and then an opportunity was afforded for Russia to throw off her "prudent reserves," and to put forth her claims to exert a power and authority in the sultan's dominions, which would soon, had she been permitted to exercise it, have put Turkey in chains at her feet. The dispute which had so long prevailed about the right to the holy places at Jerusalem, gave this opportunity, of which the czar, unfortunately for Russia, was not slow to avail himself.—The site of the nativity, and that of the crucifixion, had been venerated by Christians from the earliest ages of the church. Pilgrimages were made to them; and churches were erected over the spots which, according to tradition, the manger and the sepulchre once occupied; that over the sepulchre being erected in the fourth century, by Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor. As the followers of the blessed Saviour became divided into sects, a priority and a paramount possession of these churches began to be contended for. We find the monks quarrelling about those places as far back as the time of the caliphs, when there were eight different orders established at the holy city of Jerusalem—viz., the Latins, or Roman Catholics; the Copts, or Egyptians; the Nestorians, or Syrians; the Greeks; the Abyssinians; the Armenians; the Georgians; and the Maronites of Mount Lebanon. After the Saracens had conquered Jerusalem (A.D. 636), the Caliph Omar is said to have placed, by a grant or charter, "the holy sepulchre and its dependencies under the control of the Greek patriarchs; and the other rites and religions were made subject to them in this respect." This is doubtful; as the Saracens appear to have been willing then, as the Turks are now, to permit all Christians to worship, upon terms of equality, on the site of the Saviour's interment (there are great doubts if it be the real one). But whether Omar made the grant to the Greeks or not, the quarrels amongst the members of the different churches continued; and from the era of Charlemagne, the Latins (they are sometimes also styled Franks) began to gain the ascendency—an ascendency which was increased and confirmed by the crusades, undertaken by the followers of the pope. The only church which could offer any determined opposition to the Latins was the Greek; and, as time progressed, France became the protector of the former, and Russia of the latter, as those powers are at the present day. As early as 1604, we find a treaty concluded between Henry IV. of France and the Porte; in which, for the first time, the Turks engaged to respect national rights; to protect the French and their allies when arriving as pilgrims to the Holy Sepulchre; and to allow the monks to repair the church when necessary. In 1673, this treaty was confirmed by another, concluded between the Sultan Mahomet IV. and Louis XIV. In 1690, the Latins had sufficient influence to get the church at Jerusalem assigned to them; and though other Christians were permitted to worship there, the Roman Catholic was the only service allowed to be performed.—Another treaty was concluded, in 1740, between Louis XV. and Mahomet V., which secured new privileges to the Latins, and confirmed all they previously possessed. Under that treaty the French sovereigns considered themselves authorised to vindicate the rights of that church when assailed, as they frequently were, by the Greeks, who, in 1757, obtained a decided ascendency in Palestine. Dissensions between the followers of the two churches caused a very serious disturbance of the public peace at Jerusalem in that year. The Turks had to interfere to put a stop to the quarrels between Christians; and the ministers of the Sultan Osman III., believing the Latins to be in the wrong, that sovereign issued a hatti-scheriff, ordering them to be expelled from the Church of the Tomb of the Virgin, and the Church and Grotto of the Nativity, at Bethlehem; and putting the holy places under the protection of the Greeks. That church, supported by Russia, in later days also obtained firmans from the Porte, which invested it with privileges inconsistent with the rights the Latins contended the treaties conferred upon them. In 1808, a fire destroyed a great part of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre: it was rebuilt by the Greek-Sclave population of Jerusalem, by permission of the Turkish authorities; and, from that time, the Greek priests more persistently asserted exclusive rights and prerogatives.

In 1819, France and Russia sent commissioners to Palestine, to inquire into and report upon the claims of the rival churches, both governments being, at that time, disposed to adjust them amicably. In the following year, M. Marcellus, the French commissioner, drew up a report, which entered at some length into the subject, and asserted the rights and prerogatives of the Latin church, as derived from the treaty of 1740. No attempt was, however, made to enforce them; and though the holy places continued, on the recurrence of the feasts and festivals, frequently to be made the scene of most unholy contentions, still there were no alarming symptoms connected with the quarrel till, in 1850, the president of the French republic—for what reason, and with what view, has never been satisfactorily ascertained; but probably trusting, by that step, to ingratiate himself with the priesthood and the pope—instructed General Aupick, the French ambassador at Constantinople, to demand of the Porte that the Latin church should be reinstated in all the rights and privileges conceded by the treaty of 1740. The Greeks, of course, were extremely unwilling to resign those privileges which hatti-scheriffs and firmans had conferred upon their church, and which they had enjoyed for many years: and the sultan and his ministers were equally unwilling to withdraw them. Russia was opposed to their withdrawal; while the Roman Catholic governments (Austria included), supported the demands of General Aupick. The British ambassador, Sir Stratford Canning, saw at once what must be the consequence if those demands were enforced. Writing to Lord Palmerston, the minister for foreign affairs, in May, 1850, his excellency, after mentioning the subject, remarked—

"General Aupick has assured me that the question in dispute is a mere question of property and of express treaty stipulations. But it is difficult to separate such questions from political considerations; and a struggle of general influence—especially if Russia, as may be expected, should interfere in behalf of the Greek church—will probably grow out of the impending discussion."

As long as General Aupick remained at Constantinople, he carried on the discussion temperately; M. de Titoff, the Russian ambassador, being instructed to defend the claims of the Greeks. The former, however, was, in 1851, succeeded by M. de Lavalette, who used somewhat stronger language in his correspondence with the sultan's minister for foreign affairs, which led to similar retorts from M. de Titoff. But though the latter threatened to leave Constantinople, with his legation, "if the status quo of the sanctuaries was in any way unsettled"—and M. de Lavalette said, if that status quo were persevered in, the Dardanelles would be bombarded with a French fleet—terms were agreed upon, and the dispute was supposed to be arranged, "by the concession to the Latins of the right of officiating at the shrine of the Virgin near Jerusalem," and allowing them "keys to the Church of the Nativity, at Bethlehem." This concession being granted, and, as was generally supposed, an amicable arrangement arrived at, M. de Lavalette, the French ambassador, left Constantinople for a short time. On his return, he found that, during his absence, M. de Titoff had been again enforcing the claims of the Greeks; putting forward, in support of them, the grant of the Caliph Omar to the Greek patriarch of his day: and the Sultan Abdul-Medjid, who appears to have been unstable and infirm of purpose, had issued a firman, declining to confirm the concessions made to the Latins. This firman was sent to Jerusalem, but is supposed never to have been communicated to the parties interested there; "and there is," says an historian of the Crimean war, "altogether much doubt and mystification on this part of the subject."—M. de Lavalette was greatly displeased at the conduct of the sultan in issuing this firman. He renewed the demands for the Latin privileges; and they were again conceded, with some additions. Thus, with respect to the church at Bethlehem, the Latins were not only permitted to retain the key, but to replace in the Grotto of the Nativity a silver star, bearing the French arms, which the Greeks had removed in 1751. This star was replaced by the Latin patriarch on the 22nd of December, 1852, with all the pomp and ceremony the position of the church in Palestine permitted him to display. Thus, "to the indignation of the whole people following the Greek ritual, the church of Bethlehem was made over to the Latins." So wrote Count Nesselrode to the Baron Brunnow, then the Russian ambassador at London, on the 14th of January, 1853; adding, "the mischief is done: it is now necessary to remedy it." Whilst negotiations for this purpose were going on, the count intimated that precautionary measures would be adopted, in order to support them, and "to neutralise the effect of M. Lavalette's threats." Accordingly, Russian troops were immediately sent to the frontiers of the Danubian provinces; and other corps were ordered to be concentrated as a reserve; the whole force amounting to 144,000 men.

When these measures were in progress, Sir Hamilton Seymour, the English ambassador at St. Petersburg, in an interview with Count Nesselrode, stated the apprehensions to which these military movements must give rise. The count expressed pacific sentiments and intentions, and his hopes that the unpleasant affair would be settled by negotiations; but contended that it was necessary the diplomacy of Russia should be supported by a demonstration of force. This necessity was attributed to the conduct of France; who, said the Russian chancellor, "moves its squadrons about, without opposition, in all parts of the Mediterranean," and "presents its least demand at the cannon's mouth." The French government, however, had certainly afforded no grounds for those statements; and it now recalled M. Lavalette, whose intemperate zeal frequently irritated both Turks and Russians, and sent M. de la Cour to Constantinople. M. Turgot, the French foreign minister, who had urged the propriety of sustaining the French legation at the Turkish capital by sending a French squadron to the Dardanelles, was removed, and replaced by M. Drouyn de l'Huys, who, immediately on his appointment, wrote to General Castelbajac, the French ambassador at the court of Russia, instructing him "to use the most conciliatory language to the ministers of the czar;" and to assure them that France "had not thought of withdrawing from the Greek church the right of enjoying advantages which time had consecrated in their hands;" its sole object being "to raise the Catholic religion from a state of inferiority as unworthy of that religion as it was of France." The English ambassadors at Paris, St. Petersburg, and Constantinople, confined themselves to giving friendly advice, taking part with neither side: but Lord Cowley bears testimony to the pacific intentions of the French emperor, who, he says, in pressing the claims of the Latin church upon the Porte, subequent to the recall of M. de Lavalette, "resisted having recourse to anything like a threat, because he felt the peril of provoking a collision in that part of the world."

A quarrel between Turkey and the Montenegrins—the inhabitants of an obscure and rugged country, situated between 42° 10′ and 42° 56′ N. lat., and 20° 22′ E. long; against whom Omar Pasha was despatched, with a large force, to punish several outrages committed upon the neighbouring Turkish province, the Herzegowina—would, it was expected, raise a new phase in the "Eastern question." Montenegro was, nominally, a dependency of Turkey; the vladika, or prince, acknowledging the sultan as his suzerain, or feudal lord: but it was really independent, and both Austria and Russia were desirous that its independence should be preserved. When Omar Pasha's army advanced, therefore, and a Turkish fleet was sent to blockade the Albanian coast, Austria first collected a large body of troops on her Dalmatian frontier, and then despatched Count Leiningen to Constantinople, with a peremptory demand for the recall of Omar Pasha and his troops.—Nicholas, who always represented himself to be in perfect accord with Austria upon the policy to be pursued with respect to Turkey, resolved to support that demand, and to despatch an ambassador extraordinary to the Porte, "who was to declare, that a refusal to withdraw Omar Pasha's forces from Montenegro, would be regarded by the czar as a ground of war between him and the sultan." It is thought that the government of the sultan obtained some information as to the intentions of Nicholas; for Count Leiningen's demand was at once complied with, and the threatening message of the czar was not delivered. By the recall of Omar Pasha, peace in the Montenegrin quarter was restored.

Whilst this question was on the tapis, the czar, from the 9th of January to the 21st of February, 1853, held some important secret conversations with Sir Hamilton Seymour. They related to Turkey, and left no doubt as to the intentions of the Russian autocrat. The first interview took place at a party given at the palace of the Archduchess Helen. There his imperial majesty accosted the ambassador, and, after a few complimentary words, abruptly introduced the subject of Turkey, dwelling upon the necessity of himself and the English government being on the best terms, as "when they were agreed, he was quite without anxiety as to the rest of Europe." He hinted, that "Turkey was in a critical state, and might give them all a great deal of trouble;" and would then have closed the conversation, had not Sir Hamilton Seymour expressed his wish, that "his majesty would add a few words, which might tend to calm the anxiety with respect to the affairs of Turkey, which passing events were so calculated to excite in the minds of her majesty's government." The czar, after saying that Turkey "seemed to be falling to pieces;" that it was "very important that England and Russia should come to a perfectly good understanding;" and that "neither should take any decisive step of which the other was not apprised;" added—

"We have on our hands a sick man—a very sick man; it will be, I tell you frankly, a very great misfortune if, one of these days, he should slip away from us, especially before all necessary arrangements were made."

On the 22nd of January, Sir Hamilton had an audience of the czar, when his majesty recurred to the subject; first declaring, that "it would be unreasonable in him to desire more power or more territory than he possessed;" and that the "great, perhaps the only danger," of Russia was, "that which would arise from the extension of an empire already too large." His majesty spoke at some length; but the substance of his observations was, that Turkey was in such a state, that "the man might suddenly die upon their hands." They "could not resuscitate the dead;" therefore "it was better to be provided, beforehand, for a contingency, rather than incur the chaos, confusion, and the certainty of a European war." On Sir Hamilton's observing, that "England would not be inclined to dispose, by anticipation, of the dominions of an old friend and ally," the emperor admitted that "the rule was a good one:" but still dwelt upon the importance of England and Russia understanding each other, and "not allowing events to take them by surprise." Adding, that he "would not allow England to establish herself at Constantinople;" and "he was equally disposed to take an engagement not to establish himself there, as proprietor that was to say; for as occupier he did not say."—On the 20th of February, Sir Hamilton Seymour was at a party given by the hereditary grand duchess. The emperor was also present; and, taking the ambassador aside, he said to him—

"If your government has been led to believe that Turkey contains any element of existence, your government must have received incorrect information. I repeat to you that the sick man is dying, and we can never allow such an event to take us by surprise. We must come to some understanding."

The next day, the emperor sent for Sir Hamilton Seymour, purposely to develop his plan for the division of the Turkish empire. After some preliminary observations, his majesty said—

"The principalities [of Wallachia and Moldavia] are, in fact, an independent state, under my protection: this might so continue. Servia might receive the same form of government. So again with Bulgaria: there seems to be no reason why this province should not form an independent state. As to Egypt, I quite understand the importance to England of that territory. I can, then, only say, that if in the event of a distribution of the Ottoman succession upon the fall of the empire, you should take possession of Egypt, I shall have no objection to offer. I would say the same thing of Candia: that is land might suit you, and I do not see why it should not become an English possession."

These conversations were communicated by the ambassador to his government, which did not concur in the anticipations of a sudden collapse of the Sublime Porte, and positively refused to enter into any secret engagement in anticipation of that event. At the time, these communications, verbal and written, were carried on under the veil of the strictest secrecy; and probably they would never have been divulged, during this generation at any rate, but for a subsequent indiscretion of the court of St. Petersburg.

Though he could come to no understanding with the English government, Nicholas did not abandon his design upon Turkey; and, in pursuance of a declaration of Count Nesselrode, "that further and energetic steps" would be taken at Constantinople, it was resolved to despatch Prince Menschikoff to that capital, as an ambassador extraordinary, on a special mission; and to support that mission by sending more troops to the Turkish frontiers, and a naval force into the Black Sea. The prince left St. Petersburg in February, 1853, and arrived at Constantinople on the 28th of that month; entering the city with great pomp. In his entire demeanour, both then and subsequently, he appears to have had the intention of conveying to the ministers of the sultan, and others with whom he came in contact, the impression that he bore the mandates of a master who was determined to be obeyed, having the power to enforce obedience if his will were resisted. During an interview with the grand vizier on the 2nd of March—in which he refused to visit Fuad Effendi, the foreign minister who had always been opposed to Russian policy—Menschikoff convinced the Turkish minister that he was sent "to win some important right from Turkey, which would destroy her independence;" and that the czar sought to "trample under foot the rights of the Porte, and the independence of her sovereign."

As the Russian ambassador refused to hold intercourse with him, Fuad Effendi resigned his office of minister of foreign affairs, to which Rifaat Pasha was appointed; who, though a clever and able statesman, was not equal to his predecessor. Prince Menschikoff had an interview with the new minister on the 14th of March, when he only alluded to the holy places as the object of his mission. With respect to them, he demanded—

"1. A definite firman, securing to the Greek church the custody of the key of the church at Bethlehem; of the silver star, pertaining to the Grotto of the Nativity; of the Grotto of Gethsemane (with the admission of Latin priests there for the celebration of their rites); and the joint possession, by the Greeks and Latins, of the Garden of Bethlehem.—2. An immediate order, on the part of the government, for the repair of the cupola of the Temple of the Holy Sepulchre, to the satisfaction of the Greek patriarch.—3. A guarantee for the maintenance of the Greek church in the East, and of those sanctuaries already in the exclusive possession of that church, or shared by it with others."

These demands, supported as they were by the advance of the Russian troops to the frontiers of the Danubian principalities, and by the presence of the czar's fleet in the Black Sea, caused a panic to pervade both the Turkish government and the people. They apprehended a hostile attack, which they had no power to resist; and the grand vizier went to Colonel Rose—who, in the absence of Sir Stratford Canning in England, was left at the Turkish capital as chargé d'affaires—and requested that he would order Admiral Dundas, the commander of the English fleet in the Mediterranean, to bring his squadron to Vourla Bay. The order was given; but the admiral refused to obey without orders from home; and Lord Clarendon (then minister for foreign affairs) approved of his conduct. His lordship declined ordering the fleet to pass the Bosphorus, as "the circumstances did not, in the opinion of her majesty's government, render it necessary." A similar request was made to the French government, whose fleet was ordered to take up its station in the Bay of Salamis.

The expected arrival of a British fleet cheered the public mind at Constantinople; and, on the 5th of April, before it was known that the Aberdeen government refused to allow Admiral Dundas to obey the summons of the chargé d'affaires, the English ambassador returned to the embassy; having, while in England, been raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. No diplomatist ever acquired so much influence at the Turkish capital as his lordship —an influence exerted in behalf of all the Christian subjects of the Porte, as well as in the interests of his own country; interests, however, which he never sought to promote at the expense of Turkey. His lordship's arrival inspired the Turks with confidence; they immediately applied to him for advice; and he told them to "endeavour to keep the affair of the holy places separate from the ulterior proposals, whatever they might be, of Russia." Those proposals—made to the grand vizier under a pledge of secrecy at first, but gradually becoming known—were, that the Porte should enter into a treaty with Russia, by which the czar should be invested with the protectorate of the Greek church in Turkey. With respect to the holy places, the advice of Lord de Redcliffe was followed; and this question was advancing to a solution, whilst the other remained in abeyance till the receipt of a despatch from St. Petersburg, written after it became known there that the French fleet was ordered to Salamis. This despatch has not been published; but, from Prince Menschikoff's subsequent conduct, it is supposed to have instructed him to be firm and imperative in his demand relative to the protectorate; and to leave Constantinople, taking all the members of the legation with him, if it were not conceded. The prince did make the demand, and pressed it urgently upon Rifaat Pasha: but it was calmly declined; as such a treaty, said the Turkish foreign minister, "would be giving to Russia an exclusive protectorate over the whole Greek population, their clergy, and their churches."

On the 22nd of April, the question of the holy places —which the czar had admitted was the only "grievance" he had against the Porte—was settled by firmans being sent to Jerusalem, embodying the following terms of agreement, to which M. de la Cour, by the influence of Lord de Redcliffe, had been induced to accord the assent of France:—

The key of the church at Bethlehem to be left in the hands of the Latins, and the silver star to remain in the Grotto of the Nativity; but no new rights to be conferred on the members of that church by those concessions. The door-keeper of the church to be a Greek priest; but the right to enter the building to be accorded to all sects. The Greeks to assemble for worship at the Tomb of the Virgin every morning, immediately after sunrise, the precedence being given to them (as represented by Lord de Redcliffe to M. de la Cour, to induce him to assent to this arrangement), on account of the early hours of prayer common in the Oriental churches. The Armenians to follow, and then the Latins; each church having an hour and a-half granted for the purpose. The Convent Gardens at Bethlehem were to remain under the joint care of the Greeks and Latins; and the Cupola of the Holy Sepulchre (which was greatly decayed, and the Greeks and Latins were quarrelling as to which party should restore it) to be repaired by the sultan, the form being preserved; and if altered, the Greek patriarch to have a right to interfere.

The adjustment of this question was solely owing to the judicious counsel of the English ambassador, who received the thanks, not only of the sultan and his ministers, but of both Prince Menschikoff and M. de la Cour.—The question of the protectorate still remained. —On the 19th of April, after the receipt of the despatch from St. Petersburg, Prince Menschikoff sent to the foreign minister a diplomatic note, couched in angry terms; and stating that, "in consequence of the hostile tendencies manifested, for some years past, in whatever related to Russia, she required, in behalf of the religious communities of the orthodox church, an explanatory and positive act of guarantee." Three days later the differences respecting the holy places were settled; and, on the 24th of April, the grand vizier and the Reis Effendi had an interview with Lord Stratford de Redcliffe respecting the demand for the protectorate. By his advice, they were courteous but firm in their reply; and the prince found himself baffled at every step.

On the 1st and 2nd of May, the Russian ambassador received fresh instructions from St. Petersburg, even more peremptory than the last; and written about the same time when, in a memorandum delivered to Sir Hamilton Seymour by the czar, that sovereign and his ministers were represented as uniting with the English government in condemning "the practice of harassing the Porte by overbearing demands, put forward in a manner humiliating to its independence and its dignity." In consequence of these new orders, on the 5th of May the prince addressed another note to the minister for foreign affairs, inclosing the draft of a sened, or convention, between the two sovereigns—the czar and the sultan—confirming, by the sanction of a treaty, the arrangements made in favour of the Greek church with respect to the holy places; securing to the Greek Christians in Turkey all the rights and privileges they absolutely enjoyed, or which might have been demanded for them; and also the extension to them of any privileges or immunities that might be granted to any other Christian church: it also provided for the irremovability of the Greek patriarch of Constantinople, and the provincial bishops, and for the adjudication of all their complaints by the Russian emperor. An answer was required within five days; "any longer delay," Prince Menschikoff said, he "could consider in no other light than as a want of respect towards his government, which would impose upon him the most painful duty." Lord de Redcliffe was again consulted; and he had a written correspondence with the prince, and an interview with the sultan, on the subject, being introduced to the latter by the foreign minister. His lordship's letter to the Russian ambassador was conciliatory and courteous, whilst he reminded his excellency that he was departing from the justice and moderation which had hitherto marked the foreign policy of his sovereign. To the sultan—whom he saw on the 9th of May, after his ministers and council had resolved to concede all they safely could, but to consent to nothing which would injure the independence and dignity of their sovereign—he expressed his approval of that decision. He added, though the ambassador might depart, and the Danubian principalities might be occupied, he did not apprehend a declaration of war, nor any other act of open hostility; and pointed out "the true position to be maintained by the Porte," as "one of moral resistance to such demands as were really inadmissible." The sultan assented; and, amongst other things, professed himself "perfectly prepared, in the exercise of his own free will, to confirm and to render effective the protection promised to all classes of his tributary subjects, in matters of religious worship, including the privileges and immunities granted to their respective clergy." Before he left the sultan, Lord de Redcliffe stated, that he had authority to summon the Mediterranean squadron to the Black Sea, in case of imminent danger.

On the 10th of May, assent to the proposed convention was courteously refused by the Turkish government, at the same time that a firm intention to maintain, unimpaired, the rights of all the tributary subjects of the empire, was expressed.—On the 11th, Prince Menschikoff announced, in a note to the foreign minister, that, if this determination were persisted in, his mission would be at an end; and he requested the final answer of the Porte in three days.—On the 13th, the prince, without the knowledge of the ministers, succeeded in obtaining a private audience of the sultan; which had no effect upon that sovereign's previous determinations; but the audience being granted without the knowledge of his ministers, caused them to resign, and Redschid Pasha became the foreign minister, his colleagues being all adverse to the concession of the czar's demands. This change led to an extension of the time allowed for a reply to the last note of Prince Menschikoff.—On the 18th of May, the question was discussed in the divan, or great council; which body determined to continue the course already adopted, only three members out of forty-five dissenting. This determination was communicated to Prince Menschikoff by Redschid Pasha, in a personal interview on the 18th. In that interview certain concessions were promised, which, the minister said, the sultan would embody in a firman; and he was willing to sanction all things conceded with respect to the holy places by a convention but not to grant the protectorate to a foreign potentate over a large portion of his subjects. After this interview, on the same day, the prince addressed a formal note to the foreign minister, announcing that his mission was at an end, and that he should quit Constantinople, taking with him the whole staff of the legation, except the director of the commercial department.—On the 19th, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe assembled the representatives of France, Austria, and Prussia at his residence; and all agreed with him as to the justice of the course pursued by the Turkish cabinet, and assented to the soundness of the views adopted. Before they separated, the envoy of Austria was deputed to see Prince Menschikoff, and ascertain whether a friendly understanding between Russia and the Porte was yet impossible. The interview took place the same day, and the prince appeared to be immovable. On the 20th, he received a note, formally enumerating the concessions Redschid Pasha had promised in the personal interview, which were immediately rejected. In the evening, however, the prince made a concession. He wrote to the minister, stating that the emperor would be satisfied if the terms demanded in the proposed convention were conceded in the form of a diplomatic note, a draft of which he enclosed.—Redschid Pasha sent this note to Lord Stratford, who immediately summoned the representatives of the other three powers, and communicated its contents to them. His lordship had ascertained that the Porte considered the demands made in the proposed form were as objectionable as in any other. With this opinion all the ambassadors coincided: but "upon a question which so deeply touched the freedom of action and the sovereignty of his majesty the sultan," they declined to advise what course should be taken, thinking Redschid Pasha the best judge of that question. That minister and his colleagues refused their assent to the last demand of Prince Menschikoff, who, on the 22nd of May, left Constantinople, and the arms were removed from the front of the Russian embassy. Before his departure, having heard that the sultan intended to guarantee, by a hatti-scheriff (issued on the recommendation of Lord de Redcliffe), the spiritual rights of the members of the Greek church throughout his empire, his excellency addressed a note to the minister for foreign affairs, protesting against the adoption of this course, which he said must be regarded as "hostile to Russia and her religion." He also informed Redschid Pasha, that "the refusal of his demands would impose upon the imperial government the necessity of seeking a guarantee by its own power." The hatti-scheriff was issued on the 7th of June, and solemnly delivered to the patriarch of Constantinople, in the presence of the leading clerical and lay members of the Greek church then at that city.

During the time that Prince Menschikoff was at Constantinople, the military preparations of Russia were progressing in Bessarabia, and throughout the provinces that bordered on Turkey and the Danubian principalities; whilst at Nicolaieff and Sebastopol, orders had been given by the Admiralty to "have everything that could swim ready for sea." In taking these steps, the czar had calculated, not only upon the complete neutrality of Austria and Prussia—if indeed they did not extend to him active support—but also upon the forbearance of England. The czar and Lord Aberdeen, as before remarked, were personal friends: and immediately on the accession of the latter to power as the first minister in this country, the former proceeded to carry out those plans which he had long formed with respect to Turkey; and which, from his conversations with the noble earl in 1844, and Sir Hamilton Seymour in 1853, it is evident, aimed at the dissolution of that empire. A sincere member of the Greek church, he thought, no doubt, that he was doing good service in asserting her rights; and he evidently intended to make his exertions in the spiritual cause contribute to the success of his temporal ambition. Many persons regard the appointment of the coalition ministry as the main cause of the war between Russia and Turkey, followed by the contest in the Crimea, as it tempted the czar to culminate his previous efforts by taking up a position from which he could not retreat without disgrace. Among those persons was the late Mr. Cobden, who publicly declared, that he very much regretted the vote he gave in the division which defeated Lord Derby's ministry in 1852, as that defeat was the cause of the Crimean war. It was the czar's reliance on Lord Aberdeen's friendship for him personally, and the noble earl's known abhorrence of war, that induced him to send Prince Menschikoff to Constantinople, and to make those demands on the Porte which he could not retract. But whatever the prime minister's private sentiments, he soon found that public opinion, as well as that of most English statesmen, was decidedly opposed to the Russian policy; and that they were determined, if necessary, to resist it even by war. The tone of the ministry was taken accordingly. On the 31st of May, the Earl of Clarendon thus wrote to Lord Stratford de Redcliffe:—

"No sovereign, having a proper regard for his own dignity and independence, could admit proposals so undefined as those of Prince Menschikoff; and, by treaty, confer on another, and more powerful sovereign, a right of protection over a large portion of his own subjects. However well designed it may be, yet the fact is, that, under the vague language of the proposed sened, a perpetual right to interfere in the internal concerns of Turkey would be conferred on Russia; for, governed as the Greek subjects of the Porte are, by their ecclesiastical authorities, and looking, as these latter would in all things do, for protection to Russia, it follows, that 14,000,000 of Greeks (i.e., members of the Greek church) would henceforward regard the emperor as their supreme protector, and their allegiance to the sultan would be little more than nominal, while his own independence would dwindle into vassalage."

In these sentiments the French emperor and his ministers completely coincided: both governments recorded their opinion that the Porte did right in refusing to accede to the extraordinary demands of the czar; and they entered upon that combined line of action which led to the defeat of the Russians, and the restoration of the "sick man" to a healthy state, with every appearance of longevity.

These details will enable our readers to understand the complicated "Eastern Question," of which they will frequently hear and read; and save them the toil and trouble of wading through several volumes of state papers to make themselves masters of it.

CHAPTER CXI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA—WAR BETWEEN RUSSIA AND TURKEY.—A.D. 1853, 1854.

HE negotiations and other events noticed in the preceding chapter had not passed without remark in the British parliament. The pretensions put forth by the czar were several times alluded to; apprehensions of war were expressed; and the unprepared state of the country pointed out. In both Houses the ministers expressed themselves confident of the continuance of peace. They censured Colonel Rose for summoning Admiral Dundas to the Dardanelles; and blamed the departure of the French fleet for Salamis; Lord Cowley being instructed to express, "non-officially," the regret of the Earl of Aberdeen and his colleagues at that step, "as it was premature, and might raise the susceptibility of the czar."—On the 25th of April, Lord Clarendon declared in the House of Lords, that, "as regarded Turkey, there was no danger of the peace of Europe being disturbed;" nor "of the unanimity which prevailed between England and the other great powers of Europe, as to the necessity of maintaining the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, being interrupted."—Events, however, were moving in a direction quite opposite to that indicated by the foreign secretary; the mission of Prince Menschikoff being then in progress; and after its failure, the withdrawal of the Russian legation from Constantinople took place.

Prince Menschikoff left the Turkish capital, as already stated, on the 22nd of May, 1853; on the 31st, Count Nesselrode, who was himself favourable to peace, but was obliged to give way to the violent temper of Nicholas, wrote to Redschid Pasha, expressing regret that the mission had failed; dwelling on the "moderation of the demands of Russia;" and the "serious offence offered to the emperor by opposing to his intentions, always so friendly and so generous, a distrust for which there was no cause, and refusals for which there was no excuse:" and requiring that the draft note left in his hands by Prince Menschikoff, should be signed in a week at the latest, and transmitted to the prince at Odessa. If this request were not complied with, the emperor's troops would, "within a few weeks, receive orders to pass the frontiers of the empire," not "to make war," the chancellor declared, but in order that his imperial majesty might "possess material guarantees," until such time as the Porte would "give those moral securities which Russia had in vain demanded for two years, first by her representatives at Constantinople, and then by her ambassador." The next day the chancellor wrote to Baron Brunnow, and announced the determination of the emperor to occupy the principalities, if the Porte, within one week, did not accept the Menschikoff note. The Porte refused to accept it, and the threat was carried out.

About this time the French emperor disclaimed the desire imputed to him, of wishing to demand or exercise a protectorate over the Roman Catholics in the East; and announced his intention, in consequence of the hostile demeanour of Russia to the Porte, of ordering the French fleet to Besika Bay, a small inlet of the Ægean Sea, on the western coast of the Troad, as the plain round the ancient site of Troy is called; and about four miles south of the entrance to the Dardanelles, the modern name of the ancient Hellespont. The English fleet received orders, on the 2nd of June, to join the French squadron; and, on the 13th of June, five days after Baron Brunnow had communicated to the English foreign secretary the decision of the czar to send an army into Wallachia and Moldavia, the Earl of Clarendon addressed a circular to her majesty's ministers at foreign courts, announcing the complete accord between the English and French governments with respect to the "Eastern Question;" and informing them that "the English and French fleets, which had been ordered to approach the Dardanelles, would act in concert, under the orders of the respective ambassadors of the two countries."—On the 20th, Count Nesselrode sent a circular to the Russian ambassadors, explaining and defending the policy of the czar; and explicitly declaring that the determination of his imperial majesty to send his troops to the Danubian principalities, was taken, because "the western powers had sent their fleets to the neighbourhood of Constantinople."—The reader will notice the dates given of the different transactions, and he will see that the determination of the Porte to occupy the principalities as a "material guarantee," was taken and announced before the orders were given to the English and French; and that the two western governments were perfectly aware of it. Those orders were the result of that hostile resolution of the czar; and were given in anticipation of an event which soon after took place.

The Menschikoff note having been returned, unaccepted the orders for the Russian troops to cross the Pruth the river that divides Bessarabia from Wallachia

—were issued on the 25th of June. On the 2nd of July, from 70,000 to 80,000 men, under the orders of Prince Gortschakoff, entered Moldavia. Leaving 5,000 men in that province, under General Aurep, the prince advanced to Wallachia, and established his head-quarters at Bucharest. Little Wallachia—the south-western part of the province, was also occupied; and garrisons were placed at Kalafat, Karakal, Rowssvede, and Oltenitza; the Wallachian militia was called out, and compelled to do duty on the left bank of the Danube; and although Prince Gortschakoff, on first entering the principalities, sent forth a proclamation enjoining the inhabitants to follow their occupations, and "to be obedient to the laws and established authorities," the latter were soon displaced, the revenues were seized, and the entire administration of public affairs was taken into the hands of the Russians. The czar justified the seizure of the principalities in a manifesto, issued on the 26th of June. The step had been taken, he said, to protect the rights and privileges of the orthodox church, based on the treaty of Kainardji; rights of which he and his predecessors had made themselves the guarantee. [The treaty of Kainardji, concluded on the 10th of July, 1774, does not give the slightest authority for any of the pretensions put forth by the czar respecting the protectorate of the Christians of the Greek church in Turkey; and its provisions were certainly not violated by the then sultan, if they had been by his predecessors.] The movement of the troops, he added, would be immediately stopped, "if the Ottoman Porte engaged to observe, religiously, the integrity of those privileges." This was quite an unfounded pretence, as that integrity had not been violated by Abdul-Medjid; and the privileges were further secured by the hatti-scheriff of June 7th, which perfectly satisfied the patriarch and the clergy of the Ottoman empire.

The "passage of the Pruth" was known at Constantinople on the 7th of July. Acting under the advice of the ambassadors of the western powers, who admitted that the act was a complete cause of war against Russia, the Porte did not declare war, but, on the 14th of July, issued a protest against the occupation, and in justification of the Ottoman policy. This protest had been previously submitted to the ambassadors, and approved by them. But, though no immediate overt step was taken, the Turkish forces, both in Asia and Europe, were reinforced; the command in Anatolia being given to the Seraskier Pasha, and in Bulgaria to Omar Pasha—an Austrian by birth, who had distinguished himself on several occasions as a military commander. An army, comprising from 90,000 to 100,000 infantry, twelve regiments of cavalry, and forty batteries of artillery, with Egyptian and Albanian contingents, was gradually distributed along the Danube; extending from Widdin, on the west—a strongly-fortified town on the Danube, about twenty miles from the western frontier of Bulgaria—into the desolate tract of the Dobrutscha, on the east. The head-quarters of the left wing, commanded by Ismail Pasha, were stationed at Widdin. Those of the centre, under Mustapha Pasha, were fixed first at Rasgrad, and then were pushed on to Silistria. The right wing, under Halib Pasha, with its head-quarters at Karasu (a small place on the Danube, near Trajan's Wall), had some of its regiments cantoned in the Dobrutscha. The head-quarters of the commander-in-chief were established at Shumla, an important town of Bulgaria, situated in a gorge on a range of the Balkan mountains. It was considered one of the keys of the Turkish empire. There was also a reserve at Aitos, forming a rear-guard.

When the crossing of the Pruth was reported at Vienna, the foreign minister of Austria held frequent meetings with the ambassadors of England, France, and Prussia, to consult upon the threatening aspect of affairs. These meetings were called "The Conference of Vienna;" and the result was, the drawing-up of a note, to be submitted to the czar and the sultan; which it was imagined would be a sufficient guarantee for all the former required, whilst both sovereigns could sign it without compromising the independence of either. This document, known in history as the "Vienna Note," was framed upon one transmitted from Paris by M. Drouyn de l'Huys. When adopted by the conference, it was submitted to the four governments, and also sent to St. Petersburg; but no attempt was made to ascertain whether it was agreeable to the Porte. It was considered unobjectionable by the neutral powers; and when read by the Chancellor Nesselrode to the czar, was at once accepted by the latter. And well it might. The three ambassadors and the Austrian foreign minister did not observe, that in a reference made to the "maintenance of the immunities and privileges of the Ottoman Greek church," the subjects of dispute raised by Prince Menschikoff were again opened out, and that in a way which permitted of their being settled as desired by Russia. When the note—finally adopted by the conference on the 31st of July—was sent to Constantinople early in August, it was also sent to St. Petersburg for the formal assent of the czar, which was at once accorded. The ministers of the Porte, however, discovered its tendency, and the sultan was advised to refuse his signature unless certain modifications were adopted.—When these modifications were submitted to the czar, he declined to accept them, on the ground that, the note being the ultimatum of the four powers, which he had accepted without alteration, he ought not to be called upon to assent to alterations made by the Porte, those powers being of opinion that the sultan could affix his signature without compromising his interests or his honour. Thus the Porte was, apparently, in the wrong. But, in a despatch to Baron Mayendorf, the Russian ambassador at Vienna, Count Nesselrode explained the note precisely in the sense entertained at Constantinople, averring that it gave the czar all Prince Menschikoff demanded. The conference no longer pressed the note on the Porte; and on the 6th of September, the manifesto of that power appeared, rejecting the document.

On the 23rd of September, the Emperors of Austria and Russia, and the King of Prussia, met at Olmutz, in Moravia, where the czar endeavoured to induce Francis Joseph, the young Emperor of Austria, then in his 24th year, to join in a campaign against the Turks; but in vain: his neutrality, however, was secured; and the King of Prussia was not likely to engage in hostilities against Nicholas, who had married his sister. Indeed, there is reason to believe, that, if he could have induced any of the other powers to have joined him, he would have entered into the contest on the side of the czar: but Prussia and Russia alone could not have stood against the rest of Europe; and therefore neutrality was adopted.

The Turkish manifesto, rejecting the "Vienna Note," caused a commotion at Constantinople, where the ulemas and students demanded that war should be declared against Russia. The great majority of the Mohammedan population also called for war; and Redschid Pasha entertaining fears for the safety of the Christians in the Turkish capital, the English and French ambassadors, on the 10th of September, ordered three frigates from each of the squadrons in Besika Bay to ascend the Sea of Marmora, and anchor at the entrance of the Bosphorus.—The émeute at Constantinople continued, though no violent outbreak took place; and quiet was restored, on the 26th of September, by the divan deciding—

"1. That the system of negotiations was exhausted. —2. That all measures necessary for the last preparations of defence were regulated.—3. That the moment had arrived for making the declaration of war against Russia."

On the 4th of October, the sultan's declaration of war appeared: on the 7th it was read to the people in the mosques; and, on the same day, forwarded to all foreign courts.—In Constantinople it produced the greatest joy; both sexes and all classes offered their money and jewels to the government; and the men tendered their personal services. At that time men were not wanted, the armies being effectively organised both in Europe and Asia: if recruits had been required, such was the popular enthusiasm, that, writes a gentleman from Constantinople on the 6th of October, "I do not think one would have refused to quit; and the city would have been deserted for the camp."—The first step taken by the government after the declaration of war, was to request the presence of the English and French fleets in the Black Sea, that they might cruise against the Russians. Admirals Dundas and Hamelin were accordingly instructed by the ambassadors to leave Besika Bay, which they did on the 14th of October; and the two squadrons took up their position near the island of Marmora, in the sea of that name, about half-way between the entrance to the Dardanelles and the Golden Horn: but as neither England nor France were at war with the czar, the request that they might cruise in the Black Sea could not be granted.

Simultaneously with the declaration of war, instructions were sent to Omar Pasha to demand that Prince Gortschakoff should immediately evacuate the Danubian principalities. This demand, made on the 9th, was replied to on the 10th of October. The prince, in his letter to the Turkish commander, said that his master was not at war with Turkey, but he had orders not to leave the principalities till that moral satisfaction the emperor had demanded was obtained. If that were given, he should withdraw immediately; in the interim, if attacked, he should defend his positions. At this period the Russians were suffering greatly from the climate; the desertions had also been numerous; and it is doubtful whether the prince could have mustered 85,000 able-bodied men. The Turkish army was more numerous; but it was posted along a line 300 miles in extent, and could not immediately act on the offensive. The English and French ambassadors wished a little time to elapse after the demand was made upon Prince Gortschakoff to evacuate the principalities before hostilities commenced; and the sultan despatched orders to Omar Pasha not to begin fighting till the 1st of November. He, however, sent 12,000 men across the Danube on the 27th of October, who occupied Kalafat, then a small village opposite Widdin, expelling the Russians. Omar himself, with 35,000 men, arrived, at Turtukai, between Silistria and Rustchuck, on the 31st of October. Between the 1st of November and the 4th, three divisions of his troops crossed the river, one being established at the quarantine station, near Oltenitza, a fortified village of Wallachia. Here the Turks were attacked on the 4th, by a division of the Russian army, consisting, according to Omar Pasha's despatch, of "twenty battalions, three regiments of cavalry, one of Cossacks, sixteen mounted batteries, and sixteen on foot." The fighting lasted four hours, from about twelve at noon till near 4 P.M. The Turks were supported by the batteries at Turtukai, whose fire was effective crossing the river; and the infantry fought well with the Minié rifle. The Russians, who had expected an easy conquest, found that the "sick man" had wonderfully recovered his strength. They were beaten, and compelled to retreat, leaving 800 dead bodies on the field. The Turks, who lost 106 men, found, strewed over the site of the battle, 500 muskets, with numerous cartridge-boxes, equipments, &c. After this affair—known as the battle of Oltenitza—Omar's men succeeded in establishing themselves on two islands in the Danube, and, in several skirmishes, beat their antagonists. The Russians were astounded; they had no conception that the Turks would be able to maintain their ground; and Prince Gortschakoff was terribly mortified at the disasters which befel his troops. Reinforcements arriving from Bessarabia, his highness resolved again to attack the Turks at Oltenitza; but, before his arrival, in consequence of instructions from Constantinople, the principal corps had withdrawn from that town to the right bank of the river, having recrossed the Danube on the 13th of November. A few patroles remained, and there were repeated skirmishes till the 27th, when the Turks were all again in Bulgaria, with the exception of the corps that occupied Kalafat, and that which held the island of Mokan in the Danube. The former strongly intrenched themselves; and the latter, after the island had been taken and retaken several times, succeeded in keeping the enemy at bay.

November closed with one of the most terrible tragedies of the war. The Turkish fleet was divided into two squadrons. Both were cruising in the Black Sea; and, on the 27th of that month, one of these divisions, consisting of seven frigates, three corvettes, and two steamers, under Osman Pasha (whose principal object was to keep up a communication between Constantinople and the army in Anatolia), was obliged, by stress of weather, to take shelter in the harbour of Sinope, on the Asiatic coast, about midway between Constantinople and Trebizond. The vessels were seen, soon after they had entered the port, by the lookers-out on board of one of three Russian men-of-war, commanded by Admiral Nachimoff. The little squadron was reconnoitred by the Russians; and the admiral, having sent to Sebastopol for reinforcements, which augmented his force to six ships of the line (four of 120, and two of 84 guns each), and four steamers, attacked the Turkish vessels in the port on the 30th of November; Osman Pasha having, to a summons sent in by a flag of truce, refused to surrender unconditionally. The Turks defended themselves vigorously; and a fire from some batteries on shore was kept up with great spirit. But the superior force of the assailants rendered all valour unavailing, and the end was a massacre rather than a battle. The firing ceased on the part of the Turkish ships in about two hours and a-half. One of their ships had caught fire and was burnt; two were blown up by the captains, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy; and the remainder were so disabled that the victors burnt them the next day. The total number of men on board, when the fighting began, was 4,140: of these—120, made prisoners; 219 wounded, brought off by the English steamer Retribution, and the French frigate Mogador, which were sent to Sinope as soon as the action was heard of; and about 400 officers and men, who got on shore unhurt—making a total of 759—were all that escaped. The Russians lost one officer and thirty-three sailors killed, and had 230 wounded. It was their only success since the fighting began; and when the intelligence reached St. Petersburg, there were great rejoicings; the Te Deum was sung in the churches; the capital was illuminated; and the czar sent an autograph letter of thanks to Prince Menschikoff, who commanded at Sebastopol. Admiral Dundas was at Constantinople when the news of the sad catastrophe reached the city. He proposed that the allied fleets should immediately proceed in pursuit of the Russians, in the hope of falling-in with them before they returned to Sebastopol. General Baraguay d'Hilliers, who had just succeeded M. de la Cour as the French ambassador, would not consent to this proposition: and, for some time, both English and French were very unpopular at Constantinople; as it was said, if the request that the allied fleets might cruise in the Black Sea had been complied with, the melancholy affair at Sinope would not have happened. Those fleets did enter the Black Sea on the 3rd of January, 1854, at the renewed request of the Porte. The Russian vessels had returned to Sebastopol before the close of the year, where they remained, and did not offer to leave its well-fortified harbour again.

The fighting in Wallachia continued in December; the Russian army in the provinces having received large reinforcements; but the Turks maintained the superiority of their arms. As a diversion, General Luders, in the night of the 12th of December, sent a force across the Danube, which, the next morning, attacked Matschin, a town situated in the embouchure of one of the arms of the river, opposite the Wallachian port of Ibraila, then occupied by the Russians. The assailants were defeated with great loss; after which fighting ceased, and the two armies were encamped for the winter, Omar Pasha's head-quarters being at Shumla, and Prince Gortschakoff's at Bucharest.

In Asia, the Turks were aided by the Circassian chief Schamyl, who kept the Russian forces in Circassia and Georgia continually on the alert, capturing several of their forts. The Turks also captured five forts on the frontiers of Georgia; and took by storm, at midnight on the 28th of October, the fort of St. Nicolai, at the mouth of the Shefketil—the most southerly fortress the Russians held on the coast. Five times the Russians attempted to retake St. Nicolai, and were repulsed; the last attack being made on the 17th of November, when the assailants lost 400 men killed and one cannon. Selim Pasha then, after being repulsed in an attack on Sofa, near St. Nicolai, besieged Akhalzikh, situated on an affluent of the Kur, 103 miles west of Tiflis. Prince Woronzoff arrived on the 24th of November, with a considerable force to raise the siege. On the 26th he attacked and defeated the Turks in their intrenchments, with the loss of 1,000 killed, 120 prisoners, and a number of cannon, muskets, flags, and stores.—On the 2nd of December, the Turks, under Abdi Pasha, were again defeated at Baschkady-Lar, by the Russians under Prince Beboutoff, losing a number of men and twenty-four guns. They fought desperately, and the victors had 1,500 men killed and wounded. These victories were, of course, made much of by the Russians; but the Turks retained all the places they had captured, having abandoned the open country; and fighting ceased for the season.

In November there was another peace conference at Vienna, the plenipotentiaries present being the Earl of Westmoreland, Baron Borqueney, and Count Arnim, the ambassadors of England, France, and Prussia; and Count Buol, the Austrian minister.—These plenipotentiaries drew up a note, as the basis of a treaty; which, however, was not presented, it being forwarded to the ambassadors of the four powers at Constantinople, who had, simultaneously, been conferring on the same subject, and had also drawn up a note which they considered more suitable to the existing circumstances; and it was substituted for that agreed upon at Vienna. It provided for the evacuation of the principalities; the renewal of ancient treaties; the security of the spiritual privileges of all the subjects of the Sublime Porte, not being Mohammedans; and the definite adoption of the arrangements respecting the holy places. The Porte agreed to accept this note as the basis of a treaty, but declined to treat for an armistice till the principalities were evacuated. The acceptance of the note occasioned more riots at Constantinople; but the czar, irritated at the recent events, refused to admit of any mediation between himself and Turkey, or to send a plenipotentiary to any neutral place to meet one from the Porte. If the sultan wished to treat, said Count Nesselrode, he must send a plenipotentiary to St. Petersburg.—So this renewed effort to put a stop to the war failed, and quiet was restored at the Turkish capital. —The year closed with the publication of a manifesto from M. Drouyn de l'Huys, dated the 30th of December, in which he declared that the four courts of England, France, Austria, and Prussia had solemnly recognised the territorial integrity of the Ottoman empire as one of the conditions of their political equilibrium; and described the occupation of Wallachia and Moldavia as a fresh attack upon that integrity.

The fighting was renewed in Wallachia early in 1854. On the 5th of January, to prevent an attack on that place, a Turkish force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, marched from Kalafat, under Ismail and Mustapha Pasha; and advanced to Csitate, in and near which village the Russians were posted in great strength. Fighting began on the 6th of January, and was continued for the next four days. Both sides suffered great loss; the greatest being on the side of the Russians, who were cleared out of the neighbourhood, and the attack on Kalafat prevented.—The disasters in Wallachia made the Russians determine to attack the Turks in Bulgaria. In March, a considerable force crossed the Danube, and took possession of the Dobrutscha, the north-eastern extremity of Bulgaria, in which there was some skirmishing, and where the invaders suffered greatly from the climate and the nature of the country.—Another division of the army, with a splendid park of artillery, crossed the river in April, under Prince Paskievitch, and invested Silistria, attacking the outworks on the 28th. The first bombardment began on the 11th of May, and the siege continued for six weeks; the small garrison making a most heroic defence against a force greatly superior in strength. Two British officers—Captain Butler and Lieutenant Nasmyth—assisted the governor, Mussa Pasha, in the defence; and the narrative of the siege is one of the most interesting passages in the history of the war. There were numerous attacks and sorties; the beseigers having generally the worst of the mêlée; and after a fierce bombardment on the 20th, 21st, and 22nd of June, in which great damage was done to the town, the besiegers retreated in the night of the 22nd, the bombardment having been resumed after dark, and kept up till 3 A.M. on the 23rd, to cover the movement. —Of this siege the Turks may well be proud. The Russians had, at one time, 60,000 men on the right side of the Danube, with sixty guns in position, and threw upwards of 50,000 shot and shell, besides innumerable discharges of small shot, into the town. They also constructed more than three miles of approaches, sprung six mines, and left the fortifications ruined, indeed, but in the possession of their original defenders. The gallant Englishman, Captain Butler, who did so much to animate the besieged, was twice wounded, and died of exhaustion before the siege was raised.

The Russian commanders had, by this time, become convinced that they could not hold the principalities, and their troops had began to retire from the positions they occupied. Early in July the evacuation of the Dobrutscha also commenced; and the Turks crossing, at the same time, to the left side of the Danube, defeated the enemy at Giurgevo on the 8th of July. On this occasion, as at Silistria, the Turks were led on and inspired by several young English officers.—Captain Bent and Lieutenant Burke, of the royal engineers; Lieutenant Meynell, of the 75th regiment; Lieutenants Ballard, Hinde, and Arnold, of the Indian army: Behram Pasha, who held a command under Omar Pasha, and was engaged in the Giurgevo affair, was also an English officer—Colonel Cannon; and another Englishman, Colonel Ogilvy, was his aide-de-camp. After the battle, Cannon induced Hassan Pasha, the Turkish commander, to consent to occupy and fortify the Slobenskie heights; and, at the time, another English officer, Lieutenant Glyn, R.N., came up from the Britannia with some gun-boats and a few British seamen, and aided Captain Bent in throwing a bridge of boats across the main stream of the Danube. On the 11th of July, Prince Gortschakoff appeared on the scene with from 60,000 to 70,000 men, intending to drive the Turks from the position they had taken. When, however, he saw its strength, and that a communication was opened by the bridge with the force at Rustchuck, he determined to retreat, perhaps aware that the Austrians had a large body of troops on the frontiers of Little Wallachia; and doubtful whether, as they had called upon the emperor to evacuate the principalities, they might not cross the border, and commence hostilities if the evacuation were delayed. Instead of fighting, therefore, the Russians retired rapidly: and the Austrians, by virtue of a convention with Turkey, signed on the 14th of June, sent an army to occupy the provinces till the conclusion of peace, when they were to be restored to the Porte. The Russians had entirely evacuated Wallachia and Moldavia, and the Austrians were established there by the 6th of September, 1854; and this was the culmination of the attempt of Russia to hold those principalities as a "moral guarantee."

The battles of Akhalzikh and Baschkady-Lar had the effect of greatly demoralising the Turkish forces in Asia. The Porte sent Kourschid Pasha (the Turkish name of General Guyon, an English officer, who had distinguished himself in the Hungarian war) to organise and discipline that part of the army which was at Kars—a task he had some difficulty in effecting, owing to the jealousy of the governor and the Turkish officers. A Turkish squadron of four men-of-war and six steam-frigates, and a convoy of sailing vessels, with men and provisions on board, appeared off the coast in January, 1854.—They were followed by three French and five English vessels, under Admiral Lebarbier de Tinan, and Rear-Admiral Lyons, whose appearance caused the greatest joy amongst the population; public prayers being offered up in the mosques for England and France.—On the 19th of January and the 5th of February, the Russians attempted, for the sixth and seventh times, to retake St. Nicolai; and were, on both occasions, defeated with considerable loss. Subsequently, they themselves destroyed all the forts they had erected on the Circassian coast, south of Redouté-Kaleh, which the English squadron, assisted by a small Turkish land force, bombarded on the 19th of May. After returning the fire for a short time, the Russians fled, setting fire to the commercial town and to the magazines and store-houses before they retreated. They also intended to destroy the military quarters; but the combustibles prepared were either ineffective, or they had no time to ignite them. A Turkish garrison was established there; and when the allied ships returned to the Bosphorus, the Sampson was left to afford any necessary aid that might be required.—At Kars, General Guyon succeeded, at last, in reorganising the Turkish force. The governor, Achmet Pasha, was recalled, and his successor, Zarif Pasha, was found, by the English officer, to be much more conciliatory. Both the Turkish and Russian armies in that quarter were reinforced. The former were not so successful as they were in Europe. In some small affairs they repulsed the enemy; but they were defeated, with considerable loss, on the 14th and 15th of June, near Ladova; on the 28th of July at Bayazid; and on the 6th of August at Kurukdere; the retreat after the latter engagement being described as "a scene of almost unparalleled confusion." The loss, on both sides, was very great in these battles, the splendid Russian cavalry being terribly cut up by the Turkish artillery in the last: of twenty-six squadrons, of 100 men each, not one-third remained. The truth, probably, is, that the loss of the Russians was much greater than that of their opponents, as, very soon after the battle of Kurukdere, they retired from that place and Bayazid; and were, during the remainder of the year, engaged in skirmishing with Schamyl and his Circassians in the mountains. An attempt they made to retake Redouté-Kaleh, on the 6th of December, failed. At the close of the year the Turks retained that conquest; and, in other respects, remained in precisely the same positions as they occupied when the campaign opened.—In November, Colonel Williams—an officer well acquainted with the manners and languages of the East—arrived at Kars, as the English commissioner. He completed what General Guyon had begun; and, under his auspices, that important city was put in a complete state of defence.

CHAPTER CXII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA—THE WAR WITH RUSSIA.—A.D. 1854.

T the commencement of 1854, although the English ministers professed to believe that England was not likely to be involved in hostilities, popular opinion pointed in an opposite direction; and the public mind, remarks a contemporary writer, not only in England, but "throughout Europe, was in a state of feverish excitement such as had not characterised it for many years."—On the 2nd of January, a most destructive fire broke out at Constantinople, in the Fanar, the quarter inhabited by the Greeks; which was not extinguished till late in the following day. This fire caused great consternation; as the softas (students in theology) had threatened to burn the houses of all those who were opposed to the war, and favoured the Russians. It was, probably, to allay this Mussulman furor that, before the flames were extinguished, the English and French ambassadors announced that the two fleets would leave Besika Bay, and enter the Black Sea—

"To accompany the Turkish vessels, and protect them, on condition that they did not advance more than four miles from the coast of the Turkish territory; and, should the Russians attack the vessels they accompanied within that distance, the allied commanders were to repel force by force."

The British fleet consisted of nine ships of the line, and eleven frigates and corvettes, under Vice-Admiral James Wortley Deans Dundas, and Rear-Admiral Lyons: the French fleet comprised eight of the former and seven of the latter class, under Vice-Admiral Hamelin. This formidable armament passed the Bosphorus on the 3rd of January, and, with the exception of two ships of the line and one frigate, left to guard the Strait, proceeded northwards, accompanied by several Turkish ships of war, conveying reinforcements to the army in Asia. Messengers were, at the same time, despatched from Lord de Redcliffe and General Baraguay d'Hilliers, to Prince Menschikoff, the governor of Sebastopol, to inform him, that the object of the allied squadrons entering the Black Sea, was "to protect the Ottoman territory from all attack or hostile act;" that his excellency was apprised of the movement, "with a view to prevent any collision tending to disturb the amicable relations" between the English, French, and Russian governments; and that the ambassadors would be happy to learn that his excellency had given the necessary instructions to the Russian admirals, "so as to obviate any occurrence likely to endanger peace." When the allied fleet entered the Black Sea, the Russians had fourteen ships of the line, four frigates, five corvettes and brigs, six large and six small steamers, eighteen small vessels, and sixty-four gun-boats, in the harbour of Sebastopol; in all, 117. This large force remained perfectly quiet; no demonstration being made against the allied squadrons, which did not continue long in the Black Sea.—On the 22nd of January, they returned to the Bosphorus, and anchored in the Bay of Beicos, on the Asiatic side of the Strait, opposite Constantinople, much to the displeasure of the English and French ambassadors, who remonstrated with the admirals, but to no effect. The Austrian and Prussian ambassadors had, from the first, objected to the squadrons passing the Straits.

A correspondence took place between Sir Hamilton Seymour and Count Nesselrode, Earl Clarendon and Baron Brunnow, respecting the entrance of the Black Sea by the allied fleet—an act which the Emperor Nicholas, when he first heard of it, described as "breaking treaties, and releasing him from the obligation of them." It was justified on the ground that, by seizing and occupying two Turkish provinces with 4,000,000 inhabitants, the czar had "violated the status quo of Europe;" and "contradicted the intentions proclaimed by the great powers in 1840 and 1841." He had also "prepared great armies, at a vast expense, apparently with the object of crossing the Danube, and attempting the conquest of Constantinople." In taking the steps they had done, the allies were therefore justified, Turkey being "the grieved and weaker power:" and they were only "upholding that fundamental principle of European policy, involved in the maintenance of the Ottoman empire," which had "been repeatedly proclaimed by the five great powers of Europe."—Measures had also been taken, it was added, to prevent "any aggressive operation by sea, on the part of the Turkish fleet, against the Russian territory."—These reasons were considered unsatisfactory; and, on the 4th of February, Baron Brunnow announced, that he and the members of the embassy would leave London for Germany, until further orders.—A similar correspondence took place between M. Drouyn de l'Huys and M. Kissileff, with the same results.—On the 7th of February, notes of recall were addressed to Sir Hamilton Seymour and General Castelbajac; on the 8th, the Russian ambassadors left London and Paris, and the diplomatic relations between the two powers ceased.—While these events were in progress, Count Orloff arrived at Vienna, the bearer of propositions, which were to be submitted through the emperor, to the conference, as a basis for pacific negotiations. They were communicated to Francis Joseph on the 29th of January, and were as follows:—

1. That Turkey should send a plenipotentiary, either to St. Petersburg or Bucharest, to negotiate directly with Russia; but he might advise with the ministers of the other powers.—2. That the former treaties between Russia and Turkey should be renewed.—3. That Turkey should enter into an engagement not to give refuge to political refugees.—4. That the Porte should make a declaration in reference to the protectorate, even in stronger terms than were proposed by Prince Menschikoff.

These propositions were submitted to the conference, which was again assembled; together with the demand of the czar, that Austria and Prussia should observe a strictly armed neutrality, with the assurance that, if this brought upon them the displeasure of the other powers, his imperial majesty would "protect" them. The conference at once rejected the proposals, and, in doing so, received the cordial assent of the Emperor of Austria.—On the 3rd of February, another protocol was signed by the members of the conference, pledging the powers they represented—England, France, Austria, and Prussia—to maintain the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Porte.

An effort to preserve peace was made at the same time from another and a most unexpected quarter. A numerous meeting of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, was held in London in January. Before it separated, three of its members—Joseph Sturge, of Birmingham; Robert Carleton, of Bristol; and Henry Pease, of Durham—were appointed as a deputation, for the purpose of visiting St. Petersburg, and presenting an address to the czar; urging upon him "the maintenance of peace as the true policy, as well as the manifest duty, of a Christian government." This deputation left London on the 20th of January, and reached St. Petersburg on the 2nd of February. Their arrival was made known to the czar, who granted them an interview at the Winter Palace on the 10th, receiving them with great courtesy and kindness. He made a long reply to their address, a copy of which was delivered to them, in writing, before they left St. Petersburg. It was very carefully drawn up, and expressed only the most Christian, pacific, and philanthropic sentiments. Nicholas said he had only claimed from Turkey the fulfilment of her engagements; and he solemnly disclaimed having "ulterior objects in view, aiming at conquest, aggrandisement, and the ruin of Turkey." His majesty professed esteem for England, and affection for the Queen, whom he admired, "not only as a sovereign, but as a lady, a wife, and a mother;" adding, that he placed "full confidence in her," having "acted towards her in a frank and friendly spirit." The members of the deputation, after their interview with the czar, were introduced to the empress; and they "returned to England with the sincere opinion that the Emperor Nicholas was a most well-meaning, and a most misrepresented and ill-used, personage."

The Emperor Napoleon also made a personal effort to restore and preserve peace. He addressed an autograph letter to the czar, dated January 29, 1854; in which, after justifying the steps taken by the two western powers, he suggested the declaration of an armistice; that "things should resume their diplomatic course;" that "all the belligerent forces should retire from the places where motives of war had called them;" and that his majesty should name an ambassador "to treat directly with Turkey," and conclude a convention, to be "submitted to a conference of the four powers." The adoption of this plan, concluded the emperor, "on which the Queen of England and myself are perfectly agreed," will "re-establish tranquillity and satisfy the world."—On the 9th of February, the czar returned a reply to the imperial letter, most ably written, as all the Russian diplomatic documents were. It took the same tone as the despatches of Count Nesselrode; recapitulated the same statements and claims as to the privileges of the Greek church and the Russian protectorate; maintained that "the occupation of the principalities was anticipated by the apparition of the combined fleets in the neighbourhood of the Dardanelles;" and, after expressing sentiments nearly similar to those comprised in his reply to the deputation from the Society of Friends, his majesty offered to negotiate if the Turks would send him a negotiator; but added, that his "conditions were known at Vienna," and they "were the only bases upon which he could treat." As those conditions had been rejected by the conference, there was an end of all hopes of the preservation of peace; and a manifesto of the czar, followed by one from the court of France, prepared the public for what was to follow.—In the Russian manifesto, the allied fleets were said to be sent into the Black Sea to protect the Turks, and prevent the free navigation of the Russian vessels of war—"a course of proceeding unheard of amongst civilised nations." In consequence of this act, the Russian embassies had been withdrawn from London and Paris; and "England and France had sided with the enemies of Christianity, against Russia," which was "combating for the orthodox faith."—The French manifesto, dated the 4th of March, was issued, in the form of a circular, to the diplomatic agents of the emperor.—In reply to the defence of the invasion of the principalities, by the assertion that it was the consequence of the appearance of the allied fleet in the neighbourhood of the Dardanelles, and in defence of the movements of that fleet, the French foreign minister said—

"I will only recall to recollection the fact, that if the French squadron, at the end of March, anchored in the Bay of Salamis, it was because, since the month of January, there had been an immense assemblage of troops in Bessarabia. If the forces of England and France approached the Dardanelles (where they only arrived at the end of June), it was because a Russian army had been encamped upon the banks of the Pruth, and because the resolution to cross that river had been taken, and had been officially announced, since the 31st of May. If, at a later period, our fleets were at Constantinople, it was because cannon resounded on the Danube; and, in short, if they entered the Black Sea, it was because, contrary to the promise of acting on the defensive, Russian vessels had left Sebastopol to destroy the Turkish vessels at anchor in the port of Sinope. Every step which we took, in concurrence with England, in the East, had peace for its object; and we did not desire to interfere between the belligerent parties. Every day, however, on the contrary, Russia advanced openly towards war."

In reply to the attempt, on the part of Russia, to make the war appear to be one for religion, in which the true orthodox Christians were combating with the followers of Mohammed, M. Drouyn de l'Huys denied that France and England were "supporting Islamism against the orthodox Greek faith." Their object was "to protect the Ottoman empire against the ambitious covetousness of Russia;" and by "giving their support to Turkey, they seriously believed they would render greater service to the Christian faith than the government which used that faith as an instrument to advance its temporal ambition." To this circular no reply was given. It was communicated to the Austrian and Prussian governments; though, as will be seen, they were not alluded to in the documents issuing from the Russian Chancellerie, and although they had supported the views of the western powers, having assented to their protestations against the Russian claim of a protectorate, and authorised their plenipotentiaries to sign the protocols which pledged them to support the independence and integrity of Turkey.

There were several debates in both Houses of Parliament on the subject of the war; and on the 20th of February, when the Russian question was before the House of Commons, Mr. Disraeli blamed the ministry for not having taken advantage of the warnings of their envoys, and been prepared for the events which were almost certain to occur. Their conduct, he said, must "have originated in morbid credulity or connivance." If the former, still "the war might be conducted to an honourable issue;" if the latter, "it could only be brought to a discreditable result."—Mr. Cobden also spoke warmly against the government; defending the conduct of Russia, and charging the Porte with cruelty and tyranny towards its Christian subjects. He would not, he said, "give six months' purchase for the popularity of any gentleman in that House, or out of it, who voted for war."—Lords John Russell and Palmerston ably defended the government, which, said the former, was opposing only "the unjustifiable designs of Russia," and "aiding Turkey in resisting a power that had wantonly disturbed the peace of Europe."—Lord Palmerston warmly repelled the imputation of "credulity" or "connivance" to the conduct of the government. They had been deceived, because they had, "for a considerable period, put faith in the declarations of the Emperor of Russia." In one of his circulars, Count Nesselrode asserted, that the government of England had, from the beginning, been aware of the designs of Russia. But his lordship emphatically denied that such was the case.

This debate, and the rejection, by the czar, of the proposals of the Emperor of France, left no doubt on the minds of the public that war would be soon declared; and all the measures of the government were warlike. The number of troops was raised from 102,283, the estimate in 1858, to 112,977; and the seamen were augmented from 31,000 to 41,000. An army of 20,000 men was ordered to be organised for active service in the East, under the command of General Lord Raglan, who, as Lord Fitzroy Somerset, was the trusted aide-de-camp of the Duke of Wellington in the Peninsular war. The Coldstream Guards formed a part of this army; and that gallant regiment left London to embark for the East on the 14th of February. In that month and March, the remainder of the troops were despatched from Bristol, Liverpool, Portsmouth, and Southampton, their first destination being Malta.—They were to be supported by a larger French force, under the command of Marshal Leroy de St. Arnaud. The Emperor of the French had been, at first, "extremely averse to sending any troops to the East, hoping that the naval superiority of the allies would suffice for the protection of Constantinople." But the position of Omar Pasha—who, though his troops had been victorious, was still inferior in numbers to the enemy after the latter had been reinforced—excited attention. He was quite unable to defend Constantinople if an attack should be made upon that capital, as appeared to be the design of the czar, from the extent and position of a large part of his force, distinct from that which occupied the principalities; and it was at length resolved, by the two governments, "to protect the Turkish capital, and the entrance to the Dardanelles," with a view of preventing "the Russians from renewing that movement which brought them to Saros and Rodesto in 1829;" which would enable them to seize the European castles of the Dardanelles, and obtain the command of that important passage. In the depth of winter, Sir John Burgoyne surveyed the peninsula running for some miles between the Gulf of Saros on the west, and the Dardanelles on the east, anciently called the Thracian Chersonesus; now the peninsula of Gallipoli. He selected the port of Gallipoli, about 132 miles W.S.W. of Constantinople, as the place of debarkation, and designed works in that very neighbourhood for the protection of the Strait.

It was also resolved, in order to prevent Russia from increasing her naval force in the Black Sea, to send a combined fleet to the Baltic, where that power had a numerous fleet, and had strongly fortified Cronstadt, Sveaborg, Helsingfors, and other ports. The utmost activity had pervaded the naval department as well as the military at the close of 1853 and the commencement of 1854; and in the month of February, a magnificent armament was collected, "being"—a contemporary writer is quoted—"the finest that even this country, so long famed as 'the mistress of the seas,' ever despatched from her harbours." It was in two divisions. The first—of which Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Napier was commander-in-chief—consisted of nine ships of the line and eight steam-frigates. The second, under Rear-Admiral Corry, comprised eleven ships of the line —seven being sailing vessels, and four screw-steamers— and twelve frigates and sloops. Four steamers that were in the North Sea were also ordered to join this fleet as soon as it reached the Baltic. Thus there were forty-four vessels of all sizes in the fleet; carrying 2,206 guns, manned by 21,696 seamen; and the steamers were impelled by engines of the power of 14,562 horses.

France was preparing armaments as well as England; and, whilst these military and naval preparations were going on, the two governments resolved to send a message to St. Petersburg, calling upon the czar to enter, within six days, into an engagement to evacuate the Danubian principalities on or before the 30th of April; a refusal to be considered as a declaration of war. Captain Blackwood, the English messenger, left London on the 27th of February. The French message was transmitted simultaneously, through Earl Cowley, to the British consul at the Russian capital.—At that time a treaty was negotiating between England, France, and Turkey, which was signed at Constantinople on the 12th of March. It was offensive and defensive; the two western powers engaging to send, besides their naval forces, troops to defend the sultan's dominions. The three powers were to communicate to each other any proposition made for the attainment of peace; and the sultan bound himself not to enter into any agreement with Russia without the consent of his allies.—France and England agreed to withdraw their troops and their ships from the Ottoman territory within forty days after the exchange of the ratifications of peace; and those powers were to be free to act where and how they thought expedient, without any control on the part of the Porte.—French and English messages were delivered to the czar five days after this treaty was signed. M. Michele, the British consul, was the medium of communication: he was sent for, by the Russian Chancellor, on the 18th of March; and after a friendly greeting, Count Nesselrode told him that "the emperor did not think it becoming to give any reply to Lord Clarendon's note." A similar answer was returned to the French message; and Captain Blackwood immediately left St. Petersburg. He arrived in London on the 25th of March. On the 27th, the Queen sent a message to both Houses, informing them that the negotiations with Russia had terminated; and that "her majesty felt bound to afford active assistance to her ally, the sultan, against unprovoked aggression."—On the 28th, the declaration of war appeared in the Gazette, accompanied by a proclamation reserving the rights of trade and commerce to neutrals, except in contraband of war, and the conveying of despatches for the enemy. Similar declarations were simultaneously issued by France.

On the 31st of March, the Queen's message was taken into consideration by the parliament. In both Houses the conduct of the government was severely censured; and the Earl of Derby in one, and Mr. Disraeli in the other, remarked, that it was not till the Earl of Aberdeen took office that the czar ventured to press his demands upon Turkey. The noble earl denied that he gave any encouragement to the designs of Russia; on the contrary, he always opposed them. He still, he said, made peace his first object; but while he did so, he did not think he was inconsistent in carrying on a just and necessary war. In both Houses addresses were carried, expressive of "the firm determination" of Lords and Commons "to co-operate with her majesty in a vigorous resistance to the projects of a sovereign whose further aggrandisement would be dangerous to the independence of Europe." The only dissentients were Earl Grey in the Lords, and the Marquis of Granby and Mr. Bright in the Commons.—On the 12th of April, a long reply to the declaration of war appeared in the St. Petersburg Gazette. The czar repeated much that was contained in the diplomatic correspondence in justification of the seizure of the principalities; and said, to abandon them without the fulfilment of the conditions demanded of the Ottoman government, and in the brunt of a war which that government was the first to declare, was inadmissible.

The declaration of war caused another protocol to be drawn up at Vienna, known as the "Protocol of the 9th of April;" it being signed on that day by the Austrian minister of foreign affairs, and the plenipotentiaries of England, France, and Prussia. This document states, in the preamble, that—

"The change which has taken place in the attitude of two of the powers represented at the conference of Vienna, in consequence of a step taken directly by France and England, supported by Austria and Prussia as being founded in right, has been considered by the representatives of Austria and Prussia as involving the necessity of a fresh declaration of the union of the four powers, upon the ground of the principles laid down in the protocols of December 5, 1853, and January 13, 1854."

The provisions for maintaining inviolate the independence and integrity of Turkey, and of which the evacuation of the Danubian principalities was one of the essential conditions, and for consolidating with the independent sovereignty of the sultan a guarantee for the civil and religious rights of his Christian subjects, were recapitulated. The territorial independence of the Porte was stated to be "the sine qua non of every transaction having for its object the re-establishment of peace between the belligerent powers." The parties to the protocol engaged to endeavour to discover the guarantees most likely to attach the existence of that empire to the general equilibrium of Europe; and not to enter into any arrangement with Russia, or any other power, at variance with the principles laid down in the protocol.

On the 10th of April, a treaty was concluded at London, between England and France, by which the two powers agreed—

To use their efforts to restore peace between the Sublime Porte and Russia, upon a solid and durable basis. [Art. 1.]—To concert the best means to free the territory of the sultan from foreign invasion; and to maintain military and naval forces sufficient to meet the emergency. [Art. 2.]—Not to accept any proposals for the cessation of hostilities, nor to enter into any engagement with Russia, without previous deliberation in common. [Art. 3.]—And to receive into their alliance any other powers willing to co-operate for the proposed object. [Art. 4.]

This treaty was ratified on the 15th of April, and immediately published in both countries. It was followed by one of "offensive and defensive alliance," concluded at Berlin on the 20th, between Austria and Prussia, for the purpose of "guaranteeing to each other, reciprocally, the possession of their German and non-German dominions."

The Vienna conference met frequently after the treaty of the 20th of April was concluded; and, on the 30th, another protocol was drawn up and signed by the plenipotentiaries of the four powers, by which the assent of their governments was given to the treaties concluded between England and France on the one hand, and Austria and Prussia on the other: whilst the integrity of the Ottomon territory, and the evacuation of the principalities, was solemnly declared "to be the constant and invariable object of the union of the four powers."—Although Count Arnim signed this protocol with the full assent of his government, that government, almost immediately, evinced unmistakable signs of a desire to avoid making any manifestation hostile to Russia. The Chevalier Bunsen was recalled from the embassy at London; Count Usedom from that at Rome; General Bonin, the Minister of War, was dismissed; and the Prince of Prussia had to give up his command in the army, and ask leave to travel. These officials were deprived of office on account of their anti-Russian tendencies; and they were replaced by others more favourable to the czar. Still the king retained his plenipotentiary at the Vienna conference; and even agreed to make, with Austria, a joint demand upon the czar for the evacuation of the principalities. This demand was forwarded to St. Petersburg, after the signature of the convention between Austria and Turkey, on the 14th of June; and on the 29th, Count Nesselrode replied in the name of the czar, demanding from the Austrian government, "an explanation upon the subject of the guarantees which it could give;" that received, "the emperor, from deference to the wishes and interests of Germany," would be "disposed to enter into negotiations, for the purpose of fixing the precise time of evacuation." This led to more correspondence—further meetings of the Vienna conference—and to the declaration of the required guarantees forming the bases of future negotiations, as agreed upon by England, France, and Austria; Prussia, at first, withholding her assent. Those guarantees are known as the "Four Points of August 8," being adopted on that day. They are given verbatim, as they were subsequently acted upon, and formed the basis of the ultimate peace.

"The three powers are equally of opinion, that the relations of the Sublime Porte with the imperial court of Russia, cannot be re-established on solid and durable bases—1st. If the protectorate hitherto exercised by the imperial court of Russia over the principalities of Wallachia, Moldavia, and Servia, be not discontinued for the future; and if the privileges accorded by the sultans to those provinces (dependencies of the empire) be not placed under the collective guarantee of the powers, in virtue of an arrangement to be concluded with the Sublime Porte, the stipulations of which should, at the same time, regulate all questions of detail.—2ndly. If the navigation of the Danube, at its mouths, be not freed from all obstacles, and submitted to the application of the principles established by the acts of the congress of Vienna.—3rdly. If the treaty of the 13th of July, 1841, be not revised, in concert, by the high contracting powers, in the interest of the balance of power in Europe.—4thly. If Russia do not give up the claim to exercise an official protectorate over the subjects of the Sublime Porte, to whatever rite they may belong; and if Austria, France, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia do not lend their mutual assistance to obtain, as an initiative from the Ottoman government, the confirmation and the observance of the religious privileges of the different Christian communities; and to turn to account, in the common interest of their co-religionists, the generous intentions manifested by his majesty the sultan, at the same time avoiding any aggressions on his dignity and the independence of his crown."

While the conferences were being held at Vienna, and about a month before the final decision was come to, Prince Alexander Gortschakoff, brother to the commander of the Russian troops in the principalities, arrived on a special mission from the czar. At first the object was not apparent; but, on the 9th of August, the day after the "Four Points" were accepted by the plenipotentiaries of the three powers, the prince informed Count Buol, that his imperial master, "out of deference to the wishes of Austria," had agreed to evacuate the principalities. The prince was informed that Austria, in pursuance of her convention with Turkey, meant to occupy them till the conclusion of the war; but "not with any hostile intentions towards Russia."—The next day, the "Four Points" were transmitted to St. Petersburg, with instructions to the Austrian ambassador (Prince Esterhazy), to press their acceptance firmly and decisively on the czar. A qualified assent to the "points" having been obtained from Prussia, on the 13th of August, instructions, similar in tendency to those of Austria, were also despatched to M. Manteuffel, the Prussian ambassador; but they were much less decisive in tone.—On the 29th of the month, the answer of the czar was transmitted by Count Nesselrode. It was a refusal, the conditions being "unacceptable in substance as well as in form;" and that principally because, "with the ostensible purpose of maintaining the European equilibrium," nothing less was aimed at than the destruction of the establishments of the Russian marine in the Black Sea.—Soon after, Baron Meyendorff was recalled from Vienna, and Prince Alexander Gortschakoff was installed in the Russian embassy at that city.

We will now return to the naval and military proceedings of the war.

The departure of troops from England, and the assembling of a great naval armament at Spithead, have been already noticed. On Friday, the 10th of March, her majesty went to Spithead to inspect this fleet, accompanied by the Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice. The scene was one of the greatest excitement, from the number of yachts and boats afloat, the crowds assembled on the shores, and the enthusiasm which prevailed. The next day, the first division left Spithead, her majesty accompanying the vessels in the Fairy steamer till they were fairly out at sea. The second division sailed on the 16th of March, her majesty again bearing it company some miles. The Baltic was reached on the 20th of March. Several of the Russian ports were soon after blockaded; and attacks were made upon vessels in some of them. A "flying squadron," sent into the Gulf of Bothnia, under Rear-Admiral Plumridge, also inflicted considerable loss upon the Russians; but there was no honour conferred on the British flag.

The French fleet of twenty-three vessels, large and small, under Vice-Admiral Parseval Deschênes, was organised, and arrangements made for its sailing, about the same time that the English fleet was got ready; but it did not leave Brest till the 23rd of April. Its first division passed the Great Belt on the 11th of May; and the 13th of June arrived before a junction was effected with the English fleet. Then it was confidently expected that a descent would be made on some part of the Russian dominions. Public opinion pointed to Cronstadt, a strongly-fortified port on the side of the small island of Kotlinoi, in the Gulf of Finland, about eighteen miles W. of St. Petersburg. There the Russians had twenty-two ships of the line, five frigates, three brigs and corvettes, and seven paddle-wheel steamers, moored under the protection of the fortifications, the ships mounting 2,154 guns. The admirals did direct their attention to this formidable position; and a reconnaissance led to the opinion generally entertained by the officers of both fleets, that a successful attack was next to impossible; therefore it was declined. As the cholera prevailed to a considerable extent on board the ships, and many of the crews succumbed to the disease, probably that might have something to do with the decision adopted, not to attack Cronstadt. But it was felt by the commanders that something must be attempted to allay the discontent which was beginning to be displayed, in the fleet as well as at home, at the continued inaction of the two great naval armaments.

Another important position taken up in the Baltic by the Russians, was the Aland Isles, lying at the northern extremity of the sea, at the entrance to the Gulf of Bothnia, and a few miles to the westward of the Gulf of Finland. These isles are about 200 in number, only sixty being inhabited; and they "form a continuation of the 'scheeren'—a dangerous labyrinth of granite reefs, which, with little interruption, extend along the south coast of Finland, from Wyborg to Abo." Russia had secured their possession by the treaty of Frederickshaum, concluded in 1809. After the peace of 1815, fortifications and a town had been erected on Aland, the largest island, from which the group derives its name. Two islets, Signisklar and Prastö, had also some works thrown up upon them; but it was on Bomarsund that the most money was expended. Twenty years were devoted to the erection of works on this island, at a cost of £6,000,000. It was intended to become the Sebastopol of Northern Europe; to protect the Aland group, and annoy Sweden. Papers found, when Bomarsund was captured, developed the further plans of the czar, who contemplated obtaining Gothland from Sweden, and Bornholm from Denmark; fortifying those islands on the same plan as Bomarsund; and thus enabling him, with the numerous fleet that he possessed in the Baltic, to command that sea and its gulfs, and establish a dominant power over Sweden and Denmark, placing them at his mercy.

Sir Charles Napier had not overlooked these islands when proceeding to the Gulf of Finland; and on the 21st of June, the Hecla, Odin, and Valorous, under Captain Hall, of the Hecla, had made a demonstration on Bomarsund and Prastö. The result appears to have convinced the admirals that troops were necessary to aid the naval force, and 10,000 men were sent from Calais, in English transports, to take part in the siege of Bomarsund. The troops were under the command of General Baraguay d'Hilliers, who had, a short time before, been recalled from the embassy at Constantinople. The men embarked on the 14th and 15th of July; and, on the 30th, reached the harbour of Ledsund, formed by the island of Seurland on the north, and a number of smaller ones on the south and west, where the fleets had anchored, awaiting their arrival. The siege artillery did not arrive till the 6th of August; and the transports bearing the troops entered the bay Ytternäs, a fine semicircular inlet on the coast of Bomarsund, on the 6th. On the 7th they were landed; and the operations, in which English sailors and marines took part, commenced. They continued till the 16th, and were completely successful, all the works on the island being taken. The last fort was surrendered to prevent an assault, which it would have been impossible for the garrison to withstand. The commander (General Bodisco, an old man eighty years of age) sent a priest to order the fort on the Prastö also to be given up: Aland was then occupied, and the English and French flags supplanted that of Russia.—On the 20th of August, a proclamation was issued, recommending the inhabitants to maintain order and peace; and informing them that they were at liberty to trade with Sweden, but must not hold any intercourse with the enemy. A few days after, a deputation of the inhabitants went to Stockholm, to solicit the king to take possession of the isles, and incorporate them with Sweden. His majesty gave no reply at that time.

The loss of the allies in the attack on Bomarsund was inconsiderable. Of the Russians, 2,235 were made prisoners, fifty-one of whom were officers, and seven officers' wives; 198 guns, 200 tons of powder, a quantity of shot, and provisions sufficient to sustain 3,000 men for a long period, were also taken. The allies did not remain long in the Baltic after the capture; completely evacuating the isles in September, to the great grief of the inhabitants. The government at home had written to Sir Charles Napier, wishing him to attack Sveaborg and Helsingfors. A council of war was held on board the Duke of Wellington, the admiral's flag-ship, on the 12th of September; and the decision was, that the season was too far advanced to admit of the operation being undertaken. This decision was communicated to London and Paris; and was very unsatisfactory to the British government. Sir James Graham sent a second despatch, which arrived on the 18th of September, desiring that another council might be held to reconsider the decision of the first. This council the French admiral refused to attend, and his fleet started on its home voyage on the 19th. Sir Charles again submitted the question to his own admirals, who adhered to their former decision. The First Lord of the Admiralty still held to his opinion, that the attack might be made; but Sir Charles Napier declined to run the risk, and the English fleet left the Baltic. The vessels departed at different times, all the English not reaching port till the middle of December. It was the 17th of that month when Sir Charles Napier landed at Portsmouth. He immediately proceeded to London, where he was very coolly received by Sir James Graham, who declined to have any conversation with him, and he returned to his flag-ship. On the 23rd, he received an order from the Admiralty to strike his flag, and come on shore.

During the summer of 1854, a small force, consisting of only three vessels, under the command of Commodore Erasmus Ommanney, was sent to blockade the Russian ports, and to destroy the property of the Russian government, in the White Sea. This expedition was successful, a considerable amount of public property being destroyed on the islands of Solovetskoi and Kio; and at Kola, the capital of Russian Lapland. Private property was also injured; but not where it could be avoided. The expedition, however, was one of those which reflect no honour on the British arms; and it is to be regretted that it was undertaken.—In September, a small English and French squadron attacked Petropaulovski, the capital of Russian Kamschatka, seated on the bay of Aoatschai, on the eastern side of the Kamschatkan peninsula. The attack was unsuccessful. It was undertaken in consequence of information received from three American seamen, deserters from whalers, who, it is believed, purposely deceived the English and French commanders; as the numbers of the enemy were greater, and their position defended by a dense brushwood much stronger, than was represented. After a very smart struggle, bravely sustained on both sides, the allies, finding they could not succeed, retired to their boats, carrying off their dead and wounded, amounting to 107 English, and 102 French. The enemy own to having 115 men put hors de combat; and they lost a quantity of stores and other matériel. The united squadrons left the bay on the 7th of September; and the English vessels, the same day, captured the Russian steamer Amadis, and a merchant vessel, called the Sitka, conveying stores to the garrison of Petropaulovski, valued at 200,000 dollars. The French men-of-war wintered at San Francisco: the English having burnt the Amadis, carried the Sitka to Vancouver's Island.

The military events were not of much interest or importance till autumn approached. The English troops, in the first instance, stopped at Malta, where 12,000 men arrived early in March; and they were joined by the first division of the French contingent (under 1,000 men), on the 23rd.—On the 31st, the departure for Gallipoli commenced: to that spot the troops subsequently despatched from England and France were directed; and there, before April closed, the main force of the two nations was collected, and encamped in the neighbourhood of the port; the English tents extending to the south-west, the French to the north-west of the town, and being about three-quarters of a mile apart. The situation was not unpleasant, the surrounding country being richly wooded, with olive, fig, and almond-trees; with, here and there, a well-built farm-house, prettily situated amongst them.

Whilst the allies were passing from England and France to Gallipoli, and establishing themselves in that vicinity, an insurrection was raging in the provinces of Greece attached to the Turkish empire, fomented and encouraged by the agents of Russia; and to which Otho—who was the sovereign placed on the throne of the Grecian kingdom by the protecting powers, England, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, under whose auspices that state was formed—lent his countenance and support. Fuad Effendi was sent from Constantinople to direct the movements for the suppression of this rebellion. He arrived at Prevesa on the 7th of March. Various encounters took place in different directions; most of them of little importance. They were not all favourable to the Turks; and as Otho permitted recruiting for the insurgent forces in his kingdom, it is doubtful how the affair might have ended if England and France had not interfered. The envoys of those powers first required the king to affix his signature to the protocol of Vienna; and on his refusing to do so, except under a protest that he "had been compelled to yield to force," a naval and military armament was despatched from Gallipoli, which anchored in the Piræus on the 25th of May. A body of English and French marines was landed, and about 3,000 troops, under the command of General Forey. They took possession of the ships in the harbour, planted the English flag in the square of Themistocles in the Grecian capital, and encamped on the hills which, in the form of a semicircle, overlook Athens. Otho had no means of resistance; he therefore at once sent in his submission; dismissed those officials who had been most conspicuous and active in the movement against Turkey; changed his ministry, appointing Mavrocordato president of his new council; and proclaimed a strict neutrality in the war. The ships then returned to Gallipoli, leaving 3,000 men at Athens; and the insurgents, defeated by Fuad Effendi on the 18th of June, with great loss, at Kalabaka, fled to the mountains, making no further resistance. Turkey had lost £1,000,000 by the insurrection; and the sultan claimed indemnity from Otho, with guarantees that no future acts of aggression would be permitted. Otho could not pay the indemnity; but he substituted a treaty of commerce, in which the limits between his dominions and those of the sultan were defined. A Greek minister was then sent to Constantinople, and a Turkish ambassador to Athens: the friendly relations between Otho and the western powers were also renewed; but the Russian ambassador was withdrawn; "as the representatives of that power," said the Russian Chancellor, "could only be suffered to remain at unshackled and independent courts."

Meantime the allies continued encamped at Gallipoli; the English troops already feeling the inconveniences of a deficient commissariat, which subsequently produced such evils in the Crimea. A lady writing from the camp says—

"Our condition was such, that the possession of a Dutch cheese was quite reason enough for asking friends to dinner; and there was such a cackling about a goose that some one had brought home from a village at his saddle-bow, and had been tied to a tent-pole ever since, that those who were not invited to eat him will, I am persuaded, never forgive those that were. The matter will, very reasonably, become a heir-loom grievance, and be handed down as an hereditary feud."

The lady writes pleasantly and lightly; but the men felt their privations severely, officers and privates experiencing them alike. Not only were provisions short, but the medical department was insufficiently supplied. "There were few blankets for the sick, no beds, no mattresses;" and the unfortunate invalids had often "to lie on the bare boards, in a wooden house, with nothing but a single blanket for bed and covering." Still all was not unpleasant. "The climate," writes Mrs. Younge, "was healthful and agreeable; the scenery exquisitely beautiful:" and, at that period, "all was energy and hope; the men were not wearied by delays, nor the officers harassed by their natural results." The soldiers of the two nations were on the best terms; and the attention of the English "was continually excited by the groups of French strolling about in all sorts of picturesque costumes." These were principally the Zouaves, a branch of the French army, which originated in the formation of a native force in Algeria during the reign of Louis Philippe. One native Arab regiment was retained, called the tirailleurs indigènes, or native riflemen; but, in 1854, the greater part of the Zouaves were Frenchmen, retaining the Arab name and costume. Another corps, the Spahis, were by birth, dress, and equipments, purely Arab. They wore the Moorish jacket, richly embroidered, their head and shoulders being enveloped in white bernoos, and their saddles richly decorated with velvet and gold. Another conspicuous branch of the French army, frequently mentioned in the despatches of the time, was the Chasseurs de Vincennes; the men were trained to the use of the rifle; and "had acquired an unrivalled celerity of action, and an almost unrivalled precision in firing." They derived their name, Chasseurs (i.e., light-horse), from the former.

There was not sufficient accommodation at Gallipoli for all the troops; and Lieutenant-General Sir George Brown (who commanded till the arrival of Lord Raglan), when the Himalaya arrived, on the 14th of April, with the 33rd and 41st regiments on board, ordered her to Scutari, the ancient Chrysopolis, now the largest suburb of Constantinople, lying opposite that city, on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus. There another English camp was formed; and there, after the arrival of Lord Raglan on the 2nd of May, the English head-quarters were established. The Duke of Cambridge, who commanded the 1st division of the British army, arrived on the 9th of May. Prince Napoleon, the cousin of the Emperor of France, preceded his royal highness, having landed on the 29th of April; and Marshal de St. Arnaud joined the army the second week in May. There was much festivity, alternately at the camp and Constantinople, after the arrival of these royal and distinguished personages; but soon the commanders-in-chief turned their attention to sterner things. Having, after Marshal de St. Arnaud's arrival, received the report of Lord de Ros, who had been sent on a mission to Varna and Shumla, and returned on the 17th of May, Lord Raglan and the marshal resolved, themselves, to go to Varna, for the purpose of having a personal interview with Omar Pasha. They left Constantinople on the 18th of May; and the result was a determination that the allied troops should occupy Varna, their presence on the other side of the Turkish capital being considered no longer necessary for its safety. As soon as the commanders-in-chief returned to the camps, the orders to prepare for departure were issued. At that time the English army in the East numbered 22,000 men—viz., 5,000 at Gallipoli, and 17,000 at Scutari: of the latter, 12,000 were encamped; the remainder were in barracks.

The orders for embarkation were chiefly carried out under Lieutenant-General Sir George Brown. Everything being arranged, Sir George left for Varna on the 28th of May, that he might also superintend the disembarkation. The light division of the British army embarked on the 29th; the other divisions following day after day, till all had left Gallipoli and Scutari. The French had preceded us, some of their troops landing at Varna before the light division had embarked. During the embarkation, on the 4th of June, Lord Raglan was surprised by a visit from the marshal, to inform him that he had determined to send only one division of his army to Varna; the remainder he intended to march inland, and take up a position in rear of the Balkan range, his head-quarters being at Aidos, and his right resting on the Black Sea, at Bourgas, about twenty-five miles S. of Varna. He wished Lord Raglan to move the bulk of the English army in the same direction; but his lordship refused, and, ultimately, the French commander gave way. But he had, before he yielded to the firmness and more prudent councils of his companion-in-arms, sent General Bosquet and his division forwards to Adrianople. They continued their march, halting at that city, where General Bosquet established his quarters in the old seraglio, and the troops were encamped upon an island formed by two branches of the river Tondja, and called the Island of the Seraglio.

The disembarkation of both armies at Varna appeared to be a proceeding of joyous excitement; and "preparations for so deadly a game as war were certainly never ushered in by so much fun and gaiety." It was the middle of June before all the troops were landed; the first division, the Duke of Cambridge and staff, arriving on the 13th. It had been arranged that the French head-quarters should be at Varna, and those of the English at the village of Devna, about eight miles distant; and the two camps were formed in the vicinity of the respective head-quarters, the English having two—one for cavalry, in the immediate neighbourhood of Devna, the other further advanced on the road to Varna. At first the position of the allies was far from unpleasant. A correspondent at the English camp informs us, that any quantity of beef and mutton, and plenty of bread, could be procured, with a good supply of water; but vegetables were scarce. For the French, the government at Paris, as soon as it was apprised that the army was en route to Varna, entered into arrangements with a company at Pera, called the "Commercial Union;" the members of which—though, with the exception of one man, who was an Austrian, they were all French—were well acquainted with the interior. This company engaged to supply the French camp with provisions of every kind, being allowed a commission on the market price. Thus the French had a sufficiency of all necessaries, and many comforts, and never suffered so severely as the British from the defects of their commissariat. The men, however, while at Varna were greatly afflicted with disease; as were the English after a short time—the result of the climate.—An establishment had been left at Scutari, to take charge of the barracks, and property that was not removed to Varna. The large hospital at that place had been placed at Lord Raglan's disposal, and there confirmed invalids, and subsequently the wounded, were sent.

After the landing, the troops were most eager to march forward to the relief of Silistria, the surrender of that city being daily expected; and Lord Cardigan was despatched, with detachments of the cavalry under his command, to patrol the whole country to Trajan's Wall, on the confines of the Dobrutscha, returning by the coast and Shumla, for the purpose of ascertaining the position of the Russian army, and its outposts. A few days after his departure, it was known that the siege of Silistria was raised. When this event and the departure of the Russians were announced, the discontent at inaction increased, and officers and men were alike anxious to be engaged in active war.—On the 2nd of July, Omar Pasha arrived at the English camp, and went on to Varna, where he held several councils with the English and French generals. On the 5th, his highness reviewed the French troops—30,000 in number; and on the 6th, the English army passed before him. He had expressed his approbation of our allies most unreservedly to the officers of both countries. But he appears to have been struck with still more admiration at the magnificent appearance of the Guards and Highlanders; whilst he was perfectly astonished at seeing the movements of the cavalry and artillery; and when the 42nd passed him, he exclaimed in French to Marshal de St. Arnaud—"Did you ever see such troops, marshal? I did not believe that, in the armies of Europe, a division like this was to be found!"—"You are right! you are right!" was the reply of the marshal, who may be pardoned if he envied the fine fellows who thus took the prestige away from his own men. The same evening, Omar Pasha departed for Shumla. His visit had caused great excitement while it lasted; but when he was gone, the murmurs at the "continued inaction" were still heard.—Another sensation was caused, on the 12th of July, by the return of the Earl of Cardigan and his detachments from their extended reconnaissance. They had ascertained little about the Russians, except that the main force had returned to the left bank of the Danube, only a few Cossacks remaining in the Dobrutscha. They found the country desolated by those wild warriors; and the Bashi-Bazouks (as certain irregular levies in the Turkish army are called) had great difficulty in finding food for themselves, and forage for their beasts; and having no tents, had bivouacked for seventeen nights.—The sensation created by this arrival soon passed away; and the discontent being rife in both armies—the sufferings from heat aggravating the disgust felt at their inactivity—Marshal de St. Arnaud, with a view to check it amongst the French, sent a division of Zouaves, under General L'Espinasse, to make a reconnaissance in the Dobrutscha, supported by a troop of Bashi-Bazouks, organised by General Yussuf. It had better have remained at the camp. The party started on the 24th of July; and on the 29th, the Bashi-Bazouks, having entered the Dobrutscha, encountered, near the village of Babatagh, a party of Cossacks, whom they attacked and put to flight, though superior in number. There was little more fighting; for, although several wandering parties of Cossacks were met with, and a few slight skirmishes ensued, they always made off, if possible. But the country was completely devastated. Dead bodies and calcined skeletons were found in the road in great numbers; and the air was perfectly pestilential. This caused disease to break out both amongst the French and Turks; General l'Espinasse being so ill, that he was obliged to leave his command, and return to Varna. Marshal de St. Arnaud immediately recalled the expedition; but 2,000 of the men died before it reached the camp.—The disease of cholera was, at that time, very prevalent in both camps: several officers died; and the Duke of Cambridge was so severely affected with diarrhœa, that he had to be removed to Constantinople. The disease was equally prevalent on board the ships, several losing from twenty to fifty men: on board one French vessel there were about 200 deaths.—This was not all the armies had to contend with. A fire broke out at Varna on the 10th of August, which destroyed about one-seventh of that town; and, unfortunately, it was that part in which the stores were deposited. Great quantities of provisions were consumed, or rendered useless; as were a great part of the tools and matériel of the engineers; 19,000 pairs of shoes, stored for the soldiers; and a quantity of cavalry sabres, which were fused into the most fantastic shapes. The loss was estimated at £1,000,000 sterling; and many persons who had collected large quantities of goods on account of the presence of the armies, and lost their all, were ruined. Yet the event is thought to have produced benefit. It no doubt purified the air; and it was supposed this had the effect of producing a mitigation of the cholera, which almost immediately took place.

During this period, the minds of the commanders-in-chief were occupied with the question, what would be the future destination of the army? as well as with the sufferings of the men. The main objects of the appearance of the allies in the East—the evacuation of the principalities, and the defeat of the Russians, which had dispersed the fears as to the safety of Constantinople—were attained; and the position of Russia was such, that the czar must have been induced to sign a peace upon any fair and honourable terms. But while the war was continued on the Danube, the English people were anxious that their army should not come out of the contest without an opportunity of displaying its prowess, and once more claiming the honour due to victory. A descent upon some part of the Russian empire was loudly called for: and the prediction made by Count Pozzo di Borgo in 1828, that if ever England came to a rupture with Russia, Sebastopol "would be the point to which she would direct her attacks, if only she believed success possible," was realised. The place named, though familiar to us now, was, previous to 1854, a terra incognita to most persons. It is a large harbour, with a town rising on its borders, at the south-western angle of the peninsula, now called the Crimea, the ancient Taurica Chersonesus, by which name it was known 1,400 years B.C. It has been subject to numerous dynasties; Scythians, Greeks, Romans, Tartars, Genoese, and Turks, have ruled there; and it now forms the most southern portion of European Russia; the Empress Catherine having acquired its dominion in 1783. In January, 1787, that empress made a tour of the peninsula, escorted by the Emperor of Austria, the King of Poland, Marshal P. Lacy, of Austria, and Napoleon, M. Lacy, of Grogno. At Kherson she recorded the memorable words—"The road to Byzantium." Since her time, the sovereigns of Russia considered the Crimea as one of their most important provinces; and they fortified Sebastopol as they did Bomarsund, with a view to make it at once a citadel of defence and an arsenal and store-house of matériel, to enable them to carry on active operations for extending their empire in the East. The position of the Crimea—projecting as it does, "like an advanced bastion into the midst of the Black Sea;" thus "completely commanding the mouths of two of the greatest rivers of Eastern Europe, the Don and the Dnieper;" whilst it lies "opposite to the Danube and the Bosphorus"—admiraby adapts it for this purpose; and before the siege of Silistria was raised, and the principalities evacuated, it was declared, in the Times, that "the grand political and military objects of the war could not be attained as long as Sebastopol and the Russian fleet were in existence:" but that the capture of the port, and "the occupation of the Crimea, were objects which would well repay all the costs of the war, and permanently settle in our favour the principal questions in dispute." Whether this was an original idea of the paper we quote, or was first suggested to the editor by the Duke of Newcastle, in order that public opinion might be ascertained as to a project his grace had formed in his own mind, will, probably, never be ascertained. There are parties, professing to speak from authority, who ascribe honour to the Times; whilst others, with similar confidence, say that the invasion of the Crimea was first conceived by the duke. As his grace, in a secret despatch of the 10th of April, directed Lord Raglan "to make careful inquiry into the amount and condition of the Russian force in the Crimea, and the strength of the fortress of Sebastopol"—adding, that "the heaviest blow which could be struck at the southern extremities of the Russian empire, would be the taking or destruction" of that port—the probability is, that the latter are correct. At all events, the duke brought the matter forward in the cabinet, and at length obtained the consent of his colleagues—the unwilling consent of some of them—that the expedition should be undertaken. The assent of the Emperor of France was also obtained; and on the evening of the 13th of July, Lord Raglan and Marshal de St. Arnaud both received despatches in cipher; that of the latter so obliterated that it could only be explained by Lord Raglan's. In that missive, his lordship was informed, that "unless he and Marshal Arnaud felt they were not sufficiently prepared," Sebastopol was to be besieged: it being the unanimous opinion of the cabinet, said the war minister, "that, without the reduction of this fortress, and the capture of the Russian fleet, it would be impossible to conclude an honourable and safe peace."—On the 29th of June more precise instructions were addressed to Lord Raglan, which he received on the 16th of July. In that despatch, the Duke of Newcastle repeated the opinion expressed in the "secret" communication of April 10th; and the English commander was ordered "to concert measures for the siege of Sebastopol," with the same proviso as the letter of the 28th contained; but adding the opinion of her majesty's government, that "the difficulties of the siege were more likely to increase than diminish by the delay;" and that "nothing but insuperable impediments should be allowed to prevent the early decision to undertake the operations." Lord Raglan determined that the siege should be undertaken; and although he had, at first, some difficulties to encounter with the French, he overruled them all; preparations for the embarkation of the troops were commenced; by the 24th of August they were completed; and from that day the expedition to the Crimea takes its date.—In the following chapter the narrative of that expedition will be found.

The allied fleets in the Black Sea had not been engaged in any very important undertaking since they retired to the Bay of Beicos, early in the year. They had sailed from that bay to the Bay of Baltschik, on the west side of the Black Sea, beyond Varna, before the declaration of war was received. That war was declared, was known there on the 9th of April. On the previous day, the Furious had arrived off Odessa, from Constantinople, to bring off the British consul, and seventy-five residents who were British subjects. The consul had previously left the town; and the boat conveying the officer who was sent to bring that official away, was, when retiring to the ship, fired upon, as was the frigate. An explanation was demanded of this conduct by Admirals Dundas and Hamelin; and Baron Osten-sacken, the governor, alleged that it was because the frigate, when warned, continued to advance within cannon-shot of the fort—an assertion contradicted by all the officers on board. This led to the bombardment of Odessa, on the 22nd of April, by six English and five French frigates, aided by six rocket-boats. The forts, warehouses, and barracks were destroyed, a powder-magazine exploded, a frigate in the harbour and two on the stocks were destroyed, and several of the batteries erected for the defence of the town dismantled. About 1,100 of the garrison were put hors de combat, 300 being killed. The batteries and forts returned the fire of the allies very briskly, as long as they were able; but the loss to the assailants was very trifling.—In the night of the 11th of May, the Tiger, of sixteen guns, which had been sent from Baltschik Bay on a cruise, in a thick fog ran on shore under the lighthouse of Odessa. When discovered in the morning, twelve guns were run down to the edge of the cliff which towered about 100 feet above the vessel, and was 150 feet from the spot where she lay. From these guns a fire was opened upon the defenceless ship—"a species of barbarous ferocity," remarks a contemporary, "unknown previously in modern warfare amongst civilised nations." The fire was kept up till Captain Giffard and several officers were wounded; one was killed; and a few of the seamen were also killed or wounded. More lives would have been lost had not most of the crew been sent below to extinguish a fire which had broken out in the vessel. As the fire from the shore became more furious, as no return could be made from the Tiger, where the fire was spreading, and as no help appeared in sight, Captain Giffard most reluctantly ordered the flag to be struck. Soon after the crew had been secured, the Niger and the Vesuvius were seen approaching within range. They opened a fire on the Russians, and shots were quickly interchanged till the Tiger was burnt to the water's edge, when the vessels sailed away. The prisoners were treated with great kindness by the Russians: Captain Giffard died at Odessa; the others were exchanged.

After this affair, the fleets left the bay, and cruised some days off Sebastopol, but could not tempt the Russians to leave the harbour; and they returned to Baltschik.—On the 10th of June, the Terrible, Furious, and Descartes were sent to make another reconnaissance. They ran directly into the offing, and found the same line-of-battle ships as before. As they could only see one steamer, they went to the north, hoping to meet with some of the Russian vessels out of the protection of their forts. They, however, encountered nothing but a deserted vessel laden with salt, of which they took possession; and their boats brought a schooner out of the Bay of Eupatoria.—On the 15th, when returning, and near Sebastopol, they encountered three of the enemy's steamers—five more, and three ships of the line, being in sight. A chase was kept up for nearly an hour, the three Russian steamers pursuing the English; it being the object of the latter to detach the enemy from the line-of-battle ships. At length they came within range of the guns of the Terrible, which opened her fire. A running fight was kept up from half-past twelve till two, when the Russian vessels suddenly tacked, and made for the line-of-battle ships, the allies then becoming the pursuers. Three more line-of-battle ships and two steamers had come out of the harbour: but they made no attempt upon the English and French vessels—very soon moving off in a body towards the port. The Terrible, Furious, and Descartes returned to the bay, not having received the least damage.—On the 21st, 22nd, and 26th of June, Captain Parker, in the Firebrand, and having the Fury, the Vesuvius, and a small Turkish schooner under his command, destroyed the forts and the batteries at the Kilia and Sulina mouths of the Danube; but lost his life on the 27th, when attacking a gabion battery on the north bank of the river, about half a mile from the Sulina mouth. The battery and a quarantine establishment were destroyed; but the loss of Captain Parker, a gallant and enterprising young officer, was considered as rendering the success dearly purchased.—On the 20th of July, after the receipt of orders to undertake the siege of Sebastopol, seven French and seven English vessels, with Sir George Brown, General Canrobert, and several other English and French military officers on board, were sent to reconnoitre Sebastopol and the neighbouring coast.—On the 21st, when in sight of the port, the Fury, Terrible, and Cacique, three of the British squadron, were ordered to run-in and take as near a survey as possible. They were fired upon from the shore, and the Fury was struck, but not much injured. The vessels cruised about for several days, the officers making all the observations they could; and, on the 30th of July, returned to Baltschik Bay.

CHAPTER CXIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA—THE CRIMEAN WAR.—A.D. 1854.

HE embarkation of the troops from Varna commenced on the 24th of August, Sir Edmund Lyons and Admiral Hamelin being charged with the onerous duty of superintending the operations, which they most judiciously and satisfactorily performed. The English army comprised 26,500 infantry and artillery, 54 cannon, and 1,000 cavalry; the French, 30,204 horse and foot, 68 guns, and a Turkish contingent of 7,000 men. As there were few transports attached to the French fleet, and Marshal de St. Arnaud was obliged to fill the ships of war with troops, only from eighty to a hundred cavalry were taken to perform escort duty; and the number of horses allotted to each gun was reduced from six to four. The Turks were conveyed across in their own vessels of war. The English were arranged in four divisions of infantry, a light division, and the cavalry—six in all. The first division was commanded by the Duke of Cambridge; the second, by General Sir De Lacey Evans; the third, by General Sir Richard England; the fourth, by Lieutenant-General Sir George Cathcart. Lieutenant-General Sir George Brown commanded the light division. The cavalry was commanded by General Lord Lucan. That branch of the army was divided into a light and heavy brigade; the first commanded by Brigadier-General the Earl of Cardigan; the second, by Brigadier-General the Hon. J. Scarlet. The heavy brigade was not embarked in August; and did not join the army till after the first engagement with the enemy. Prince Napoleon, Generals Canrobert, Martimprey, Thierry, Bizot, and Bosquet, were the principal officers under the command of Marshal de St. Arnaud.

The entire number of vessels collected to convey this large force of near 65,000 men, was little less than 600. The English transports were all fine vessels, and contained every accommodation for the troops: the few the French had succeeded in obtaining were very inferior. They were the sweepings of French and Italian ports, but they were made as convenient as possible. Both commanders-in-chief issued precise instructions for the guidance of the men, in an operation which Lord Raglan described as "one of much difficulty." All was to be done quietly, and without hurry; and as it was fully expected the enemy would attempt to prevent the landing, it was arranged that the men, on disembarking, should form in columns, in order of battle, and be prepared to load as soon as they stepped on shore. Besides his accoutrements, each man—officers and privates—was to carry on shore three days' provisions, the daily ration being 1 lb. of meat, 1 lb. of bread, 2 oz. of rice, 12 oz. of sugar, 1 oz. of coffee, and half a gill of rum. The preparation of the meat, &c., for the three days, kept the cooks fully employed on board the troop-ships during the voyage. The vessels, as they received the men on board at Varna, proceeded to the Bay of Baltschik, the general rendezvous. There they were all collected on the 6th of September, except the French men-of-war, which sailed for Sebastopol on the 5th; on the morning of the 7th, at five o'clock, the signal-gun was fired; by seven every anchor was apeak; and soon after the transports were on their way, steam-tugs being attached to the sailing vessels; and the whole formed into six divisions, or squadrons, each conveying a division of the British army. When all were under way, the sight was splendid. "Oh! that I could describe the majestic appearance of the noble ships formed in line," wrote the correspondent of the Morning Post: "they extended in every direction beyond an eye's grasp." The English and French fleets met on the 8th of September, at the Isle of Serpents—a small rock, a short distance from the coast of Bessarabia, opposite the mouths of the Danube—on which a lighthouse has been erected. A French officer, writing on the evening of the 8th, says—"The English fleet has just arrived from Varna, and was hailed with enthusiastic huzzas, ten times repeated. Admiral Dundas, with his fourteen ships of the line, is manœuvring at this moment, to form his line of battle:" for, as the French ships had troops on board, the fighting department was allotted to the English, should the enemy make an attack during the passage.

On the 9th and 10th the fleets were inactive; the commanders-in-chief being occupied in consulting as to where the descent should be made on the first of those days; and, on the second, in reconnoitring the coast of the Crimea. There was a difference of opinion between some of the French officers and Lord Raglan as to the most convenient point for disembarkation. It had been arranged, after the former reconnaissances, that the troops should land on the south-west coast to the north of Sebastopol, in the bays of Katcha and the Alma. But General Canrobert, General Martimprey, and the principal officers of the French artillery and engineers, had, Lord Raglan says, "an indisposition to the expedition." They probably thought that the force of the enemy was superior to that of the allies; at all events, they wished for delay, and proposed that the landing should be made at Kaffa, a seaport to the east of Sebastopol, and divided from that city by a wild country, the roads of which crossed hills and mountains, and would have occasioned such delay in the transport of cannon and ammunition, that the siege could not have been undertaken that year if this plan had been adopted. Marshal de St. Arnaud was ill; he could not leave his own vessel; and he referred the question to Lord Raglan, who received the French officers on board the Caradoc. After hearing what they had to propose, his lordship quietly declined going to Kaffa, and ordered a reconnaissance, in which he invited the French officers to join, to take place the next day. The officers who made it were—Lord Raglan, Sir George Brown, Sir John Burgoyne, and Sir Edmund Lyons; Generals Canrobert, Martimprey, Thierry, and Bizot; Colonels Trochu and Lebœuf; and Admiral Bouet-Villaumez. Their decision was in favour of the south-west coast, but not exactly in the spot first selected.

To understand the brief sketch of the landing, and the campaign that followed—the limits of this work will not allow any other to be given—it is necessary that the reader should know something of the Crimea; and though he could refer to works on geography, and find there all that is needful, it will be better to mention here its principal features. The Crimea is a peninsula, united to the Russian government of Taurida by the isthmus of Perekop; lying between latitude 44° 20′ and 46° 10′ N., and longitude 32° 40′ and 36° 30′ E. Its figure is quadrilateral; and its sides are directed to the north-east, south-east, south-west, and north-west: from the angle between the north-east and south-east sides, juts out the sub-peninsula of Kertch, which is divided from Asia by the straits of Kertch and Yenikale; the former running into the Black Sea, the latter into the Sea of Azoff. The Crimea is bounded by the isthmus of Perekop on the north: on the north-west by the Gulf of Karkinite, an inlet of the Black Sea, extending from Cape Karamroun, at the northern point of the western angle of the Crimea, to Perekop. The southern point of that angle is called Cape Eskiforos, or the Tartaud; the Black Sea washes the south-west side of the Crimea, as it does the south-east; the straits of Kertch and Yenikale bound the narrow eastern side of the sub-peninsula of Kertch; and from the town of Arabat, at the north-western extremity of that sub-peninsula, to the isthmus of Perekop, the true boundary of the Crimea is the Sivash, or Putrid Sea, which opens out into numerous irregular and shallow inlets on the land side to the west; and is divided from the Sea of Azoff, on the east, by a long narrow strip, called the Tongue of Arabat, being a bank of sand drifted by the north-east winds. A narrow strait, at its north end, not more than a furlong across, and called the Strait of Genitche, unites the Putrid Sea (which takes its name from the pestilential vapours it emits), to the Sea of Azoff. The Crimea is, according to Mr. Danby Seymour, about 200 miles across, from Cape Karamroun on the west, to Cape Fanar, abutting on the Straits of Kertch, on the east; and 125 miles from Perekop on the north, to Cape Kirkineis on the south; and its area is computed at 10,050 English square miles. About two-thirds of this area, including the north and centre, is flat and arid, and form the southern portion of the steppes, or plains, which extend "over one-fifth of the Russian empire in Europe." "The remainder, comprising the whole range of its southern coast, is a mountain region, with numerous fertile and well-watered valleys;" and there are many villages, vineyards, and country-seats on the slopes of the mountains. The number of inhabitants in the peninsula is about 200,000: they are mostly Tartars.

In the Crimea there are, for its extent, very few towns. Yenikale stands on the west side of the bay of that name, and is defended by a strong citadel. A few miles to the S.W. is Kertch, at the north-western extremity of the Strait of Kertch, which from thence takes the name of Yenikale. Proceeding westward, on the south-east coast, at about sixty miles S.W. of Kertch, is Kaffa, or Theodosia, a seaport, with a good and safe harbour: twenty-two miles to the S.W. of Kaffa is Sudak, another maritime town; and about the same distance from that town, still progressing to the S.W., stands Alushta. That town is considered as marking the boundary between the eastern and western portions of the coast. A good road leads direct north from Alushta into the interior; upon which, at the distance of forty miles from the coast, Simferopol (or Simpheropol), the capital of the Crimea, is situated. This road runs direct to Perekop: one long branch turning to the north-east, about twenty miles from the capital, terminates at the Putrid Sea, near the Strait of Genitche; other roads run from Simpheropol, on the east, to Kaffa and Kertch; and on the south-west to Balaklava and Sebastopol. About eighteen miles to the south-west of Simpheropol is Bakche-serai, the only town in the Crimea which preserves the character of its Tartar origin. Proceeding along the coast from Alushta, towards Balaklava, we meet with the towns (so called, though they are no more than villages) of Ourzouf, the Gorzabita of ancient times; and Yatta, a small port, lying close to the sea-shore, at the end of a large fertile valley, and on a spacious bay; also Aloutka, a palace built by Prince Woronzoff, at the base of Ai-Petri, a limestone elevation, towering 2,500 feet above the mansion; the village of Kirkineis; and the valley of Baidar, which is in length about ten miles from east to west, and terminates in the latter direction, about five miles from Balaklava. This valley, "on account of its beauty and fertility, is termed the Crimean Tempé." There are several neat villages in the valley, with healthy inhabitants: and the Woronzoff road runs from north to south, on the western side.

The valley of Baidar, Balaklava, and Sebastopol, are on the south-west angle of the peninsula, anciently known as the Heraclidæ Chersonese. Balaklava is built at the termination of an excellent harbour, running from south to north; lofty hills guarding its entrance, which is scarcely wide enough for two vessels to pass, and shutting in from observation the noble basin, where the largest vessels can safely float. The town stands on the south shore of the harbour, and on the north are the villages of Kadakoi and Kamara; and, more to the east, about four miles from the town, that of Tchorgouna, occupying a romantic situation in a picturesque valley, through which the Tchernaya runs to the bay of Sebastopol. Four miles further, to the north-east, is Khutor Mackenzie, or Mackenzie's Farm—taking its name from Admiral Mackenzie, who, towards the close of the last century, commanded the Russian fleet in the Black Sea. The country, partly a plateau, and partly hilly, and interspersed with ravines, to the north-west of Balaklava, and where the allies encamped, is covered with ruins of the ancient city of Kherson, built by the Heraclidæ 659 years B.C. It terminates in Cape Kherson, or Chersonese, the north-western extremity of that angle of the Crimea. Between that cape and the bay of Sebastopol are several inlets or bays; Dvonia, or Double Bay; Kozatchaia, or Cossack Bay; the bay of Kamiesch; Kronglaia, or Round Bay; Arrow, or Strelets Kaia Bay; and Khersonese, or Pestchannaia Bay. Sebastopol lies about eight miles to the north of Balaklava. When the Russians took possession of the Crimea in 1783, there were no human habitations in the neighbourhood of the magnificent bay of Sebastopol, except the little village of Aktiar, at its eastern extremity. That bay runs from west to east about four miles and a-half. It is nearly one mile across at the entrance, and has an average breadth of half a mile, forming one of the finest harbours in Europe. Four spacious bays branch out from the southern coast of this harbour—viz., Karamania, or Quarantine—the first arrived at going eastward—Artillery or Commercial, South or Admiralty, and Careening Bays; in the largest, the Admiralty Bay, which runs one mile and a-half to the south, and is 400 yards wide, the fine three-deck sailing ships, which used to be the pride of the ocean, but are now superseded by iron-clad steamers, could be moored a few yards from the land. Diverging from the entrance of the Admiralty Bay to the south-east, is a fifth inlet, called, at first, the Bay of Vessels; but before the war it had received the name of the Karabelnaia Bay.

The Empress Catharine II. selected the bay of Sebastopol as the place of shelter for the Russian fleet in the Black Sea; and the town of Sebastopol was built to defend the bay. It rises between the Admiralty and Artillery Bays, and to the south of the latter, in the form of an amphitheatre. The suburb of Karabelnaia, the Wapping of Sebastopol, lies between the Careening and the Admiralty Bay; and on Karamania Bay the Quarantine station was erected. The principal streets of the town run from north to south, parallel with the Admiralty Bay. They are intersected by others, of various widths. A landing-place of stone is constructed from the harbour, approached, on the land side, beneath an architrave supported on lofty columns. Near the shore (before the war) was the house built for the reception of Catharine II. in 1787; behind it were the admiralty, arsenal, and offices of marine; in the upper part of the town were (and they still remain) the houses of the inhabitants, markets, mosques, and a Greek and an Armenian church. In the suburb of Karabelnaia were large store-houses, barracks, a naval arsenal, a military hospital, and a dockyard. The docks were formed in Karabelnaia Bay; for those works—completed at a vast expense by Mr. John Upton, an Englishman—its quays, aqueduct, and fortifications, Sebastopol was famed. The latter were only weak and insignificant till after the French revolution of 1830: then the government set to work in earnest, and spent large sums on works which it was expected would defy any force that could be sent against them. They commenced on the north side of the bay. At the entrance, to the north, was a strong fort, called Fort Constantine, which stood on a projecting cape, surrounded by a shallow shoal, where the water was scarcely two feet deep, and vessels could not approach nearer than 600 yards. It mounted 104 guns, in three tiers. To the north of this fort was the Telegraph Battery, mounting twenty-eight guns; to which our sailors gave the name of the Wasp Fort. The works were terminated in this direction by several earthen batteries, thrown up about a mile from Fort Constantine. Fort Catharine, mounting 120 guns, was also on the north coast of the harbour; and further to the east was Fort Sievarna, built on the east side of a small inlet, called the Port of Sievarna; at the head of which stood Sievarna, or the Northern Village. There was a large polygonic fortress beyond Sievarna, called the Star Fort, under the protection of which was an intrenched camp of 80,000 troops. At the termination of the harbour, inland, stood two towers, called the Inkermann lighthouses; and a little beyond was the ruined village of Inkermann. On the south side of the harbour there were six forts and batteries. To the south-west of the entrance stood the Quarantine Fort, mounting fifty-one large guns. A little to the north, Fort Alexander, with eighty-four guns, stood opposite Fort Constantine, and was similarly situated on a small cape, jutting out into shallow water. Further eastward was the Battery of Sebastopol; and still further, at the north-western corner of the Admiralty Bay, Fort Nicholas, mounting 192 guns. On the opposite corner of the bay stood Fort St. Paul, with eighty guns; and a powerful battery was erected between that fort and Careening Bay. These forts were intended to repel any attack from the sea, or from the north. On the south side of the town, a crenelated wall ran from Fort Sebastopol to the extremity of the Admiralty Bay; and from that point it was carried round the southern termination of Careening Bay. This wall was about five English miles in extent, and was three feet thick. Batteries were raised, in the form of cavaliers, behind it, on which guns were mounted, firing over the top. To the westward of Careening Bay stood the Korinleff Fort, afterwards known as the Malakoff, which completely covered the suburb of Karabelnaia, and the north-east part of the town.

Four rivers run from east to west, north of Sebastopol, at a very short distance from each other—the Belbek, the Katcha, the Alma, and the Bulganak. About five or six miles beyond the latter, is a headland—Cape Loukoul; and the sea between the embouchure of the river and the cape is called the Bay of Kalâmita. In the centre of this bay is a spot marked "Old Fort" on the maps and charts; but there is neither fort nor house near the spot, and there is neither town nor village on the coast, till we come to Eupatoria, or Koslof, a small seaport, on the coast of Kalamita Bay; but there are villages and farms in the interior; and cattle and their keepers were seen in various directions by those engaged in the reconnaissances. In the Gulf of Perekop there is only one port—Ak-metchet—which is about twelve miles to the north-east of Cape Karamroun. On the whole line of this coast, from the Bulganak to Perekop, there were no defences; and when the reconnaissance was made on the 10th, and the Caradoc came to that line of coast which extends from Cape Loukoul to Eupatoria—being an open and extended line, where there was ample space for the disembarking and formation of the troops—Lord Raglan at once decided that there the landing ought to take place. A council of war, held on board the Caradoc, adopted his lordship's suggestion, in opposition to the wish of General Canrobert, who was of opinion that the descent should have been made near the mouths of the Katcha and Alma. It was resolved by this council that the allied army should land at Old Fort; that Eupatoria should be occupied; and that, in three or four days after the landing, the army should march towards the south, with its right defended by the sea; the fleets to follow the troops along the shore, to protect them with their artillery, and to ensure their supplies. These resolutions, when submitted to Marshal de St. Arnaud, received his approval; and they were carried out as speedily as possible.—There are two lakes on the part of the coast selected for the disembarkation—the Salt Lake to the south, and the Lake Kamishla, about a mile further to the north. Between these lakes and the sea there is a narrow strip of land; and, according to the arrangement decided upon, the landing was ordered to take place in front of the Salt Lake; a buoy being laid down opposite the centre of this chosen site; and the British were to land to the north, the French to the south, of this mark. The disembarkation was to commence on the morning of the 14th of September.

On the 13th, Eupatoria (which is about forty miles north of Sebastopol) was taken possession of, without opposition—a few soldiers that were there prior to the arrival of the fleets having disappeared. Captain Brook was stationed in that town as governor, with 500 marines under his command. In the night of the 13th—how or why has never been made known—the buoy laid down opposite the centre of the Salt Lake was removed to its northern edge; and but for the promptitude and determination of Sir Edmund Lyons, great confusion must have ensued; as the English, though in their right place, would have been on the wrong side of the buoy, and must have come in contact with the French Sir Edmund, in the Agamemnon, anxious that all the arrangements should be perfect, was in motion, on the 14th of September, before dawn. He discovered the removal of the buoy, and instantly resolved that the British, still keeping to the north of the French, should land opposite Lake Kamishla, leaving the shores of the Salt Lake to their ally. Some time was unavoidably lost in communicating the change of place to the different commanders; and this enabled the French to be the first to commence disembarking. Much was said at the time, which circumstances certainly did not warrant, about the backwardness of the English, and the superior activity of our allies; all arising out of the latter taking the lead in consequence of the removal of the buoy.

Once commenced, the disembarkation went on briskly; and it produced a scene of extraordinary bustle and excitement. As the men got on shore, they were followed by boats, conveying guns, horses, waggons, cattle and sheep, provisions and beverages, spare ammunition, and all that are comprised within the wants of a soldier, except water and tents. The former, it was expected, could be procured on shore; and the English tents were not landed the first day. As the landing progressed, parties of Cossacks were seen, who set fire to the villages laying in what they supposed would be the route of our troops; and Sir George Brown, advancing too far into the interior, narrowly escaped being taken prisoner. All went well, however. The day was beautifully bright, like a June day in England; and before dark, the whole of the British infantry, some of the artillery, and most of the French troops were landed. As the sun went down the weather changed. Rain fell, and our men had to bivouac (the term applied to the halting and resting of troops when they have no tents to pitch) in the open air, getting what shelter they could. The French had their tents d'abri, which are only about three feet high, and capacious enough to shelter three or four men, who divide the materials amongst them when the tent is struck, and carry them on the top of their knapsacks. In these tents the occupants were protected from cold and wet, but nearly choked for want of air. The Turks conveyed their camp equipage in their ships, and were much more comfortable than either of their allies.—"Of all the miserable nights I ever spent in my life," wrote Lieutenant George Shuldham Peard, of the 20th regiment, "this was the most wretched; its discomforts it would be impossible to describe." Whilst there was no shelter for officers or privates, a misty exhalation which arose from the lake, was the cause of much sickness amongst both; and many poor fellows laid down, wrapped in their blankets, to rise no more. Most of the officers remained up the greater part of the night, to see if anything could be done to alleviate the sufferings of the men. The Duke of Cambridge was one of them. His royal highness was on horseback, riding from point to point, till an early hour in the morning: then, dismounting, he wrapped himself in a blanket, and laid down under the shade of an araba. The next day the tents were taken on shore.

The 15th was again a bright, brilliant day; and the men were enabled to dry their clothes and blankets in the beams of the warm sun. Unfortunately sickness prevailed to a great extent; and a number of invalids had to be sent back to the ships.—The disembarkation of men and matériel, however, went on; and on the 18th, Lord Raglan, writing to the Duke of Newcastle, informed his grace that all were on shore. In that despatch his lordship spoke in the highest terms of the conduct of the sailors, without whose hearty and cheerful co-operation the disembarkation could not have been effected so expeditiously, and with so little loss. During the time it occupied, the native Tartars had been very friendly with the English soldiers, who had been successful in obtaining what was much wanted—additional means of conveyance. On the first day, General Airey, the Quartermaster-General, at the head of two companies of the 23rd Fusiliers, dispersed a band of Cossacks, and captured seventy or eighty waggons, with their oxen and drivers, the latter gladly transferring their services to the Englsh. His aide-de-camp, Captain Nolan, on the next or subsequent day, fell-in with a convoy of eighty waggons laden with flour, and captured the whole of them. Waggons, camels, and other supplies were obtained from the Tartars, till 350 arabas, or carriages, with their teams and drivers, were attached to the English army. Appropriating, of course, what was captured from the enemy, all that the English took from the natives was scrupulously paid for; the French, on the contrary, first compelled the Tartars to sell them whatever they required, at a price fixed by themselves; but ultimately, we are told, they "helped themselves, without paying, to anything they met with."

During the disembarkation, not the slightest attempt was made by Prince Menschikoff, who then commanded in the Crimea, to disturb the allies, or prevent them from carrying out their designs. He had at that time, according to the lowest estimate given by Russian authorities, 74,200 men of all arms, including Cossacks, at his disposal; and could have greatly harassed the invaders if he had crossed the Alma and the Bulganak, and attacked them when disembarking, or when bivouacked. He contented himself, however, with taking up a defensive position on the south bank of the Alma. That river rises from a group of hills to the south-east; and takes a very undulating course till it approaches the coast, when it runs nearly due west. There is a gentle slope towards the right or north bank, which, when the allies landed, was skirted by a broad belt of vineyards and gardens, each enclosed within a low stone wall. Houses were scattered amongst these enclosures; and there was a wooden bridge over the river, connecting the high road from Perekop to Sebastopol, which runs north and south about two miles and a-half from the sea. Close to this bridge, on the east, was the village of Boulionk; and two miles further to the east, that of Almatamak. Both lay near the banks of the river. "The smooth slopes," remarks Mr. Kinglake—

"By which the invader from the north approaches the Alma, are contrasted by the aspect of the country on the opposite bank of the river; for there the field is so broken up into hills and valleys—into steep acclivities and narrow ravines—into jutting knolls and winding gullies—that, with the labour of a Russian army, and the resources of Sebastopol at his command, a skilled engineer would have found it hard to exhaust his contrivances for the defence of a ground having all this strength of feature."

On these hills Prince Menschikoff had taken up his position; and a formidable one it certainly was. As approached from the north, to the left of the allies was the Kourganè hill, which the prince made the chief point in his position, and where his head-quarters were established. It receded from the river "in a south-easterly direction, the ground rising gradually to a commanding height, and terminating in a peak." Mounds spring up around this hill on all sides, forming natural ramparts; and it is difficult of access, the river's bank rising, nearly perpendicularly, to a height of from eight to fifteen feet. To the westward, the bold and almost precipitous range of heights, rising from 350 to 400 feet above the water's level, turns round a great amphitheatre, or wide valley, terminating in an eminence, called Telegraph Height, where stood an unfinished tower, intended for a telegraph. From thence "the descent to the plain is more gradual, the front being about two miles in extent. Across the mouth of this great opening is a lower ridge, varying from 60 to 150 feet in height, and at a distance from the river of from 600 to 800 yards." The range of hills extend beyond the Telegraph Height to the west, terminating in West Cliff, which rises to a height of 350 feet. Looking west, this cliff presents "a bluff buttress of rock to the sea;" whilst, on the north, the side "hangs over the river so steep, that a man going up along the bank of the stream has, at first, almost a sheer precipice on his right hand." This entire range is so abrupt and precipitous, that Prince Menschikoff, whilst he erected batteries on the Telegraph Height, the Kourganè hill, and on several other places, which swept the river, and commanded all the approaches, left the west cliff nearly undefended. To the east, the "principal battery consisted of an earthwork, constructed on the brow of a hill about 600 feet above the river, of the form of two sides of a triangle, with the apex pointed towards the bridge, and the sides covering both sides of the stream." In this battery were thirteen 32-pounder guns; earthwork batteries were also thrown up on the summit of the ridge, containing 24 and 32-pounders, which were supported by field-pieces and howitzers. A breastwork, capable of receiving fourteen heavy guns, but in which only twelve were mounted, rose on a mound, jutting out from the Kourganè hill. It was called the Great Redoubt. Higher up, and more to the westward, was a slighter breastwork, armed with less powerful guns, and called the Lesser Redoubt. The Russian troops were skilfully posted to support the cannonade; and lines of skirmishers were planted on the sides of the hills, armed with two-grooved rifles, capable of carrying a conical ball 700 or 800 yards.

In this position Prince Menschikoff had posted about 40,000 men, and 130 guns; his troops being inferior to the allies in number; but the natural and artificial defences of the entire line gave them, in truth, a great superiority if all the English and French troops had been brought into action. This was not the case: the number absolutely engaged was inferior to that of the Russians. The English and French commanders-in-chief, however, had no reliable information either as to the numbers or the position of the enemy; all they knew was derived from the loose statements of the Tartars, that a considerable force was posted on the Alma heights, which lay in the direct route to Sebastopol; and as the allies must cross those heights, it was determined to lose no time in making the attempt to drive the enemy away. On the morning of the 19th of September, therefore, the order to march was given. It was obeyed cheerfully, though the troops were suffering severely from sickness, and from their exposure to the extremes of wet, cold, and heat, from the time they landed; whilst the daily toil to provide themselves with water had been excessive. When they started the tents were again sent on ship-board, the fleets being ordered to keep along shore, and support the army. On the march, the French were on the right, which is considered the post of honour; the English on the left, which was that of danger, as it was from that side any attack of the enemy must have been made. Nothing was seen, however, of the Russians, till the Bulganak had been crossed; then a large body of Cossacks was discovered on the hills, which it was soon ascertained was supported by both infantry and artillery in the plain beyond; and it was apprehended that the escort of light cavalry, consisting of the 8th and 10th Hussars, and 13th Light Dragoons, commanded by the Earl of Cardigan, would be in danger. They, however, retired in time, and in excellent order; but the Russian artillery opened its fire upon them, and a horse of the 11th Hussars was killed, its rider's leg being broken. The English horse-artillery galloped up, under Captain Maude, and returned the fire. The Russians soon retired, having lost, says Major (now Colonel) Hamley, of the royal engineers, twenty-five horses and thirty-five men. The English had five or six horses killed, and four men wounded. Soon after, orders were given "to bivouac" on the south side of the Bulganak; and gladly were they obeyed. The men were greatly fatigued, and many had dropped on the march, most of whom were brought in during the night, arabas constantly arriving with them. Those who had kept up through the day, settled down round the fires they kindled, and cooked their rations, and they retired to rest in the open air, wrapped in their great coats and blankets, knowing that the enemy was immediately in front, and that they would have to ford the Alma, and attack them the next morning Few of the officers were able to get any sleep, as they had to consult with the commander-in-chief as to the movements to be made on the following day.

There are various reports as to the arrangements entered into by Lord Raglan and Marshal de St. Arnaud for the attack. But Lord Raglan, in his despatch to the Duke of Newcastle, dated September 23rd, says—"It was arranged that Marshal de St. Arnaud should assail the enemy's left by crossing the river at its junction with the sea, and immediately above it; and that the remainder of the French divisions should move up the heights in their front, whilst the English army should attack the right and centre of the enemy's position." The "Battle of Alma" was fought as nearly upon this plan as circumstances permitted; but, as it progressed, the commanders and troops had to follow the impulse given by the various exciting and important events of the day, rather than the precise directions of a preconceived plan.

Prince Menschikoff, on his left, immediately opposed to the French, had 13,000 men, and thirty-six guns; and that part of his position had, as before stated, been little attended to, because the Russians believed it was almost inaccessible to men, and quite to the artillery. In the centre and on the right, there were 26,000 men, and eighty-six guns. Silently—"without sound of bugle or beat of drum"—on the morning of the 20th of Sptember, both the English and French armies prepared for the attack upon the strong and formidable position before them. As early as half-past five, General Bosquet, with the second division of the French army, and the Turkish battalions, was marching along the coast to the Alma; an hour and a-half later the main body of that army was in marching order, ready for the word "forward;" and the English had been deploying into a position which would enable them to resist the enemy, should an attempt be made to turn the left flank of the allies. Lord Raglan, regardful of his baggage and provision train, had that moved into a safe position on his right. This accounts for the English not arriving in line till half-past ten o'clock, as Marshal de St. Arnaud remarks in his despatch; but, he adds, "they bravely made up for the delay." It was half-past twelve when the allies reached the right or north bank of the Alma; and Prince Napoleon having, with his division, taken possession of the village of Almatanak, opposite the West Cliff, General Bosquet rode forward, taking a few Spahis as his escort, to reconnoitre the spot where his division had to cross. Assuring himself that his men could make the passage, he gave the word, and they went over in what soldiers call double-quick time. While this was going on, the steamers opened their fire upon the village of Ulukul Akles, in the rear of the heights, where the enemy had stationed four guns. The fire was returned from them; but they were soon silenced, and the gunners took themselves out of reach, the steamers having received no damage. The French, meanwhile, were rapidly crossing the Alma. When they reached the south side, they had (wrote Admiral Hamelin to the French minister of war) "to climb cliffs, almost perpendicular, but where our African soldiers gave extraordinary proofs of agility and daring." The Turks crossed at the same time, and ascended the cliff by narrow paths on the extreme west—of the existence of which Prince Menschikoff appears to have been perfectly unaware—without meeting a single enemy. As soon as the Zouaves reached the summit, they formed in line, and were shortly joined by the artillery attached to the division, which had sustained a galling fire from the Russian cannon when making the ascent. The Russians had concentrated near the unfinished turret, and a fierce interchange of shots took place, and continued for some time. At length the Zouaves, headed by Lieutenant Poitevin and Sergeant-Major Fleury, made a charge; the Russians gave way; and Poitevin and Fleury rushing to the turret, planted the French flag on its walls, receiving, at the time, mortal wounds. Almost immediately the turret was cleared of the enemy, and occupied by the French. At that time the main body of the French army, under Prince Napoleon and General Canrobert, was gaining the heights; but it advanced slowly under a severe fire. General Canrobert's men pressed forward, whilst many of Prince Napoleon's division were in the valley, or still on the north bank of the Alma.

Prince Menschikoff appears merely to have taken a general view of his position, and determined upon its eligibility. He certainly adopted judicious plans for defending his right and centre, but had (as we have stated) neglected the left, deeming it unapproachable. When he found that the French and Turks were at the summit of the position, and had routed his left wing, he became greatly disturbed. He ordered reinforcements to the spot, and the troops first sent opened a severe fire upon Bosquet's division, which stood alone on the heights; and upon the two other French divisions, which were making their way up to the plateau. Other reinforcements were, at the moment, also ordered, but these the prince almost immediately countermanded. Had those Russian troops advanced, Bosquet's division would in all probability have been cut off. As it was, he was in great danger; and an aide-de-camp was sent to Lord Raglan, to inform him, that, "unless something could be done to support or relieve Bosquet's column, it would be compromised." On Lord Raglan wishing to know what was meant by "compromised," he was told it "would retreat." Up to this time the English had been nearly, though not quite, inactive. They had advanced to the river, and had found the gardens and vineyards despoiled, the houses gutted and in flames, and many trees cut down, and thrown across the road. The second division, supported by the third, was on the right; the light division, supported by the first, on the left; the fourth division and the cavalry being held in reserve to protect the left flank and rear against the Russian cavalry, seen in that direction. It had been arranged that the English were not to make a direct assault till the French had established themselves on the left; and as the enemy opened upon them a heavy fire of artillery and rifles, they were ordered to lie down. Major Norcott, with the left wing of the 2nd battalion of the rifle brigade, had driven the Russians out of some enclosures, from whence they annoyed the light division; but this was all that was done. The men were getting very impatient when Lord Raglan received the French aide-de-camp, and the command was given immediately to advance. The two leading divisions deployed into line on the instant; and the supporting divisions followed the movement.

"Hardly had this taken place, when the village of Bourliouk" [which was immediately opposite the centre] "was fired by the enemy at all points, creating a continuous blaze for 300 yards, obscuring their position, and rendering a passage through it impracticable. Two regiments of Brigadier-General Adams's brigade, part of Sir de Lacey Evans's division, had, in consequence, to pass the river under a sharp fire; whilst his first brigade, under Major-General Pennefather, and the remaining regiments of Brigadier-General Adams, crossed to the left of the conflagration, opposed by the enemy's artillery from the heights above, and pressed on towards the right of their position with the utmost gallantry and steadiness."

Lord Raglan and his staff crossed with Brigadier Pennefather's division, and took up their position on an eminence a little to the east of the main road, where shot and bullets flew round them in all directions. The light division effected the passage in its immediate front; but it had to advance under great disadvantages. The men gallantly persevered, however; whilst the first division, under his royal highness the Duke of Cambridge, crossed; the 7th, 23rd, and 33rd regiments, forming Codrington's brigade, being in front; and, under a fire which brought down great numbers of them, they dashed up the slope to the Great Redoubt, driving the enemy before them. The Russians were removing the guns—the English leaped in to prevent them; but just then a fresh body of troops, sent by Prince Menschikoff, rushed down the hill, and, being at first mistaken by the English for a corps of their allies, they ceased firing. On finding the mistake, the fighting was resumed, Brigadier Pennefather's brigade advancing in support. Codrington's brigade, however, was so hardly pressed that it was obliged to retire.—By this time the Duke of Cambridge had crossed the river, and formed his men into line. He moved them up in support, "and a brilliant advance of the brigade of foot-guards, under Major-General Bentinck, drove the enemy back, and secured the final possession of the work."—During this struggle, Sir George Brown, who led the light division, fell, with his horse, in front of the battery: he was soon up again, and called to the men immediately behind him—"23rd, I'm all right; be sure I'll remember this day."

The capture of this redoubt did not secure the victory. The Russians still kept up a rapid fire from their centre, the second division and the Highlanders being especially exposed to it. The 55th, 30th, and 95th regiments, led by Brigadier-General Pennefather, were in the thickest of the fight, and they never drew back. The Guards also made a steady advance on the right, and the Highlanders on the left; Lieutenant-General England bringing his division to the immediate support of the troops in advance; Lieutenant-General Sir George Cathcart being as actively engaged on the left. All were passing on to the Causeway Battery, amidst a literal tornado of round and grape-shot, and a no less fierce discharge of musketry. As our men pressed on, a mass of Russian infantry was seen descending from the back heights towards the battery. Lord Raglan was in a position to see the advance, and the movement which promised to check it; and he asked if it were not possible to bring up a couple of guns to bear on those masses? Captain Dickson, R.A., undertook to move up two pieces of artillery. There was some delay, owing to a horse being shot: but at length the guns were brought successively into action by Captain Turner; their fire took the Russian centre in reverse; at the same time, the French had succeeded in establishing themselves on the heights, and drove back the troops which Menschikoff had sent to reinforce his left. The result was apparent in the rapid breaking up of the enemy, which was soon in full retreat; Pennefather's brigade, of the second division, Codrington's, of the light division, and the Guards, forming in line on the ground they had so gallantly won. Lord Raglan saw the movement; and he was desirous that Sir Richard England's division, which had been only partially engaged, and the cavalry, which, owing to the nature of the ground, had not been employed at all, should pursue the flying foe, aided by a part of the French forces. General Airey conveyed to General Martimprey, the chief of the French staff, Lord Raglan's wish; but he was told it was impossible for any part of our allies to move forward that day. In the meantime the Russians were in full retreat to the Katcha. They were enabled to carry off their artillery, except one gun and one howitzer, taken by the English, and a gun taken by the French: but they left upwards of 1,000 of their wounded on the field of battle; and, on their route, threw away knapsacks, muskets, everything that encumbered them and impeded their retreat. One division of 7,000, or 8,000 men took the road to the east, into the interior of the country; the other, upwards of 20,000 in number—"officers, men, horses, guns, tumbrils, carts laden with stores, carts laden with the wounded"—all pressed into a gorge, or deep hollow, behind the hills, from which there was only one narrow outlet—the road to Sebastopol, which was about fourteen miles distant. If pursued, half the men might have been destroyed in this gorge. They, however, got to the Katcha; and at the village they broke into the houses, and either carried off or destroyed their contents. When they crossed the bridge, they left the cannon behind; and were become so utterly demoralised and unruly, that the commanders were glad to get to Sebastopol as quickly as possible, leaving the cannon, which men were sent to secure immediately after their arrival. These flying troops left at least 5,000 muskets alm[illegible]0,000 knapsacks on the field, besides what they In the ce[illegible]ay in their retreat. Prince Menschikoff's and eight[illegible]lso fell into the hands of the French. It contained bugle or b[illegible] porte-feuille, in which was found a letter addressed to the emperor, informing his majesty of the steps taken to defend the heights of the Alma; and asserting that he could hold his position for three weeks against 100,000 men. He yielded it in three hours to about half that number. His loss in killed and wounded was officially stated to be 5,709; the English made 150 unwounded, and 1,000 wounded prisoners; the French took 500 prisoners. Two generals were taken by the English, and one by the French.

The French say that the number of their killed and wounded was 1,339. The English lost twenty-five officers, nineteen sergeants, and 318 rank and file killed: the number of wounded was—eighty-one officers, 102 sergeants, and 1,438 rank and file: nineteen were missing, and were supposed to have perished in the fire of Bourliouk: thus 2,002 were put hors de combat. The Turks lost 230 killed and wounded. In the engagement, Lord Raglan said, "the conduct of the troops was admirable." "I do not," he added, "go beyond the truth in saying that they merit the highest commendation." Marshal de St. Arnaud was also warm in their praise. "The English army," he wrote in his despatch, "met with a most vigorous and firmly organised resistance. The combat which took place was most desperate, and reflects the highest honour on our brave allies." Of the French, Lord Raglan remarked, that, "under the guidance of their distinguished commander, Marshal de St. Arnaud, they manifested the utmost gallantry, the greatest ardour for the attack, and the high military qualities for which they are so famed."

Lord Raglan had anxiously watched the last movements of the battle and the retreat of the Russians, which took place about 4 P.M.. When the fighting was over, he rode along the English line, and was received with the loudest and heartiest cheers. He crossed the river, to the village of Bourliouk, where the half-burnt buildings had given shelter to many of the wounded, officers and others. His lordship passed some time amongst them, seeing that everything possible was done for their relief. He then returned to the heights, where the allies bivouacked on the ground thy had won. The French were on Telegraph Height; the English in the centre; and Lord Raglan's head-quarters were established adjacent to the high road to Sebastopol; a little marquee being put up for his lordship. It was a cold, cheerless evening. The men were supplied with their rations of meat, bread, and rum, as soon as the orders were given to bivouac; and they immediately set about gathering weeds, nettles, and grass, and breaking-up the empty casks to kindle fires, at once to cook their dinners, and to warm themselves. Then they wrapped themselves up in their great coats and blankets, and laid down to seek repose, having previously received directions from their officers for the following day. Just as Lord Raglan was sitting down to dinner, Colonel Torrens arrived with some troops, which had been left at Kamishlu, to clear the beach where the English had landed; and who were sorry they did not reach the Alma in time for the battle. During the night many of the stragglers who had been left on the march came in; most of them belonging to the fourth division. Some arrived walking; some were brought in arabas, which continued to arrive for several hours.

Morning approached before all was still; and when it broke, the sight which was presented can only be imagined by those who have seen a field of battle. The ground was covered with the dead; and, unfortunately, there were many Russian and English wounded—those who were not insensible writhing with pain. The French had removed all their wounded on board the ships the previous evening. Great activity was displayed in conveying the English, and also the Russians whom it was not possible to accommodate on shore, to the steamers appointed to receive them; and they were taken to Scutari; a portion of the barracks there having been converted into an hospital. Whilst many men were employed in attending to the helpless, more were engaged in burying the dead. The British and French took part in this labour; and the former are said to have placed the bodies of 1,200 Russians in the earth. Whilst the men were thus employed, the officers were busily examining the position from which the enemy had been driven. This inspection caused all who shared in it to be astonished at the victory that had been won. If the English and French had been the defenders, and the Russians the assailants, it was the universal opinion that the result would have been decidedly different. A general admiration was expressed at the conduct of the British. Whilst the agility of the nimble Zouaves, it was admitted, was requisite to scale the sides of the deep ravines, and the rocky precipices, by which they had gained the top of the West Cliff—even the French officers expressed doubts whether their men could have carried the position on the left. General Canrobert said, if he could command a corps of English troops for three short weeks, he should die happy: and one of the Russian generals taken prisoner by the English, told Lord Raglan, that they came to fight men, not devils, as the red-coats seemed to be.

On the 21st and the 22nd the troops were chiefly occupied in the burial of the dead, and the relief and removal of the wounded. At Sebastopol, the Russians, anticipating an immediate attack, were preparing for the defence of that place. On the 21st, they moored seven vessels of war across the entrance of the fort, from north to south; plugged them, and sank them in that position, with all their guns and stores on board; time, as they anticipated, not allowing for their removal. Thus the entrance of the port was effectively blocked up; and it was rendered impossible for the allied fleets to co-operate in the attack on the town, though they might bombard the outer forts. The position of the other vessels was altered, so as to bring their broadsides to bear on the north side of the harbour, where it was supposed the attack would be made; and new batteries on both sides of the port were speedily constructed, defending the entrance and the line of coast.

The allies—working eagerly and actively on the two days—were enabled to bury their own dead, and to remove their wounded; but more than 600 Russians still remained, who had been as carefully tended by the English surgeons as if they had been their own countrymen. One of these benevolent medical men, Dr. Thomson, of the 44th, and his servant, remained with them. A Russian officer, a prisoner, charged his fellow-countrymen to be obedient to that gentleman; and General Ertevart sent a notice to the inhabitants of the nearest Tartar village, informing them that the wounded Russians were left under their care. For four days, the two Englishmen, aided by a few Tartars, attended to the wants of these men, upwards of sixty of whom died and were buried in one day. On the 27th of September, two English vessels arrived, and took on board 340 of the Russians, to convey them to Odessa. All would have been embarked, under the protection of Captain Lushington and a few marines; but a large body of Cossacks came down to the coast, who would have made prisoners of all the English, notwithstanding the work of humanity in which they were engaged, if they had not embarked. They were obliged, therefore, to go on board one of the ships, leaving more than 200 wounded Russians to their fate. As they were in the hands of subjects of the emperor, it is to be hoped they were properly cared for.

It was on the evening of the 22nd of September that the troops had orders to prepare for the march towards Sebastopol on the following morning. Early on the 23rd, therefore, the drums and trumpets gave note of preparation; and at six o'clock the march was commenced. Marshal de St. Arnaud was too unwell to accompany the French troops. He was suffering from cancer, and went on board the Berthollet. General Canrobert directed the movements of our allies. When two miles had been passed over, the command to "halt" reverberated through the English lines: it was to permit two divisions of the French army to pass across their front to the left. As they passed, there was, wrote the correspondent of the Morning Herald—

"Such a scene of fraternisation as has seldom been witnessed. Each army cheered until the hills echoed for miles; and the enthusiasm reached an almost ungovernable pitch. French and English privates rushed from the ranks, embracing and shaking hands; gradually the officers did the same; generals took off their cocked hats, and waved them; while shakos went into the air by hundreds in all directions. This fervour of friendship lasted, with more or less spirit, for about ten minutes; when the French having taken their place on the left, the whole army again moved forward."

The allies that day proceeded no further than Katcha. There from 7,000 to 8,000 French troops joined that army, having just arrived from France; and they were landed at the mouth of the Katcha river, as were the Scots' Greys and the 57th foot, who came from Varna. The new arrivals were heartily welcomed; they helped to make up the losses inflicted by battle and disease. It was a pleasant halt in the blooming valley of the Katcha; and when the men started again the next morning, they were greatly refreshed. That day they marched to the village of Balbec; and there, on the morning of the 25th, a council of war was held, which Marshal de St. Arnaud, though still suffering greatly, landed from the Berthollet to attend. There the question was considered—on which side shall Sebastopol be attacked? The consultation led to a departure from the original plan of attack, which was, to make it from the north side of the bay; and it was resolved to alter the route, from the direct line to the south, to the south-east; to occupy the harbour of Balaklava and the Bay of Kamiesch; and to invest Sebastopol on the south. While the generals were consulting, the troops were under arms; and no sooner was the resolution taken, than the famous "flank march" commenced, which has been characterised as "one of the boldest on record." The route was through a country thickly wooded, for the most part destitute of roads; and, where they existed, the men could only march four deep. No one was acquainted with the route; and the English army was guided by a Russian deserter, who might have led them into great difficulties. But the men pushed gallantly on, the English leading, the French and Turks marching in the rear. Lord Raglan and his staff were foremost; and, after pushing through woods and tangled bushes for three or four hours, his lordship, and the officers accompanying him, suddenly debouched on an open plateau, with a good road across it, which was afterwards known to lead to Mackenzie's Farm. Here Lord Raglan was surprised at discovering a strong Russian force, marching at right angles with the allied army. It was afterwards ascertained that Prince Menschikoff, anticipating an attack on Sebastopol from the north, and fearing that the allies might be able to intercept reinforcements and supplies expected from Perekop, resolved to take part of his force to Baktchi-serai and Simpheropol; from whence he hoped to operate on the rear of the allied forces, and compel them to raise the siege. It was the rear-guard of the Russian army making this movement that was in sight. Lord Raglan immediately rode back to order up cavalry and guns. The Scots' Greys and Captain Maude's troop of horse-artillery appeared on the scene before the Russians were out of sight. Some infantry also came up; and a short skirmish ensued with the hindmost of the Russians, who made no stand, but got off as quickly as possible, losing about thirty killed, and as many wounded and prisoners. They left one tumbril, with 25,000 rounds of rifle cartridges, which, as they would not fit the English guns, were blown up. About fifty arabas, laden with baggage and flour, and a military chest containing money, were also taken. The baggage was valuable; and the captors were well pleased with their booty.

That night the English bivouacked on the banks of the Tchernaya; the French and Turks encamped on the heights in the vicinity of Mackenzie's Farm. The next day (the 26th of September) the march to Balaklava was completed. The town, and a small castle, erected many years previously by the Genoese, on a ridge of rock running at the back of the town, were taken possession of; and it was found that the fleet had anticipated the movement of the army, Sir E. Lyons having been informed of the "flank march" by Lieutenant Maxse, of the Agamemnon, who left Lord Raglan on the night of the 25th. When the troops entered the town, the Agamemnon was anchored in the harbour. Here was to be the base of the siege operations; and whilst the harbour was appropriated to the English ships, the French fleet took possession of Kamiesch Bay. On the day the allies arrived at Balaklava, Marshal de St. Arnaud resigned his command to General Canrobert, and returned to the Berthollet: he died on board that ship on the 29th of September. His remains were taken to France, and landed on the 15th of October. They were forwarded by rail to Paris, where they arrived at 8 A.M. on the 16th; and that day they were interred, with great pomp, in the chapel of the Invalides.

The English were pleased with their position at Balaklava; "principally," says the correspondent of the Herald, "because all the grounds around abounded with fruit and vegetables of every description." The 27th and 28th were spent in reconnoitring, and making themselves acquainted with the aspect of the country. On the 29th the landing of the siege artillery commenced; and the allies were occupied for the three following weeks in preparations for the bombardment of Sebastopol. Batteries had to be erected opposite the principal forts, and trenches dug for the protection of the besiegers, who spread themselves across the Chersonese, in the rear of the town; the French being on the left, the English on the right. During this time, the Russians were employed in annoying the allies by repeated discharges of artillery, and strengthening their defences; they threw up heavy earthworks round the principal forts, and dug a long and deep trench beyond their crenelated wall.

At a council of war held at the English headquarters on the 15th of October, it was determined that the bombardment should commence on the 17th, the English and French fleets attacking the forts at the mouth of the harbour, while the batteries assailed the defences on the south of the town. Accordingly, at 6 A.M. on the day appointed, the batteries opened their fire, which was returned from the town; and at twelve the attack on the forts commenced. The French silenced the Quarantine Fort which they attacked, and injured considerably the Artillery Battery. The English ships silenced, one by one, the guns in the Wasp Fort; but the Russians were well provided with artillery, for they immediately replaced them with others. There was an explosion in Fort Constantine about two o'clock, by which several of its guns were silenced, and its walls greatly damaged. Soon after the Wasp and St. Catharine batteries commenced firing with red-hot shot; two of the vessels, the Albion and Arethusa, were several times on fire; and as the French withdrew after the Quarantine Fort ceased firing, Sir E. Lyons soon after gave the signal to retire; several of the ships having received as much injury as was inflicted on the forts. By land, the French batteries, erected too near the enemy's works, were silenced by half-past nine o'clock, the magazine of a 10-gun battery having exploded, killing many men, and seriously injuring the battery itself. The Russians continued occasionally to discharge shot and shell at these works; and one of their shells dropped into and exploded another magazine, in which were about twenty tons of powder and sixteen guns. The latter were all whirled into the air; and 180 men, it is said, were killed. The English kept up their fire till darkness had set in; and one of their shells, about the middle of the day, fell into the magazine of the Great Redan, which exploded, and that fort was nearly silenced for the day. But the Malakoff and the earthworks were also considerably injured; and the total loss inflicted on the enemy was allowed, by Prince Menschikoff himself, to be severe; but no details were ever published. The English and French suffered as much, or more. The batteries of the latter were, as we have seen, silenced early in the day; and the English, though they maintained a destructive fire till darkness set in, were unable to keep it up during the night; the Russians were therefore enabled to repair the damage done to their works, which they did so effectively, that, when morning dawned, the massive walls of Sebastopol appeared to be nearly uninjured.

The result of this day's bombardment convinced the allied commanders that Sebastopol was not to be taken so easily as had been imagined. The position, in fact, as Lord Raglan wrote in one of his despatches, was "not that of a fortress, but rather that of an army in an intrenched camp, on very strong ground," with "an apparently unlimited number of heavy guns, amply provided with gunners and ammunition." There was, in that position, an army nearly as numerous as the assailants; whilst Prince Menschikoff had a large force outside the walls, and the road to Perekop was open for reinforcements and supplies. Noways disheartened, however, the allies set to work to repair the losses sustained on the 17th of October. On the 19th, the French batteries were enabled to resume their fire; and the siege operations were carried on uninterruptedly till the attack made on the English position on the 25th. During those few days, the allies still further ascertained the difficulties of their position: the English especially suffered from the want of a sufficient number of men to work the guns, and bring a supply of ammunition from their ships. But for the assistance rendered by the sailors, they would not have been able to maintain their fire during the day: as it was, it ceased at night; whilst the enemy, with the resources of the fleet and arsenal at command, was enabled every night to repair the disasters of the day.

On the 20th of October, there were movements on the right bank of the Tchernaya which indicated a design on the part of the enemy to become the assailants. It was afterwards ascertained that General Liprandi had arrived with 30,000 men—the force which had so recently evacuated the Danubian principalities; and it was resolved to attack the allied positions from the Tchernaya. On that side the English were posted; and the Russian commanders, having ascertained their position, felt certain that they could drive them from it, and gain possession of Balaklava by a sudden attack. A plain extends from Balaklava to the heights on which the right of the English force, which was carrying on the bombardment of Sebastopol, was posted. This plain was crossed to the north-east of Balaklava by a low undulating ridge, extending from the village of Kamara to the heights on which the batteries were erected; the village of Kadekoi lying to the west, nearly in a direct north line from the head of the harbour. On this ridge four small redoubts had been hastily constructed, which were garrisoned by Turkish troops, no other force being at Lord Raglan's disposal for their occupation. The 93rd Highlanders was the only British regiment in the plain, with the exception of a part of an invalid battalion, and a battery of artillery belonging to the third division. On the heights, skirting the harbour, 1,500 marines were placed, whom Major Dundas had sent on shore. The command had been given to Major-General Sir Colin Campbell.

The enemy commenced operations before daylight on the 25th of October; and when the morning began to break, crossed the Tchernaya, debouched into the plain, and opened a fire on the redoubts Nos. 1, 2, and 3. The attacking force consisted of eighteen or nineteen battalions of infantry, from thirty to forty guns, and a large body of cavalry; and the main body was covered with a cloud of skirmishers. The Turks were unable to make an effective resistance, there being only seven guns in the three redoubts, which were evacuated in a very short time by the defenders; as was the redoubt No. 4, in which no cannon were mounted. Whilst this was passing, the 93rd Highlanders had been drawn up on a piece of undulating ground between battery No. 4 and the army; and Lord Raglan had ordered the first and fourth divisions, under the Duke of Cambridge and Sir George Cathcart, to withdraw from before Sebastopol, and march down into the plain. The enemy, having taken the redoubts, made a move towards the 93rd Highlanders, which was supported by the invalid corps, under Lieutenant-Colonel Daveney; and as the Turks left the redoubt, they formed on the Highlanders' flanks. The round shot and shell falling amongst the Highlanders, caused Sir Colin Campbell to order them to retire a few paces behind the crest of the hill. Then the enemy's cavalry—which had been effectively fired upon by the marines stationed in the batteries on the heights — divided into two bodies. One, about 400 in number, turning to the left, charged the brave Scotsmen, who "immediately advanced to the crest of the hill, and opened their fire, which forced the Russian cavalry to give way," still keeping to their left. They made for the right flank of the Highlanders, and the Turks stationed there took to flight when they saw the cavalry advance. The latter made an attempt to turn that flank of the regiment; but "the grenadiers wheeled up and fired upon the enemy, which manœuvre completely discomfited them."

While these events were passing in one direction, others much more stirring took place in another. The second, and by far the most numerous body of Russian cavalry, consisting of at least 1,000 men, keeping to their right, rode towards the spot where the Scots' Greys and Inniskillin dragoons were stationed, under the command of Brigadier-General Scarlett. As they came on, the length of the Russian line was at least double that of the British; but the latter did not wait to receive the charge. The trumpet sounded, and they dashed into the centre of the enemy. They broke that line in an instant; but there was a second behind, which they also charged, driving horses and men before them, and scattering them on each side by the impetuosity of their movement; whilst many a Russian was struck down by their sabres. Soon they were seen at the rear of the enemy, having made, says Lord Raglan, "one of the most successful charges he ever witnessed." They were gallantly supported by the 1st Royals, and the 4th and 5th Dragoon Guards; who, seeing the Russians attempting to rally and surround their comrades, suddenly charged them in one massive line. The enemy broke and retreated; infantry and cavalry retiring to the high road beyond the ridge and the redoubts. The Russian artillery prevented the British cavalry from pursuing them, and they soon began to re-form their line, with artillery in front and on their flanks.

It was about ten o'clock when the first and fourth divisions descended from the heights into the plain. The former was sent by Lord Raglan to protect Balaklava; the other remained on the plain, ready for action. Soon after General Canrobert arrived, followed by several corps of Chasseurs de Vincennes and Chasseurs d'Afrique; and took up a position in support of the fourth division. Lord Raglan then sent an order to Earl Lucan, "to take advantage of any opportunity to recover the heights." An opportunity did not present itself; but soon after, observing certain movements in the redoubts 1 and 2, indicating that the enemy was about to remove the guns from those redoubts (which stood nearest to Kamara), the Earl of Lucan was "ordered to advance rapidly to the front, follow the enemy, and try to prevent them from carrying away the guns." General Airey's aide-de-camp, Captain Nolan, was despatched with this order; and, but for the earnestness—indeed haughtiness—with which he enforced its observance, it is probable it would not have been obeyed; for the danger was imminent; the advantages, even if successful, slight and inconsiderable. The terms of the order, and the language of Captain Nolan, admitted, however, of only one course; and though Earl Lucan and Earl Cardigan both saw the enterprise in the same light, the word was given. The light brigade—consisting of the 4th and 13th Light Dragoons, the 17th Lancers, and the 8th and 11th Hussars (the five corps not numbering 700 men)—led by Earl Cardigan, advanced towards the enemy, then concealed by the ridge of hills on the eastern side of the Woronzoff road. The advance was slow till the road was crossed, and the heights gained. Then the little body, which had an army in position to encounter, put their horses to a fast trot, Captain Nolan, who accompanied them, being foremost. He was the first that fell, receiving a mortal wound from the fragment of a shell. The advance was made in two lines; the 13th Light Dragoons and the 17th Lancers forming the first, the 4th Light Dragoons and 11th Hussars the second, and the 8th Hussars were in the rear. As they neared the enemy, the trot was changed to a gallop; and, under the most fearful fire from infantry and artillery, the gallant heroes dashed on, reaching the guns and sabring all the gunners who stood to them, and breaking a column of Russian infantry, scattering them like chaff. Finding that it was useless to attempt to carry off the guns, they prepared to return, when a much larger body of Russian cavalry rode up, and attacked their left flank. Colonel Shewell, who kept his 8th Hussars in the place first assigned them, called to his men to "charge," which they did most effectually, cutting their way through, though with great loss. The fighting was now clear of the guns; British and Russians were mixed together in one fearful mêlée; and then those Russian gunners who had crept under their guns, or hid themselves in ammunition carts, to get clear of the British, returned to the fight, and absolutely opened a cannonade upon the mixed mass of cavalry, "mingling friend and foe," says the correspondent of the Times, "in one common ruin." The heavy brigade now, providentially, came up to cover the retreat; and the Chasseurs d'Afrique made a brilliant charge on the guns of the Russian right, sabring the gunners and stabbing the horses; but they were compelled to let the cannon remain. By this time, the remains of the light brigade—scarcely 200 officers and privates, many of whom had lost their horses—were in safety, and fighting ceased; the enemy, though so superior in numbers, making no movement in advance.—Unfortunately, while the fighting was going on, under the impression that the Russians would succeed in their object, and gain Balaklava, an order was given to clear the harbour; and the ships, transports, and other vessels put to sea; and many of them were anchored off the coast, where they remained till the storm of November drove them on the rocks.

The French, in this engagement, lost 100 men and officers, killed and wounded; the English had about 100 infantry and artillery, and 436 cavalry, put hors de combat: the Turks lost 300 killed or prisoners. The Russian loss is supposed to have been between 500 and 600. As to the results of the battle, the military glory was all with the English and the French; the light cavalry charge—though, as a French officer observed, it was not war—not fair fighting, but rushing to certain death—was still one of the most brilliant exploits ever performed—"a triumph of courage and discipline," an eye-witness observes, "to which history affords no parallel." The solid advantages remained with the Russians; and Liprandi claimed a complete victory for them. He carried off seven guns, which were taken that night into Sebastopol; and there was great rejoicing when they arrived. The most serious loss to the British was that of the Woronzoff road. After the battle, Lord Raglan consulted with his generals, General Canrobert, and several French officers: they went together, and examined the opposing force, which occupied Kamara, Tchourgouna, and the heights abutting from the former village. The conclusion arrived at was, that, as "the means of defending the extensive position, which had been held by the Turkish troops in the morning, had proved wholly inadequate," the lower range of heights should be abandoned, and the troops which had occupied that position concentrated "immediately in front of the narrow valley leading into Balaklava, and upon the precipitous height to the right; thus affording a narrow line of defence."

This battle proved that sufficient care had not been taken to protect the different points of the British position. Such was especially the case with respect to the plateau held by the first and second divisions, to the north of the Woronzoff road, and the two roads leading up from the valley of Inkermann. The want of defences here had been pointed out by both the Duke of Cambridge and Sir De Lacey Evans; and as the Russians were aware of it, they determined to take advantage of the neglect. On the afternoon of the 26th of October, a strong force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery was seen to leave Sebastopol, pass by the Inkermann valley, ascend the hills in the rear of the second division, and reach the crest of an eminence called "Shell Hill," which commanded the camp. The outpickets, not more than 100 men of the 30th and 49th regiments, though surprised at the sight of the enemy's troops, gained a turn in the road, and there kept up a fire upon the Russians, and held them at bay till the second division was roused and under arms. Then the gallant fellows retired; the officers in command, Captains Bayley and Atcherley, of the 36th, and Lieutenant Conolly, of the 49th regiments, being severely wounded; as were thirty-five privates, five being left dead. The assailants got their guns upon Shell Hill; but the artillery of the second division was brought to bear upon them; and it was quickly supported by a battery under Lieutenant Dacres, which the Duke of Cambridge, as soon as he heard the cannonading, brought up with the brigade of Guards, which his royal highness posted in advance on the right, for the purpose of securing that flank. The artillery was served with the utmost energy; and, in half-an-hour, the enemy was driven from that position.

Our batteries were then directed, with equal accuracy and vigour, upon the enemy's column, which (exposed also, to the close fire of the British advanced infantry) soon fell into complete disorder and flight. They were literally chased, by the 30th and 95th regiments, over the ridges, and down towards the head of Sebastopol Bay; and so eager was the pursuit, that it was with difficulty Major-General Pennefather recalled the men, who were gallantly led by Majors Mauleverer, Chapman, Eman, and Hume.

The Russians were as gallantly pursued and defeated, towards the right, by four companies of the 41st, led by Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. P. Herbert. This affair is often called "The first Battle of Inkermann." In it 1,200 men defeated a force of upwards of 6,000.

The bombardment of Sebastopol was continued at intervals, and abundantly replied to by the Russians. Sorties and skirmishes also took place now and then; but, although the Russians were always beaten back, and a good many people were killed on both sides, nothing decisive came of these contests. The enemy, however, continued to boast of the victory of Balaklava; and as fresh reinforcements were received, and the two Russian grand dukes, Nicholas and Michael, had arrived at Sebastopol, Prince Menschikoff resolved that another desperate effort should be made to crush the enemy; which, he had assured the emperor a few weeks previously, should "perish by the sword, or be driven into the sea." The princes arrived on the 3rd of November; and the Russian forces, which had been greatly reinforced in the valley of the Tchernaya, were observed, that day and the 4th, to be in an unusual state of commotion within Sebastopol. The arrival of troops, and the demonstrations in the valley, had not been unobserved: and, in consequence, Lord Raglan had placed as strong a force as he could spare upon the precipitous ridge in that direction; a strong redoubt had been thrown up in front of the gorge leading into Balaklava; and a battery to the left of the redoubt was manned by a naval battalion formed of soldiers from the fleet. A battery had also been placed on the slope of the hill over Inkermann—a position, the insecurity of which Sir De Lacey Evans had repeatedly pointed out to the commanders-in-chief. No guns had been placed in this battery, as Sir De Lacey was of opinion, that to place guns in such a position, without other works to support them, would only invite attack.

On the night of the 4th of November, troops were in motion in Sebastopol: and the morning of the 5th was ushered in by the tolling of church bells, which was heard in the allied camp; and the men in the trenches nearest the city heard voices chanting hymns; prayers were then being offered up in the churches by the inhabitants, for the success of the Russian arms in the attack upon the enemy, which was just commencing. And it was well planned. The night had been a dismal one; the morning was extremely dark, with drizzling rain; and the Russians—who had selected the heights of Inkermann, the "neglected spot," for the attack—advanced under cover of the darkness, "creeping up the rugged sides of the heights over the valley of Inkermann, on the undefended flank of the second division." A French corps d'armée, under General Bosquet, overlooked the Woronzoff road and the valley of Balaklava; and a few shots fired before dawn roused the attention of the French general, who expected the enemy was about to attack his position; and this prevented his moving for some time. The Russians continued to creep silently up the heights; and a few unarmed men, seen about 6 A.M. by the advanced picket of the second division, were the first signs of life in that direction. They were taken for deserters. The officer in command, and the few men with him, went forward to receive them: they were instantly surrounded by large bodies of men, who had lain concealed, and nearly all were taken prisoners without firing a shot. Providentially two or three (the entire number was about thirty) escaped, and alarmed the next pickets, which "behaved with admirable gallantry, defending the ground foot by foot against the overwhelming numbers of the enemy, until the second division, under Major-General Pennefather" (who had taken the command in consequence of the illness of Sir De Lacey Evans), "which had immediately been got under arms, was, with its field-guns, placed in position." Major-General Codrington, who had been visiting his outposts before dawn, heard the firing between the pickets and the enemy, and he immediately rode back to the camp, and summoned his men. The light division and the brigade of Guards, under the Duke of Cambridge, were also brought to the spot: soon after the fourth division advanced, and took up a position on the front and right of the attack; the third division was formed in reserve; two battalions of French infantry were also sent by General Bosquet, which joined the English on the right.

All this time the Russians—having the advantage of a thick brushwood, and, for some time, of a darkness which concealed all their movements when not revealed by the flash of artillery—continued to advance, preceded by a vast cloud of skirmishers. They brought numerous batteries to the front and left of the second division; placed additional batteries to the left of the English position; and kept up a tremendous fire of shot, shell, and grape from ninety pieces of cannon. The guns in the Russian ships in the harbour were also brought to bear on the English; and a fire was kept up from them, as well as from the cannon on the walls of the town. As the pickets fell back, the Russians planted cannon on Shell Hill, which greatly annoyed the British; and their dense columns of infantry, under this fire, pushed forward for a short time unchecked. They had previously been supplied with large quantities of brandy, and fought with a desperation seldom witnessed. But they were met most heroically by the British. By seven o'clock, Lord Raglan, accompanied by Sir John Burgoyne, Brigadier-General Strangeways, and several aides-de-camp, was in the field, which he never left till the enemy was in full retreat, being frequently in the midst of the fire. For eight hours the fighting continued; one scene of contest being the battery on the edge of the slope opposite the ruins of Inkermann: it was occupied by the Russians, who were driven out by the Guards. They soon returned in great numbers; and the brigade, after a fierce hand-to-hand combat, which reminds us of the days of chivalry, was, in its turn, obliged to retire. Joined by a wing of the 20th regiment of the fourth division, it returned to the attack, retook the redoubt, and held it against repeated attempts at dislodgment. While the fighting was going on upon the heights, Sir George Cathcart made a movement into the valley, with a few companies of the 68th regiment, and took the enemy in flank. At first he gained ground; but he soon discovered that the heights were all occupied by the Russians, and that he was entangled in the midst of a superior force. While attempting to withdraw his men from the dangerous position in which they were placed, he received a wound that proved mortal; and Brigadier-General Torrens, who took the command, was also seriously wounded.

In the front, and on the right, the battle raged with great fury. It was a fierce struggle, all strategy being disregarded. "Colonels of regiments led on small parties, and fought like subalterns, captains like privates. Once engaged, every man was his own general. The enemy was in front, advancing, and must be driven back. The tide of battle ebbed and flowed, not in wide waves, but in broken, tumultuous billows." Thus it continued for several hours: and the result might have been different but for the resolution of General Bosquet to leave his own position—which was threatened by General Liprandi; whilst Generals Dannenberg and Soimonoff, just arrived from Moldavia, directed the movements against the British—and assist his allies. He deemed the demonstration of Liprandi a feint, and he was right; for no attack was made except upon the British; and to that point fresh bodies of Russians continued to press. It was a critical moment when the French general, at the head of the 3rd regiment of Zouaves, the Algerine riflemen, the 6th and 7th of the line, and two troops of horse-artillery, marched to the aid of the English. At the same time, Lord Raglan ordered up two more 18-pounders in support of the English artillery already engaged. The French marched to the battery, so long the scene of contention, and where a large Russian force had just arrived, and was engaged with the Guards and the portion of the 20th regiment which had joined them. The French went into action with cheers, and cries of "Vive l'Empereur!" Three charges with the bayonet were made; "and it was only after the third that the enemy abandoned the ground, which was covered with his dead and wounded." The two 18-pounders simultaneously opened their fire on Shell Hill, and soon silenced the enemy's guns. At the same time, General Soimonoff, with a large body of infantry and artillery, attempted to turn the English right flank; and a body of men, about 5,000 strong, made a sortie from the town on the left of the French trenches, and actually got into two of the batteries. They were driven out with great loss; and a small body of marines, acting with the first brigade of the light division, under General Codrington, forced the Russians under Soimonoff, first to recoil and then to retreat.

And so "the battle continued with unabated vigour, and with no positive result, till the afternoon, when the symptoms of giving way first became apparent; and shortly after, although the fire did not cease, the retreat became general, and heavy masses were observed retiring over the bridge of Inkermann, and ascending the opposite heights." The artillery covered the retreat of the foiled and broken battalions of infantry; and the latter once in safety, the firing ceased, and the guns were withdrawn. "Before nightfall not a remnant of the mighty host, which had that morning been led to the battle, could be seen." It was one of the most wonderful engagements on record. There were never more than 8,000 English engaged; and for several hours they resisted the attack of 60,000 Russians. The French, under Bosquet, amounted to about 6,000: thus 14,000 men resisted and repulsed more than four times their number. The casualties of the enemy, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, Lord Raglan estimated at 15,000. The loss of the allies was very heavy. The English had 462 killed and 4,952 wounded; forty-three officers being in the first category, and 103 in the second. The French had 1,726 killed and wounded.

The battles of the Alma, Balaklava, and Inkermann were the most important in which England was engaged since that of Waterloo, in 1815: and they reflect so much credit upon the bravery and persevering energy of our gallant soldiers, that we have gone into them somewhat in detail. The remaining occurrences of the siege must be much more briefly narrated. After the last battle, immediate attention was directed to strengthen all those parts of our line which were exposed to attack: the siege was continued, though the hopes of its speedy termination were abandoned; and, on the 7th of November, it was resolved, at a council of war, to winter in the Crimea.—On the 13th of that month, a fearful storm swept over Constantinople, which did great damage, unroofing the lofty buildings, and bringing down three of the elegant and lofty minarets which surmounted the Grand Mosque of Sultan Achmet. The next day the tempest swept over the Black Sea; and the destruction done off the coast of the Crimea was immense. Many vessels that left the harbour of Balaklava on the 5th of November had not returned; most of them were lost. A day or two previous, a magnificent steamer, the Prince, had arrived at Balaklava, with winter clothing, provisions, and ammunition for the troops. That vessel had not entered the harbour, and was lost, with her cargo, valued at £500,000. The French had ships at Eupatoria, and they were much damaged. Eighteen vessels were wrecked or dismasted at the mouth of the Katcha; and the savage Cossacks fired upon the wrecks, killing or making prisoners of the crews, and taking possession of all property which the wind and sea had spared. The estimate of lives lost in this storm is 1,000; and that of the value of the clothes, provisions, and ammunition—all destroyed—all so much wanted by the army—was £2,000,000. From this time (to quote Lieutenant-Colonel Hamlyn), "To the end of December, but few events occurred to break the monotony of the siege. Day after day, the gunners, at intervals, exchanged shots with the enemy; and the French and English sharpshooters in the advanced trenches fired, from their sand-bag loopholes, at the Russian riflemen hid in pits, or behind screens of stone, without any other result than the loss of a few men on either side. Sometimes, shortly after dark, the Russians would commence a sharp cannonade, chiefly directed on the French. Very little damage was done on these occasions by the enemy's fire."

On the 6th of December, the Russians abandoned their camps in the villages of Kamara and Tchourgouna, first burning their huts. They marched away in the direction of Mackenzie's Farm.—On the 30th, Sir Colin Campbell and General Bosquet, accompanied by a body of troops of both nations, made a reconnaissance in that direction. Some Cossacks, and 4,000 or 5,000 infantry, had again advanced to Tchourgouna; but they retired on the advance of the allies, and the French set fire to the village.—On the last day in the year, the French bombarded the town with great vigour; the Russians made a very feeble reply.

CHAPTER CXIV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA—THE CRIMEAN WAR CONCLUDED.—A.D. 1854—1856.

THE student will find few pages in English history producing more melancholy sensations than those which tell of the condition of the English troops in the Crimea in the winter of 1854-'5. The government at home had not made sufficient arrangements for the hutting and feeding the army; and the sufferings of our poor soldiers from exposure to the bitterness of the weather, from killing fatigue in the trrnches, from want of proper clothes and food, were terible to endure, and heartrending to listen to. All our delicate and feeble men died; the strongest suffered dreadfully; and the whole camp resembled a hospital, where there was scarcely any one to tend the sick and the dying. The evils arising from the failures in the commissariat and medical departments, were increased by the loss of the Prince steamer on the 14th of November; and the civilian, enjoying the comforts of home, can scarcely imagine what the soldiers endured abroad.—At Scutari, the state of things was almost as bad as it was in the Crimea. Who was to blame it is impossible to say. There, as already stated, a hospital was established for the wounded men. It appears, from statements made in the House of Commons, sustained by official returns, that really immense quantities of medicines, restoratives, luxuries, comforts, and necessaries were ordered for Scutari, and the public had to pay for them; yet, when the wounded and invalids were sent there, a deficiency was found in everything—in medicines, medical men, nurses, beds and bedding, and provisions; even the means of cleanliness were wanting. An appeal for the troops in the Crimea, made by Sir Robert Peel, through the columns of the Times, produced the sum of £25,402, which was subscribed by the public, Sir Robert heading the list with £200. The relief afforded from this fund, called the "Times Fund," was most judiciously administered on the spot by Mr. Macdonald, a gentleman connected with that journal, whose expenses the proprietors defrayed. The want of nurses, both at Scutari and in the Crimea, called forth the active personal exertions of a lady whose name ought never to be omitted in any sketch of the Crimean war, as it most assuredly never will be forgotten by those who were indebted to her for consolation and comfort, and many of them, under the blessing of Providence, for life. Florence Nightingale, the daughter of William Shore Nightingale, Esq., of Embley Park, Hampshire, and Leigh Hurst, Derbyshire, left her luxurious home to go to Scutari and the Crimea; in both places being the principal medium through whom the hospitals were put on a proper footing, and the sick and wounded received the care and attendance they required. Augustus Stafford, Esq., and the Rev. Sydney Godolphin Osborne, were active fellow-labourers in the same cause, and personally contributed to the relief of the invalids; and a number of ladies followed the example of Miss Nightingale. Nurses were also sent out, the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Bracebridge heading the first party of thirty-seven; Mrs. Sidney Herbert (the wife of the then Secretary at War) aiding the movement by her influence and her funds. Mr. Sidney Herbert also warmly supported the proposal to send suitable nurses to the East. The steps taken by these benevolent persons had, in every way, the best possible effect; nor must the anxiety of the Queen for her soldiers be overlooked. Her majesty had subscribed to a society called the "Central Association," instituted, as soon as war was declared, for the relief of the wives and families and dependent relatives of the soldiers engaged in active service; for which purpose the large sum of £120,000 was raised. On the 13th of October, her majesty issued her royal commission, with the Prince Consort as president, to raise and distribute a "Patriotic Fund" for the relief of the widows and orphans of the soldiers, sailors, and marines who might fall in the war; heading that fund with the munificent sum of £1,000. And, on the 6th of December, when the privations and wants of the wounded and invalids were made known, and when Miss Nightingale and Mrs. Bracebridge were actively employed in their beneficent work, her majesty sent the following autograph letter to Mr. Sidney Herbert;—

"Would you tell Mrs. Herbert that I begged she would let me see, frequently, the accounts she receives from Miss Nightingale or Mrs. Bracebridge, as I hear no details of the wounded, though I see so many from officers, &c., about the battle-field; and, naturally, the former must interest me more than any one. Let Mrs. Herbert also know that I wish Miss Nightingale and the ladies would tell these poor, noble, and sick men, that NO ONE takes a warmer interest, or feels more for their sufferings, or admires their courage and heroism, MORE than their queen. Day and night she thinks of her beloved troops. So does the prince. Beg Mrs. Herbert to communicate these my words to those ladies, as I know that our sympathy is much valued by those noble fellows."

Mrs. Herbert sent this letter to Scutari and the Crimea, where it was read in the hospitals amidst loud cheers, and shouts of "God save the Queen!" and copies were made and put up, not only in the sick rooms, but in many of the tents.

The administration was severely and justly blamed for the miserable evils to which the sick and wounded were subject; but the ministers were as eager as any one to find a remedy for the break-down which had been exposed by the press.

Parliament met on the 12th of December, as the government required powers to raise a foreign legion of 15,000 men; and to accept the services of any militia regiments which might offer to do duty abroad. In discussing these measures, the policy of the war and its conduct, and also the condition of the army, were brought forward; and the ministers were very severely censured in the speeches of those members who opposed the bills; they were carried, however, by good, though not large, majorities. On the 22nd of December both Houses adjourned for the holidays, and reassembled on the 23rd of January. On that day, Mr. Roebuck gave notice of his intention to move for a select committee, "to inquire into the condition of our troops before Sebastopol; and into the conduct of the commissariat and medical departments of the army." This notice was followed by the resignation of Lord John Russell as President of the Council. His lordship resigned on the 25th of January; and on the 26th he stated his reasons for taking that step to be, that evils existed in consequence of military maladministration; and he had no confidence that those evils would be redressed. That evening Mr. Roebuck moved his resolution, which was carried, on the 29th, by 305 votes to 148.—Of course ministers could take no other step than to resign after such a majority against them. The Queen sent for the Earl of Derby, and requested him to undertake the formation of a new cabinet; but in the existing state of parties, as the Peelites would not join his administration, the noble earl felt himself obliged to decline the responsibility. Her majesty then sent for Lord John Russell. His conduct in imputing blame to his colleagues with whom he had so long acted, and deserting them in the moment of trial, had so offended the Whig party, that he could get none of the noblemen and gentlemen to whom he applied, to consent to serve in a cabinet of which he was the head. As a last resort, Lord Palmerston was summoned to the royal closet; and he undertook the task of re-forming the ministry. On the 8th of February the cabinet was reconstructed; Lord Palmerston taking the office held by Lord Aberdeen; Sir George Grey the Home Office, vacated by the premier. Earl Granville again became President of the Council; Lord Panmure succeeded the Duke of Newcastle as Minister of War; and Viscount Canning, the Postmaster-General, obtained a seat in the cabinet. In a very few days there was another ministerial crisis. When Lord Palmerston met the Commons, as premier, on the 16th of February, he expressed a hope that Mr. Roebuck would not insist upon carrying out his resolution; pledging the government, if the appointment of the committee of inquiry was not insisted upon to a strict investigation of the conduct of the war. Mr. Roebuck declined acceding to the noble lord's suggestion; and the House of Commons was as little disposed to abandon the inquiry as the member for Sheffield. As the premier yielded to the wishes of the House, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Cardwell, and Sir James Graham, resigned. Sir Charles Wood took the secretaryship of the Admiralty, the Right Hon. Vernon Smith being installed in his office as President of the Board of Control; Sir G. C. Lewis became Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, to the surprise of the majority of the House, and of the public generally, Lord John Russell was appointed colonial secretary. In Ireland, the Earl of Carlisle became lord-lieutenant, and Mr. Horsman, chief secretary, in the place of Lord St. Germans and Sir John Young; and Mr. Brewster resigned the office of attorney-general, to which Mr. Keogh, the solicitor-general, was promoted. Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald became the new solicitor-general; Sir Robert Peel also accepted office as Under-Secretary for the Colonies, and Mr. Danby Seymour as Secretary of the Board of Control. Mr. Roebuck's committee was appointed on the 23rd of February. It was several months before it made its report, which was submitted to the House on the 18th of June. It established the facts, that the troops "suffered from over-work, exposure, want of clothing, insufficient supplies for the healthy, and imperfect accommodation for the sick;" and Mr. Roebuck moved that the House will "visit with its severest reprobation" every member of the Aberdeen government whose councils led to these results. The House, however, was not inclined to go any further, and the previous question was carried by 289 to 182 votes. The government had, early in the year, sent out Sir John M'Neill and Colonel Tulloch to the East, to make inquiries into the state of the army. The result of those inquiries, and of the measures carried out by the new Minister of War—most of which were originated by the Duke of Newcastle before he left office—was so to improve the state of the army, as to leave few, if any causes of complaint. Mr. Stafford came home from the East to attend to his parliamentary duties; he returned again after the prorogation, and appeared in his seat when parliament assembled in 1856. He then said—

"Since the House separated, I have visited all the hospitals in the East to which our brave troops were sent—from the fine hospital in the Renkioi, to the furthest hospital in the Crimea; and high as my expectations were of the improvements made in them, they were surpassed by the reality. Not only were the patients in those hospitals supplied with every necessary and comfort, but I may even say, with every luxury. In answer to my inquiries, I heard nothing but expressions of satisfaction and of gratitude to the country that cared so well for her soldiers."

The troops in camp were as well looked after as those in the hospitals; and more comforts could not be possessed by soldiers on foreign service than ours enjoyed from the commencement of 1855 to the conclusion of the war.

In the autumn of 1854, negotiations were again carried on between Austria and Prussia, which ended in the latter power recognising the "Four Points of August" as the bases of peace; and on the 2nd of December, a treaty was concluded between England, France, and Austria; in which, again recognising those "Four Points," and also previous protocols that had been agreed to, the three powers further engaged, "mutually and reciprocally, not to enter into any arrangement with the imperial court of Russia, without having first deliberated upon it in common." Before the year closed, Russia was admitted to the conferences; and on the 7th of January, 1855, Prince Gortschakoff, who represented the czar, accepted the "Four Points;" and also an explanation of their bearing as applied to the navigation of the Danube and the Black Sea, contained in a protocol agreed to by England, France, and Austria, and dated the 28th of December. It was arranged accordingly that negotiations should be opened at Vienna; and Lord John Russell went to that city in February to act with the Earl of Westmoreland as her majesty's plenipotentiary. M. Drouyn de l'Huys, the French foreign minister, soon after joined the conference as the plenipotentiary of France. The opening of the negotiations was delayed by the death of the czar, which took place on the 2nd of March—there is little doubt, from the effects of grief and mortification at the failure of his plans, and the aspect of affairs in the Crimea. He was succeeded by the Grand Duke Alexander, who authorised his plenipotentiaries (Prince Gortschakoff and M. Titoff) to go on with the negotiations, which were opened on the 15th of March, and continued till the 19th of June. In the course of them, Austria proposed terms which would have given Russia power to increase her fleet in the Black Sea to an unlimited extent. All the plenipotentiaries agreed to these terms, which the governments of England and France at once rejected, as being opposed to the objects for which the war was undertaken, and to the "Four Points." M. Drouyn de l'Huys resigned his office, as the terms he had agreed to, and recommended, were rejected. Lord John Russell did not take that course, though he also had pressed the acceptance of Austria's terms upon his colleagues; and yet, before the proceedings at Vienna were known, he made a violent war speech in the House of Commons. Soon after, the discussions, and the various propositions submitted during their progress, were laid before the public, and the conduct of Lord John Russell excited great indignation. Sir F. B. Lytton gave notice, on the 10th of July, that, on the 13th, he should move a resolution declaring that the conduct of his lordship at Vienna "had shaken the confidence of the country in those to whom its affairs were entrusted." A number of ministerial members, including several holders of office, signed a round-robin, and sent it to Lord Palmerston, to the effect, that they should vote for the motion unless Lord John resigned. He did resign, and Sir William Molesworth was appointed colonial minister. Sir Benjamin Hall succeeded him as First Commissioner of Works; and the Hon. E. Bouverie was appointed President of the Poor-Law Board in the place of Sir Benjamin. Sir William Molesworth did not hold his office long. He died on the 22nd of October, and was succeeded by Mr. Labouchere. About the same time, Lord Canning went to India as Governor-General, and the Duke of Argyll was appointed Postmaster-General in his place. The Earl of Harrowby then became Lord Privy Seal; and Mr. Matthew Talbot Baines Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

The negotiations at Vienna were not accompanied by an armistice; though the hostile forces were not very active in the Crimea till the spring had advanced. Omar Pasha had joined them in the last week of December, with a considerable part of the army that had served with him on the Danube; and he was placed in command at Eupatória. On the 10th of January, another ally was obtained: Victor Emmanuel, King of Sardinia, joined England and France, agreeing to send 15,000 troops to the Crimea, a loan being obtained from England to pay their expenses. England, by this time, had her foreign legion nearly enrolled, and had taken a body of Bashi-Bazouks into her pay; and the French army had been reinforced; whilst the Emperor of Russia, on the 12th of February, issued an imperial ukase, ordering the entire militia of the Russian empire to be organised and armed for the defence of the orthodox faith. In that month an attempt was made to drive the Turks from Eupatoria. The army under Omar Pasha was attacked by at least 40,000 men. There was a gallant contest; but the Russians were defeated, and had to retreat in a dismal plight, when the invalids and wounded must have suffered greatly from the bitterness of the cold. Soon after, the intelligence of the emperor's death was received, which caused great grief in the army. About that time, Prince Menschikoff, on account of illness, resigned the chief command at Sebastopol to General Osten-sacken. There were then 50,000 men in the forts of Sebastopol, and the camp in the north; 18,000, under General Liprandi, were encamped on the Tchernaya; 9,000, under General Wagner, were in the valley of the Baidar; 45,000, under General Read, at Simpheropol; and 20,000, under General Pawloff, at Perekop: making a total of 142,000 men.—In March, Prince Gortschakoff arrived at Sebastopol; and he took the supreme command of all the troops in the peninsula. His first act was to order a sortie on the English and French lines, in the night of the 20th of that month. It was one of the most desperate and determined the allies had yet encountered. They were attacked by strong parties at every assailable point, but were able to repulse them all. The English succeeded in beating off the enemy and securing their own trenches first; then they assisted the French.

During the winter and spring, both the English and French had been employed in strengthening and improving their works, and in making the communication between their positions more easy. At the close of 1854, the construction of a railway from Balaklava to the camp was commenced, at the suggestion of Mr. Peto, an eminent railway contractor, then M.P. for Norwich, and his partners, Messrs. Brassey and Betts. Their offer to the government was, to send men to make the railway, to find the requisite materials, and to charge only the actual expenses—an act of patriotism which ought not to go unrecorded. This railway was constructed, and was found of the utmost use to the army. A "land transport corps" was also sent out, under Colonel M'Murdo, whose aid greatly lightened the labour of the troops, and enabled them to work in the trenches with cheerfulness and vigour. There had been little actual fighting (except the sortie of the 20th of March) in the first three months of the year; but on the 9th of April the bombardment was resumed, with greatly increased force, and continued to the 17th, when it again slackened. During the time, the stoneworks of the forts were shattered, but the heavy earthworks thrown up stood the shock of the balls, which were imbedded in them, but produced little or no effect in the way of destruction. On the 16th of May, General Canrobert resigned the command of the French army to General Pelissier, but continued to act as general of division. On the 7th of June, the first really substantial success in the bombardment was obtained. On that day the French captured one of the forts, which had been a great annoyance to the allies—the Mamelon; and also two redoubts to the east of that fort, called the White Works, with 62 guns, 14 officers, and 450 rank and file, prisoners. At the same time the English attacked some works to the westward of the Mamelon, called the Quarries. They were literally large burrows in the earth, from which the Russians had greatly annoyed both the English and French in their trenches. The storming them was a very gallant exploit. General Pelissier said of it—"While we were taking the White Works and Mamelon, the English, with rare intrepidity, stormed the Quarries, and established themselves firmly there; taking thus a glorious part in the day's success."

The guns of the Mamelon and the White Works were, thenceforth, directed against the town, which was again bombarded on the 17th of June, with an effect so satisfactory, that it led to the assault, the next day, of the Malakoff by the French, and of the Redan by the English. Both failed: though the assaulting troops displayed equal firmness and intrepidity, they had to retreat to their trenches. This was the first decided check the allies had received; and it was owing to the tactics of General Pelissier, though he endeavoured to throw the blame on the English. The failure had a great effect on Lord Raglan, whose health had recently given way. A few days after he was attacked by cholera, of which he died on the 25th of June, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. He was greatly regretted, both by the English and their allies; and warm tributes were paid to his memory in the general orders of the French and Sardinian commanders-in-chief. Even the Russians said of him—"He succeeded in conciliating the esteem and respect, not only of those to whom his nation was allied, but also of the enemy to whom he was opposed." Lieutenant-General Simpson, as the senior officer, succeeded his lordship in the command of the English army; and the allies, from the commencement of July, continued to press the "beleaguered town"—as the soldiers called Sebastopol—closer every day. The Russians kept up a pretty constant fire in return; and "the loss of the French and English," writes a contemporary, "was more serious than at any other period during the siege; the former frequently having 100 men killed, or rendered unserviceable, during a night, and sometimes many more." The killed and wounded on the part of the English were also, General Simpson regretted, when transmitting the lists to Lord Panmure, "very heavy." The Russians made no sorties of importance during that month. Almost one of their last attempts of that nature was an attack, by 2,000 men, in the night of the 2nd of August, on the English works on the Woronzoff road (the use of which they had recovered some time before), between their right and left attacks. The fighting did not continue more than ten minutes, when the enemy made a rapid retreat.

The French had for some time pitched a camp on the Tchernaya; and they were supported by the Sardinian and Turkish contingents. It protected the approaches from Inkermann and the valley of Baidar to Balaklava; and the French had taken up that position when the English army was so greatly weakened by losses in battle and disease; previously, the post of honour and of the greatest danger had always belonged to the English. The Russians in Sebastopol were now suffering from scarcity and disease; whilst the streets were covered with ruins—the effect of the bombardment. It was the conviction of Prince Gortschakoff that the town could not hold out much longer; and he determined to make another effort to force the allies to raise the siege. For this purpose the French and Sardinians were to have been taken by surprise, and driven from the Tchernaya. This was to have been followed up by simultaneous attacks on Balaklava, and on the heights occupied by the English, under General Simpson, opposite the Redan and a battery called the Barrack Battery. These attacks were to have been made by the forces encamped in the valleys of Baidar and the Tchernaya. The French then occupied the left and right of the attack, and sorties from the town were to be made upon those points at the same time: thus the battle would have been raging in four places at once; and as the Russians continued to exceed the allies in number, their commander may be excused for calculating upon a success, which he felt would be a glorious triumph. Deserters occasionally came into the camp of the allies; and one of these, on the 25th of July, stated that the allies on the Tchernaya were to be attacked with a great force; thirty brigades of infantry and four of artillery were being organised for that purpose. This information probably prevented the success of the well-laid plan, for it was intended to surprise the camp of the allies; and, from the instructions (found after the battle, with the details above given, in the pocket of General Read, who was killed), it is evident that defeat was not contemplated. But the Sardinians, who were commanded by General La Marmora, had strongly fortified their position. The French were encamped on those hills where the redoubts had been erected that formed the object of contention on the 25th of October. The Sardinians were nearer the river, which, with a canal or aqueduct, ran between the two armies, and the river and canal were crossed by bridges. The Sardinians had also established two outposts on the other side of the river. At dawn, on the morning of the 16th of August, these outposts were attacked, and driven across the side stream after a gallant resistance. The Russians immediately crossed the Tchernaya, partly by the bridge, and partly by the aid of ladders, pontoons, and planks; having compelled a battalion of French infantry, which held the bridge, to retire. They fell back upon their main supports; and the united force again advanced, and retook the bridge. The Russians had, however, been able to follow up their first advantage by gaining the heights which rise precipitously from each side of the road; from whence they opened a fire from their artillery upon the French and Sardinian positions. A column also assailed the Mamelon; but it was, says General Marmora, "vigorously attacked by the French troops in support, and hurled back, broken and disordered, into the Tchernaya." General La Marmora made every effort to silence the enemy's guns by his own, a Turkish battery, and an English battery, with which General Simpson had reinforced him, and he eventually succeeded. There were other points attacked; but the enemy being repulsed at all, commenced his retreat, and was driven back across the river, leaving the ground covered with dead and wounded. The English cavalry, under Lieutenant-General Scarlett, was placed in the plain of Balaklava, prepared to take advantage of any circumstance that might present itself: they had no opportunity, however, of coming in contact with the enemy. Again numbers were beaten; for whilst Liprandi had from 50,000 to 60,000 men, and 160 pieces of artillery, the force of the Sardinians was 12,000 men and four batteries; that of the French, 10,000 men in position, but only 4,500 actually engaged, and twenty-four pieces of cannon. The loss of the Russians was estimated at between 5,000 and 6,000 men, including 600 prisoners; whilst, on the part of the allies, it did not amount to more than 1,000 men.

After this defeat, the allies made preparations for what it was deemed would be the last attempt on Sebastopol.—On the 5th of September, a cannonade was opened from the French works, which was kept up during the night, and on the 6th, by repeated discharges from all the allied trenches. On the 7th, the bombardment continued; and houses in the town, and ships in the harbour, were set in flames, one after the other, by the "infernal fire," as it was termed in the Russian despatches. On the 8th, the fire was still continued; and on that day it was resolved to attack the Malakoff and the Redan; the fall of which, it was expected, would be followed by the surrender of the town. It was twelve o'clock when the French rushed forward, dashed up the ascents to the Malakoff, climbed the parapets, leaped into the work, and, in a short hand-to-hand fight, drove out the Russians. They soon returned; and in three columns attacked the centre, the right, and the left of the fortress. The fighting continued for near four hours; but the French held the post, and the Russians were at last compelled to retire into the town. Whilst this struggle lasted, the French attacked another fort, called the Little Redan, and the Central Bastion: but were repulsed at both; and the English once more tried their fortune at the Great Redan. The men sent on this enterprise had to cross a wide open space, and were literally mowed down by the Russian cannon. But they gained the crest of the ditch, and, ladders being placed, "they stormed the parapet of the Redan, and penetrated into the salient angle. A most determined and bloody contest was there maintained for more than an hour, and, although supported to the utmost, and the greatest bravery displayed, it was found impossible to maintain the position." The trenches were, subsequently to this attack, so crowded with troops, that General Simpson was unable to organise a second assault. He arranged for a renewed attack the next morning with Sir Colin Campbell and Sir William Eyre; but about eleven o'clock at night, the enemy commenced exploding the magazines. It was found that the Redan was abandoned; at daylight it was occupied by the British; and their great fires were seen in the town, and explosions were repeated every instant. The Russians had been observed, some days previously, constructing a raft bridge on the north side of the harbour; it was now found that it was intended to enable them to evacuate the town, which they did in the night between the 8th and 9th of September, under cover of the fires and explosions; disconnecting the bridge, and removing it to the other side, when the evacuation was effected. All the men-of-war in the harbour were sunk; and the town, Forts Nicholas and Paul, and the dockyard were left in flames. To the latter, however, very little damage was done. The losses of all parties in the final assault were great. The English had 385, the French 1,634, and the Russians 2,684, men killed; the numbers wounded were, respectively, 1,886, 4,513, and 6,058. The Russians had also 1,185 men returned as captured; and there were missing of the three nations—English, 176; French, 1,410; Russians, 1,763. The grand totals were—

English	2,447
French	7,557
Russians	11,690
	21,694

On the 9th of September the allies entered Sebastopol; they were obliged to observe the greatest caution, as the explosions continued; several English soldiers being killed and wounded by one of them. The town presented a dreadful scene; and it was evident that the sufferings of the troops and inhabitants must have been intense. The allies took immediate steps to remove nuisances and to establish order. They divided the town into a western and eastern portion, the former being allotted to the French, the latter to the English. Brigadier-General Windham was appointed governor of the English, and General Bazaine of the French. The soldiers of both nations were quartered in their respective portions of the town; and they lost no opportunity of congregating together, and promoting good fellowship with each other. The Russians remained in the Crimea; and they occupied positions so strong and so well defended, that the allies, at a conference held on the 24th of September, after several reconnaissances had been made, resolved not to attempt to dislodge them; they, therefore, occupied themselves with improving their own position, and preparing for the coming winter. In October a small expedition was sent out against Kinburn, a Russian fortress, standing on a narrow tongue of land at the mouth of the Dnieper. It sailed on the 14th; and, after a brief defence, the fort surrendered on the 17th. A French garrison was left at Kinburn, and the expedition returned to Kamiesch Bay. On the 24th of October, the Russian settlements of Tamar and Fanagoria, on the eastern side of the Straits of Kertch, were destroyed; and these were the last passages at arms.—On the 10th of November General Simpson resigned the command of the English troops, and, with Sir Colin Campbell, embarked for England. Lieutenant-General Sir William Codrington succeeded to the chief command, and Brigadier-General Cameron was placed at the head of the Highland division.

There was a sad accident in the French camp on the 15th of November. A large powder magazine, called the Mill, stood near Inkermann, which contained several tons of gunpowder, 600,000 cartridges, and 300 shells. This magazine exploded about 3 P.M. on the above day; and it caused a conflagration, in a contiguous part, of artillery belonging to the English, arranged round a windmill, in which were 180 tons of gunpowder. The heroism of Lieutenant Hope, of the 7th Fusiliers, and some men of his regiment, of the Rifles, and of the 34th, who mounted the roof of the mill and covered the walls with tarpaulins and blankets, it is thought was the means of preserving this magazine from explosion. Lives were unfortunately lost of both nations; and the French park of artillery was destroyed. At Sebastopol, the work of destruction, as well as of preservation, was also going on. All the ammunition, guns, small arms, provisions, and other useful articles were collected from the forts and magazines, to be divided between the allied armies in proportion to their numbers. These things cleared out, the sappers and miners were set to work to make mines for blowing-up the docks and the remaining forts. All these buildings were laid in ruins; and well might the Russians say, "The glory of Sebastopol is departed."

The movements during 1855, out of the Crimea, were not very important. A naval and military expedition of the allies to the Sea of Azoff, which they entered on the 25th of May, was completely successful. Kertch and Yenikale were taken, and an almost incredible quantity of shipping and stores destroyed. To the Baltic an immense fleet had been sent, under Admiral Sir R. Dundas; but, beyond establishing a blockade, and partially destroying the fortifications of Sweaborg in the month of August, little was done; and at the approach of winter the fleet returned home, with no more credit than it had gained the year before. An expedition was also sent to the White Sea, which put an entire stop to the Russian trade in that direction; but one to the Pacific, sent to redeem the discredit which the allies imagined was attached to that of 1854, as they failed in taking the settlement of Petropaulovski, was equally unsatisfactory in its result. The united squadron of seven British and four French vessels again sailed to that port. It did not arrive in the Bay of Avatscha till the 20th of May; when it was found that several Russian vessels, which the commanders had expected to find in the bay, had made their escape; so had the inhabitants of Petropaulovski. The sailors destroyed the fortifications and all the public buildings, except the hospital and church; the private dwellings were left untouched. The squadron cruised in the Pacific and the Eastern Ocean during the summer, with no result except destroying a large quantity of shipping materials, belonging to the Russian government, in De Castries' Bay. In Asia the Russians were more successful than they had been in Europe. After a long siege, and a most gallant defence, conducted by General Williams, the English commissioner, Kars surrendered to the Russian army under General Mouravieff, on the 25th of November. The Turks lost, by this mishap, 8,000 prisoners, 130 cannon, and 30,000 muskets.

The negotiations which had failed in June, 1855, ceased for the remainder of that year; but in 1856 they were renewed, and conducted at Paris, the plenipotentiaries being—England, the Earls of Clarendon and Cowley: France, Count Walewski and the Baron de Borqueney: Austria, Count Buol Schaunstein and Baron Hubner: Russia, Count Orloff and Baron de Brunnow: Sardinia, Count Cavour and the Marquis de Villa Marina: Turkey, Mohammed Emin Ali Pasha and Mehemmed Djemel Bey.—The conferences were opened at the hôtel of the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, Count Walewski, on the 25th of February. The "Four Points" were made the bases of a treaty, with a fifth added, at the suggestion of England, for the purpose of enabling the plenipotentiaries to make such terms as might be considered necessary to check Russian progress in the Baltic as well as in the Black Sea. The negotiations continued through the month of March; and at the sixth sitting, on the 10th of that month, it was resolved to invite Prussia to send plenipotentiaries to the conference, as a "signing party to the convention concluded at London on the 13th of July, 1841." That government accepted the invitation, and sent Baron de Manteuffel and the Count de Hatzfeldt to Paris; who arrived in time to be present at the sitting of March 18th, attended the subsequent ones, and signed the definitive treaty, which was concluded on the 30th of March. It comprised thirty-four articles, stipulating—

The establishment of peace, in perpetuity, between Great Britain, France, Sardinia, Turkey, and Russia [Art. 1].—That all the territories conquered or occupied by the hostile troops during the war, should be restored [Arts. 2—4].—That a full and entire amnesty should be granted to any of the subjects of the contracting parties who were in any way compromised by the war [Art. 5].—That all prisoners of war should be immediately given up [Art. 6].—That the Sublime Porte is declared to be admitted to participate in all the advantages of the public law and international system of Europe [Art. 7].—In disputes between the sultan and any of the contracting powers, the mediation of the others to be resorted to before the use of force [Art. 8]. The sultan to communicate to the other powers the firman ameliorating the condition of his Christian subjects; but they are not to interfere in the relations between him and his subjects, nor in the internal affairs of the empire [Art. 9].—The convention of July 13th, 1841, respecting the closing of the Dardanelles, to be revised [Art. 10].—The Black Sea to be neutralised; and consuls to be admitted into the ports of Russia and Turkey on its coast [Arts. 11 and 12].—No military arsenal to be maintained; and the force and number of vessels necessary for the czar and the sultan to keep in the Black Sea, to be settled by a convention to be annexed to the treaty [Arts. 13 and 14].—The navigation of the Danube to be settled in conformity with the principles of the act of the congress of Vienna, regulating the navigation of rivers which separate or traverse different states; and the works necessary to remove the impediments to the free navigation of that river, to be directed, and the navigation kept open and regulated, by a commission of one delegate each from Austria, Bavaria, Turkey, and Wurtemberg; and one from the three Danubian principalities — Wallachia, Moldavia, and Servia [Arts. 15—18].—Each of the contracting powers to have the right to station two light vessels at the mouth of the Danube, to execute the regulations, &c. [Art. 19].—Russia agrees to cede certain portions of Bessarabia, which are to be added to Moldavia [Arts. 20 and 21].—Wallachia and Moldavia to enjoy, under the suzerainty of the Porte, all the privileges of which they are in possession: to possess an independent and national administration, and full freedom of religion, commerce, legislation, and navigation: their definite organisation to be settled by a divan, composed so as to represent, most closely, the interests of all classes of society: the final agreement with the suzerian power to be recorded in a convention to be concluded at Paris between the contracting parties; the principalities to keep up a national armed force, to maintain the security of the interior and of the frontier: if either is menaced, the sultan is to come to an understanding with the other powers as to the measures to be taken; and no armed intervention is to take place without a previous agreement between those powers [Arts. 22—27].—The same privileges of freedom of religion, &c., and from armed intervention, to be secured to Servia [Arts. 28 and 29].—The integrity of the Russian and Turkish possessions in Asia to be maintained as before the war [Art. 30].—The conquered and occupied territories to be evacuated as soon as possible after the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty [Art. 31].—Commercial transactions between the belligerents to be restored to the state that existed before the war [Art. 32].—A separate convention respecting the Aland Islands to have the same force as this treaty [Art. 33].—Ratifications to be exchanged within four weeks, or sooner, if possible [Art. 34].

Three conventions were annexed to this treaty:—

I. Was an agreement between the contracting powers respecting the Straits of the Dardanelles; excluding ships of war of all nations, except light vessels of war employed on the missions of foreign powers, and those which each of the contracting parties is authorised to keep at the mouth of the Danube.—II. Limits the force the Emperor of Russia and the sultan are to keep in the Black Sea, to six steam-vessels each, the tonnage of each vessel not to exceed 800 tons.—III. The czar engages "that the Aland Isles shall not be fortified, and that no military or naval establishment shall be maintained or erected there."

The intelligence that peace was signed was received with the firing of salutes and great rejoicing in the capitals of all the contracting powers. The conferences still continued; the excesses of the press in Belgium, and the state of Italy, being discussed; Count Walewski complaining that the doctrine of assassination was promulgated in the former country, and Count Cavour objecting to the continued occupation of the latter by foreign troops. The congress came to no decision upon either subject.—Another discussion was on international maritime law; and on that subject all the plenipotentiaries agreed to a manifesto, in which they solemnly declared that—

"1. Privateering is, and remains, abolished.—2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.—3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under an enemy's flag.—4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy."

All the powers represented at Paris agreed to this declaration, and undertook to endeavour to procure the assent of those who had no plenipotentiaries present. On the continent it gave great satisfaction; but in England there were certainly as many who disapproved of it as there were of those who regarded it with favour. The former condemned it as a surrender of what this country had always considered as her most essential maritime rights.

After the "Treaty of Paris" was settled and arranged between the seven powers, a separate treaty was concluded between Great Britain, France, and Austria, by which the contracting parties guaranteed, "jointly and severally, the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire;" and declared, that any infraction of the treaty of March 30th, 1856, would be considered by them a casus belli.—This treaty was signed on the 15th of April, and the ratifications exchanged on the 29th. When it became known, it gave the czar great offence; and Count Orloff, in an interview with the Emperor of the French, remonstrated bitterly against it. The contracting powers considered it merely supplemental to the former treaty and understanding between them: "still," as another historian observes, "if they had a perfect reliance on the good faith of Russia, the necessity for their entering into this separate agreement is by no means apparent."

Comfortable and easy as their life was at Sebastopol, the military men received the news of the signature of the treaty with great joy. Measures were immediately taken to evacuate the town and plateau of Sebastopol; but before they left, measures were adopted by both the French and English officers to preserve the security of the sites where the bodies of their countrymen who fell in the war were interred. The principal English burial-ground is situated on what was known to the army as "Cathcart's Hill." It is a parallelogram, of about forty yards long by thirty broad, and is formed by the base of a ruined wall, which, in former days, might have marked the lines of a Tartar fort, or have been the first Russian redoubt to watch over the infancy of Sebastopol. It has been enclosed; and there are memorials, in solid stone, to most of the officers interred there. There are other burial-places, which were well defined, and decorated with great care by the officers and men, and the Russian authorities promised scrupulously to preserve them. A church has also been erected at Constantinople, as the fittest monument to the officers and soldiers of the British army who fell in the Crimea. The survivors had nearly all left the peninsula by the end of May; the French and English having parted with the most fervent expressions of good-will and friendship for each other. The two governments appeared desirous of cultivating that friendship. The emperor decorated many of our officers with the Legion of Honour; and the Queen sent the Order of the Bath to 190 of the French officers. They were invested, in her majesty's name, with the insignia of the order by Earl Cowley. A banquet followed, at which Count Walewski proposed, as a toast, "The English Army and Navy," saying—

"May the English soldiers and sailors always fight side by side with the French soldiers and sailors in a cause so just, and with a success as striking! May the bonds of fraternity, so gloriously cemented on the fields of battle, never be weakened; but may the alliance which now so happily exists between the two countries be perpetuated to the latest posterity!"

Medals were cast in both countries in honour of the gallant deeds of their soldiers, which were given to officers and to the rank and file. Orders and medals were also given, by England and France, to the officers and privates of Sardinia. Both Houses of Parliament, on the 5th of May, voted an address to the crown, approving of the treaty. On the 8th, "the thanks of parliament" were unanimously and heartily voted "to the army, navy, and marines employed in the operations of the late war, and to the embodied militia." Very warmly were their gallant deeds eulogised on this occasion; and the Earl of Derby (who, in the House of Lords, seconded the vote of thanks proposed by Lord Panmure, Minister of War) extended his praise "to those brave men who had associated with them in the hour of trial and of victory; and the alliance and close friendship with whom, he trusted, would not terminate with the war in which they had fought and won together."—The same evening that this vote was carried in both Houses by acclamation, a message was received from her majesty, requesting that a pension of £1,000 per annum might be settled upon Major-General Williams, for his conduct in Asia; to which the House agreed; and her majesty created that officer a baronet, by the title of Sir William Williams of Kars. Her majesty also bestowed the Order of the Bath very liberally upon the officers generally.

Before concluding this chapter, two events must be mentioned connected with the war. The first was a rand naval review, held off Portsmouth, on the 23rd of April, "in order that the world might see that Great Britain did not conclude peace because she could not carry on the war." It was a magnificent sight; the Queen, the Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, and the Princesses Royal, Alice, and Helena, being present. There were also ministers, ambassadors, members of both Houses of Parliament, and countless thousands of all classes of the English people. The sea was covered with elegant yachts, and other craft, amongst which was conspicuous the French corvette Duchayla, which was sent over by the Empress of the French as a compliment to the Queen. She was commanded by Rear-Admiral Jurien de la Graviere; and her deck was crowded with officers glittering in gold lace, and other ornaments. The day was fine, and all went off well; there was no fault nor mishap in the manœuvres; and not a single accident occurred.

The second event was a display of illuminations and fireworks in the metropolis, in the evening of the 29th of May; the pyrotechnic display taking place in the parks and on Primrose Hill. The expense (£8,000) was paid by the public; and the "oldest inhabitant" declared that such crowds had never before been collected in the metropolis. The illuminations were brilliant and beautiful; and probably the exhibition of pyrotechnics was the grandest ever seen in this country. The utmost good-humour was displayed by the crowds, and nothing unpleasant occurred. There were similar rejoicings—of course not on so magnificent a scale—throughout the country; intermingled with public dinners, and treats to the poor; and it was several weeks before the peace celebrations came to a close.

CHAPTER CXV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1856—1858.

IN 1856, parliament opened on the 31st of January. In her opening speech, her majesty adverted to the successes that had attended the arms of the allies in the Crimea, and to the pleasing prospect that peace would be speedily concluded; intimating, at the same time, that the military and naval preparations would be in no degree relaxed till a satisfactory treaty of peace should have been concluded. Her majesty expressed her gratification, that, notwithstanding the pressure of the war, the resources of the empire continued unimpaired; and her reliance on the manly spirit and enlightened patriotism of her subjects, for a continuance of that support which they had hitherto so nobly afforded. When the address was under discussion, the Conservative leaders, in both Houses, declared that they would carefully abstain from any cause likely to embarrass the government during the progress of negotiations.

The parliamentary proceedings did not attract any especial interest during the session, as the negotiations, first, and then the peace, occupied much of the public attention. In the upper House, at the commencement of the session, an important question was raised connected with the life peerages. With a view to augment their strength in that House, ministers advised the Queen to create life peerages: the first dignity of that class being conferred on Sir James Parke, one of the barons of the Exchequer, who was created, by letters patent, Baron Wensleydale, "for the term of his natural life." The advisers of her majesty intended to create ten or twelve other life peerages, and thus to have increased the number of their supporters without permanently adding to that of the peers. This scheme was considered unconstitutional by the majority of the Lords; and on the 7th of February it was, on the motion of Lord Lyndhurst—who contended that a system of life peerages would destroy the hereditary character of the House, and give a dangerous power to the ministers of the crown—resolved to refer the subject to the committee of privileges, which is composed of the entire House. After discussing the question in three sittings, this committee, on the 22nd of February, resolved, by 97 "contents" again 52 "non-contents," that a peerage for life did not entitle the grantee to sit and vote in parliament. In consequence, in July, 1856, her majesty reversed her first letters patent conferring the life dignity, and created Sir James a peer of the United Kingdom, with remainder to his heirs male. The question of life peerages was then dropped, and has not subsequently been revived.

In the Commons, a debate on a resolution moved by Mr. Whiteside on the 28th of April, connected with the fall of Kars, excited the greatest interest. The resolution, after expressing admiration of the Turkish soldiery, and of the devotion of the British officers at the siege of Kars, declared the conviction of the House, that the capitulation of that fortress, and the surrender of the army, "were in a great measure owing to the want of foresight and energy on the part of her majesty's government." On the 1st of May this motion was negatived by 303 to 176 votes.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer did not make his financial statement till the 19th of May. It presented a great excess of expenditure over income; the former being £88,428,000, and the revenue producing only £65,704,000, leaving a deficiency of £22,724,000.

Although the army and navy estimates were this year reduced between sixteen and seventeen millions, still, there were so many expenses consequent upon the close of the war, that the estimated expenditure for the financial year 1856-'57 was £77,525,000, the estimated income being £67,152,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to supply the deficiency by loan, and not by increased taxation; and the Commons passed a vote authorising him immediately to raise a loan of £5,000,000.—Several important acts were passed during the session. One of these, for "the Incorporation and Regulation of Joint-Stock Companies, and other Associations," provided, 1st, for "the constitution and incorporation of companies and associations;" 2nd, "for the management and administration of companies;" and, 3rd, for "the winding-up of companies." It was the first time that those transactions became the object of legislation; and that part of the act has been frequently put in operation.—Another act, "to render more effectual the Police in Counties and Boroughs of England and Wales," was rendered necessary, as former acts for the establishment of a county police had not succeeded in establishing a general system. The new act directs the justices assembled in quarter sessions to establish a sufficient police force for the county, where such a force does not already exist; and where constabularies have been established in divisions of counties, to consolidate them, unless, by order in council, the county should be divided into separate police districts. It also empowers county constables to act in any borough within the county; and provides for the incorporation of boroughs with counties, under certain circumstances, for the purposes of police.—By another act, the commissioners of the Admiralty were authorised to raise a force for the defence of the coast, in addition to the existing coast-guard; but not to exceed 10,000 men.

Early in the year, her majesty instituted a new Order of Merit, called "The Victoria Cross;" to be conferred upon inferior officers and privates, both in the army and navy, for distinguished gallantry. The members wear a medal and ribbon, but bear no title.—The proclamation of peace was followed, on the 3rd of May, by the issuing of a royal proclamation granting an amnesty to political exiles. Under its provisions, Frost, Williams, and Jones, Chartists, transported for offences committed in Wales, and Smith O'Brien, transported for his share in the rebellion of 1848, at Ballingarry, in Ireland, were declared at liberty to return to England. John Mitchell and Timothy Meagher, also transported for their participation in the Irish movement, having made their escape from Bermuda, were exempted from the benefit of this amnesty. On the 11th of November, this gracious act was followed by another. Her majesty issued a full and free pardon to the above offenders, by which they were enabled to re-enter on the possession of their property, and to the enjoyment of all the civil rights and privileges they had previously forfeited.

The revenue appears to have improved during the year, as it produced, from January 1st to December 31st, 1856, £71,217,881 8s. 2d. Receipts from old stores, money repaid by the East India Company, &c., raised this sum to £72,218,988 1s. 11d. The exports were reported to amount to the large sum of £115,826,948.

Foreign events offer little, during 1856, either for comment or narrative. The powers engaged in the late war were occupied chiefly in reorganising their resources, and in carrying out the obligations of the treaty. As the year waned, doubts arose whether Russia intended faithfully to observe the terms of the late treaty. She had consented to cede certain parts of Bessarabia to the Hospodar of Moldavia; but there was great delay in withdrawing troops. She also attempted to establish a fort on the Isle of Serpents, in the Black Sea. France seemed inclined to condone these breaches of faith on the part of the great northern power; but England and Turkey demanded a strict fulfilment of the treaty; and Austria did not, in consequence, withdraw her troops from the principalities; whilst England continued to maintain a small squadron in the Black Sea. Before the year closed, plenipotentiaries from all the powers who were parties to the treaty, assembled in Paris to hold a conference, with a view to settle the difference which prevailed, the first meeting being held on the 31st of December. On the 6th of January, 1857, the plenipotentiaries agreed upon terms, which led to the evacuation of the ceded parts of Bessarabia and of the Isle of Serpents by Russia; the Austrian troops being recalled from Wallachia and Moldavia, and the English vessels from the Turkish waters. The settlement of the principalities, however, still occupied the attention of the powers.

At the close of 1856, and before parliament opened in 1857, domestic industry appeared to be thriving: the people were quiet and contented, and there was no political agitation. A strong opinion prevailed, however, in the higher circles, that there would, after parliament assembled, be a change of ministers, as the popularity of Lord Palmerston was supposed to be based upon no permanent foundation, but to have sprung out of the circumstances of the war. Events, however, ran contrary to these anticipations.

The legislature met on the 3rd of February, and the session was opened by commission. In the royal speech read by the Lord Chancellor, allusion was made to the wars then raging with China and Persia; and when the address was under discussion in the Lords, Lord Grey moved an amendment, censuring the government for not calling parliament together when it was deemed necessary to go to war with Persia. The amendment was negatived by 45 votes against 12. During the debate on the address in both Houses, the conduct of Sir John Bowring, and others who had commenced the war with China, was censured; and, on the 16th of February, notices of motion condemning that conduct were given—in the Lords by the Earl of Derby, in the Commons by Mr. Cobden. Lord Derby moved three resolutions on the 24th of February—the first regretting the interruption of amicable relations between her majesty's subjects at Canton and the Chinese authorities: the second declaring the time unfavourable for pressing the question of the admission of British subjects into Canton: the third declared it to be the opinion of the House, that hostile operations should not have been undertaken without express instructions, previously received, from her majesty's government. After two nights' debate, these resolutions were negatived; the "contents" and "non-contents," present and proxies, being respectively 110 and 146.—Mr. Cobden was more successful. He brought forward his motion on the 26th of February, and his resolution regretting the breach of the peace; stating that the affair of the Arrow offered no satisfactory grounds for the violent measures resorted to; and moving for the appointment of a select committee, "to inquire into the state of our commercial relations with China." The debate on this motion extended into three nights; and it was carried, on the 3rd of March, by 263 "ayes" against 247 "noes."—On the 5th, Lord Palmerston announced that ministers did not intend to resign, as her majesty had consented that they should appeal to the people. The same evening, Lord Granville made a similar announcement in the House of Lords.—On the 9th of March, the Speaker (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) stated that, at the close of the session, he should retire from his important position, his health and increasing years preventing him from adequately discharging its duties. The next day, the House, on the motion of Lord Palmerston, seconded by Mr. Disraeli, passed a vote of thanks to the Speaker for his distinguished services, and his conduct in the chair. The premier also moved an address to her majesty, which Sir J. S. Pakington seconded, praying that some signal mark of royal favour might be granted to the right honourable gentleman. This motion was also carried unanimously, and led to his elevation to the peerage, by the title of Viscount Eversley, and the grant of a pension of £4,000 per annum.

Little was done during this short session but discuss the financial propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right honourable gentleman introduced his budget on the 13th of February. He noticed, in his speech, the growing prosperity of the country; announced that the late war had added £41,041,000 to the funded and unfunded debt; and that the estimates for the financial year 1857-'58 amounted to £65,474,000. He proposed to repeal the war duty on malt; to reduce the income-tax from 1*s*. 4*d*. to its original rate of 7*d*. in the pound, on incomes above £150 per annum, and 5*d*. in the pound on incomes between £100 and £150; those rates to be in force for three years. Some reductions in the tea and sugar duties were also proposed; the entire relief given by the various reductions being nearly £11,500,000. The estimates for the army and navy were voted, and the resolutions relative to the taxes passed, before the parliament was, on the 21st of March, prorogued by commission; and the same day the proclamation dissolving the House of Commons appeared.

The elections took place in April. The result proved that the war with China was popular; the English people being indignant at the many insults offered by the Chinese to their countrymen, and at the tame submission of the latter for what was considered by the populace, merely the mean desire for gain. The minority against the government was changed into a decided majority; and Mr. Cobden, who moved the resolution relating to China in the House of Commons, was, on attending a meeting of his constituents of the West Riding of Yorkshire, received with such decided disapprobation, that, finding his return was very improbable, he did not offer himself for re-election, but came forward for Huddersfield, where he was defeated. Another member, Mr. Bright, who had been a great popular favourite in the north, and had been returned for Manchester several times, first by large majorities, and then unopposed, was at the bottom of the poll. Mr. Cobden did not obtain a seat in that parliament. Mr. Muntz, one of the members for Birmingham, dying soon after the election, Mr. Bright was chosen to replace him. Three other popular Liberal members of the former parliament—Messrs. Milner Gibson, Layard, and W. Fox—also lost their seats.

The new parliament was opened by commission on the 7th of May; the Queen, who had been delivered of the Princess Beatrice on the 14th of April, not being able to attend. Soon after it assembled, the approaching marriage of the Princess Royal with the Crown Prince of Prussia was announced to both Houses by a message from the crown. An annuity of £8,000 per annum, and a marriage portion of £40,000, were voted to her royal highness. The marriage, however, did not take place till the 25th of January, 1858.—During the session, which continued till the 28th of August, a bill was passed for abolishing a payment in Ireland called "Ministers' Money"—a tax levied upon householders, in the principal cities and towns of that country, in support of the established church. It was no real grievance; for the whole amount collected was little more than £10,000 yearly; but Roman Catholics complained of it as compelling them to contribute to the support of a Protestant church; and Mr. Fagan, one of the members for Cork, brought in a bill for its abolition. As a majority of the Commons were in favour of the measure, the government adopted it as one of its own; and it passed both Houses. It was very near being defeated in the House of Lords, where the second reading was agreed to, on the 18th of June, by the small majority of five—101 to 96.—Another bill, intended to favour Jews and Roman Catholics by an alteration of the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, introduced by Lord Palmerston on the 15th of May, and which passed the House of Commons by a large majority, was unsuccessful in the Lords; who, on the 10th of July, refused to read it a second time by 173 votes to 139.—Resolutions to withdraw the grant to Maynooth College, to reduce the household qualification for voting in the counties, to introduce the ballot, to abolish the office of Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and to censure government for commencing and concluding the war with Persia without consulting parliament, were introduced in the Commons, and negatived; the latter, moved by Mr. Roebuck on the 16th of July, by the large majority of 352 to 38.

During the session, in consequence of frauds which were brought to light, "committed by trustees, bankers, and other persons entrusted with property," and of abuses connected with joint-stock companies, acts were passed for better regulating those companies, and making the frauds alluded to punishable as misdemeanours. Two important acts were also passed to promote the attempts of those who were desirous of preserving the youthful street Arabs—the forlorn and frequently abandoned children met with in our public places—from crime and ruin. One of these measures was directed to "promote the establishment and extension of reformatory schools in England;" the other, "to make better provision for the care and education of vagrant, destitute, and disorderly children, and for the extension of industrial schools."—The most important acts of the session received the royal assent on the 25th and 28th of August: they were acts "to Amend the Laws relating to Probates and Letters of Administration in England;" an act for the same purpose, applying to Ireland; and an act "to Amend the Law relating to Divorce and Matrimonial Causes in England." By these acts, two new courts were established, one called the "Probate Court," the other the "Divorce Court;" but the same judge was to preside over both, with a salary of £4,000 per annum, and a retiring yearly pension of half that amount. By the first bill, the powers of the ecclesiastical courts—in which the laws connected with marriage and testamentary matters had been administered—were materially abridged; as their jurisdiction in the latter was abolished, and transferred to the Probate Court; and that in the former limited to the granting of marriage licences, when applied for. Both these measures were, in their passage through the two Houses, strongly opposed, especially that for establishing a Divorce Court; by which divorces—previously only obtainable by rich persons who could afford to pay the expenses attendant upon passing a Divorce Bill through parliament—were placed within the reach of persons of ordinary means.

Some of the general events of the year were of considerable importance. Our merchants trading to the Baltic, in common with those of other nations, had long complained of the dues levied by the Danish government upon vessels passing "the Sound"—the channel connecting the North Sea with the Baltic. Negotiations had been going on for some time with the court of Copenhagen to procure the abolition of those dues; and they were brought to a close on the 14th of March, by the signature of a treaty, by which the various European powers agreed to pay Denmark a considerable sum of money as an indemnity for the abolition. This sum was paid by the different powers in a ratio according with that of the average number of vessels of each which passed the Sound every year. The amount which Great Britain had to pay was £1,125,206.—On the 30th of April, the Duchess of Gloucester, the last of the family of George III., died at Gloucester House.—On the 25th of June, by order of the privy council, letters patent of the Queen were published, bestowing on Prince Albert the title of Prince Consort during the joint lives of her majesty and his royal highness.—On the 31st of May, the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia arrived in England, on a visit to her majesty; and on the 8th of August, when the Queen and Prince Consort were at Osborne, the Emperor and Empress of the French arrived, and remained at Osborne House for some days. In this visit—according to a statement made by Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons—the emperor, and the Queen and her advisers, conferred upon Eastern affairs; which, owing to events in the Danubian principalities, were becoming again involved, and had caused considerable differences between the ambassadors of the great powers at Constantinople. By the treaty of Paris, those principalities were to be kept under separate governments; the inhabitants were desirous of their union, under one hospodar; and this course the French and Russian ambassadors, in opposition to the Turkish court and the ambassadors of England and Austria, supported. Turkish influence procured the election of two hospodars, in opposition to the wishes of the majority of the population; and the ambassadors favourable to the union left Constantinople. After the conferences at Osborne, the elections were annulled, and the ambassadorial flags were re-hoisted at the Turkish capital. The differences respecting the principalities did not, however, subside; but were left for a second congress of Paris to adjust. The negotiations on the subject continued far into 1858. On the 20th of August in that year, a convention was signed at Paris, stipulating that the principalities, as the United Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, should be under one hospodar, and the sultan was to continue the suzerain.

During the year, 30,000 troops were sent to India; and, on the 25th of August, a public meeting was held at the Mansion-house, London, to originate a subscription in aid of the sufferers by the mutiny of the Sepoys in that country. The subscription was liberally supported in London and in the provinces; and, notwithstanding a financial crisis that occurred in the autumn, upwards of £260,000 was raised. That crisis was caused by a monetary panic in the United States. This panic originated with the railroads, which were saddled with debt. After a brief struggle, the companies were unable to pay their dividends, or to meet their other obligations; the banks, whose issues had been enormous, could not pay their notes in gold; the largest mercantile firms caught the contagion; and, for a time, all remittances to foreign firms were suspended, many of them never being made at all. As the balance of trade between the two countries always leaves a great debt due to England, and as no attempt in the summer and autumn of 1857 could be made to reduce the large sums then due, many eminent commercial establishments, whose chief support was the American trade, failed; and their aggregate liabilities were stated at £45,000,000. The panic extended to Scotland and Ireland. In the former country, it was increased by the failure of the Western Bank of Scotland, which occasioned a wide-spread distress that was long remembered. The Bank of England resisted the pressure, and afforded assistance as long as it was able; but its reserve of notes and bullion became so diminished, that, on the 12th of November, Lord Palmerston, as First Lord of the Treasury, and Sir George C. Lewis, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, wrote to the chairman of the Court of Directors, authorising an extension of the issue of notes beyond the limits fixed by the act of 1844. Parliament was assembled on the 3rd of December, to pass a bill of indemnity for this exercise of power, and the step arrested the progress of the panic.

The two Houses met on the 3rd of December. The session was opened by the Queen, who regretted the circumstances which had led to the suspension of the act of 1844; and said a bill would be introduced to indemnify those who advised and those who acted under that suspension. This bill being passed, a select committee was appointed, on the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to inquire into the Bank Act of England of 1844, and those of Scotland and Ireland of 1845; and also into the causes of the recent commercial distress, and how far it had been regulated by the issue of bank notes payable on demand. The laborious inquiries of this committee, it may be remarked, led to no result. After its appointment, the legislature was adjourned to the 4th of February, 1858.—At the close of the year, the agricultural interest appeared to be more flourishing than it had been since the repeal of the corn-laws, notwithstanding the pressure of the commercial distress. That distress did not appear to affect either the revenue or the foreign trade. The former amounted, from January 1st to December 31st, notwithstanding the repeal of taxes, to £66,056,055; and the value of the exports of British and foreign produce in the year, was £122,066,107.

When the year 1858 opened, Lord Palmerston and his cabinet appeared to be secure in their places for years, so large was the majority in the Commons, which followed them into the lobby on divisions, and so popular were they in the country. But events were on the tapis which soon after effected a complete change in their position. The Emperor Napoleon, during his residence in Italy, had belonged to a secret political society, called the Carbonari. Having, when he became Emperor of France, ceased to be a member, he was marked out for the vengeance of his former colleagues. Two attempts at assassination had been made, and failed. Then, in 1857, towards the close of the year, a new conspiracy against him was organised in Italy. Orsini, one of the conspirators, came to England. There, under his direction, and that of some refugees who acted with him, a number of hand-grenades were constructed; which, in January, Orsini took with him to the continent, entering them at the custom-house as a newly-invented gas-apparatus. On the evening of the 14th of January, the emperor and empress went to the Italian Opera. Their carriage reached the door of the opera-house, in the Rue Lepelletier, at half-past eight o'clock. Just at that moment an explosion took place, and a number of hollow projectiles were scattered about. It was followed by two others; and the effect was, to damage the carriage, kill one of the horses, wound General Bosquet, who was sitting in the carriage in front of the emperor, send a projectile through the emperor's hat, kill five soldiers, and wound about sixty persons, two mortally. Orsini was arrested; an active and searching inquiry was made into the circumstances; and, on the 20th of January, Count Walewski, then the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, wrote to Count de Persigny, the French ambassador in London, informing him of the connection which had been traced between Orsini and conspirators in England; reminding him that the plan of Pianori to assassinate the emperor had been formed in England; that on another occasion, Mazzini, Ledru-Rollin, and Campanella had directed the assassins from London; and whilst he "appreciated and respected the liberality with which England exercised the right of asylum to foreigners, the victims of political struggles," the count asked—

"Ought the right of asylum to protect such a state of things? Is hospitality due to assassins? Ought the English legislature to contribute to favour their designs and their plans? And can it continue to shelter persons who, by their flagrant acts, place themselves beyond the pale of common right?"

To this despatch no direct answer was returned. It was followed, on the 27th of January, by the publication, in the Moniteur, of numerous addresses to the emperor from colonels in the French army, in which very strong expressions were used, relative to the asylum given to foreigners in England. These addresses—as, in some of them, the French officers wished to be placed at the head of their men, for the purpose of coming to England, and clearing the country of the regicides—caused great excitement amongst the English people; and, leading to fears of invasion, gave a great impetus to a patriotic movement, which had been previously set on foot, for forming regiments of rifle volunteers. The press, which reflected public opinion in England, contained indignant articles both on the Walewski despatch and the colonels' addresses; while a correspondence took place between the two governments, which bore a conciliatory tone; but the French government strongly pointed out the necessity of a law to punish and expel such characters as Orsini from this country; the emperor writing to the Count de Persigny towards the close of January, and saying that, although he "did not deceive himself as to the little efficiency of the measures which could be taken," yet, to adopt them, "would still be a friendly act which would calm much irritation at Paris;" adding, "it is not now a question of saving my life; it is a question of saving the alliance."

On the 4th of February parliament assembled after the adjournment. On the 8th, Lord Palmerston moved for leave to bring in a bill "to amend the law relating to the crimes of conspiracy and incitement to murder, either within or without her majesty's dominions, and whether the person killed or to be killed was a subject of her majesty or not." The introduction of this bill was opposed; but, after two nights' debate, leave was given, by 299 "ayes" against 99 "noes." The bill was brought in, and read a first time. Between that period and the 19th of February—the evening fixed for the second reading—numerous public meetings were held, at which the bill was condemned in the strongest terms, because it was believed to have been introduced at the instigation of the French government. It was the idea that English ministers were acting under foreign influence, that formed the only objection to the bill; for, although the foreign political refugee has the right of asylum in England; he can have no right to plan and organise conspiracies and assassinations; and if he engages in any such nefarious undertakings, he ought to be immediately compelled to leave our shores. The feeling against foreign intervention was strongly entertained by many members of the House of Commons; and when, on the 19th of February, Lord Palmerston moved the second reading of the bill, Mr. Milner Gibson (who, since the general election of April, 1857, had obtained a seat for Ashton-under-Lyne, vacant by the death of Mr. Hindley) moved, as an amendment—

"That the House had heard, with much concern, that recent attempts upon the life of the Emperor of the French had been devised in England, and expressed its detestation of such guilty enterprises. That it was ready at all times to remedy any defects in the criminal law proved to exist, yet regretted that her majesty's government, previously to inviting the House to amend the law of conspiracy, had not made some reply to the despatch of the French government, dated January 20th, 1857."

After an animated and interesting debate, this amendment was adopted by 234 votes to 215. On the 22nd, the Palmerston ministry resigned; and the Earl of Derby having been sent for by her majesty, undertook to carry on the government. Both Houses were adjourned, to allow his lordship time to construct his administration; and by the 1st of March that task was accomplished. The following noblemen and gentlemen then composed

THE CABINET.

Lord High Chancellor	Right Hon. J. Napier.
Chief Secretary	Lord Naas.
Attorney-General	James Whiteside.
Solicitor-General	Edmond Hayes.

When the new ministry met the parliament, Earl Derby detailed the principles on which the government would be conducted; and, on the 12th of March, the Chancellor of the Exchequer informed the Commons, that the painful misconceptions between France and England had been, by friendly correspondence, brought to an honourable termination, which, he believed, would be satisfactory to the people of both countries. Parliament was then occupied with the India Bill, which was finally passed, mainly through the tact and urbanity of Lord Stanley, the eldest son of the premier. The circumstances which led to that bill, and the changes it effected, are stated in Chapter CXVII. When those changes were finally settled, Lord Stanley became the First Secretary of State for India, and Sir E. Bulwer Lytton took the seals of the colonial department.

On the 19th of April, the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his financial statement, which was ably drawn up. The right honourable gentleman proposed some important changes in the customs; that an additional duty of 1*s.* 10*d.* per gallon should be laid on spirits distilled in Ireland, to raise the duty in that country to the same amount as was paid on spirits distilled in England or Scotland; that a stamp duty of one penny should be imposed on all cheques and drafts drawn on bankers; and that the stamp duty on passports should be reduced from 5*s.* to 6*d.* All the propositions of Mr. Disraeli were adopted by the House.

This session, the bill for substituting a new oath for those of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, again introduced by Lord John Russell, became law; as did another for allowing persons professing the Jewish religion, elected members of the House of Commons, to sit and vote in that House on taking the new oath, from which they were allowed to omit the words, "On the true faith of a Christian." In the general oath, the old pledges of allegiance and supremacy, and to maintain the Protestant succession to the crown, were retained; the clauses denouncing certain articles of the Roman Catholic faith as idolatrous and superstitious were omitted.—On the 26th of July, Baron Rothschild, who had been twice elected as one of the members for the city of London, took his seat; being the first Jew who sat and voted in the British legislature.—A bill abolishing the qualification, in landed property, of £600 for county members, and of £300 per annum for representatives of the House of Commons, was passed this session by both Houses, being read a third time in the Lords on the 15th of June.—In July a bill was passed for forming a new colony in North-west America, to be called British Columbia—a district brought into notice by the discovery of gold-fields within its boundaries. On the 2nd of August parliament was prorogued.

During the month of February, the excitement connected with the French conspiracy continued. Orsini, with three associates, was tried in Paris. One was acquitted; the others were found guilty; and Orsini and Joseph Andrew Pieri were executed on the 13th of March. The other convict was imprisoned for life. Dr. Simon Francis Bernard, a member of a political debating society that met at a coffee-house in Leicester Square, London, was also included in the act of accusation. As he was in England, he was tried par contumace. In consequence of the disclosures made on the trial, he was arrested in London, and committed on a charge of being connected with the Orsini plot. The trial took place in April, commencing on the 17th. It lasted six days, and ended in an acquittal.—On the 15th of May, the Queen and the Prince Consort visited Birmingham, where they met with a most enthusiastic reception.—After the prorogation of parliament, her majesty and the prince went to Cherbourg, and were present at the opening of a magnificent dock there, called the Napoleon Dock; having been commenced by the first emperor, and, after a long suspension of the works, completed by the second occupant of the imperial throne. On that day, an important telegraphic message was received by her majesty. In the previous year, an attempt had been made to lay an electric cable across the Atlantic, for the interchange of messages between Europe, Newfoundland, Canada, and the United States. It failed, the cable breaking when it had been laid about half-way across the wide ocean. The attempt was renewed in 1858; and at Cherbourg her majesty received a congratulatory message from Mr. Buchanan, the president of the United States, upon the completion of the undertaking. The Queen returned an answer, rejoicing at the event, and anticipating great benefits to England and America from the facility of intercourse thus afforded. Messages continued to be exchanged till the 3rd of September, when the power of transmission ceased; and several years elapsed before the attempt to relay the cable was again made.—In September, the Queen and Prince Consort went to Potsdam, to visit the Princess Royal. On their return, they proceeded to Scotland; inaugurating on their way, on the 7th of September, a splendid new Town Hall just completed at Leeds.—On the 13th of that month, one of the most terrible accidents on record occurred. The Hamburgh screw-steamer Austria, on her voyage to America, was burnt at sea, and upwards of 400 lives—passengers and crew—were lost.

The autumn was distinguished by an active agitation for reform, in which Mr. Bright and Mr. Milner Gibson were the principal actors. Meetings were held at Newcastle, Leeds, Sheffield, Huddersfield, Leicester, Carlisle, Hull, Manchester, Ashton, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, which were numerously attended. Mr. Bright made many eloquent speeches, bitterly denouncing the higher classes, whom he styled "a bloated aristocracy;" and accused them of having caused all the wars of the last century and a-half, and thus to have initiated the national debt. This, he said, was not to serve the country, but to provide, out of the national purse, for the younger branches of their families, who were deprived, by the law of primogeniture, of their proper and legitimate means of support. His speeches caused many moderate men to join the ranks of the Conservatives; but they pleased the Radicals. A meeting of the latter party, held at London on the 5th of November, which was attended by most of the members of parliament belonging to it, passed a resolution, requesting him to introduce a Reform Bill when parliament met, and he promised to do so.—On Friday, the 10th of December, a soirée was given to Mr. Bright and Mr. Milner Gibson at Manchester; at which, for the first time, the report of the speeches was transmitted to the Times by electric telegraph. The first portion of the report was received at the telegraph office at Manchester at fifty-five minutes after ten o'clock on the night the speeches were delivered; and the last at twenty-five minutes past one in the morning of Saturday, the 11th of December. The report occupied nearly six columns of the Times. It was in type by three o'clock, and published at the usual hour on the 11th. This feat, unexampled then in reporting for rapidity of transmission, has, since that period, been frequently surpassed.

This year, the taxes realised the sum of £61,812,555; the expenditure amounting to £60,684,898. The value of the exports for the twelve months was reported to be £116,608,756.

CHAPTER CXVI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA—WAR WITH PERSIA—WAR WITH CHINA—THE INDIAN MUTINY.—A.D. 1856, 1857.

WE will now pass over to British India; where, in the year 1857, events occurred which make the blood run cold when we read of them, even at this distance of time. At that era, by conquest and by annexation, British India had become a most extensive empire, comprising an area of 842,367 square miles, with a population estimated at upwards of 180,000,000. It was divided into three presidencies, of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay; and the three heads of those provinces acknowledged the supremacy of the governor-general, who resided at Calcutta—a fine town, situated on the river Hooghly, the capital of the presidency of Bengal and of all British India. The last annexation to this vast empire had been the territory of Oude. There were several wars with the sovereign of that country, and as many treaties, from the middle of the eighteenth century to the close; the last being signed on the 10th of November, 1801. From that time the sovereigns of Oude spent most profligate and licentious lives, and none more so than the last king, Wajid Alee Shah. Under these sovereigns, Oude became "one of the most miserably governed countries under heaven;" and a member of the household of Nussur-u-Deen, Wajid Alee's father, remarked, in 1855, "that it would be a blessing to its numerous inhabitants were the Indian government to do for it what had been so well done for the Punjaub." This was soon after done; the continued misgovernment of Wajid rendering it impossible to give effect to the treaty of 1801. A new agreement was drawn up at the close of 1855, by which the administration of affairs in the territory of Oude was transferred to the British government, ample provision being made for the maintenance of the king and his family in dignity, splendour, and honour. Wajid Aleo refused to sign this treaty: in consequence, the Marquis of Dalhousie—who had been governor-general since the 4th of August, 1847—declared the treaty of 1801 to be null and void; and by a proclamation issued on the 7th of February, 1856, his excellency announced the deposition of the king, and the annexation of Oude to the British possessions in India. A pension of twelve lacs of rupees, or £120,000 sterling, was settled upon the deposed sovereign.

This was the last important act of the Marquis of Dalhousie as governor-general. He was succeeded, on the 29th of February, by Viscount Canning, who found negotiations going on with Persia, that country having —it is supposed at the instigation of Russia—interfered in the affairs of Affghanistan; and the British ambassador at Teheran, Mr. Murray, having been insulted by imputations cast on his honour, both by the Shah and his ministers. By an agreement entered into at Teheran, on the 23rd of January, 1853, the Persian government had engaged not to send any troops to Herat, an important fortified town, and commercial and military position in Western Affghanistan, which had maintained its independence; and it was considered necessary to England that it should continue to do so. Towards the close of 1855, it was evident that the Persian government intended to violate this agreement; and negotiations were being carried on at Constantinople, between a Persian envoy and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, to effect an understanding both on this point and the insult offered to the ambassador. An engagement satisfactory to both parties was concluded; but, in the interim, the Persian prince, Moorad Meerza, at the head of 9,000 men, had marched on Herat, defeated the Heratees, and besieged, captured, and occupied the city. As he refused to withdraw his troops, on the 1st of November, 1856, Viscount Canning declared war against Persia. Intelligence of these events reached Constantinople in December, just after the agreement or treaty had been signed by Lord Stratford de Redcliffe and Ferokh Khan. The latter immediately declared the engagement into which he had entered to be null and void; and, before the year closed, he quitted Constantinople.

Hostilities were not of very long duration. As soon as war was declared, a military force, under the command of General Stalker, was sent from Bombay to the Persian Gulf. This force was landed near Bushire on the 8th of December; and on the 10th that city was taken possession of by the British.—In January, 1857, the gallant Sir James Outram, who has been termed the Bayard of India, was appointed commander-in-chief of the troops in Persia. On the 15th he sailed for Bushire; and was followed, on the 19th, by several regiments of foot and one of horse, forming the second division of the Persian army, of which the command was given to Colonel Havelock. The troops already in Persia formed the first division, and remained under the command of General Stalker. The second division landed near Bushire on the 31st of January.—On the 3rd of February, the second division marched into the interior, and, on the 5th, approached an intrenched camp of the Persians at Brasjoon, which it prepared to attack. But whilst the division halted, to allow the men to get into position, the enemy retreated; and the camp and stores were taken possession of, without fighting, except a "smart brush," as the affair was termed by an officer engaged in it, between the Persian rear-guard and a few cavalry. After everything had been destroyed which could not be carried off, the troops set out on their return to Bushire, in the evening of the 7th of February. In the night, the march was arrested by a numerous opposing force; and the next day the battle of Khoosh-aub was fought, in which the Persians—numbering about 6,000 foot, and 2,000 horse —were broken and driven from the field, leaving behind them more than 700 dead, and two very handsome 9-pounder brass guns. The English had nineteen killed, and sixty wounded.

After the troops had remained some days in idleness —at least as much idleness as a camp life affords—an expedition was planned against Mohammerah—a frontier town between Asiatic Turkey and Persia, situated on a canal, cut between the Shat-ul-Arab, a branch of the Euphrates, and the Karoon. The expedition reached the mouth of the river on the 8th of March, and waited there for the arrival of General Outram. But on the 14th of March, General Stalker committed suicide. Sir James, therefore, resolved to remain at Bushire, and gave the command of the troops engaged in the projected operations on Mohammerah, to Brigadier-General Havelock. Sir James, however, arrived before those operations were concluded. The enemy had a strong camp at the town, and there was a little fighting; but having received a slight defeat in the morning of the 26th of March, the Persians almost immediately fled from their camp, blowing up some ammunition, but leaving every tent standing, and "the ground strewed with arms, accoutrements, ammunition, band-instruments, saddlery, carpets, grain, bedding—even their dinners." On the 27th, the army took possession of Mohammerah; and as the enemy had retreated on Akwaz, a town on the Karoon, about 100 miles from Mohammerah, Sir James Outram sent 300 troops up the river, expecting to surprise the town before the enemy could arrive. The steamers conveying the troops left Mohammerah on the 29th of March; but the enemy was beforehand with them, and when they made the shore, about fourteen miles below Akwaz, on the 31st, his position was discovered on the opposite bank of the river. The British, notwithstanding, landed, and took possession of Akwaz, the garrison of 500 men retreating; and, soon after, the army of 10,000 men, which had been shelled from a gun-boat accompanying the steamers, was also seen to be marching away. Pursuit was out of the question; and after destroying everything of a public character, and carrying off some guns, the little body of daring fellows returned to Mohammerah. This was the last operation; for, a few days after, it was known that peace between Persia and England had been signed at Paris, on the 4th of March.—In May the British troops returned to Bombay.

Before the year closed we were involved in the dispute with China which led to the animated discussion in the House of Commons already noticed. Subsequent to the treaty of 1842, if an English subject became the owner of a Chinese vessel, a certificate of register was given, it was authorised to bear the British flag, and to trade with those ports which were, under that treaty, opened to foreigners. In September, 1855, a small vessel, called the Arrow, was thus registered, but only for twelve months, which expired on the 27th of September, 1856. In the following month of October that vessel was lying in the Pearl river, and a trader, whose vessel had been destroyed by pirates, informed the authorities that some of those pirates formed part of her crew. On the 8th, the Arrow was boarded by a party of Chinese soldiers, and the crew taken prisoners, when, as the master, who claimed to be an Englishman, alleged, the British flag was flying at the mast-head. By the provisions of a treaty, concluded in October, 1843, and supplementary to that of 1842, before an arrest could be made on board a British vessel by Chinese officials, they were bound to communicate with the British consul, and receive from him the necessary authority. With respect to the Arrow, this communication was not made; and Mr. Parkes, our consul at Canton, demanded from Yeh, the Chinese governor, the release of the men, and an apology. He also wrote to Sir John Bowring, the British plenipotentiary at Hong-Kong, who supported him in his demands; although, in Sir John's own words, "the Arrow had no right to hoist the British flag," as "the license to do so expired on the 27th of September, from which period she had not been entitled to protection." Yeh gave up the men seized, except two, deposed to as pirates; but as they were sent privately to the consulate, and not publicly to the vessel, Mr. Parkes would not receive them: and as Yeh refused to make an apology, contending that the Arrow was a Chinese vessel, and the British had nothing to complain of, hostilities were resorted to. Sir Michael Seymour, the rear-admiral in command of the British fleet in the Chinese waters, went to Canton in compliance with orders received from Sir John Bowring, who, writing to Yeh, stated that "the Arrow lawfully bore the British flag under a register granted by him." There were then in the Canton waters twelve British vessels, carrying 301 guns; and before November closed, the forts in the Canton river were attacked and taken, the war-junks destroyed, and part of Canton occupied by British troops. The Chinese collected from 17,000 to 20,000 soldiers at Canton; and, on the 14th of December, they set fire to some houses near the factories; and the flames reaching to the latter, destroyed them all except the English factory: the foreign residents removed, in consequence, to Macao and Hong-Kong, and trade was suspended.

Early in 1857, Sir John Bowring received despatches from England, announcing that the Earl of Clarendon, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, had consulted the law-officers of the crown; and, in consequence of their opinion, he considered the "act of the Chinese authorities constituted an infraction of Art. 9 of the supplementary treaty;" he, therefore, approved of the conduct of the plenipotentiary and Rear-Admiral Seymour. The government appointed General Ashburnham commander of the forces in China; sent Lord Elgin as her majesty's ambassador extraordinary to the emperor; and ordered several regiments of troops, ships of war, and gun-boats, to proceed to Hong-Kong. Whilst these steps were being taken, the Chinese authorities made several attempts to destroy the British ships by contact with junks filled with explosive and combustible materials, and Commodore Elliott, with several vessels of war, in operations which occupied from the 25th to the 27th of May, destroyed forty-two war-junks, in Escape, Tszekee, and Second-bar Creeks, on the east side of the Pearl river. On the 1st of June, a small squadron, under Rear-Admiral Seymour, entered the Fatshan Creek, on the west side of the river; captured a fort at its mouth, mounting nineteen guns, and between seventy and eighty armed junks, "mounting, on an average, from ten to fourteen guns, many of them long 32-pounders."—On the 16th of June, Commodore Keppel captured Chucupee fort; and then a long period of inaction ensued.

General Ashburnham had arrived at Hong-Kong on the 10th of June, and Lord Elgin on the 1st of July; but the troops that followed them had been met, at the island of Ceylon, with the startling news of the mutiny in India, and their destination was, in consequence, changed to Calcutta. On the 16th of July, Lord Elgin left Hong-Kong for that city, taking with him 1,500 sailors and marines to serve against the mutineers. In his absence, Admiral Keppel established a blockade of the Canton river. His lordship returned to Hong-Kong in September; and, on the 14th of October, he was joined by the Baron Gros, sent to co-operate with him as commissioner extraordinary from the Emperor of France, who also complained of injuries received from China; and the two negotiators were "to seek, by vigorous action, explanations for past, and security against future wrongs." Several gun-boats and some troops were also sent from France; and the United States, whose flag had been fired upon in the Canton waters, had sent several men-of-war to join the English: there were also Portuguese, Dutch, and Russian vessels off Canton; and all were hostile to the Chinese.

English troops did not arrive at Hong-Kong till the autumn. General Ashburnham had, before their arrival, gone to Calcutta, leaving the command to General Van Straubenzee; and as Lord Elgin and Baron Gros could obtain no satisfactory answer from Yeh, it was determined, in pursuance of a notice given to him, to attack Canton with the united English and French forces. There was then a considerable armament collected in the Canton waters. The English fleet comprised forty-nine vessels, mounting 417 guns; Lord Elgin also had at his disposal 800 British soldiers, 2,500 marines, and a naval brigade, 1,500 strong; making a total of 4,800 men. The French had twelve vessels of war, carrying 195 guns, and about 700 troops. The commanders-in-chief, on the 16th of December, took possession of the island of Honan, opposite Canton, where they established their head-quarters. Lord Elgin and Baron Gros followed them; and, on the 21st of December, formally handed over to the naval and military authorities the further arrangement of affairs.—On the 28th, at day-break, a bombardment of Canton from the gun-boats commenced. While it was going on, the land forces were transferred from Honan to Kuper Creek, where they landed; and before dark, had taken the Lin, or the east fort, and established themselves on that side of Canton. The next morning the assault was made. The walls were breached, escaladed, and carried by 10 A.M., though the Chinese fought well, and were more numerous than the assailants; and by half-past 2 P.M., the allies had gained the complete command of the city. All the defences were taken or abandoned; and that night the victors bivouacked around the walls of the city. They remained there till the 5th of January, 1858, awaiting the surrender of Yeh; but as he did not come forward that day, the English entered the city in three columns, supported by one column of the French. No resistance was offered; but still Yeh did not make his appearance. The English marched forward, and they took the Tartar ruler and the Treasury, containing fifty-two chests full of dollars and sixty-eight parcels of Sycee silver. The Tartar general was taken by the French. A body of British sailors, under the command of Vice-Admiral Elliott and Captain Key, rushed into the yamun, or house of Yeh, where they succeeded in capturing him as he was in the act of making his escape over one of the walls. He was sent on board the Inflexible; and, on the 17th of March, was brought a prisoner from Canton to Calcutta.

The allies reorganised the government of Canton: they placed the Tartar ruler Pequi at the head of affairs, in which position he was assisted by Brigadier-General Holloway, Captain Martineau, and Mr. Parkes. After the four ministers had held several consultations, they resolved to proceed to the north, and then to forward their demands to Pekin. The first destination of the plenipotentiaries was the gulf of Pecheli, where Lord Elgin and Baron Gros arrived on the 14th of April. The next was the river Peiho; and on the 20th, the allied fleet of nineteen vessels anchored in that river, eleven miles from its mouth, and 140 miles from Pekin. Communications were immediately opened with the Chinese government; the emperor sent a commissioner, whose powers were found quite inadequate to come to any agreement; and Lord Elgin and Baron Gros having been joined by Count Putiatin and Mr. Reed, it was resolved to proceed up the river. First it was necessary to capture the Taku forts which defended the passage, in order that the return of the plenipotentiaries might not be impeded. There were five of these forts; two on the north, and three on the south side of the river. Besides the forts, which were very formidable defences, earthworks and sand-bag batteries had been erected, on which eighty-seven guns in position were discovered; the shores had also been piled to oppose a landing; two strong mud batteries, one mounting thirty-three, the other sixteen guns, had been constructed about 1,000 yards up the river; and, in the rear, several intrenched camps were visible. The attack was made on the 10th of May: the vessels opening a fire upon the forts on the north and south sides simultaneously, which the Chinese returned with great rapidity. They, however, had no wish to come to close quarters with the English and French. Soldiers and marines landed as soon as possible, and rushed to the attack of the forts; but the garrison did not wait to receive them. They made off as the assailants advanced, and that not only from the forts, but from the batteries and camps. By two o'clock all were in possession of the assailants, who took 150 brass guns, some of them of excellent workmanship. The allies lodged, during the night, on the spot; and a melancholy accident alloyed the joy felt at the successful termination of the undertaking. One of the forts allotted to the French blew up, and thirty-six rank and file and four officers were killed.

After the capture of the forts, the plenipotentiaries proceeded up the river to Tien-tsin, eighty miles from Pekin, where they arrived on the 20th of May, and were met by two commissioners from the emperor, who had full powers to treat. A separate treaty was made with each of the four powers—England, France, Russia, and the United States. The British treaty, which was signed on the 26th of June, confirmed the treaty of 1842, and abrogated the supplementary one of October, 1843. Stipulated that there should be a British minister at the court of Pekin, and one from China at that of London, who were to transact business with the Secretary of State, or some high officer nominated by the sovereign, on the footing of equality. Guaranteed the toleration of Christianity throughout the Chinese empire; and the privilege of British subjects, with a consul's passport, to visit any part of the interior of China, and to purchase landed property. Removed all restrictions on the employment, in any lawful capacity, of the Chinese by British subjects; and on the entry of British ships to Chinese ports. Pledged both powers to take measures for the suppression of piracy. Provided for the proper regulation of the commercial tariff. Opened five new ports to foreign trade—New-chwang, Tang-chow, Chow-chow (Swatow), Tai-wan in Formosa, and Kiung-chow in Hainan. And stipulated that the Chinese "I" (barbarian) should not, in future, be applied in official documents to British subjects. A separate article provided that an indemnity of 4,000,000 taels should be paid for the expenses of the war, and the losses of the British merchants by the events at Canton.

The treaty with the United States was not so favourable to that country, on several points, as the English treaty was to this country; those with Russia and France were similar to the latter.—The document signed, the plenipotentiaries left Tien-tsin; and Lord Elgin, taking with him several ships, proceeded to Japan, where he was admitted to audiences with the Tycoon (or emperor), at his capital city of Jeddo. He remained a fortnight; and, before he left, concluded a treaty with the government, opening the Japanese empire to British commerce. It was signed on the 26th of August. Lord Elgin returned to Hong-Kong, and, before he left China, succeeded in arranging a commercial tariff, which appeared to be satisfactory to all parties. Soon after his lordship returned to England.—In the London Gazette of January 14th, 1859, the appointment of his brother, the Hon. F. W. A. Bruce, appeared, as envoy extraordinary to the Emperor of China. Consuls were also appointed to reside at Canton, Amoy, Shanghai, Tang-chow, New-chwang, Foo-chow-foo, Chin-kiang, Ningpo, and Swatow; and a consul-general in Japan.

The Sepoy mutiny in India now demands our attention; the announcement of which occasioned more excitement in England than any event that has occurred for a number of years. At the commencement of 1857, "the whole of the British empire in India" was said to be "apparently in a state of profound tranquillity;" but the public mind in that country was not unprepared for the announcement of discontent amongst the native troops, though no one expected the horrible events to which it gave rise. Opinions differ much as to the causes of the mutiny. They were, no doubt, numerous; some arising from those feelings which a conquered people naturally imbibe towards their conquerors; others from religious opinions, and the fear of the Hindoos that their system of caste was to be interfered with. The loss of prestige by the English, from the occurrences at Cabool, though it was amply redeemed by subsequent events, was not without its effect. The annexation of Scinde was a great grievance; and the disallowance, by the Marquis of Dalhousie, of the Indian system of adoption—by which a native prince, with no son, might adopt a friend or relative, or make him his heir—was a still greater. The same nobleman's annexation of Oude was also very unpopular. When that annexation became known in England, Syed Abdoollah, a Hindoo and professor of Hindostani in University College, London, in an interview with the Earl of Albemarle, declared his conviction, that, if the measure were persisted in, the result would be a mutiny in the Anglo-Indian army. That army was greatly recruited from Oude; the recruits being what would be termed in England freeholders, or representatives of freeholders; and they feared the same course would be pursued, with respect to Oude, as had been almost invariably adopted when other annexations had taken place—viz., that a searching inquiry into the title of every proprietor would be made, with a view of invalidating his tenure. Then came the introduction of the Enfield rifle, which rendered greased cartridges necessary. The grease was a compound of mutton fat and wax; but it was asserted to be the fat of cows and pigs, which it was alike an abomination for Hindoos and Mohammedans to taste, as they must do, in biting their cartridges. This last seems to have been the culminating cause; for the outbreak almost immediately followed the introduction of the rifle and the greased cartridges, which the Sepoys generally refused to take.

The first outbreak took place on the 24th of January, 1857, at Barrackpore—a military station on the banks of the Hooghly, about fifteen miles above Calcutta. There were other acts of insubordination at Berhampoor, a station also on the Hooghly, a few miles further from Calcutta. It was the 19th native infantry which had been insubordinate at the first-mentioned station. As soon as a European regiment could be marched there, the 19th was paid off and discharged. Two insubordinates of other regiments were hanged. At the same time agents were passing from one regiment to another, telling the Hindoo Sepoys that the greased cartridges were used to abolish their caste; and chupaties (pieces of unleavened bread about the size of a small gingerbread nut or biscuit) were distributed from village to village, through the hands of the chowkeydars, or watchmen; being first sent out, it is asserted, from Cawnpore, the capital of a district of that name, in Allahabad, a province in the north-western district of Bengal. This circulation of the chupaties, said to have been "spread over the provinces with a velocity of speed never yet equalled by the bearers of government despatches," threw the whole country into a state of excitement. The messengers were arrested and examined, but nothing at all could be learned from them: and W. C. Erskine, Esq., commissioner in the Saugor division of Bengal, where the distribution also took place, writing to C. B. Thornhill, Esq., the officiating secretary to the government in the north-western provinces, on the 5th of March, said, "Nothing has yet been discovered beyond the fact of the spread of the cakes, and the general belief that such distribution, passed on from village to village, will prevent hail falling, and keep away sickness." Mr. Erskine also understood that the practice was adopted by dyers, when the dye would not act properly; and closed his letter by declaring that "there appeared to be no harm intended."

Many people believe, however, that the circulation of the chupaties was the signal for the Sepoys to mutiny. At all events, shortly after, the cartridges were refused by several regiments; and on the 3rd of May, when they were offered to the 7th regiment of irregular infantry at Lucknow, the capital of Oude, the men not only refused them, but committed acts of insubordination, and threatened to shoot one of their European officers. Order was restored by the Queen's 32nd and the artillery; but the discontent continued. At that time, "the demeanour of the native troops had become insolent and threatening throughout the whole of the Bengal presidency, and, to observant persons, was a cause of much anxiety."

It was at Meerut—a military station between the Ganges and the Jumna, thirty-eight miles N.E. of Delhi—that the first decided movement was made by the mutineers. At the beginning of May, the 11th and 20th regiments of native infantry, and the 3rd regiment of light cavalry, were stationed at Meerut; the three comprising 2,700 men. There was also a European force of 1,717 men, composed of the 60th Rifles, the 6th Carabineers, and some artillery.—On the 6th of May, eighty-five of the native cavalry refused the cartridges, were tried by a court-martial on the 9th, sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour, and taken to prison. The next day was Sunday. During the time of divine service, in the evening, the native infantry assembled on their parade-ground, shot several of their European officers, and, being joined by the cavalry, made for the prison where the mutineers were confined; murdered all the Europeans—men, women, and children—they met with on their way. Having reached the gaol, they liberated the mutineers, and set off for Delhi. They were pursued by the Carabineers and Rifles; but succeeded in reaching that city with little loss. There were three native regiments and a company of native artillery—in all, 3,361 Sepoys, and forty-eight European officers—stationed in the cantonments, about a mile from the city walls. In Delhi there was a large magazine in charge of two officers of artillery, Lieutenant George Dobson Willoughby and Lieutenant Forest, with three or four subalterns; who, when the mutineers from Meerut approached, secured the gates, and loaded the 6-pound guns with grapeshot. Three of the subalterns were also employed in laying a train to ignite the ammunition. When the mutineers entered Delhi, some began to murder the European inhabitants, most shamefully ill-treating the females; and others made for the magazine, where the demand to surrender in the name of the king was received with discharges of grapeshot. Some Europeans escaped, got to the cantonments, and the officers there led the Sepoys to Delhi, in hopes they would aid them in putting down the mutiny. But as each of the regiments arrived, they no sooner got within the gates, than they shot their European officers, and joined the mutineers. In the meantime the struggle at the magazine was going on; and the natives who were withinside first refused to obey their officers, and then, when the mutineers on the outside threw up ladders, and attempted to scale the walls, those on the inside climbed up the sloped sheds in the interior of the magazine, and, descending on the exterior, joined the assailants. Many of the latter fell from the discharge of grapeshot; and when defence was no longer possible, Lieutenant Willoughby ordered the train to be fired. This was done; and the explosion was terrible, killing many of the Sepoys. The Europeans were all wounded; but they made their escape in the confusion, except Lieutenant Willoughby, who was seen no more. Delhi was then entirely in the hands of the mutineers, who massacred the Christian inhabitants, and many of the natives who were in their employ; plundered the bank (cruelly murdering the manager, his wife, and five children), and the government treasury; destroyed the church and other buildings; and proclaimed Mohammed Suraj-oo-deen Shah Ghazee, the old Mohammedan king—who was living there with some of the remains of royalty about him, but as a pensioner of the British—Emperor of Hindostan.

It was a providential thing for the Europeans that the telegraph wires had been so extensively spread across the country. By this medium, intelligence of the mutiny at Meerut, and the occupation of Delhi, was transmitted to Calcutta on one side, and, on the other, to Lahore, the principal city of the Punjaub; where Mr. Robert Montgomery, the judicial commissioner, was acting for Sir John Lawrence, the chief commissioner, during his temporary absence. The information was received on the evening of the 12th of May, when a ball and supper were to take place. The commissioner summoned the leading military and civil officers to a conference; and it was resolved to disarm and deprive of their ammunition the 16th, 26th, and 49th native infantry, and 5th light cavalry, which were stationed at Meean Meer, a large military cantonment, five or six miles from Lahore. The European troops were mustered, and marched to Meean Meer, where the native troops were summoned, and confronted with a dozen pieces of artillery charged with grape. They were ordered to pile their arms; and, as they had no alternative but to obey or to be mowed down with grapeshot, they reluctantly complied, and the Europeans put the weapons in places of security. The intelligence of the events at Delhi was received, on the 13th of May, at Ferozepore and at Peshawur, where the same prompt steps were taken as at Lahore; and at the latter place a corps of European troops was concentrated, of which Major-General Reed, as senior officer, took the command; and it was to act as a movable column, "to move on every point in the Punjaub where open mutiny required to be put down by force." Sir John Lawrence, who returned to Lahore as soon as he heard of the outbreak, skilfully organised the small European force in the Punjaub, and raised fresh troops among the Mooltanese, Sikhs, and hill tribes. The governor-general took equally effective steps to reinforce the Europeans in the disturbed districts, as far as the force at his disposal would allow; and he wrote for fresh troops to be sent from Madras, Bombay, Ceylon, the Mauritius, Burmah, the Eastern settlements, and England; and from all those places reinforcements, in time, were received. The Hon. General George Anson, commander-in-chief of the forces in India, who was at Simla when the mutiny broke out, as soon as he received the intelligence, proceeded to Umballah, in the Cis-Sutlej territory, where the principal part of the European forces in the north-west were concentrated; and where he made immediate preparations to march to Delhi, to relieve that city from the hands of the mutineers.

During the remainder of the month of May, and in June, there were mutinies in the Upper Punjaub, at Umballah, Murdan, Allahabad, Benares, Ferozepore, Allyghur, Nusseerabad, Bareilly, Shahjehanpore, Lucknow, Cawnpore, and various other places. Before the latter month closed, the movement had spread most rapidly in all directions. The revolt had become universal in the Bengal army, which was converted from a body of brave and disciplined troops, into bands of desperate rebels, or unarmed malcontents. "From Calcutta to Peshawur, and from Delhi to Hyderabad, had become a scene of savage strife, of anarchy, and of pitiless carnage." From the rapidity of the movements, and the uniform conduct of the Sepoys, there can be no doubt that the mutiny was pre-arranged and organised; and that the mutineers kept up an understanding with each other by an agency, of which the authorities were not aware. Wherever they obtained a temporary success, the Europeans, without respect to age or sex, were massacred; and the general treatment of the females was barbarous in the extreme. Every indignity that can be named was frequently inflicted upon them before their lives were taken. The murderers seized any artillery, muskets, and ammunition which they could lay hands upon. Most of them, when they had succeeded in murdering or eluding the Europeans, made for Delhi.

The most serious occurrences took place at Lucknow and Cawnpore. At the former city, Sir Henry Lawrence was the chief commissioner; and, after the occurrences of the 3rd of May, his promptness and vigilance succeeded in procuring a temporary calm. There were three regiments of native infantry and one of light cavalry at Lucknow; her majesty's 32nd regiment, a battery of artillery, and a small detachment of irregular horse. Sir Henry had deemed all safe, except from external influences, on the 23rd of May; but on the 29th, he informed the government at Calcutta, by telegraph, that there was "great uneasiness at Lucknow," that "disturbances were threatened outside," and that "tranquillity could not be much longer maintained unless Delhi was speedily captured." On the 30th, the commissioner was warned of danger; but the day passed over, and he began to think it was not likely to occur at the moment. At about 9 P.M., however, he heard a discharge of musketry from the direction of the cantonment where the 71st native regiment was stationed; and it appeared there was a general outbreak of the Sepoys, who had fired the bungalows; shot General Handscomb, who commanded the brigade, and thought he could induce the men to return to their duty; and cruelly murdered Lieutenant Grant, who was in charge of the cantonment guard, and was deserted by his men. Sir Henry Lawrence, when he heard the firing, rode to the encampment of the 32nd regiment, which he found already under arms; and placing one part of the men to guard the Residency, he, with the remainder and two guns, took up a position on the road from the cantonment to Lucknow, to be enabled to check the mutineers should they contemplate a raid on the city. They did not immediately turn their steps in that direction, but went and set fire to the cavalry quarters at Moodkeepore, a short distance from the cantonments. Then they retraced their steps, and the commissioner met them, at the head of 200 Europeans, the 7th native light cavalry, a few of the irregulars, and two guns. About 300 men of the three infantry regiments, who had continued faithful, also joined the commissioner's little force. The mutineers fled as the Europeans approached, some of the light cavalry joining them; and the remainder of that regiment evinced no zeal. A few round shots were discharged at the runaways, whom the Europeans could not overtake, and Sir Henry returned to Lucknow with thirty prisoners.

The commissioner's first steps were to punish the guilty who were in his power, and to reward those who had nobly done their duty. But as time progressed he found his difficulties increase. In Oude the mutiny was general; and before the middle of June, every station, except Lucknow, was in the hands of the rebels, who were favoured by the inhabitants, and there were no Europeans to resist them. Sir Henry took every precaution for the defence of the Residency, where the European inhabitants were assembled; and there the guns from the Mushee Bhawun—a strong fort, and one of the principal defences of the city—were removed, with as much of the ammunition and stores as could be conveyed away; as it was found that the force under the chief commissioner could not defend that place and the Residency. Thus the month of June was passed in incessant preparation and watchfulness. On the last day, there were reports that the mutineers were marching to attack the city. Sir Henry Lawrence, at the head of about 300 troops, some pieces of artillery, and an 8-inch howitzer, advanced to meet them. It was a disastrous movement. The rebels were found to be so overwhelming in numbers, that, after a short but severe contest, the commissioner and his small force were compelled to retire, leaving the howitzer and three field-pieces in the hands of the rebels. Their approach rendered it necessary to complete the withdrawal from the Mushee Bhawun fort; and as all the ammunition could not be removed, 240 barrels of gunpowder, and nearly 600,000 rounds of cartridge, were blown up. The enemy occupied the town; loopholed the houses, for the purpose of firing out of them; and planted the 8-inch howitzer they had captured on the other side of the river on which Lucknow stands, from which position they shelled the Residency. On the 2nd of July, Sir Henry Lawrence having been employed all the night in posting and stationing the men who came from the Mushee Bhawun fort, entered the Residency about 8 A.M., and, going to his room, laid down on his bed. Soon after, a shell from the 8-inch howitzer fell through the window, and, exploding, a fragment struck his excellency on the right thigh, inflicting a fearful wound, which occasioned his death on the 4th. As he felt the wound was mortal, he appointed Major Banks to succeed him as chief commissioner, and nominated Colonel Inglis the commander of the troops. The death of the chief commissioner occasioned great grief to the garrison. Before the month closed Major Banks was also killed by a musket-shot, and the operations for the defence of the Residency were conducted by Colonel Inglis. This position was then entirely beleaguered; and few parties have been called upon to endure greater privations and hardships, or to display more energy and fortitude, than the heroic band collected within the walls of the Residency at Lucknow, and the females who were with them, till they were relieved, some time after, by Havelock and Outram.

The occurrences at Cawnpore were more distressing and horrible than those at Lucknow. On the 16th of May, it was known at that town that the Sepoys at Meerut had mutinied, and that the mutineers had taken Delhi. General Sir Hugh Wheeler was then in command at Cawnpore, with three native regiments (the 1st, 53rd, and 56th), the 2nd regiment of Bengal light cavalry, and some artillery. To this army there were attached 115 European officers; and there was a European detachment of infantry and artillery, but it only numbered 170 men. The town stands on a plain, and was entirely without any fort or other building, either for defence or refuge. A military hospital was being erected in the middle of the grand parade, which had some other unfinished buildings on the north-west, and on the north-east a partly built church. Sir Hugh resolved to convert these buildings into a place of retreat. For that purpose he connected them with breastworks, surrounded them with intrenchments, and placed there a supply of ammunition, with provisions and other stores sufficient to support 1,000 persons for thirty days. Till the end of May, with one exception, the only unusual symptoms evinced by the troops were, that they sent home their families, and held meetings nearly every night, not at any public place of assembly, but in their own lines. The exception was the refusal of the Sepoy guard at the collectorate at Nawabgunge, four miles from Cawnpore, to allow the revenue lying there—amounting to about seven lacs of rupees (£70,000)—to be removed to the fortified intrenchment. This caused Sir Hugh Wheeler to apply to Nana Sahib, the Rajah of Bithoor (a place about twelve miles from Cawnpore), to send him some men to protect the Treasury. Nana promptly complied; and when 300 Mahratta troops arrived from Bithoor, the general felt that the money was safe: he soon discovered that the chief he had applied to was in league with the Sepoys, and that the British had not a more bitter enemy than Nana Sahib. The proper name of that individual was Nana Dhoondu Pant; he had been adopted by the ex-Peishwa, Bajee Rao, who was Rajah of Bithoor, and had no son. Bajee Rao enjoyed a pension of eight lacs of rupees, settled upon him by the East India Company when he surrendered much of his territory and dignity to them, and also held a jaghire close to the town of Bithoor. He left Nana his heir; but the Indian government refused to recognise him, as he was only the adopted, not the real, son of the Peishwa; and when he petitioned to have the titular and other rights of the deceased continued to him, his petition was refused, the jaghire was taken possession of by the company's officers, and the pension was withheld.

In the last days of May, there were several circumstances observed in the conduct of the troops which alarmed the inhabitants; and a corps of irregular Oude cavalry, sent by Sir Henry Lawrence to General Wheeler, with fifty men of her majesty's 32nd regiment, were especially unruly. On the 30th, two companies of her majesty's 84th regiment arrived from Calcutta; and this arrival induced Sir Hugh to send the men of the 32nd back to Lucknow, and order the Oude irregulars from the town to protect the communications by road between Cawnpore, Agra, Benares, and other places. Sir Hugh, knowing something of the position of Lucknow, thought himself also justified in sending one-half of the men who had arrived from Calcutta to join the force at that city. This detachment was sent off on the 3rd of June; and, on the 4th, it was known that the telegraph wires were broken between Cawnpore and Agra; and that the irregular cavalry sent to protect the roads had mutinied, murdered their officers, and gone to join the rebels at Delhi. That day Lieutenant Ashe, of the Bengal artillery, arrived with three guns, a supply of ammunition, and some gunners. He had been compelled to retire on Cawnpore, a body of troops he was leading to Futteghur having mutinied and dispersed. The guns were very acceptable to Sir Hugh Wheeler, who placed them in position upon his intrenchment. That evening the movements of the Sepoys were so suspicious that he ordered all the European noncombatants and females at the station to be concentrated with the troops. The general had then a defensive force of 240 men, with six guns; and the officers' and privates' wives and children, the servants, the civilians and their families, made an aggregate of near 900 persons collected on the night of the 4th of June, 1857, in the intrenchment at Cawnpore.

On the 5th the native troops mutinied—the 2nd light cavalry setting the example—left their cantonments, set fire to some of the officers' bungalows, plundered others, as also the paymaster's chest, and made a pile of valuable furniture, books, &c., belonging to the European officers, which they burnt. The mutineers proceeded to the collectorate at Nawabgunge, and seized the money there, packing it in bullock-carts, and on the backs of elephants which they had taken from the military stables. They met with no opposition from the Mahratta guard; and while the packing was proceeding, a messenger was despatched to Nana Sahib, to inform him that they were going to Delhi, and to express their desire that he would put himself at their head. Nana at once complied with that desire, joining them at Nawabgunge with 600 men and four guns. He did not take them to Delhi, however. Halting at Kulleanpore—the first stage from Cawnpore to that city—he called upon them not to proceed till they had killed all the English at Cawnpore. They agreed to remain; and he immediately issued a proclamation reorganising the regiments, appointing officers, and promising them all increased pay. The next day Cawnpore was in the possession of the rebels, who treated the inhabitants as if they had been Europeans; plundering the houses, and ill-using the people. Nana Sahib took up his residence in the town—of which, and the surrounding districts, he assumed the government—as the representative of the King of Delhi.

The rebels commenced a regular siege of the intrenchment, which was gallantly defended; and whilst many of the inmates were killed by the shots from the enemy, others fell a sacrifice to the unremitting fatigue and anxiety to which they were exposed. Several sorties were made to drive back the advanced posts of the assailants; and in one of them, led by Sir Hugh Wheeler on the 23rd of June, the general received a severe wound, which disabled him from active service. The next morning a message was received from Nana Sahib—one account says by a half-caste woman, another by a Mrs. Greenway, whom, with her son, he had taken prisoner, and spared their lives on the promise of a lac of rupees for their ransom—offering terms for the surrender of the position. This led to an agreement being entered into with that chief, who, on condition that the inmates of the intrenchment should retire, and leave the treasure, guns, and magazine, guaranteed to them their lives, with their arms, colours, ammunition, and personal baggage: he also agreed to find boats to convey them in safety down the Ganges to Allahabad.

It was not the intention of the treacherous chief, however, to keep faith with the Europeans. He wanted to get possession of the intrenchment, the treasure, and the magazine; and for that purpose he professed to guarantee the safety of the inmates. But they were no sooner embarked than a fire was opened upon the boats from two guns, and also by the Sepoy infantry. Some of the men steered for the opposite shore, and attempted to land; but they were met and repulsed by the 17th native infantry, just arrived from Azimghur. The majority of the boats pursued their course down the river: they were fired upon from both sides; men, women, and children were constantly falling, dead or wounded. Some men of the native cavalry rode into the river, and slew all they could get near; and when a boat drifted near the shore, it was seized, the men killed—some of them being blown from the cannons' mouths—and the women and children were taken back to Cawnpore, and given up to the Nana, who ordered them to be lodged in a public building, called the Subada Kothee, from whence they were removed to a house near the assembly-room. General Wheeler, with several ladies and gentlemen in one boat, got down the river for twenty-two miles. They were seized by the zemindars of Joagnussar, and sent to the Nana with their hands tied behind them: all were shot.

In a few days many more prisoners were added to these victims of the Nana's treachery. The 41st and 10th regiments had mutinied at Futteghur, a military station near Furruckabad. A few able-bodied men, with women and children, and servants, making about 150 in all, took refuge in the fort, where they defended themselves till several lives were lost; and the rebels having sprung one mine, and effected a breach, were observed to be sinking another mine. As it would have been impossible to defend themselves if a second breach were effected, the survivors (126 in number) left the fort, and, between midnight of the 3rd, and 2 A.M. of the 4th of July, embarked in a boat on the Ganges, having spiked their guns and destroyed the little ammunition they had left. Their flight was discovered. They were pursued, and fired upon. Several were killed. The survivors reached Bithoor, where Nana Sahib made them prisoners, and sent them to Cawnpore, where they were confined, with the women and children who had been snatched from death on the Ganges, to meet a more terrible fate.

CHAPTER CXVII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA—CONCLUSION OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.—A.D. 1857—1859.

AT this time the gallant Havelock was marching to the relief of Cawnpore and Lucknow. He had landed at Bombay, on the 29th of May, from Persia; and had immediately proceeded to Calcutta, which city he reached on the 17th of June. On the 25th, he again left Calcutta, at the head of a small movable column, with the rank of brigadier-general conferred upon him by the viceroy. His route was to Allahabad, which important city had been saved from the mutineers by the activity and energy of General Neill. He arrived there on the 30th; and on the 7th of July marched for Cawnpore, at the head of 1,000 European infantry, 130 Sikhs, eighteen volunteer cavalry, and six guns. On the 10th, he overtook Major Renaud, who had been previously despatched towards Cawnpore with 700 men and two guns. On the 12th, the united force—not amounting to 2,000 men—found the enemy strongly intrenched at Futtehpoor, a place of some magnitude, about forty-eight miles from Cawnpore, and seventy-five W.N.W. of Allahabad. Nana Sahib commanded, having with him 3,500 Sepoys and eleven guns. Havelock would fain have rested his men, as they had marched a long distance that morning, and the heat was intense; but the rebels, aware of their approach, opened a fire upon them, at a long range, from their eleven guns, and an immediate contest was inevitable. Most of Havelock's men had been with him in Persia; and reminding them that, when marching to Mohammerah, he promised them a field-day—which he could not give them, as the Persians ran away, but now they would have one, and must let the enemy see what they were made of—he led them to the attack. There was very little fighting; for the rebels broke and fled almost as soon as the Europeans (the 73rd Highlanders) approached; retreating to Cawnpore, with the loss of all their guns, ammunition, and baggage.

The next day was employed in securing and bringing-in the guns, baggage, &c.; and the discovery, amongst the latter, of ladies' dresses, worsted-work, and other memorials of the victims of the treacherous Nana Sahib, made the men yet more eager to reach Cawnpore. On the 14th of July they were again on their march, encountering the rebels, and defeating them that day at Aong, and the next at Pandoo Nuddee; where, after another brief struggle, the Sepoys fled as before, leaving their cannon; and the pursuers found the road strewed for miles with abandoned tents, ammunition, and other materials of war. The rebels made a stand at a bridge across the Pandoo stream, which they had strongly intrenched; but they were driven from it, and the guns they had there in position captured.—On the 16th, the march to Cawnpore was continued: the Sepoys were found, at least 10,000 or 12,000 strong, cantoned before and in that city, and they made a more determined defence than at Futtehpoor or Pandoo Nuddee. The fighting lasted from 2 till 7 P.M. The Europeans and Sikhs were outflanked; the enemy got in their rear; and, for some time, less than 1,000 men were combating with at least 5,000. But the mutineers had no general capable of regulating their movements. The Europeans and Sikhs kept together, and fought desperately; the latter even more so than the former, as they had learned that the throats of some of their countrymen had been cut by the Bengal Sepoys. The determined bravery of the few was successful. One by one the positions of the enemy were taken, and their guns captured. Before nightfall they had retreated, and ceased firing; and the English force, being concentrated, bivouacked on a fine plain adjoining the grand parade-ground of the city. The next morning, while the little army was waiting for the arrival of the baggage, they saw "a huge, dense, white pillar of smoke slowly rising in the air." It was accompanied by a loud explosion; and it was soon after ascertained that Nana had blown up the grand magazine of Cawnpore, and fled to Bithoor. "Thus, in four days, the force had marched 126 miles, fought four actions, and taken twenty-four guns, light and heavy; and that, too, in the month of July, in India."

On the morning of the 17th of July, about nine o'clock, the conquerors marched into Cawnpore; and then it was discovered that Nana Sahib had crowned his atrocious treachery by murdering his captives. This had been done the previous day, when he had ascertained that the battle was going against him. They had been again removed to the Subada Kothee, being, in all, upwards of 200 women and children. All were massacred; and when the court-yard was entered, it was found to be covered with blood, which rose over the feet of the soldiers. Of the victims, 163 were the inhabitants of Cawnpore, and forty-nine were fugitives from Futteghur, who only fled from one series of horrors to encounter others even more dreadful. One of the victims [was the dau]ghter of General Wheeler. Her remains were found by the 78th Highlanders, who removed the hair from her head, dividing it amongst themselves; each vowing, that as many hairs as he held, so many mutineers should die by his hands. And, as far as lay in the power of the conquerors, their deaths were avenged, the rebel Sepoys captured alive being tried by a drum-head court-martial, and hanged. We may add, that many of the bodies of the women and children had been thrown into a large well; and several ladies leaped into that well alive, to escape the insults of the brutal soldiery. In this well the mutilated bodies of upwards of 200 women and children were found. General Neill had it decently covered in, and built as one large grave. A monument has since been erected over it.

On the 19th of July the troops marched to Bithoor, where Nana had 5,000 men and thirteen guns. When they reached that place, it was found that he had fled, and his palace was in flames.—On the 20th, General Neill, who had, at Havelock's request, marched from Allahabad to reinforce him with as many Europeans as could be spared from that station, arrived at Cawnpore. Leaving him in command there, Havelock crossed the Ganges on the 21st; and on the 25th, with 1,500 men, he commenced his march for the relief of Lucknow. The Residency at that town was then completely environed. Sir Henry Lawrence had died on the 4th of July, from the effects of his wound; and the command devolved entirely upon Sir Thomas Inglis. A daily fire, more or less severe, was kept up from the rebels' guns; the heat was excessive, and the fatigue of the garrison far beyond what a soldier on ordinary duty can conceive. Relief was anxiously looked for, but none arrived; and a staff officer wrote, on the 1st of August—

"Still no intelligence of any kind, which caused much anxiety, more particularly as some of our supplies were likely to be at an end in twenty days' time. Weather very hot and sultry; small, painful boils, covering nearly the whole body, very prevalent. Many deaths among the children, and sickness on the increase. Great inconvenience felt in the hospital for want of space; the sick and wounded sadly crowded, and the building very badly ventilated, as the lower storey was hardly safe from shots."

All this had to be endured for several weeks longer, as Havelock was unable to reach Lucknow. The rainy season was at its height, the enemy lay in his route, and he had a flooded country to wade through, as well as to fight that enemy when he appeared. On the 20th of July the foes met, and Havelock defeated the rebels between Unao and Busserut-Gunge, taking nineteen guns. Sickness, however, was so prevalent amongst his men, that, on the 31st, he was obliged to retire to Mungulwar, six miles from the Ganges. There his rear was threatened by Nana Sahib, who had again collected round him a large number of Sepoys. The English intrenched themselves till the 4th of August, when they again advanced: and, on the 5th, drove the enemy from the town of Busserut-Gunge and the surrounding villages. As they marched, however, through a richly-cultivated country, covered with hamlets, they found themselves emerge upon an extensive open plain, over which about half-a-dozen different camps were spread, occupied with troops. Very reluctantly Havelock found himself compelled to retire again to Mungulwar. There a council of war was held, and it was resolved to return to Cawnpore; and the commissariat and stores were sent across the river, when Havelock heard that the Sepoys were again advancing, and had re-occupied Unao, Busserut-Gunge, and other places from which they had been driven; and, with 4,000 infantry, 500 cavalry, and a small battery of horse artillery, had intrenched themselves before Busserut-Gunge. It was determined to attack them there. Leaving 200 men to guard the approaches to the river, on the 12th of August that attack was made, and was completely successful; but the loss—140 men put hors de combat—was one which could be ill sustained. After the battle, the troops returned to Mungulwar. They then moved down to the river; and owing, we are told, "to the excellent arrangements of the engineer," they all crossed over, and bivouacked before Cawnpore that evening.

Nana Sahib had collected a large force before that town; and Havelock had only 1,415 men, 335 being sick of the cholera, or wounded. On the 15th of August, he wrote, "I do not despond. I must march to-morrow against Bithoor; but it seems advisable to look the evil in the face, for there is no chance but between reinforcements and gradual absorption by disease." On that day, General Neill attacked the left wing of Nana's army at the Pandoo Nuddee, threw it into confusion, and drove it back to Bithoor. The next day, Havelock, with all the forces at his command, marched to Bithoor, where the main body of the rebels was posted. Havelock described their position as "one of the strongest in India;" and Nana had stationed there "the flower of the mutinous soldiery," strengthened in numbers, and inflated in spirit by successful mutinies and defections which had just taken place at Saugor and Fyzabad. There were not more than 1,300 British to attack this post; and for one hour the Sepoys defended it obstinately. Then they gave way; and if Havelock had possessed cavalry, not one would have escaped. As it was, they left 250 killed and wounded behind them, the English loss being forty-nine in battle; but it was increased by sunstroke and cholera: and on the 19th of August, out of his small force, Havelock had seventeen officers and 466 rank and file on the sick list.

It was absolutely necessary that the few troops at Cawnpore should take some repose; and they remained there for about a month.—On the 14th of August, Sir Colin Campbell had arrived at Calcutta, and, on the 17th, in a general order, he announced that her majesty had been pleased to appoint him commander-in-chief of the forces in India: and in that post, arduous indeed was his position, great his responsibility. The entire Bengal army, 105,000 strong, had mutinied; the populations of Oude and the north-western provinces had revolted; the Doab was in the hands of the rebels; Lucknow and Agra were invested by numerous forces of the revolted Sepoys; and Havelock, with his small force reduced by war and sickness, had to maintain himself at Cawnpore. Some native chiefs joined the rebels; others, especially the Maharajahs Scindia and Holkar, the Rajahs of Bhurtpore, Jheend, and Puttiala, declared their friendly allegiance to the British, and offered assistance. And such aid was needed; for, with a garrison at Calcutta scarcely strong enough to at once overawe the native population, and watch three regiments of disarmed Sepoys which were dispersed in the vicinity, the commander-in-chief had not more than 7,000 Europeans and 2,000 native troops at his disposal. Before his arrival, Lord Canning had appointed Major-General Sir James Outram to supersede Havelock in the military command at Cawnpore; and that gallant officer arrived there, with 1,500 troops, on the 15th of September. He found the brigadier-general on the point of again starting to relieve Lucknow; and he chivalrously declined to deprive him of his command, feeling, as he declared in a division order to the troops, that after "the strenuous and noble exertions" Brigadier-General Havelock had already made to effect that object, "to him should accrue the honour of the achievement." When, therefore, on the 19th of September, the English again crossed the Ganges, and advanced to Lucknow, Outram accompanied them as a volunteer in his military capacity, but acting in his civil capacity as chief commissioner of Oude.

This time the troops succeeded in reaching Lucknow; arriving in front of the enemy there on the 23rd. The rebels were posted in the enclosure of the Alum-bagh (or Garden of Beauty), a country seat of one of the royal family of Oude, about three miles from the city. It was a formidable position, and capable of being defended for a long time; but the rebels fled before Havelock's men, and the latter occupied the Alum-bagh the same evening. The enemy, however, returned, after having been pursued for some distance by a small corps led by Sir James Outram, and cannonaded the position for several hours, but was finally driven off. At the Alum-bagh, Havelock left all his baggage, ammunition, sick and wounded, with 300 men to protect them; and, on the 25th, he marched to the Residency. The enemy was driven before him on the route, which was one of successive conflicts; and in the evening the relieving force reached its beleaguered countrymen. "The immense enthusiasm with which they were received defies description." The deliverers and the delivered interchanged loud hurrahs. Officers and privates mingled together, and shook each other by the hand; the rough soldiers taking children out of their mothers' arms, kissing them while tears rolled down their cheeks, and thanking God that they had arrived in time to save them from the fate of those at Cawnpore.

This success had not been obtained without great loss when the amount of the force was looked at. The number of killed, officers and rank and file, was 119; wounded, 339; and missing (wounded prisoners in the hands of the enemy), 77: total, 535. Amongst the killed was Brigadier-General Neill, who had so gallantly exerted himself, first to preserve Allahabad, and then to join Havelock at Cawnpore. Sir James Outram was also wounded; yet he did not quit his horse till he arrived at the gate of the Residency, where, the next day, he assumed the command. But it was found impossible to remove the women and children, so large was the rebel force, and so rapidly did it again collect in Lucknow; and the inhabitants of that city being hostile to the English, could not be induced to assist them in obtaining supplies. The arrival of the additional troops, therefore, for the time, added to the privation of the garrison and the other inhabitants of the Residency. The new troops occupied some buildings in the vicinity, from which they had driven the enemy; Colonel Inglis and the old garrison continued to occupy the Residency; and patiently, under the command of Sir James Outram, all waited for further reinforcements, feeling confident that Sir Colin Campbell would not lose any time in sending them.

At this period the rebels had instituted something like a regular government in Oude. They had chosen as their king (recognising him as a tributary to the King of Delhi), a child eight years of age, a son of the deposed King of Oude, who resided at Fort William, Calcutta, as a pensioner of the British government. A minister—Shirreff-u-Dowlah, a dignitary of the old court of Oude—and a council of state were appointed to carry on the government in the name of this infant sovereign; and Hissamut-u-Dowlah was made commander of the rebel troops.

As time progressed, and their resources continued to diminish, without any apparent means of repairing them, the spirits of the garrison began to fail, though they were not without hope: and now that hope had a better chance of being realised. Sir Colin Campbell resolved to lead reinforcements to Lucknow himself. He left Calcutta on the 27th of October; arrived at Cawnpore on the 3rd of November; crossed the Ganges on the 9th; and on the 13th reached the Alum-bagh, between which and the Residency a communication was kept up by the telegraph. Sir Colin, including a naval brigade, under Captain Peel, had about 2,700 infantry and 700 cavalry under his command; and on the 14th he commenced active operations to relieve the Residency. His first effort was to drive the rebels from the Dilkoosha (or Heart's Delight), a hunting palace of the late kings of Oude, situated in a beautiful and extensive park. This was done on the 14th of November; and on the 15th the rebels were attacked in another post they occupied—a very extensive and strong building in the centre of a large garden, encircled with a high wall loopholed for musketry in every direction, and known as the Secunder-bagh (or Alexander's Garden). The contest was long and fierce. The rebels never fought more desperately: they neither gave nor asked for quarter; and about 2,000 of them were killed before they could be driven from that stronghold.—Whilst attacking the Secunder-bagh the English had been cannonaded from the Shah Nujeeff, a large mosque converted by the rebels into a defensive fort, and strongly barricaded. The naval brigade, led by Captain Peel, attacked this position with several pieces of heavy artillery. The attack was supported by Brigadier Hope and his Highlanders; and the mosque was carried by assault. The next day some posts that still intervened between the relieving army and the garrison were attacked by the latter on one side, and by the former on the other; and, in the midst of the fighting, Sir Colin Campbell was met by Generals Outram and Havelock, and the occupants of the Residency felt at last that they were free.

But they had to leave Lucknow. With his then resources, and the enemy, at least 50,000 in number, hovering near the city, it would have been very imprudent for Sir Colin Campbell to remain there, encumbered with all the wounded and invalids, and the women and children, who were no longer beleaguered in the Residency. Orders were therefore given for their removal to Cawnpore. Care was taken to render the journey as little irksome as possible to the women and children; and whilst the first movements were taking place, Havelock—who had been raised to the rank of major-general, and honoured with the Order of the Bath—was attacked by dysentery, and died on the 25th of November, at Dilkoosha. A feeling of deep regret pervaded all military men and civilians at the loss of this great and good officer. Two days after his death, the Queen created Havelock a baronet, and the title was transferred to his son. His sad death did not arrest any of the movements: the troops, to facilitate them, were put in two divisions—one under Major-General

Outram, the other under Brigadier-General Hope Grant; and on the evening of the 25th all were safe at the Alum-bagh.—A hurried removal took place on the 28th, in consequence of the receipt by Sir Colin Campbell of unpleasant news from Cawnpore. Brigadier-General Windham had been left in command there; and he had been attacked by a daring band of Gwalior troops, who had mutinied against the maharajah because he continued faithful to England.—The troops of Holkar had also mutinied at Indore, and murdered many Europeans of both sexes. These mutineers joined those of Gwalior; and, on the 5th of September, they marched from Gwalior to the Chumbul, crossing that river on the 8th, and taking possession of the fort of Dholpore, about thirty miles from Agra. They attacked the latter city on the 10th of October, and were repulsed with great loss.—They continued moving about during the month; and, on the 11th of November, a column of 3,000 men, with eight guns, occupied Calpee, on the Jumna, about forty-five miles S.W. of Cawnpore. There it was so largely reinforced, that, by the 21st of November, the 3,000 had been increased to 20,000, with thirty-eight pieces of cannon; and on that day they began to cross the river, preparatory to an attack on Cawnpore. General Windham had some knowledge of their movements; but they had advanced to within twenty miles of his position before he was aware of their vicinity. On the 25th of November they were only fifteen miles away, and the general determined to make an effort to arrest their further advance. He had taken up a position at Dhuboulie, a village on the Calpee road; and he marched on the 25th, at 3 A.M., with 1,200 men of her majesty's 34th, 82nd, 58th, and Rifle regiments, 100 mounted Sowars, and eight guns, to attack the enemy, who were met at Bhowsee, near the Pandoo Nuddee. The English commenced the fight; and successfully at first, having caused the mutineers to make a disorderly flight in one direction, leaving behind them two howitzers and a gun; they then found the main body close at hand, in such numbers that General Windham resolved to return to Cawnpore. Leaving, therefore, the position he had occupied in the morning, the general encamped that night on the Jewee plain, a short distance from the city. There he was attacked, the next day, by the enemy in great force in front and on his right flank. An interchange of firing continued for five hours, the enemy having several heavy guns. Then the general found that the assailants had turned his flank, penetrated into the town, and were attacking his intrenchment on the river. He immediately ordered his men to retire to the fort; and this was done so precipitately, that the camp and baggage were abandoned, and seized by the rebels, to their great joy and exultation.

The success of the 27th was followed up on the 28th. The mutineers from Gwalior and Indore had been joined by Nana Sahib, and his brother, Bhola Sahib, both at the head of detachments; and the united army, 21,000 strong, followed by an immense horde of plunderers, marched on Cawnpore, where the troops had been drawn up in four divisions. One of these, under Colonel Walpole, repulsed the enemy, and captured two 18-pounder guns. But the rebels succeeded in the attack on the other divisions, which had to retreat before overwhelming numbers to the intrenchments, officers and privates falling at every step. That night "the mutineers revelled as victors in the city of Cawnpore;" and they had reason to boast of their success; for amongst the booty they acquired, were "10,000 rounds of Enfield cartridges, the mess-plate of four of the Queen's regiments, the paymaster's chests, and a large amount of miscellaneous property."—Sir Colin Campbell arrived in the evening, on the opposite bank of the Ganges; and his first care was to secure the safety of those whom he had rescued from imminent peril. They had to cross the Ganges by a bridge of boats, which was commanded by the fire of the enemy; and on the morning of the 29th of November, Captain Peel and Captain Travers took up their position near that bridge, on the left bank of the river, with several heavy guns. The rebels opened a cannonade upon them; but, after a short time, the Sepoys' guns were silenced. All that day there was a brisk bombardment kept up by the enemy, and returned from the intrenchment; and whilst it was going on, "a procession of human beings, cattle, and vehicles, six miles long, was coming up to the bridge of boats." As soon as it was dark, the passage of the bridge was commenced; but it was not till the evening of the 30th that the last cart of the convoy crossed; and then the safe removal of the helpless beings from Cawnpore had to be arranged. On the 3rd of December, the women, children, and wounded started, under the escort of 500 men of the 34th regiment, for Allahabad. They arrived there in safety, and met with an enthusiastic reception.—On the 9th of January, 1858, they reached Calcutta, and landed under a royal salute, amidst the cheering of several hundred Europeans.

Only half the wounded could be despatched with the convoy; and the 4th and 5th of December were occupied in consigning the remainder to places of safety. About 3 P.M. on the 5th, the enemy attacked the pickets on the left with artillery, assailed the right flank with infantry, and the pickets in the General-gunge—a bazaar of very considerable extent, in front of the British camp, and standing on the bank of the canal which crosses the city from east to west. The sorties were all repulsed; and arrangements were then made for a general attack on the enemy the next day. The rebels had been joined by four regiments from Oude, and the remains of various mutinous corps that had been defeated and broken up by the Europeans. Sir Colin Campbell estimated the number at 25,000 men; and they had more than forty guns. The centre of this force was in front of Cawnpore, where the houses and bazaars were filled with men, and the principal street barricaded. The right abutted beyond the angle formed by the canal and the Grand Trunk road, which unites Cawnpore to Delhi in one direction, and to Allahabad and Calcutta in another. Two miles in the rear was the camp of the Gwalior contingent; and the left of the enemy extended beyond it. On this occasion the usual success awaited the English. At 9 A.M. a heavy bombardment was opened from the intrenchment to cause the enemy to believe that the attack was coming from that direction. But it was made on the right and left, the infantry being greatly aided by the fire of the artillery, the naval brigade handling the 24-pounders as if they were light field-pieces. The enemy did not long stand to the guns, but fled on the Calpee road; was pursued for fourteen miles, the camp being taken, and every gun and cart of ammunition captured by the assailants. In this affair Major-General Dupuis, Brigadier-General Greathed, the Hon. A. Hope, Walpole, Inglis, and Hope Grant, greatly distinguished themselves; as did Brigadier Crawford and Major Payne, of the royal artillery; Captains H. W. Norman, Herbert Bruce, J. H. Smyth, and William Peel, and Lieutenant Vaughan, of the royal navy. Whilst the rebels were attacked and beaten in this direction, Major-General Mansfield, with some artillery, Rifles, and the 93rd Highlanders, attacked a body of Sepoys concentrated in a position called the Subahdar's Tank, in the rear of his left, and drove them from it. The British, during the night, bivouacked on the ground from which they had driven the enemy.

These successes entirely disconcerted the previously organised operations of the rebels; and thenceforth all was dismay and confusion; whilst the British completely shook off the gloom which the affairs of the 26th and 27th of November had thrown over them.—On the 7th of December, Sir Colin Campbell devoted himself to secure and concentrate his resources. On the 8th, Brigadier-General Hope Grant, with a force of the three arms, amounting to 2,797 men and eleven guns, was despatched to Bithoor, to clear that locality of any rebel force he might find there; to destroy the public buildings belonging to Nana Sahib; and to press on to Serai-Ghât (a ferry over the Ganges, about 25 miles from Cawnpore), if he heard of the enemy in that direction. The general met with no enemy at Bithoor, and advanced to Soorajpore, three miles from Serai-Ghât, where he bivouacked for the night. The next morning, leaving a portion of his column to guard the baggage, he advanced with the main body, and found the rebels concentrated on the banks of the river. A discharge of artillery commenced, and a body of the rebel horse made a dash at the British guns, but was met by Grant's cavalry, and at once broke and fled; a number of them being cut down in a pursuit which the British kept up as long as the nature of the ground would permit them. Before the infantry could get into action, all the enemy's troops had fled, leaving fourteen brass guns and howitzers, and a large store of waggons and ammunition. In this affair there was not a single man killed or wounded on the side of the British.—By these movements, Cawnpore and the roads around it were cleared of the enemy, and Sir Colin Campbell made preparations for a final advance upon Lucknow.

Before we close the year 1857 we must go back to Delhi, which we left in the hands of the mutineers, who had proclaimed the aged king Emperor of Hindostan. On the first outburst of the mutiny, the European troops, under Brigadier-General Wilson, marched from Meerut, and after several encounters with the rebels, in all of which they were victorious, were joined by the troops from Umballah, under General Barnard. The united army advanced to Delhi in two columns, under Generals Barnard and Wilson; and driving the rebels from the ridge in front of the city, they encamped behind it. This force consisted of about 3,000 British troops and a few Ghoorkas. On the 27th of May, General Anson, the commander-in-chief, died of cholera at Umballah. He was succeeded by Major-General T. Reed, who reached the camp before Delhi, where General Barnard commanded, on the 7th of June. It is said of the latter officer, that if he "had shown a happy audacity," his army was strong enough to have taken Delhi. The attempt, however, was not made. The British were soon reinforced by the Guides; a distinguished corps, originally raised on the conclusion of the Sutlej campaign, to act in a threefold capacity—as regular troops, guides, or spies. Its force, limited by Lord Hardinge (by whom it was first levied) to one troop of cavalry and two companies of infantry—in all, 284 men—was increased by Lord Dalhousie to three troops of horse and six companies of foot; and such was its conduct when called into action, that "it is not too much to say that a braver, more intelligent, more faithful, or better disciplined corps does not exist in the military service of the British empire."

For several weeks the little army before Delhi remained in its encampment, having frequent encounters with the rebellious Sepoys. Sometimes the British were the assailants. In all the rebels were beaten; and no event occurred before Delhi to lower the British prestige.—On the 5th of July, General Barnard was attacked by cholera, and died the same day. He was succeeded, but only for a few days, by General Reed, who, on the 16th, was compelled, by failing health, to resign the command to Brigadier-General Wilson.—On the 8th of August, Brigadier-General Nicholson arrived at the camp; and he was followed, on the 14th, by a movable column which had been operating in the Punjaub under his command, and on the 12th of July had utterly routed a large body of mutineers from Sealcote, in that province, which was en route to Delhi. This column consisted of 1,000 Europeans and 1,400 Sikhs. It was a welcome addition to the army; and what was equally so, it reported the approach of a heavy siege-train from Ferozepore. After the arrival of this column, there were encamped before Delhi 9,700 men, of whom 4,600 were English.

The rebels heard of the approach of the siege-train, and they marched from Delhi, to the number of 7,000 men of all arms, and eighteen guns, with a view to intercept it, and also to operate upon the rear of the British. Information of this movement was conveyed to the camp; and, on the 25th of August, Brigadier-General Nicholson, at the head of 1,000 European and 2,000 native troops, was despatched to operate against the rebels. The same day, at half-past five o'clock, having been guided by information received from some natives, this force arrived at Nujuffghur, and found the Sepoys in position on the left and front, extending from the bridge over the Nujuffghur canal to the town, a distance of a mile and three-quarters, or two miles. As soon as they caught sight of the English force, a sharp fire of musketry and light guns was opened on the advanced column. Brigadier Nicholson then formed his men, after a hasty reconnaissance, in which he ascertained that the rebels' strongest position was an old serai on the left centre. He determined to force this point, and then, changing front to the left, to sweep down their lines of guns towards the bridge. After a few rounds of shot were fired, a charge was made by the infantry with the bayonet, and the enemy was driven out, with little loss to the British, except in the death of Lieutenant Gabbett, a promising officer, who was mortally wounded. When the British changed their line, and attacked the rebels going down to the bridge, they made little resistance, but retreated across the bridge, the British guns playing upon them; their own guns, thirteen in number, being left behind. Some rebels had concealed themselves in the little village of Nuglee, a few hundred yards in the rear of the British; and the general ordered Lieutenant Lumsden—who, at the head of the 1st Punjaub infantry, had just cleared the town of Nujuffghur of the enemy—to drive them out of the village. They made a firm resistance, refusing quarter; and some of the hardest fighting of the day was with this little band of desperadoes. Nicholson had to send the 61st to support the 1st Punjaub; Lieutenant Lumsden was killed, Lieutenant Elkington dangerously wounded, and more rank and file put hors de combat than in the engagement with the main army, before this village was cleared. The next morning, the bridge, and all the waggons and tumbrils which Brigadier Nicholson had not the means of bringing away, were blown up, and the force returned to the camp.

The arrival of the siege-train caused the preparations for the siege to be actively carried on. At this time, General Wilson had a force under his orders of 8,748 men, of whom the British numbered 2,294 infantry, 443 cavalry, and 580 artillery; making a total of 3,217: of the entire force, 2,977 were in the hospital. In Delhi there were 12,000 infantry and 4,000 cavalry, of disciplined troops; and 3,000 infantry and 1,000 cavalry which might be called a non-military force, being armed, but not disciplined. Great as was the difference in their numbers, the besiegers were not at all disheartened. They worked with a will in preparing the ground for the breaching batteries, and in removing all obstructions between them and the city walls. On the 7th of September, the erection of siege batteries was commenced; on the 12th they were completed; and on that day and the next an incessant fire was kept up against the walls. Two breaches being effected, it was resolved that the assault should be made on the morning of the 14th; two columns entering the breaches, and a third the Cashmere Gate, which a small party—consisting of Lieutenants Home and Salkeld, Sergeants John Smith and A. B. Carmichael, and Corporal F. Burgess, all of the sappers and miners corps; with Bugler Hawthorne, of her majesty's 62nd regiment, Havildar Madhoo, and thirteen sappers and miners (natives), and ten Punjaubs—undertook to blow up, under the protection of the fire of her majesty's 60th Rifles. At daybreak on Monday, the 14th of September, the troops moved out to the assault. The Cashmere levies and Ghoorkas, sent under Major Reid to attack two of the suburbs merely as a diversion, were repulsed with considerable loss; but the object was effected. In the meantime the first and second columns, led by Brigadier-Generals Nicholson and Jones, advanced under a perfect storm of ball poured upon them from the walls, cleared the ditch, and carried both the breaches. The third, under Colonel Campbell, preceded by the exploding party, made for the Cashmere Gate; Lieutenant Home, Sergeants Smith and Carmichael, and Havildar Madhoo leading and carrying the powder-bags. Part of the drawbridge in front of the gate had been destroyed; but the party got over safe notwithstanding, and deposited their bags, Sergeant Carmichael being killed, and Havildar Madhoo wounded whilst performing that act of devoted heroism: then Lieutenant Salkeld advanced to fire the charge, and was wounded in the leg and arm before he could accomplish that daring feat. He handed the slow-match to Corporal Burgess, who succeeded in setting fire to the train, but was mortally wounded at the same moment. Two of the natives were also wounded. Instantly the gate exploded; and Lieutenant Home, who was unhurt, ordered the bugle to be sounded: thrice the call to advance was given, and the third column rushed to the gate, which it carried; and soon after the three columns were hailing each other within the walls of Delhi. So determined was the stand made by the rebels, however, at the various defences of the interior, that it was not till the 20th of September, when the gates of the royal palace were blown open, that the city was won, with 206 pieces of artillery, besides enormous quantities of shot, shell, percussion-caps, and other warlike matériel.—The loss to the assailants had been great:—

	English. Officers.	English. Privates.	Natives. Privates.	Total.
Killed	8	162	103	273
Wounded	52	510	310	872
	60	672	413	1,145

Thus near one-third of the storming party was put hors de combat; but the survivors took possession of the city; and on the 21st of September, General Wilson established his head-quarters in the palace of the old king—the famous Dewan-i-Khas, where, we are told by an inscription on it walls—

"If paradise be on the face of the earth, Here it is."

In the Hall of Audience, after the last enemy had fled from Delhi, the British officers assembled; and whilst the British flag was hoisted over the royal edifice, the "Health of Queen Victoria" was pledged amidst reiterated cheers.

The aged king, his two sons and grandson, had fled from Delhi. Captain Hodson, of the Guides, was sent in pursuit. He found the monarch, on the 21st of September, at Durgah Nizam-oo-deem, within six miles of Delhi, accompanied by his favourite wife, the Begum Zenat Mehal. Her sons and grandson had taken shelter in the tomb of the Emperor Humayoon, where they were captured. Between 5,000 and 6,000 of the refuse of the city and palace were congregated in the purlieus of this tomb, who were armed with weapons of all descriptions. They began to fire upon Captain Hodson's band, when he ordered them to surrender, and lay down their arms. On the order being sternly repeated, and his men being about to charge, it was complied with; and about 500 swords, and 1,000 fire-arms of different kinds, were hastily picked up by the Guides. A number of horses, and several elephants, were also taken possession of. But, in the meantime, the princes had got into a carriage, and returned to Delhi. Captain Hodson, the arms being collected, had rapidly followed them, and overtook the carriage when near the city. It had halted, and was surrounded by thousands of the people, who appeared to be quite disposed to resist the capture of the princes. But Captain Hodson made his way to the carriage; and telling the crowd that the inmates "had not only rebelled against the government, but had ordered and witnessed the massacre and shameful exposure of innocent women and children, and that, therefore, he should punish them," he shot the three in succession, many of the spectators exclaiming, "Well and rightly done; their crimes have met with their just penalty." The crowd then dispersed; and the bodies being taken into the city, were exposed for two or three days, when they were thrown into the stream. The old king was subsequently tried on charges of being a partisan in the crimes of mutiny and rebellion, and with being accessory to the murder of forty-nine persons, chiefly women and children, of European and mixed European descent. He was found guilty, sentenced to be transported for life, and was taken to one of the Andaman Islands, where all his wants were provided for till his death. It was elicited, on this trial, that the intended revolt was known to, and encouraged by, the Shah of Persia; and that a native, Mohammed Dervish, wrote to Mr. Colvin, lieutenant-governor of the north-western provinces, revealing the plot six weeks before it actually broke out. Unfortunately, that gentleman — very strangely, we must think—neither acted upon this information himself, nor transmitted it to the governor-general.

Prompt measures were taken to pursue the fugitive rebels, who took flight in various directions; to punish the overt actors in mutiny and murder who were in the hands of the British; to re-establish order at Delhi; and to effectively control the discontented native population, which still remained hidden in the ruined edifices, and lurking in every out-of-the-way and concealed place. Colonel Burn was appointed military governor; Colonel Innes, commandant of the palace; Mr. Saunders, civil commissioner; and General Penny to the provisional command of the army at Delhi, in the room of General Wilson, who was compelled to resign that command in consequence of ill-health. Before his retirement, General Wilson issued a proclamation, promising protection and encouragement to all the inhabitants who had not been actually concerned in the foul murders and outrages of the 11th of May; but very few, at first, availed themselves of this lenity. Early in the following year, the administration of the province of which Delhi was the capital, was transferred to Sir John Lawrence, K.C.B., the chief commissioner of the Punjaub.

We must now return to Lucknow. The commander-in-chief having put Cawnpore in an efficient state of defence, and installed Brigadier-General Inglis in command there, in the place of General Windham, who was removed to Umballah, on the 24th of December, with a force of about 8,000 men, commenced his march to Futteghur. On the 29th, at Jellalabad, a large body of rebels appeared, and seemed, at first, determined to oppose his progress. However, one discharge of grape and round shot dispersed them, and they fled, leaving eighteen pieces of cannon, and throwing away numerous small arms as they ran off. On the 4th of January, 1858, the army reached Futteghur, which was found entirely deserted; the camp of the mutineers having been broken up, and its occupants gone. They had only carried off two guns; the remainder, with large quantities of stores and ammunition, fell into the hands of the soldiers.—On the 1st of February, Sir Colin and his army left Futteghur on the return march to Cawnpore; and on the 27th of February, left again for Lucknow.

There Sir James Outram had continued to hold the Alum-bagh, where the force he had with him was encamped; the fort of Jellalabad forming the right extremity of his position. Having learned that the rebels contemplated surrounding that position, in order to cut off his supplies, and intercept his communications; and that about 5,000 men were collected for that purpose at a village called Guilee, about three miles from the camp—at 4 A.M. on the 22nd of December, with 100 infantry, 150 cavalry, and six guns, he marched to the spot, hoping to surprise them. He succeeded. The rebels were found in position, from which, after they had discharged one volley at the troops, they were driven with the bayonet, and lost four artillery guns, much ammunition, besides elephants and baggage.—From that time till the middle of January, 1858, the rebels continued to receive re-inforcements: and their number is estimated to have been near 87,000 men, who were cantoned and encamped in and around Lucknow.—On the 12th and 16th of January they attacked the Alum-bagh; but were, on both occasions, driven back with great loss. Still their numbers increased. From Goruckpore, Rohilcund, Etawah, Allyghur, Futteghur, and many other places where the Sepoys had mutinied, and been beaten, the leaders and their desperate bands resorted to Lucknow; and in February, the force there amounted, it is supposed, to 100,000 fighting-men, with from eighty to 100 guns, and plenty of ammunition. "The fortifications of the city had," also, "been carefully restored, the streets intrenched, and most of the houses loopholed for musketry." The queen, Mummoo Khan, greatly encouraged the insurrection, and frequently taunted the leaders with doing so little against a force so notoriously inferior to their followers in numerical strength. General Outram had spies amongst those followers: they informed him, that, irritated by the remarks of the queen, the leaders had arranged an attack for the 21st of February; and he prepared to receive them. Just before daybreak on that day, 20,000 men commenced a movement round both flanks of the position: in each, instead of taking the English by surprise, the rebels were received with rapid discharges of grapeshot, and a general rout was the result. On this occasion the enemy lost 500 men; and had not the greater part of the British cavalry been absent escorting a convoy of provisions from Cawnpore, the loss would have been still heavier.—Another attempt was made on the night of the 24th of February; but although "the queen, with her son, and the officers and members of her court, came out of the city, on state elephants, to encourage the assailants," the rebels were again routed, and four guns captured.

The troops with which Sir Colin Campbell intended to march to relieve Lucknow, had been collected from every available quarter. They were nearly 50,000 in number; and were accompanied by 200 pieces of field and siege artillery. These troops commenced crossing the Ganges on the 11th of February. The passage occupied some days; and it was not till the 26th that they were ready for the onward march. In the evening of that day it was arranged they should start the next morning, and, in three days' march, reach Bunthura, a large plain nine miles from Lucknow, and there await further orders. This arrangement was carried out; and on the 2nd of March, Sir Colin, with a detachment of his force, advanced on the Dilkoosha, and seized that position after a smart skirmish, in which a gun was taken from the enemy.—From that day till the 8th was occupied in concentrating the forces and artillery near the Dilkoosha, and in forming bridges with casks, brought from Cawnpore for the purpose, across the Goomtee, on the right bank of which river Lucknow is built. While these operations were going on, Sir James Outram, at the head of the force from the Alum-bagh, crossed to the left bank of the Goomtee, to co-operate with the commander-in-chief. There were slight actions with the enemy on the 6th and 7th: and on the 9th the siege of Lucknow was formally commenced by the bombardment of a large building called the Martiniere, which the rebels had converted into a formidable position. Sir James Outram opened a fire upon this work in reverse; and when, on the 10th, Brigadier-General Hope led his division to the assault, he met with no resistance. A succession of buildings, erected in the midst of gardens, between the city and the river—"forming," said Sir Colin Campbell, "a range of massive palaces and walled courts of vast extent," every outlet of which had been covered with a work, and on every side were prepared barricades and loopholed parapets—had to be successively sapped into or stormed. Several of these buildings were taken on the 10th and 11th of March; and on the latter day, the Maharajah Jung Bahadoor joined the army with several thousand Ghoorkas, and took part in the further operations of the siege.—The attack on the buildings and other positions of the enemy continued till the 21st. On the 16th, the rebels began to leave the city in large numbers: but it was on the 21st that the last post was taken by Sir Edward Lugard. Then Lucknow was free, and it became possible to invite the return of the inhabitants.—On the 22nd, the commander-in-chief congratulated the army on the reduction and fall of the city; the attacks on both sides of the Goomtee having been successful, and every man engaged having done his duty, and deserved well of his country.

The conquest of Lucknow was followed by the departure of the Ghoorkas, whose services were no longer needed. There was some trouble in getting rid of them; but at length it was effected. It was a more difficult undertaking to settle Oude.—A proclamation from the governor-general was sent to Sir James Outram—whose authority, as chief commissioner, superseded that of Sir Colin Campbell when the city was taken—promising reward to those who had been steady in their allegiance; confirming the title of a few rajahs, who had remained faithful, as hereditary proprietors of the lands they held; but declaring that, with those exceptions, the proprietary right in the soil was confiscated to the British government. That their lives and honours should be safe, was promised to all those talookdars, chiefs, and landholders who should surrender their arms, and thenceforward obey the orders of the governor-general. For any further indulgence and the condition in which they would hereafter be placed, they must throw themselves upon the justice and mercy of the British government. To those who came forward properly, and gave their support to the chief commissioner in the restoration of peace and order, the indulgence would be large; but every participator in the murder of Englishmen and Englishwomen would be excluded from all mercy.—The chief commissioner did not approve of this proclamation, as it confiscated all land except that of those who had been steadfast in their allegiance. These were very few; Sir James Outram did not believe there were a dozen proprietors who had not, directly or indirectly, taken part in the rebellion. As their property was to be declared confiscated, he thought it useless to attempt to enlist the landowners on the side of order; and, under the circumstances in which they were placed, he thought they ought not to be treated as rebels, but as honourable enemies. The governor-general ordered a slight modification in the proclamation, but adhered to its general terms; and it formed the subject of much discussion both in and out of parliament. The difference of opinion on it between Viscount Canning and Sir James Outram, probably led to the appointment of Mr. Montgomery as chief commissioner. He arrived at Lucknow to supersede Sir James on the 3rd of April. In that city itself order was re-established, the civil power resumed its authority, and the police was restored. The inhabitants began to return, but not in very large numbers; for the absence of the court, of the nawabs, and the rajah—whose palaces were destroyed, and houses desolate—rendered all who were dependent on them destitute of the means of subsistence.

The city in the hands of the English civil authorities, Sir Colin Campbell broke up the army of Oude, reorganising the regiments into new brigades and divisions; which, a sufficient number of men being left to protect Lucknow, were sent on service elsewhere. And there was yet much to do, though the two great centres of the rebellion, Delhi and Lucknow, had been captured. The greater part of the vast province of Rohilcund still continued in the hands of the rebels; and Nana Sahib, with another rebel leader, Khan Bahadoor, was known to be concerting a plan to make it the theatre of operations. The Begum of Oude was at Khyrabad with 10,000 men, and 2,000 were encamped at Shahjehanpore. The other principal positions held by the rebels were Kotah, in Rajpootana; Jhansie, in Bundlecund; Calpee, the capital of the pergunnah of that name; and several strongholds in Rajpootana and Central India. Fyzabad, on the eastern borders of Oude, was also occupied by an insurgent force; and Koer Sing, a rebel leader who had particularly distinguished himself, had taken possession of Azimghur, in the north-west provinces. Sir Colin Campbell sent divisions of his army against most of these places. General Walpole's division was sent to Rohilcund; and the commander-in-chief proposed to conduct the campaign in that province with him. Sir Hope Grant went to Fyzabad; Sir Edward Lugard to Azimghur; Kotah, Jhansie, and Calpee were left to General Rose and Major Roberts: and against most other places where rebels were known to be in force, troops were despatched.

There was much fighting for some time, the result being in favour of the British, who drove the rebels from all their posts one after the other, the odds being always against them as to numbers; but victory, almost as uniformly, settled upon their flag. One of the most important expeditions was that of Sir Hugh Rose and Major Roberts, whose first movements were directed against Jhansie. That strong town was held by a large body of rebels, under the orders of the Ranee of Jhansie; who, to great cunning, added a spirit of manly bravery. When Sir Hugh Rose arrived before the town on the 20th of March, the Ranee proposed to visit his camp, with a view to come to terms of accommodation. Sir Hugh knew the character of the woman, who had ordered the commission of many murders, and sanctioned those committed by others; and he refused to hold any intercourse with her. He invested the town; and, on the last day of March, a large rebel force, commanded by Tantia Topee, a relative of Nana Sahib, came in sight, its object being to relieve Jhansie. —On the 1st of April a battle took place, the English force being divided into two columns, one of which continued the bombardment of the town, while the other attacked the enemy in front and flank. The rebels fought well; they stood a cannonade for some time without being thrown into confusion; and when the cavalry advanced to a charge, they formed squares to receive them. However, they were ultimately broken, and fled, closely pursued, to the Betwa; and in that river hundreds who rushed into it to escape the sword were drowned. In this battle the enemy lost 1,500 men, eighteen guns, and a large quantity of ammunition.—On the 3rd of April, Jhansie was assaulted, and gallantly captured; it was found, however, that the Ranee and 2,000 troops had previously left the town, and had escaped.—It was before the palace of the Ranee that the rebels who remained made their last resistance. There were 3,000 Sepoys on the spot. They were shattered, and driven before the English; and then some of them fired the magazine. The explosion was terrific; nine officers and 200 rank and file of the British were killed or wounded. The rebels lost no men by the explosion: but 1,500 were either killed in the assault, or cut down as they fled.

The Ranee, with her 2,000 followers, went to Calpee; and Sir Hugh Rose, having secured Jhansie, followed them. Konch lay in the route, where a considerable force was concentrated under Tantia Topee.—On the 7th of May, the British first "drove the enemy's infantry and cavalry out of the woods into the town with artillery fire;" and then the town was carried by storm, being in possession of the assailants in less than an hour.—On the 16th of May, Sir Hugh Rose arrived before Calpee, having been preceded by Brigadier Maxwell, whose column occupied a position on the left bank of the Jumna.—On the 22nd of May, a heavy fire was opened on the town. Whilst it was going on, the rebels attacked Sir Hugh's camp on the right and in front. The attack failed. The enemy, charged with the bayonet, broke; and as the English advanced, the rout became general. At the same time the town was abandoned, and the garrison joined the fugitives. They were pursued by the cavalry and horse-artillery, who killed many, and took all the rebels' guns and ammunition.

Similar movements took place in the other districts where the rebels were in force, which it would be tedious to describe; but we must devote a few words to the events in Scindia's territory.

The fugitives from Calpee, accompanied by the Ranee of Jhansie, her general, Tantia Topee, and the Nawab of Banda, fled to Indoorkee, on the road to Gwalior. There two other rebel chiefs, Rahim Ali and Koogar Daulap Sing, with 1,500 men, joined them: and there it was resolved to attack the maharajah in his capital, Gwalior, and punish him for his loyal allegiance to the British. Scindia's contingent, 12,000 strong, had, in the previous July, joined the rebels; but the defection of his army, though it endangered his position, had no effect on him; so, foiled in their intended vengeance on the British, the rebels determined to wreak it on the maharajah. Tantia Topee took the command of the force, which reached the vicinity of Gwalior on the 31st of May. Tantia had with him 7,000 infantry, 4,000 cavalry (all, or nearly all, well-disciplined men of the former Bengal army), and twelve guns: Scindia's force at Gwalior was 6,000 infantry, 600 cavalry, and eight guns. He was apprised of the approach of the rebels, and, on the 1st of June, put himself at the head of his troops, and marched to meet them. They encountered each other about two miles from Morar, the Gwalior cantonment. At first Scindia's men fought loyally and bravely, especially his body-guard. But in a charge, the rebel cavalry captured his guns; and 2,000 of his troops went over, at the same time, to the enemy, and commenced firing on their comrades. Soon the remainder retreated, and Scindia and his surviving guard reached Agra, where they got shelter. The rebels immediately took possession of Gwalior, and chose Nana Sahib peishwa, or chief of the Mahratta confederacy of princes. The property of the principal inhabitants was sequestrated; the maharajah's treasurer placed an immense sum, belonging to his master, in the hands of the rebel leaders; and all the royal property was declared to be confiscated. But the triumph of the rebels was of short duration. Sir Hugh Rose, as soon as he heard of these events, leaving General Whitlock at Calpee, marched to Gwalior. He was joined by Scindia on the 13th, and arrived within two miles of the cantonments in the evening of the 15th of June. There was skirmishing on the 15th, 16th, and 17th; the Ranee, who accompanied the troops in the dress of an officer, being killed on the latter day.* On the 18th, a few long shots were exchanged with the enemy; and on the 19th, the positions of the latter were reconnoitred by Sir Hugh Rose. This occupied some time, and orders were then given to encamp. Seeing the English inactive, the enemy redoubled their fire; and Sir Hugh thought it necessary to put a stop to it. He ordered the whole force to advance; which was done, the men being chiefly in skirmishing order. The 86th regiment stormed and captured a three-gun battery which had greatly annoyed the British. Heights on the right and left, where cannon were mounted, were also stormed and carried; and wherever any rebels appeared they were shot down, or fled. The fighting continued five hours; and by that time the rebels had been driven entirely out of Gwalior, which was occupied by the British. Brigadier Napier pursued the fugitives on the 20th and 21st, cutting them up desperately; returning to Gwalior on the 23rd. He delivered to Scindia—who, on the 20th, had been reinstated in his palace—as a prisoner, the faithless treasurer who had so basely betrayed his trust.

In other parts of India the enemy was powerless. In Rohilcund, in Oude and the Punjaub, apprehensions were entertained of fresh outbreaks: in Central India, Tantia Topee and the Banda nawab, who had gone there with the Gwalior rebels, whom they were enabled to rally, took possession of the town of Jhalra Patnor on the 26th of August, and most of the nawab's troops joined them. Having levied contributions on the town, and taken the treasure, guns, and munitions of war, Tantia led his augmented force in the direction of Rampore. He was pursued by General Michel, with the Mhow field force, who came up with him on the 15th of September, near Heore, and defeated and dispersed his followers, capturing most of their guns. Tantia then became a fugitive, without any place of settlement; and he was heard of in so many different directions, that his powers of motion appeared marvellous.

In several other directions the rebels were defeated; but in Oude, though they never stood before the British in the field, still, encouraged by the queen, they gathered strength; and the commander-in-chief (who had been raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Clyde) resolved on another "Oude campaign." The preparations were made at the close of October, "when Lucknow and Fyzabad were the only two places of importance held by the British."—In the hands of the rebels were seven or eight fortresses, where about 60,000 men were distributed; the Begum had an army of 12,000 men beyond the Gogra; the Nana and Feroze Shah were in Oude, and had also strong bands with them, mostly cavalry; and the people generally sided with the rebels, conveying to them intelligence of the movements of the British.—On the 1st of November, Lord Clyde commenced his campaign. He had a small, well-appointed army of 26,000 men, to oppose to at least three times that force; but in two months, "Oude was completely subjugated; its forts were taken and destroyed; its leaders, with two great exceptions [Nana Sahib and Tantia Topee], captured; its armies beaten down, and fugitive; its people disarmed." There being no longer an enemy to contend with, the commander-in-chief issued orders for the reduction and distribution of the army; and Oude began to enjoy the blessings of peace; its "entire pacification" being reported on the 25th of January, 1859.

In the following April Tantia Topee was taken prisoner, having been betrayed by one of the rebels. He was tried for rebellion at Sepree on the 15th; condemned, and executed on the 18th.—The mutiny and rebellion was by this time virtually at an end; for though the rebels were not extinguished, but were to be found dispersed in the wild country, they had no leaders, nor resources; and the people in those districts where they had for a time been supreme, were heartily tired of their lawless rule.—Charles Raikes, Esq., who was some time commissioner of Lahore, says—

"In January, 1858, I passed from Agra, through the district of Mynpoorie, on my way to join Sir Colin Campbell in the field, as civil commissioner. I had, in former years, been well known to the people as magistrate of the Mynpoorie district. When they heard of my arrival, they turned out in crowds along the roadside, and thanked God that the English had come back again. For, said they, the last six months, every one has been knocking his nearest neighbour on the head."

The mutiny led to the abolition of the East India Company as a ruling power. On the 23rd of December, 1857, the chairman of the Court of Directors informed his colleagues, that Lord Palmerston had communicated to him, that it was the intention of her majesty's government to propose to parliament, as soon as it met, a bill for the purpose of placing the British East India dominions under the direct authority of the crown. On the 12th of February, Lord Palmerston moved for leave to bring in a bill for the above purpose; which, after some debate, was granted. Before it reached the second reading, however, there was a change in the government; and Mr. Disraeli, on the 26th of March, introduced another bill, differing, in some respects, from that of his Liberal predecessor, who did not withdraw his measure, but postponed its consideration till the new bill was before the House. On the 12th of April, however, when the government bill was to have been read a second time, Lord John Russell proposed that the proceeding, in the first instance, should be by resolutions, not by bill. Mr. Disraeli assented, and he introduced his resolutions on the 20th. The debate on these resolutions was continued, at intervals, till the 17th of June, when they were reported to the House, and leave given to introduce a bill "for the future government of India." This was brought in by Lord Stanley on the 22nd of June, and passed by the House of Commons on the 8th of July. It was read a third time in the House of Lords on the 30th of July; and, on the 2nd of August, received the royal assent. By this act, all the territories heretofore under the government of the East India Company, are to be vested in her majesty, and governed in her name. One of her majesty's principal Secretaries of State, as the Secretary of State for India, is to have all the powers hitherto exercised by the company or by the Board of Control. The secretary is to be assisted by a council of fifteen members, eight to be appointed by the crown, and seven elected by the directors of the East India Company. Vacancies of those nominated to be filled up by the crown; and of the elected, by the members of the council; it being an indispensable qualification for the majority to have resided at least ten years in India, and not to have left that country more than ten years. The salary of each member of the council to be £1,200 a-year, with a retiring pension of £500. All the real and personal property of the company, except the capital stock, is vested in her majesty, for the purposes of the government of India. The naval and military forces of the East India Company are to be deemed the forces of her majesty. After the passing of this act, the directors elected by the General Court of the company, are alone to be the directors of the company.

On the 9th of August, the Court of Directors met, and elected seven of their number to be members of the first council for India. And on Thursday, the 2nd of September, that court assembled for the last time, in its old capacity of a governing as well as a commercial body. Its final act was the recognition of the faithful services of its servants and dependents. It had previously voted pensions to Lord Canning, and some of the other leading officials, for their services in suppressing the mutiny; and medals for the officers and troops. The Queen raised the governor-general in the peerage to the rank of earl, and conferred a baronetcy on Sir John Lawrence. The House of Commons had settled an annuity of £1,000 per annum upon Sir Henry Marsham Havelock, the eldest son of the gallant general.

On the 1st of November, Queen Victoria was proclaimed at Calcutta, and in all the principal towns of her Indian empire, as actual and supreme ruler in that vast territory. A few months after, the mutiny was considered to be finally suppressed; and on the 1st of May, 1859, by order of the Queen, there was a public thanksgiving in her British dominions for that result. From that time there have been no further signs of disaffection in the Indian army; and the Indian people generally have manifested great satisfaction at the transfer of authority from the East India Company to the Queen. The measures of the government have not been always of "the wisest and best" description; but there is no doubt that much has been done to improve the country, and meliorate the condition of the natives. Let us hope that course will still be pursued; and that the people of India, happy and comfortable in themselves, may continue to be faithful subjects of the Queen; and mutually, with those of her European and American dominions, contribute to the general welfare and prosperity of the vast British empire.

CHAPTER CXVIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1859, 1860.

THE people of England, in the first months of 1859, were agitated with the contests between the Whigs and Conservatives. Ere the year had far advanced, the Peelites, moderate Liberals, and Radicals joined the former in their opposition to the ministry of the Earl of Derby, and the four sections were recognised as the "Great Liberal Party." For a brief period attention was drawn from politics by the entrance of the Prince of Wales on his public career. His royal highness joined the army as colonel of the Guards; and his first public act was presenting colours to one of her majesty's regiments—the 100th Foot, called the Prince of Wales's Royal Canadian Regiment. The presentation took place at Shorncliffe, where a camp had been established for the purpose of training the troops, and accustoming them to field duties.—After the ceremony—in which the prince acquitted himself well, making a brief but appropriate address to the regiment—his royal highness took the train to Dover, where he embarked the same evening on a journey to Rome. He diligently inspected the works of art in that city, and also visited the pope. His royal highness remained abroad for some time. After his return, on the 17th of October, he took up his residence as a student at Frewen's Hall, Oxford, where he soon became very popular.

Before parliament opened, public attention was drawn to the inauguration of the Wellington College, erected by public subscription, a short distance from Blackwater and Sandhurst, as a memorial of the late illustrious Duke of Wellington; at which provision is made for educating young gentlemen; the children of officers of small means being received at merely nominal rates; whilst £100 per annum is charged for the board and education of those of civilians. The building, which is a very handsome one, had been opened for the reception of scholars on the 20th of January; and, on the 28th, her Majesty, the Prince Consort, the Princess Alice, and Prince Arthur rode from Windsor, the Queen having consented to preside at the inaugural ceremony. There was a large attendance of the nobility and gentry, including the Earl of Derby, the president of the college, and most of his colleagues; and her majesty took great interest in all the proceedings.—The ceremony over, the royal party returned to Windsor.

The agitation for reform was continued during the month of January; and at Bradford, on the 17th, Mr. John Bright entered fully into the details of the bill he then intended to bring forward, in compliance with the resolution passed at the meeting in London on the 5th of November. It comprised an extension of the franchise to all rated householders; with a disfranchisement of boroughs, and a re-distribution of seats extending to nearly every county in England, and to many in Scotland. The measure, however, was never submitted to parliament.—That assembly met on the 3rd of February, and was opened by the Queen in person. It was known that the government meant to bring forward a Reform Bill, and its introduction was anxiously looked forward to.—On the 28th of February, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—after an eloquent and appropriate speech, which a political opponent describes as "worthy of an occasion so remarkable"—detailed the outlines of the government measure. It proposed—

To extend the suffrage to all persons who held property in the funds, the Bank, or East India stock, producing £10 per annum; to those who had invested £60 in a savings-bank; to the recipients of pensions in the naval, military, and civil services, of the amount of £10 per annum, and upwards; to lodgers, or persons occupying parts of houses for any purposes, who paid £20 per annum rent; to graduates of the universities; to clergymen of the established church, and ministers of the dissenting persuasions; to the members of the legal and medical professions; and to schoolmasters of the higher class. To reduce the county franchise for householders to £10, the same as in boroughs; to prevent those who were freeholders for counties and householders in boroughs, from voting for the county; to take one member from a number of the smallest boroughs then returning two; and to dispose of the seats thus obtained by giving four members to West Yorkshire, two to South Lancashire, and one each to Hartlepool, Birkenhead, West Bromwich, Wednesbury, Burnley, Staleybridge, Croydon, and Gravesend.

The introduction of this measure was opposed very warmly by Lord John Russell, Mr. Bright, Mr. Baxter, and other leading reformers of the House. But leave was given to bring in the bill, and the second reading was fixed for the 21st of March.—On the 1st of that month, Mr. Walpole and Mr. Henley announced their withdrawal from the cabinet, as they could not agree to several provisions of the government Reform Bill; and on the 21st, when the motion for the second reading was before the House, Lord John Russell moved the following amendment:—

"That this House is of opinion that it is neither just nor politic to interfere in the manner proposed by this bill with the freehold franchise as hitherto exercised in counties both in England and Wales; and that no re-adjustment of the franchise will satisfy this House and the country, which does not provide for a greater extension of the suffrage in cities and boroughs than is contemplated in the present measure."

The debate on this amendment was six times adjourned. On the seventh night, the 31st of March, the division took place, and Lord John Russell's resolution was carried by 330 votes, only 291 members supporting the ministry. The next day the two Houses adjourned to the 4th of April, when Lord Derby informed the Lords, and Mr. Disraeli the Commons, that having obtained the sanction of her majesty, they should not resign their seats, but dissolve parliament. Only measures essentially necessary were, therefore, proceeded with; and, on the 19th of April, the legislature was prorogued by commission, her majesty's intention to dissolve parliament, "with a view to enable the people to express, in the mode prescribed by the constitution, their opinion on the state of public affairs," being announced at the end of the speech, which the Lord Chancellor read.

On the 23rd of April the writs for the new parliament were issued; the 31st of May being the day fixed for its meeting. Both parties used all their influence in the elections, which resulted in the return of more than 300 Conservative members; the Whigs, Peelites, moderate Liberals, and Radicals being singly far beneath the ministerialists in number; but superior when united. On the 31st of May, when the two Houses met, the Right Hon. John Evelyn Denison was re-elected Speaker; and the swearing-in of members occupied that and five following days. There were three Jews returned: Baron Lionel de Rothschild, for London; Baron Meyer de Rothschild, for Hythe; and Mr. Alderman Salomons, for Greenwich: by resolution, they were permitted to take the oaths and their seats on the 6th of June.

On the 2nd of June, about 300 members of the "Great Liberal Party" met at Willis's Rooms, the leaders of all sections being present. Lords John Russell and Palmerston were the principal speakers; and the result of the meeting was a resolution, that all the Whig and Liberal members—differing as they did on many important questions—should unite in opposing the ministry, upon the understanding, that, in the succeeding administration, there was to be a fair and equitable distribution of places amongst the different sections.

On the 7th of June the Queen opened the session; and in the Lords the address was carried; but, in the Commons, in pursuance of the resolution adopted at Willis's Rooms, after the address had been moved and seconded, the Marquis of Hartington (eldest son of the Duke of Devonshire, who had been returned for North Lancashire) moved an amendment, declaring that the confidence of the House in her ministers was essential to the discharge of her majesty's high functions; and that the present ministers did not possess that confidence.—The debate extended into the early hours of the next morning; excellent and telling speeches being delivered on each side. The result was the triumph of what Lord Derby termed the "unnatural combination" of parties—313 members voting for, and 310 against the amendment.—In consequence of this vote the ministers came to the determination to resign; and the Queen entrusted the reconstruction of the cabinet to Lord Palmerston, whose administration was composed of the following members:—

In the Cabinet.

First Lord of the Treasury	Lord Palmerston.
Lord President of the Council	Earl Granville.
Lord High Chancellor	Lord Campbell.
Lord Privy Seal	The Duke of Argyll.
Chancellor of the Exchequer	W. E. Gladstone.
Secretaries of State — Home Department	Sir G. C. Lewis, Bart.
Foreign Department	Lord John Russell.
Colonial Department	The Duke of Newcastle.
War Department	Sidney Herbert.
India	Sir Charles Wood, Bart.
First Lord of the Admiralty	The Duke of Somerset.
Chief Secretary of State for Ireland	Edward Cardwell.
Postmaster-General	The Earl of Elgin.
President of the Board of Trade	Thomas Milner Gibson.
President of the Poor-Law Board	Charles Villiers.
Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster	Sir George Grey, Bart.

Not in the Cabinet.

Vice-President of the Education Committee of the Privy Council	Robert Lowe.
Lords of the Treasury	Sir William Dunbar, Bart.; John Bagwell, and E. Knatchbull Hugessen.
Lords of the Admiralty	Vice-Admiral Sir R. S. Dundas, Rear-Admiral Hon. F. T. Pelham, Captain Charles Eden, and S. Whitbread.
Attorney-General	Sir Richard Bethell.
Solicitor-General	Sir Henry Keating.

Scotland.

Lord Advocate	James Moncrieff.

Ireland.

Lord-Lieutenant	The Earl of Carlisle.
Lord High Chancellor	Maziere Brady.
Attorney-General	J. D. Fitzgerald.
Solicitor-General	Richard Deasy.

When these ministerial arrangements were announced, there was much murmuring amongst the extreme Liberals, the most numerous division in the House, next to the Conservatives and Whigs; all the places in the executive, the duties of which involved the real powers of government, being given to Whigs and Peelites. The cabinet had never before been so numerous. The number of members was extended to sixteen, to admit the most influential supporters of Lords Palmerston and John Russell, the leading Peelites, and the only two members of the extreme party on whom seats in that council were conferred—Mr. Milner Gibson and Mr. Charles Villiers. If the resolution adopted at Willis's Rooms had been fairly carried out, the organs of that party contended, they ought to have had more seats than were given to the Peelites; and so, no doubt, they ought, if the number of members belonging to each in the House was considered.—However, there appeared to be no redress but by ceasing to support the Whigs, and thus readmitting the Conservatives to power. So the Radicals submitted, but with an ill grace; and Lord Palmerston was frequently assailed in the columns of the Radical papers as severely as ever Earl Derby was.—Mr. Cobden was in America when the elections took place, but was returned for Rochdale in his absence. He arrived at Liverpool on the 29th of June; and Lord Palmerston immediately offered him a seat in the cabinet, as President of the Board of Trade. He, however, declined to take office, on account of fundamental differences between his lordship and himself with respect to the measures necessary to be adopted for the defence of the country.

The session passed over quietly, being prolonged till the 13th of August. Mr. Gladstone brought in his budget on the 18th of July. The revenue for the financial year had been estimated at £63,900,000: it produced £65,477,000. The expenditure had been £64,663,000; leaving a surplus of £814,000. The revenue for 1859-'60 was estimated at £64,340,000; but the expenditure, from repayment of exchequer bonds and other causes, was raised to £69,207,000; leaving £4,867,000 to be provided for. This was done by adding 4*d.* in the pound to the income-tax.

During the two sessions there were few acts of general interest passed — except one, in the first session, repealing acts for the observance of the 30th of January, the 28th of May, and the 5th of November—the anniversaries of the martyrdom of Charles I., the return of Charles II., and the Gunpowder Treason; and for excluding the proper services for those days from future editions of the Prayer-book: and two in the second session, authorising the government to establish a reserve volunteer force of seamen, to be called the Royal Naval Volunteers, the number not to exceed 30,000 men; and a reserve military force of 20,000 men. The former were to be raised by voluntary entry among seafaring men; the latter enrolled from men who had previously served either in her majesty's other land forces, or in the Indian army. These forces were to be trained a few days in the course of each year, and called out for actual service in case of invasion, or if the civil power required their aid.—The volunteer movement, which has been before mentioned, received, during the second session, great encouragement from the government. It was very popular; young men of all classes being eager to enrol themselves.—Lord Palmerston had, originally, discouraged the movement; but now the government took it up; and, on the 1st of July, the Earl de Grey and Ripon, then Under-Secretary of War, announced that volunteer corps would be enrolled throughout the island; and that government would issue twenty-five stand of arms to every 100 men, the uniforms and other accoutrements being found by themselves. On the 13th of July, a circular was issued from the War Office to the lords-lieutenants of the different counties, authorising the formation of rifle and artillery volunteer corps; and, soon after, the Enfield rifles were issued to every man.

Whilst the parliament was sitting in England, a series of important state trials had taken place in Ireland. The Ribbon-men—a society sworn in secret to undermine English authority and the Protestant religion, and to re-establish the Roman Catholic supremacy—had long existed in that country. Of late years its operations had chiefly been directed against landlords and their agents, or, "middle-men;" and, unfortunately, the harsh and oppressive measures of many of the latter—who probably supposed they were only doing their duty to their employers—frequently afforded too much cause for irritation and ill-will on the part of the tenants. In 1858, a secret society, called "The Phœnix," had sprung out of Ribbonism; and so alarming was its progress, that, on the 3rd of December, the lord-lieutenant issued a proclamation, declaring "all societies or bodies of persons associated under the pretended obligation of oaths unlawfully administered," to be illegal; that all persons taking or administering such oaths were guilty of felony; and offering rewards of £100 for the apprehension of any person who should have administered the oath; and of £50 for such information as would lead to the conviction of any members of secret societies. A great many arrests were made before the year closed, at Belfast, Bandon, Kenmare, Killarney, Skibbereen, Cork, and other places; and incendiary fires and other outrages, which were, unhappily, frequent, were laid to the charge of the members of the Phœnix secret society; who practised secret drilling with pikes, and sent numerous threatening letters to the Protestant clergymen and the scripture-readers. At that time the disaffected looked for aid from America; and they were told, by their leaders, that before Christmas the Americans would arrive, who would be joined by the French, and Ireland would become an independent republic. Neither Frenchmen nor Americans showed themselves; and in March the trials of those arrested took place. The opposition papers had denied the existence of any conspiracy, attributing the arrests to the falsehood and treachery of the informers. The prisoners were ably defended. In Dublin the jury could not agree, and had to be discharged without giving a verdict: at Cork and Belfast there were several convictions, and the offenders were sentenced to various terms of penal servitude. Apart from these transactions, Ireland was flourishing and tranquil under the government of the Earl of Eglinton, who was generally popular, and his policy as generally approved.

During the year, the Princess Royal visited England twice—in May, and early in November, to be present at the Prince of Wales's birthday, on the 9th, when his royal highness completed his eighteenth year; and was eligible, if the throne became vacant, to take his seat as king of the realm. The princess did not return to Prussia till after her own birthday, on the 21st of November. The King of the Belgians, and the Grand Duke Constantine, of Russia, also visited England during the summer. The Queen, Prince Consort, and the younger members of the royal family, visited the Channel Islands in August, and spent part of the autumn at Balmoral. On her return, her majesty came to England by way of Glasgow, where, on the 14th of October, amidst great rejoicings, she formally opened the works for supplying that city with water from Loch Katrine.

On the 18th of July, a dreadful storm passed over the greater part of England. Several persons were killed by lightning, and much property destroyed, in and near London, in Yorkshire and Lancashire, and in many other parts of the kingdom. There were also several serious accidents during the year; but the most important domestic occurrence arose out of the differences between the employers and the employed. On the 6th of August, the workmen of Messrs. Trollope and Sons, one of the largest building firms in the metropolis, struck work, the masters having refused to shorten the hours of labour from ten in the day to nine, without any reduction in the rates of wages. As the men were liberally supported by those in the employ of other builders, the masters, after a short time had elapsed, also combined, and resorted to what was termed a "lock-out," closing all their establishments; the consequence being a general suspension of building operations; and the progress of many works was arrested. The masters also resolved that every man should, before he was allowed to resume work, sign a document, pledging him not to connect himself with any society interfering with the hours or wages of labour. The strike continued till the end of October, causing great distress to the families of the workmen; for although the trades' unions throughout the kingdom granted allowances to them, those allowances fell far short of their regular wages. At length, many of the employers agreeing to pay by the hour, and not by the day, leaving the men to work as many hours as they pleased, the latter gradually returned to their work; and before November was far advanced the strike entirely ceased. The masters had, previously, generally abandoned "the document."—These events do not appear to have affected the material prosperity of the country. In the twelve months, ending December 31st, 1859, the revenue amounted to £66,070,469 9s. 8d.; and the value of exports was £130,411,529.

Early in the year, the mutiny in India was entirely quelled; and on the 1st of May there was a public thanksgiving for the success of our arms in that quarter. —In our other colonies, in America, the West Indies, Australia, Tasmania, New Zealand, and in Africa, peace prevailed; and all were progressing in prosperity.—British Columbia—which, by arrangements entered into with the directors of the Hudson's Bay Company by Sir E. B. Lytton, when colonial minister, included a large portion of the region in North-west America, belonging to that body—was becoming almost as famous for its gold-fields as California or Australia.—With foreign countries we maintained peace; though, at one time, it was feared that we should be embroiled with the United States of America. But three of the European powers were involved in a war that must be briefly noticed, on account of the results, which affected several of the ruling dynasties. The powers involved in hostilities were Austria, France, and Sardinia—the future of Italy being the cause of battle.—Before the war broke out, the peninsula of Italy was divided into the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, which, by the treaty of Vienna, of 1815, belonged to Austria; the kingdoms of Sardinia and of Naples, or the Two Sicilies; the Papal States; the Grand Duchy of Tuscany; and the Duchies of Modena and Parma. The island of Sardinia was attached to the kingdom of Sardinia; and that of Sicily to the kingdom of Naples.—The presence of the Austrian power in Italy had long been greatly obnoxious to many Italians. By treaties concluded by that power with the King of Naples and the Grand Duke of Tuscany, in 1815, and with the Dukes of Parma and Modena in 1847, those sovereigns had engaged not to admit any changes in their governments, "irreconcilable with monarchical institutions, or with the principles adopted by his imperial and royal majesty in the internal government of his Italian provinces." The Italian sovereigns faithfully observed these treaties; and the Austrian ascendancy led to the employment of officials from the empire, or in immediate connection with the government of Vienna, much to the disgust of the Italian nobles. As liberal principles prevailed in the rest of Europe, they extended to Italy. In 1820, an attempt was made to constitute the arbitrary government of Naples more in accordance with the opinions of the day. A liberal constitution was proclaimed; but, in 1821, an Austrian army entered Naples, and the despotism was restored.—In that year a revolutionary movement took place in Piedmont—the object, the establishment of a constitutional government. Again Austria interfered, and her army assisted the royal troops to put down the insurrection.—After the expulsion of the Bourbons from France, in 1830, insurrections broke out in Modena, Parma, and the Papal States. These were also put down by the Austrian troops: as were disturbances in Parma in 1846. In that year and 1847 secret societies were organised throughout Italy, with a view to expel the Austrians, and to compel the despotic sovereigns to give liberty to their people. In 1848, Charles Albert, King of Sardinia, resolved, in the words of a royal proclamation, issued on the 8th of February in that year, "to adopt the bases of a fundamental statute for the establishment in the state of a complete system of representative government." He did introduce the representative system; and when the revolutionary spirit which so effectually manifested itself that year in France, broke out in Lombardy, Charles Albert assisted the insurgents, and proclaimed his intention "to support them in their struggle for freedom by the expulsion of the Austrians from Italy." He took the command of the united armies of Lombardy and Piedmont; and for a time victory followed his steps, and crowned all his exertions. The Venetians also revolted; and for a time the Austrian power in Italy seemed to be threatened with immediate extinction. The courage of the Austrian troops, and the admirable tactics of their commander, Field-Marshal Radetsky, however, changed the aspect of affairs. After several minor struggles, in which he had ill-success, Charles Albert was finally defeated at Novara on the 23rd of March, 1849. On the 25th, he resigned in favour of his son, Victor Emmanuel, the Duke of Savoy, who was proclaimed King of Sardinia the next day. He soon after concluded an armistice, and, on the 6th of August, signed a treaty of peace with Austria, who re-established herself in all her Italian dominions. Insurrections in Tuscany, Parma, and the Two Sicilies, had also been suppressed; and to Rome—where the pope had been expelled, and taken refuge at Mola di Gaëta, the government being placed in the hands of a triumvirate (Mazzini, Armellini, and Saffi; whilst Garibaldi commanded the troops)—a French force was sent, under the command of General Oudinot, which besieged and took the city, and reinstated the pope. Garibaldi and the triumvirate sought safety in flight.

Soon after Pope Pius IX. returned to Rome—which was not till the 13th of April, 1850—a firm alliance was formed between Austria and the pontiff; and there is little doubt that Victor Emmanuel, from that time, contemplated renewing his efforts to expel the Austrians, even if he did not anticipate the result that has followed—so favourable to himself.—Travellers tell us that the Austrian government, though despotic, was not oppressive in Lombardy and Venetia; but it was distasteful to the people, especially to the nobles, who felt themselves expelled from their natural position by the foreigner.—In Naples, on the contrary, the government was tyrannous, in every sense of the word. No symptom of opposition was permitted; and those who, by word or deed, evinced the slightest disapprobation of the acts of the government, were immediately thrown into prison; those places of confinement being the worst in Europe, and the treatment of the inmates the most cruel. This treatment of political offenders in Naples had been carried on for years. In 1851, Mr. Gladstone had detailed the horrors of the prisons there, after personal inspection, in a pamphlet which was widely circulated in England. The system practised there, the right honourable gentleman described as "an outrage upon religion, upon civilisation, upon humanity, and upon decency." The exposure of his barbarity, and the remonstrances of England and France, did not cause Ferdinand II. to discontinue it; but at the commencement of 1859, finding himself to be near death, he ordered a number of the prisoners to be released, and sent to America as exiles. They compelled the American captain to land them in England, where they were cordially received. A committee was formed, with Lord Shaftesbury at its head, by which a subscription was raised; and they were kept in a comfortable position while they remained in this country. But their aim was, as they declared, in reply to an address presented to them at a public meeting, held at St. Martin's Hall, London, on the 15th of April, "to free Italy from all internal and foreign despotism;" and they ultimately went to Sardinia.

The Sardinian king joined the western powers in the war against Russia in 1854, no doubt to gain their support in his designs against Austria; and after the peace, the hostile movement towards that power was kept up throughout the Peninsula. It was notorious that this movement was encouraged in Sardinia, where troops were gathering—many of them "volunteers" from the Austrian provinces; and Austria, early in 1858, sent reinforcements to Lombardy, concentrating strong bodies near the Sardinian frontier. England, which, when Lord Palmerston was the foreign minister, in 1848, had strongly advised Austria to give up her Italian dominions, if suitable terms were offered—now, when Lord Malmesbury presided at the Foreign Office, advised her as strongly to peace. Probably, through her agents in Italy, Austria knew more of what was going on in Sardinia and France, than had come to the knowledge of the English government; for although she abstained from all overt acts of hostility, she continued to strengthen the Lombardo-Venetian army, and to advance her military positions there to the Sardinian frontiers.

Thus things went on during 1858. In the autumn of that year, when the French court was at Plombières, Count Cavour, the principal minister and adviser of Victor Emmanuel, arrived there, and had repeated interviews with Napoleon. Everything that subsequently occurred tends to strengthen a belief in the statement, which has been confidently made, that at these interviews the future of Italy was discussed; and it was resolved to cause a quarrel between Austria and Sardinia, and thus lead to a war. At all events, on the 1st of January, 1859, when Napoleon, as usual, received the foreign ambassadors, he addressed himself to M. Hubner, the Austrian minister, and said, "I regret that our relations with your government are not so good as they were; but I request you to tell the emperor that my personal feelings for him have not changed." These few words produced a startling effect upon the public mind of Europe, which had not subsided when the Piedmontese chambers were opened, on the 10th of January; and the king, in his speech, after saying,

"the horizon in which the new year rises is not perfectly serene," and making some remarks on the position of the country, added—"This condition is not free from danger, since, while we respect treaties, we are not insensible to the cry of grief which reaches us from so many parts of Italy."—On the 30th of that month, Prince Napoleon, the cousin of the emperor, in his thirty-seventh year, was married to the Princess Clotilde, the daughter of Victor Emmanuel, not yet sixteen: and as it was reported that the marriage was quite against the wishes of the youthful bride, the belief that the king had sacrificed his daughter to forward his own ambitious views, filled Europe with disgust.

January, February, and March were spent in negotiations by all the European powers, the object being to preserve peace; and Earl Cowley, in February, went to Vienna on a special mission, with the same view. All efforts, however, failed to remove the cause of mutual complaint between the Austrian and Sardinian governments, each charging the other with being the cause of producing the unpleasant state of affairs; which, as the spring of 1859 passed away, was rapidly coming to a crisis. In March, Russia proposed that the questions in dispute between Austria and Sardinia should be referred to a congress of all the powers, to be held at some neutral town. The proposal was published in the Moniteur of the 22nd of March, and was favourably received. But there was a tedious negotiation as to the preliminaries to be agreed to before the congress assembled. It had not come to a close, when Austria—which power, up to that time, whatever the agents and friends of Sardinia may urge, had been acting strictly upon the defensive—put herself decidedly in the wrong. On the 19th of April she addressed an ultimatum to the court of Turin, requiring Sardinia immediately to disarm her own troops, and to disband the Italian volunteers. Three days were allowed for the answer to be returned—a refusal to be followed by a declaration of war. As might be expected, Sardinia did refuse; and whilst England, Prussia, and Russia protested, diplomatically, against the conduct of Austria, the Emperor of France prepared to join his army to that of Piedmont; one division being despatched to Italy by way of Genoa, a second crossing the Alps. The Austrian army, commanded by General Gyulai, received strong additional reinforcements; and, on the 29th of April, it crossed the Ticino.—On the 3rd of May, the Emperor of France announced his intention to join the army; on the 10th he left Paris; embarked at Marseilles on the 11th; landed at Genoa on the 12th; and, on the 14th, established his head-quarters at Alessandria. A short campaign followed, in which the Austrians were defeated at Montebello, on the 10th of May, by the French and Piedmontese; at Varese, on the 24th, by a body of 5,000 Italian volunteers from the Austrian dominions, which Garibaldi had quietly raised and trained; and this force, on the 27th, occupied Como, from which the Austrians were compelled to retreat in the direction of Milan. Then the inhabitants of the Valtellina rose in insurrection; the leaders fixed their head-quarters at Sandrio, the capital, and thus closed to the Austrians the great military road to Milan, over the Stelvio Pass, and secured the northern flank of Lombardy against the return of the army from Piedmont.

The allied armies of France and Piedmont, and that of Austria, made various movements between the 21st and 30th of May: on the latter day the Emperor of Austria arrived at the head-quarters of his army; and on the next day, had the great mortification of hearing that his troops were defeated at Palestro, which town the Piedmontese had occupied, and the Austrians endeavoured to retake. On the 4th of June, the latter suffered a still more serious defeat at Magenta; the Emperor of France commanding in person the Imperial Guards and the Zouaves; and, on the 8th, Napoleon and Victor Emmanuel made a triumphant entry into Milan, the capital of Lombardy. On the same day Garibaldi entered Bergamo. On the 12th, Bologna, in the Papal States, was abandoned by the Austrian troops; Ancona and Ferrara, part of the pope's territories, were declared free, and the Duke of Modena was also compelled to leave his capital, and follow the Grand Duke of Tuscany and the Duke of Parma, who had been expelled from their territories, after bloodless revolutions, about a month before. Victor Emmanuel was declared dictator in the free Papal States. The Austrian army in Piedmont was obliged to retreat, "abandoning successively the lines of the Adda, the Oglio, and the Chiese," where it had previously been stationed; and, on the 22nd of June, it crossed the Mincio. The Emperor of Austria now assumed the command-in-chief, fixing his head-quarters at Villafranca. On the 20th of June he had 170,000 men concentrated; and on the 23rd they recrossed the Mincio, again occupying the positions they had evacuated. On the 24th of June the battle of Solferino was fought, about 150,000 men of the allied armies being opposed to the Austrians. Both emperors were present, and partly directed the operations. The Austrians were thoroughly and completely defeated; retiring in the midst of a severe storm of thunder, hail, and wind, that continued nearly an hour. Their loss in killed and wounded must have been great: the allies, who had about 12,000 men put hors de combat, took 7,000 prisoners, and thirty pieces of cannon.

This was the last of the fighting. On the 8th of July an armistice was concluded; and on the 11th, the two emperors met at Villafranca, and agreed to preliminaries of peace. By these preliminaries—with the exception of Lombardy, which Austria ceded to France, and France to Sardinia—Italy was to have remained in the same divisions as existed before the war, the various states to form an Italian confederation, under the honorary presidency of the pope: Venetia, though remaining under the sovereignty of Austria, was to be one of the confederated states. After a short interval, the plenipotentiaries of France and Austria met at Zurich where a treaty was concluded upon the bases of the preliminaries. To facilitate the return of the exiled sovereigns, and the establishment of the confederation, France proposed that a conference of the great powers should be held, to consider and promote the future settlement of Italy. But the Italians had taken their affairs into their own hands. They were determined that the treaty of Zurich should not be carried out, and it remained a dead letter. The duchies refused to receive their old sovereigns; the popular voice there—as it did in the Roman Legations—declared in favour of annexation to Sardinia; and the French troops still remained at Rome, to protect the pope, for whom there was not the slightest prospect of becoming the head of an Italian confederacy. Victor Emmanuel, at the close of the year, found himself King of Lombardy, as well as of Sardinia, and dictator of no unimportant part of the Papal Legations. In 1860, his dominions were still further extended.

As in a proclamation, issued when he entered Italy, Napoleon had promised to free the peninsula "from the Alps to the Adriatic," the terms granted to Austria excited great astonishment. It was conjectured that the unpopularity of the war in France, and the arming of the German confederation, which threatened to invade the empire—whilst the press of England almost unanimously expressed grave doubts as to the sincerity of the professions of the emperor, that he was only in Italy to combat the enemies of his ally, and to preserve order—led him to think that it was not safe to prolong the contest; that his wisest course was to seize the moment of victory for the conclusion of peace; and that, by making Italy a united confederation, he might contend he was setting it free. There is reason to believe, however, that if these circumstances had some weight—and no doubt they had—others had as much or more. The quarrel with Austria was planned, as already stated, [illegible] the Plombières conferences of 1858: and if that [illegible]er had remained strictly on the defensive, there is [illegible] doubt, that a pretence would have been found to [illegible] peace. But the "unification," as it is termed, [illegible] not the object contemplated. On the con[illegible] Victor Emmanuel was to have been left to [illegible]y he could in Austrian Italy, it was intended to form Central Italy into a kingdom for Prince Napoleon; and Southern Italy into another for Lucien Murat. The prince, however, was unpopular both with the army and the Italians; so was Murat. The emperor found that there was not the slightest likelihood of inducing the people of Italy voluntarily to acknowledge either; and the emperor shrunk from engaging in a war to win crowns for them. On the other hand, he was averse to the creating of such a formidable power as a united Italy must be, under a clever, energetic, and determined ruler. Therefore he resolved that Victor Emmanuel should acquire only Lombardy and the Legations; leaving the rest of the peninsula under its ancient sovereigns—strengthening those states by forming a confederation, and thus enabling them to resist the aggressions of Sardinia, should Victor Emmanuel attempt to carry out the scheme of uniting Italy from the Alps to the Adriatic. These, we are told, were the motives that led to the preliminaries of Villafranca and the treaty of Zurich; and there is a great probability that such was the fact.

The year 1860 opened favourably for England. Except differences which had again arisen with the Chinese, owing to the treachery of the latter, peace prevailed at home and abroad; and the trade and commerce of the country were steadily increasing. Parliament met on the 24th of January, and was opened by the Queen in person. The principal topic in the speech was Italy. Her majesty intimated that she had been invited to send a plenipotentiary to join in a conference of the representatives of the great powers of Europe on the affairs of Italy. She expressed her willingness to join the congress, where her plenipotentiary "should steadfastly maintain the principle, that no external force should be employed to impose upon the people of Italy any particular government or constitution."—Her majesty also stated, that she was "in communication with the Emperor of the French, with a view to extend the commercial intercourse between the two countries, and thus to draw still closer the bonds of friendly alliance between them."—The breach with China was alluded to; and her majesty announced, that she was, "in concert and co-operation with the Emperor of the French," preparing "an expedition, intended to obtain redress" for injuries committed; "and a fulfilment of the stipulations of the treaty of Tien-tsin."

It was a long and a busy session, and there were animated debates on various questions.—The address was carried, in both Houses, without amendment—one moved by Earl Grey, in the House of Lords, being negatived.—The financial statement was made on the 10th of February; on which day Lord John Russell laid on the table a treaty of commerce with France, which had been just concluded, Mr. Cobden having been the principal negotiator on the part of England, and M. Chevalier on that of France. Mr. Gladstone's budget was very voluminous. He had a deficiency to provide for; and whilst he proposed to augment the income-tax to 10*d*. in the pound upon incomes above £150 per annum, and to 5*d*. upon those between £100 and £150, his budget contained proposals to reduce or repeal a number of stamp, custom, and excise duties—the abolition of the paper duty being one of his measures. He succeeded in carrying all his proposals through the Commons after warm debates. The reduction or repeal of other custom duties was proposed chiefly with a view of carrying out the treaty with France; and on the 20th of February, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the House should go into committee on the Customs Act, Mr. Disraeli moved an amendment, to the effect, that the House did not think fit to go into committee, with a view to reduce or repeal the duties referred to in the treaty of commerce concluded with France, till the engagements of that treaty had been considered and assented to.—This amendment was negatived by 293 to 230 votes; and the alterations in the customs duties were carried.—There was a more formidable contest when the abolition of the paper duties came before the House; the opposition contending, that taxes which pressed more immediately on the people—such as the duties on tea, sugar, and malt—should be first mitigated. The third reading of the bill for repealing the paper duty was carried in the Commons, on the 8th of May, by 219 ayes to 209 noes.—On the 21st, when the motion for the second reading of the bill was before the House of Lords, Lord Monteagle—generally a supporter of the ministers—moved, as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day six months. This amendment was carried, the votes being 193 for, to 104 against it; and the bill was lost. Many of the ministerial members in the House of Commons contended, that the Lords—who had long since ceased to attempt to amend or alter a money bill—had exceeded their privileges by rejecting a financial measure that had received the sanction of the Commons. A committee was appointed to inquire into the subject, which reported in favour of the peers. Lord Palmerston, however, on the 5th of July, introduced three resolutions, the purport of which was to assert, that the House of Commons had "in its own hands the power to remit and impose taxes;" after two nights' debate, these resolutions were adopted.—The war with China—for which £4,000,000 were required; and the defence of the country, by erecting fortifications in the Medway, at Spithead, and other places offering facilities for the attack of the enemy, at an expense of £2,000,000 for executing the first portion of the plans—rendered two supplementary budgets necessary.

The debates on the financial measures, and on the French treaty, were long and animated, and, at times, angry. The treaty was approved of by good majorities in both Houses; and from the ministerial side, Mr. Cobden was highly complimented for the ability he had displayed in treating with the French statesmen, and heartily congratulated on the success of his efforts. On the other hand, he was as severely censured by many for having agreed to the admission of French produce and manufactures into England free of duty, while the French government was left at liberty to impose duties upon English goods imported into France, to the amount of 25 per cent. There does not appear to be either fairness or equity in that arrangement; and as the ribbon-weavers of Coventry, and the silk-weavers in all parts of the country, found themselves seriously affected by the competition of the Lyons manufacturers, the treaty was very unpopular in Coventry and the silk districts. Generally, however, the new commercial arrangement worked well for both countries; but France, of the two, has been most benefited by it.—The question of the ballot and that of church-rates also caused exciting debates. The Commons refused to sanction the former by a large majority—254 to 147. They passed a bill to abolish church-rates; which was rejected by the Lords. On the 1st of March, Lord John Russell brought in a bill to amend the representation of the people in England and Wales. Mr. Cardwell introduced a similar measure for Ireland; and the Lord Advocate one for Scotland. All three were received very coolly by the supporters of the ministry; and so many notices were given of amendments to be moved in committee, that, after the English bill had been read a second time, the three were withdrawn; Lord John Russell saying it would be impossible to get through with them during the session.—On the 28th of August parliament was prorogued.

Numerous acts, public and private, were passed during the session; but only a few require notice in this epitome.—One act was important to the success of the volunteer movement; it prevents members of benefit societies from forfeiting their interest therein by becoming enrolled in volunteer corps. The financial scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer included an act for allowing confectioners, and the keepers of refreshment-houses, to take out licences for the sale of wines or malt liquors—a measure which has been productive of much benefit to those who are so frequently compelled to resort to such places for necessary refreshment when engaged in business or in pursuit of pleasure. The Jewish question was at last settled by passing a bill to allow any member of the House of Commons, professing the Jewish religion, in taking and subscribing the usual oath, to omit the words, "upon the true faith of a Christian."—The condition of women, young persons, and children employed on bleaching-grounds, and in dyeing-works, had been long complained of, on account of the hours they were employed, and other hardships attendant upon their position. An act of the session placed them under the regulations of the Factory Acts. An act "for the regulation and inspection of mines," forbids the employment in mines of boys under the age of ten years; and from ten to twelve they are not to be employed without a certificate from a schoolmaster that they are able to read and write.—Another act inflicted fines upon persons adulterating or selling adulterated food or drinks.

Of home events during the year, the most remarkable was the rapid progress of the volunteer movement, which received every encouragement from all classes, the Queen setting the example; as her majesty generally does in everything tending to the benefit or the improvement of the people over whom she so beneficently rules.—On the 7th of March, her majesty held a levée especially for officers of the volunteer rifle corps; when no fewer than 2,500 gentlemen were introduced, and had the honour of kissing the Queen's hand.—In the evening there was a "volunteer banquet" at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, over which the Duke of Cambridge presided; and a "volunteer ball," at a fine spacious room which the Duke of Bedford had recently erected, adjoining Covent Garden Theatre, for a flower-market, and which was called the Floral Hall. At that time about 70,000 volunteers were enrolled.—On the 23rd of June, the Queen reviewed nearly 26,000 volunteers in Hyde Park. And on her way to Balmoral with the Prince Consort, on the 7th of August, her majesty reviewed about the same number at Edinburgh. On both occasions, the way in which the amateur soldiers went through their evolutions astonished the military men who were present. The movement received no check: before the year closed, about 175,000 men were enrolled; and most of them were reported, by the military officers by whom they were regularly inspected, to be fit for effective service in time of need.

During the year two of our royal princes went abroad—the Prince of Wales to the West, Prince Alfred to Africa and the East; where Englishmen and natives were alike eager to render due homage, and pay every respectful attention to the son of England's Queen.—The Prince of Wales, travelling as Baron Renfrew, and attended by the Duke of Newcastle, Secretary of State for the Colonies, embarked at Plymouth on the 9th of July, for Canada. It had been previously announced that his royal highness was about to visit North America; and Mr. Buchanan wrote to the Queen, inviting him to Washington. To this friendly communication the Queen sent an autograph letter in reply, accepting the invitation. His royal highness arrived at Quebec on the 18th of August, and he visited most of the other towns in Canada, being everywhere received with great enthusiasm.—He spent rather more than a month in Canada, entering the United States on the 18th of September, and proceeding to Washington. The citizens under the republican rule of President Buchanan, gave his royal highness as warm a welcome as he received from the subjects of his royal mother; and he returned home, highly gratified with his excursion; landing at Plymouth on the 15th of November.

In August, the Queen and Prince Consort visited Balmoral; and in the following month went to Germany, to spend a short time with the relatives of the prince. At all the places the royal pair stopped at on their tour, whether in England or on the continent, they were most cordially welcomed.—In November the Empress of the French arrived in England. Her imperial majesty was travelling incognita; her destination being Scotland; and it is said she was travelling for the benefit of her health, which was seriously affected by the death, in the summer, of her beloved sister, the Duchess of Alba. She arrived in London on the 14th of November; at York on the evening of the 16th; and at Edinburgh at 8 P.M. on the 17th.—On the 21st, her majesty proceeded to Dalkeith, Perth, Dunkeld, Birnam, Taymouth Castle (the seat of the Marquis of Breadalbane), Crieff, Glasgow, and Stirling; leaving the latter city for Manchester on the 29th of November. The 30th was spent in that city. On the 1st of December the empress proceeded to Leamington; and on the 4th to Windsor, upon a visit to the Queen, and to the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore. From Windsor her majesty went to London; and, after a few days' residence, returned to Paris; her health being much improved.

Notwithstanding that amicable relations between the two governments of France and England existed, and that a combined force of the two nations was acting against China, the English people were strongly impressed with the idea that danger "loomed in the distance," and that the Emperor of France was not in reality the friend he seemed. Some expressions of the emperor, in one of his public speeches, after receiving an address from a departmental municipality, strengthened this impression; which was not removed, though it might be somewhat weakened, by a letter addressed, on the 25th of July, by his majesty to the Count de Persigny, his ambassador in London, disclaiming any hostile feeling towards this country. It was the apprehension of hostility—the fear of invasion—which gave an impetus to the volunteer movement, and caused the public voice to sanction the expenditure for fortifications, as well as to look with complacency upon th large sums expended upon the navy, and on gunnery experiments. Plans were adopted for fortifying Portsmouth, Plymouth, Pembroke, Portland, the mouth of the Thames, the Medway and Sheerness, Chatham and Cork.—In the navy, iron-plated ships were substituted for our old ships of oak; the first that was completed, the Warrior, being launched in 1860. It was a most magnificent vessel, and was then considered to be a "model ship." The march of improvement, however, soon cast a shade over her.—The "trials of the guns,' also, were repeatedly taking place. Just before the Crimean war, a Mr. Lancaster had invented a large cannon, which was so constructed as to throw a heavy ball further than any ordnance then existing. But it proved unsatisfactory; and since that period, Mr. Whitworth, of Manchester, and Sir William Armstrong, who was in the ordnance department, have invented cannon of a peculiar internal construction, which imparts great force to the ball—a 32-pound ball, with a charge of six pounds of powder, striking an object at the distance of nearly 10,000 yards. After repeated trials, the officers to whom the decision was left, deemed that Sir William Armstrong's guns were the best; the government then purchased his invention; and a number of cannon were manufactured under his superintendence.—The experiments have since been resumed: there are, also, other inventors in the field; and it is far from certain who produces the best gun.

In the spring a war commenced in New Zealand, between the colonists and the Maoris, as the native inhabitants are called. It arose out of a dispute relative to lands, which one chief had disposed of, whilst another claimed them. It continued, more or less actively, for many years afterwards; for although the natives could make no head against the colonists in the open field, whatever their number, yet such is the nature of the country, and they defended themselves so well in their retreats amongst the hills and ravines, that, though frequently beaten, they were not subdued.—Our other colonies continued quiet and improving; especially Australia, British Columbia, Canada, and India. The "gold-digging" still did much for the two former; and the steady industry of the Canadians met its reward. —The prosperity of the colonies, no doubt, aided in producing that of the mother country, which exported produce and manufactures, in 1860, to the amount of £135,842,817; the revenue for the same term being £71,967,494 14s. 8d.

From the East very alarming accounts were received early in the year. The Druses and the Maronite Christians of Lebanon had long been jealous of each other; their quarrels were frequent; and the European powers were often appealed to, by both, for protection; the Maronites, on account of their connection with the Roman Catholic church, chiefly looking to France; and the Druses, who maintained that their enemies were constantly scheming to expel them entirely from the Lebanon, for that reason regarded England as their friend; though the English authorities at Beyrout, Aleppo, and elsewhere, strongly censured them for their constant outrages upon their neighbours. After repeated quarrels, extending over the years 1858 and 1859, Europe was, in July, 1860, startled with reports of horrible massacres perpetrated in the Lebanon. In May, it seems, of that year, active hostilities broke out between the two tribes; and the Druses, having the advantage, burnt numerous villages, and cruelly put to death many of the inhabitants; a Turkish force, under Khoosheed Pasha, being unable or unwilling to prevent them.—In June the strife continued, the advantage still being with the Druses. Early in July, the war became extended beyond the Lebanon; and at Aleppo and Damascus the Mohammedans joined the Druses; more than 5,500 Christians being murdered, and their houses burned and plundered. The massacres "spread over the country from Sidon to Antioch, and from the sea to the Hauran." There "the Christians, previous to the 28th of May, 1860, had been numerous and prosperous; but, on the 15th of July, not an entire Christian village was to be seen." The number of persons murdered in cold blood, since the outrages commenced, was estimated at 12,000. It was also affirmed, that "163 villages, 220 churches, and seven convents were destroyed, and 200 priests butchered."—As soon as this terrific intelligence was known, a conference of England, France, and other European nations was held; and it was resolved to send commissioners from the powers, and also a military force, to Syria, to restore peace and order, and to protect the Christians. To France was left the task of sending the troops; and a French force accordingly sailed for Syria on the 4th of August; an English fleet being also despatched to the coast, to protect British subjects and property, and to afford a refuge to native fugitives. The Porte had already taken steps to avenge the murders. As soon as the events were known at Constantinople, the sultan sent Fuad Pasha, with full powers to do justice; he took a sufficient force to restore peace; and on the 20th of August, he had 111 members of the police force at Damascus, who were implicated in the massacre, shot; and fifty-six persons, also implicated, were hanged in the most public part of the city. He sent 553 others to Constantinople, to be imprisoned, and put to hard abour.—He took similar steps at Beyrout; and appears o have acted heartily with Lord Dufferin, who was sent o Syria as English commissioner, to restore order.—The French troops, which landed at Beyrout, under General Beaufort d'Hautpoul, between the 16th and the 22nd of August, joined by the Turks, marched into the desolated country—the Druses flying before them. They re-established the Christians, some of whom displayed the same spirit as their enemies, murdering the Druse fugitives when they fell-in with them; and before the year closed, the Turks had re-established regular government in the Lebanon.

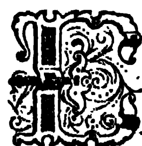
The war with China has been alluded to. It arose out of the bad faith of the government at Pekin, which refused to ratify the treaty of Tien-tsin; and when Sir Frederick Bruce, the English ambassador, and his French colleague, escorted by several armed vessels—one object being to force the ratification of the treaty—arrived at the mouth of the Peiho river on the 25th of June, 1859, on their way to Pekin, their progress was arrested by the Taku forts and obstructions in the river. An attempt to force their way was defeated, so inadequate was the fleet: two vessels, the Plover and Lee, grounded, and were taken by the Chinese, the crews having been transferred to other ships; two others were sunk; and, in the fighting, eighty-nine men were killed, 345 wounded. The two governments resolved to take immediate steps to repair this disaster, and they were supported by the public voice in both countries. The expedition was not ready, however, till 1860. It sailed early in the year, being accompanied by the Earl of Elgin and Baron Gros. The former was succeeded, as Postmaster-General, by Lord Stanley of Alderney. In the middle of August, the allies arrived off the Peiho. On the 20th, the troops (English and French) landed, and after some hard fighting, captured the Taku forts on the 21st, the Tartar troops, by whom they were garrisoned, making a most determined resistance. The allies had 400 killed and wounded. They then proceeded up the river, as far as Tien-tsin, where the treaty was signed. Leaving a competent force in that place, the ambassadors and the army marched towards Pekin. On their way they encountered the Tartar army, under Prince Sankolinsin, which was attacked, and though the men fought well, defeated. Several officers and civilians attached to the allied army were, however, taken prisoners, and barbarously used, some of them dying from the effects of their ill-treatment. The survivors were ultimately released, as the Chinese feared to retain them, the allies being then close to Pekin; having taken and sacked the summer palace of the emperor. Finding resistance useless, Prince Kung was commissioned to meet Lord Elgin and Baron Gros; and on the 24th of October, peace was concluded, the ratifications of the treaty of Tien-tsin being also exchanged. The allied troops occupied Pekin for several days; and the French having replaced, on the summit of the Pekin cathedral, a cross which had formerly surmounted it, on the 29th a Te Deum and the Domine Salvum were solemnly chanted in that building, to celebrate the triumphs of the allies.—On the 5th of November, the allied forces left Pekin: on the 26th of March, 1861, Sir F. Bruce arrived there, and took up his residence as the British minister; and though we have had some differences with China since, the peace between the two powers has not been disturbed. The English, during that time, have assisted the emperor's forces in their war with the rebels, who have, for some years, been seeking to replace the Tartar dynasty by a Chinese race; and British ships of war have frequently made captures of piratical junks in the Chinese waters.

Little interest attaches itself to European affairs, except as far as Italy is concerned. At the close of 1859, there had been rumours that France claimed some additional territory on the side of Italy, as a compensation for the increased power and strength gained by Sardinia. Before parliament assembled, these rumours took a different form. It was confidently affirmed, that the pacte de famille, concluded at Plombières in 1858 (by one article of which the union of Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clotilde was arranged), also contained another, by which, if the plans of Cavour and his master were successful, it was stipulated that Savoy and Nice were to be ceded to France. All these rumours were positively contradicted by M. Walewski (now Count Walewski), the French foreign minister; and Lord Cowley and Lord John Russell "had no information" respecting them. However, on the 10th of March, the French government formally demanded those provinces from the King of Sardinia and Lombardy; and, on the 24th, a treaty between France and Sardinia was signed at Turin, by which they were declared annexed to the empire. On the 14th of June the formal transfer took place.



In the meantime Garibaldi—who had returned to the service of Victor Emmanuel, which he left in the previous November—had joined an insurrection raised in Sicily against the Neapolitan government. Unsuccessful till he put himself at their head, the insurgents now defeated the royal troops wherever they met them. On the 17th of May, Garibaldi declared himself dictator of Sicily; on the 29th, the ministers of the King of Naples resigned their functions; on the 1st of June, an armistice was signed between the insurgents and the Neapolitan troops in Sicily, and the authority of the king was at an end. The victor employed himself in organising the government of the island; and soon after disturbances were fomented in Naples. A conflict took place in the streets of the capital, on the 15th of July, between the soldiers and the people; and on the 20th, the king, Francis II., who had succeeded to the throne in 1859, recalled his troops from Sicily, where they had peaceably remained since the armistice was signed. Garibaldi then prepared an expedition to attack the continental dominions of the king. With a few troops he landed in Calabria in August; the royalist soldiers retreated before him, or were defeated if they attempted to check his progress. On the 7th of September, the king left Naples for Gaëta; on the 8th, Garibaldi entered the city, accompanied only by his staff; and on the 9th, he proclaimed Victor Emmanuel King of Italy. That sovereign had been carrying on a war in the Papal States, where he had overrun more of the Legations; Ancona, which had been reoccupied by the pope's troops, capitulating on the 29th of September; when what remained of those troops, with their commander, General Lamoricière, surrendered prisoners of war. The Sardinian army then entered Naples, joined the troops under Garibaldi, and, on the 1st of October, the battle of the Volturno was fought, in which the royal army was defeated; and it was driven in, first to the Garigliano, and then to the walls of Gaëta. That town was defended by a body of troops, with the king at their head, and its siege was not then undertaken; but on the 2nd of November, Capua capitulated; and the votes of the people of the kingdom having been taken on the question of annexation to Sardinia, the numbers were declared, on the 3rd, to be—ayes, 1,302,064; noes, 10,312.—On the 7th, Victor Emmanuel entered Naples as King of Italy; when Garibaldi again left the army, and, on the 9th of November, retired to the island of Caprera.

In 1860, there was a strong contest for the presidency of the United States, which ended in the election of Abraham Lincoln. The slave question had long been a source of disagreement between the Southern and the Northern States; in the former negro slavery being recognised, in the latter abolished. The Southern planters considered that slave labour was necessary to their very existence; and hitherto they had been enabled to hold their own, and to protect what President Buchanan called their "peculiar institution." For some years their representatives had formed the minority of the House of Representatives, as each state returns members to that house in proportion to the number of its population: but they had generally, by their own unanimity and the divisions of the North, found the president to side with them; and they had, till a short time previous to 1860, a majority in the senate, to which each state returns two members; and, as there were fifteen slave states, they had thirty senators—outnumbering, for many years, those sent from the North and West. The number of states, however, in 1860, was thirty-four; and thus the South was in a minority of all the departments of the government. Though slavery was the cardinal point of difference between North and South, there were other causes of complaint. The North supported protection, whilst the South wanted free trade, that they might dispose of their raw produce—chiefly cotton, tobacco, sugar, and rice—for the manufactures of Europe. The public money, contributed by all, they also contended was chiefly expended for the benefit of the North; especially in the construction of navy-yards, docks, arsenals, forts, and lighthouses. After the election of Abraham Lincoln—who had the votes of all the nineteen states opposed to the South, whilst the votes of the latter were given against him—the leading men of the South determined to carry out a project which had long been talked of, and to secede from the Union. In his message to congress on the 4th of December, 1860, the president (Buchanan) deprecated the threatened secession; and recommended such an amendment of the constitution as would enable the dissatisfied states to remain in the Union. Nothing was done; and a convention which had assembled at Charleston led the way, by declaring, on the 20th of December, the secession of South Carolina. It was anticipated (as it turned out correctly) that more would follow.

CHAPTER CXIX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1861, 1862.

IGHTEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY closed, and the new year was ushered in by an unusually keen winter. In the last week of December the frost had been very severe; and the working classes—many of them impoverished by the long strikes—suffered greatly; none more so than the silk-weavers of Coventry, for whose special relief £40,000 was raised.—Subscriptions were opened in London for the distressed operatives of the metropolis; and most liberally were the appeals answered, and well did the poor, unemployed men behave. As was truly observed by one residing amongst them—"The teeming crowds of London poor, cut off from their wonted fields of labour, went through the ordeal that would have produced a revolution in almost every other capital of Europe, with a patience and forbearance which elicited a general feeling of estimation and respect." As the spring advanced, trade improved; and the men in all branches but one were pretty well employed. That one was the cotton manufacture, which was most disastrously affected by the civil war in America; but not so much in 1861 as in the following year.

The session of 1861 was opened by the Queen on Tuesday, the 5th of February. In her speech, her majesty stated that tranquillity had been re-established in Syria; that the operations of the allied forces in China had been attended with complete success; and thus alluded to the schism which had sprung up in the United States of America:—

"Serious differences have arisen among the states of the North American Union. It is impossible for me not to look with great concern upon any events which can affect the happiness and welfare of a people nearly allied to my subjects by descent, and closely connected with them by the most intimate and friendly relations. My heartfelt wish is that these differences may be susceptible of a satisfactory adjustment. The interest which I take in the people of the United States cannot but be increased by the kind and cordial reception given by them to the Prince of Wales during his recent visit to the continent of America."

The subject of reform was, this session, dropped by the government. Mr. Locke King brought forward his measure to reduce the county household franchise to £10: Mr. Baines introduced a bill to extend the franchise in towns to £6 householders; and Mr. Berkeley again moved the adoption of the mode of voting by ballot.—All these measures failed. Sudbury and St. Alban's had been, for some years, disfranchised for bribery; and the ministers introduced a bill to transfer the four seats thus vacant to Chelsea and Kensington. It was, however, proposed, that instead, one seat should be given to Birkenhead, one to South Lancashire, and two to West Yorkshire: this amendment was carried.

The budget, introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 15th of April, was much simpler than that of 1860. The right honourable gentleman estimated the expenditure for the financial year 1861-'62 at £69,900,000; the revenue at £71,823,000: leaving a surplus of £1,923,000. He proposed to reduce the income-tax 1*d*. in the pound; to repeal the paper duty; to vote the tea and sugar duties only for a year, in order that the subject of their reduction might then be again considered; to increase the duty on chicory to 8*s*. 6*d*. per cwt. till April, 1862, and after that time, to 11*s*.; and to make alterations in the excise duties payable on hawkers' and victuallers' licences. It was not customary to comprise the income-tax, the customs duties, and the excise duties in one measure; each class of imposts being brought separately before the House. But, this year, to ensure the repeal of the paper duty, Mr. Gladstone adopted the unusual course of including all the above proposals, except that relating to licences, in one bill; concluding that the Lords—who, if they insisted upon their right to reject, could not amend a money bill—would pass the complex measure, however reluctantly, rather than, by its rejection, throw all the Treasury arrangements into confusion. A resolution, moved by Mr. Newdegate, to treat each duty separately, being negatived by the large majority of 196 to 34, little opposition was made in the Commons to any of the proposals of the finance minister, except that for the repeal of the paper duty, which was carried, on the 30th of May, by the small majority of 15—296 "ayes" to 281 "noes." The Lords did not attempt to reject the bill; and thus the duty on paper was abolished. That abolition has been very beneficial generally, more particularly with regard to the penny papers; and even by this means alone has greatly increased knowledge. During the session the approaching marriage of the Princess Alice to Prince Louis of Hesse was announced; and an annuity of £6,000 per annum, with a dowry of £30,000, were voted to her royal highness.

Several important acts were passed in the session. One, introduced by Mr. Gladstone, has had a more beneficial effect upon the industrious classes than perhaps any other of his measures—the act establishing post-office savings-banks, especially intended to receive the savings of the working-men. The government security is given for these deposits, which have been made to a large amount.—An Act, "to place the Employment of Young Women, Young Persons, Youths, and Children, in Lace Factories, under the Regulations of the Factories' Act;" an Act "to Exempt the Horses used by Volunteers, when on duty, from Tolls;" and an Act "to Amend the Laws relating to Bankruptcy and Insolvency"—which abolished imprisonment for debt, except in cases of fraud, and did away with much of the cumbrous and expensive machinery of the old bankruptcy laws—were also passed.—Before the session closed, Lord John Russell was called to the upper House by the titles of Earl Russell and Viscount Amberley; and Lord Campbell, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Herbert of Lee, the Secretary at War, died; both being greatly regretted by the public. The Attorney-General, Sir R. Bethell, was elevated to the woolsack, and to the peerage, by the title of Baron Westbury; Sir William Atherton became Attorney-General, and was succeeded, as Solicitor-General, by Sir Roundell Palmer. Sir George Lewis took the war department; Sir George Grey succeeding him as Home Secretary.

Mr. Cardwell gave up the Chief Secretaryship of Ireland, and was appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; and Sir Robert Peel became Chief Secretary in his place.

Early in the year the Queen met her first domestic calamity in the death of her mother, the Duchess of Kent, who departed this life on the 16th of March. Her royal highness was in her seventy-fifth year. She was the daughter of Francis Frederic Anthony, Duke of Saxe-Coburg; and Leopold I., King of the Belgians, was her brother, and uncle to Queen Victoria. Her royal highness first married, in 1803, Enrich Charles, the Prince of Leiningen, who died on the 4th of July, 1814. On the 11th of July, 1818, she married Prince Edward, Duke of Kent and Strathern, who died on the 24th of January, 1820, when his daughter, the Princess Victoria, was only eight months old. The duchess was an excellent mother, and to her judicious training may be attributed the many domestic virtues and high social qualities that distinguish our excellent Queen. For this loss the Queen found consolation in the society of her beloved husband; and together, after parliament broke up, they visited Ireland, where, on the 24th of August, her Majesty and the Prince Consort were present at a review of the troops in the Curragh camp, by the commander-in-chief. The Prince of Wales, who had been for some months at Curragh, going through the strict routine of military duty, was, throughout the day, at the head of his regiment, the Grenadier Guards. It was estimated that there were not fewer than 60,000 spectators on the ground, by whom the Queen, Prince Consort, and their son were loudly and heartily cheered. From the Curragh the Queen and Prince Consort went to Killarney; and having enjoyed the beautiful scenery of the lakes, they proceeded to Balmoral for the usual autumn residence.—In the summer her majesty instituted a new order of knighthood, called the Star of India, to be conferred on those who had distinguished themselves in the civil and military service of the Indian empire. It comprises the sovereign, the grand master, and twenty-five knights; with such extra and honorary knights as the sovereign may be pleased to appoint. The insignia consists of a star, a collar of gold, and a badge suspended from a light-blue riband, with narrow white stripes near each edge. The motto, "Heaven's light is our guide," is inscribed on the star.—After her return from Balmoral to Windsor Castle, her majesty held the first investiture of the order. The Governor-General of India for the time being was declared to be grand master and principal knight; and the Prince Consort (as an extra and honorary knight), Field-Marshal Lord Gough, Sir George Russell Clerk, and General Sir George Pollock were invested with the insignia, which has since been conferred upon several native sovereigns of India, and distinguished members of the Indian military and civil service. The Prince of Wales, after he left Ireland, pursued legal studies at Cambridge. On the 31st of October he was in London, and on that day opened a new library erected in the Temple Gardens, and called "The Middle Temple Library." The same day his royal highness was called to the bar, and admitted as a bencher of the Middle Temple.

On the 8th of April, the census of the United Kingdom was taken; papers having been left at every house, on which were to be inscribed—1. The name and surname of every individul in the dwelling.—2. The relation of each to the head of the family.—3. Whether they were single or married, or widowed.—4. Sex.—5. The age on the last birthday.—6. Rank, profession, or occupation.—7. Where born.—8. If deaf and dumb, or blind.—These papers were expected to be filled up on the morning of the 8th of April; and they were collected the same day. After a careful examination and classification, the returns were published, and the following is the result:—

POPULATION OF THE UNITED KINGDOM.—APRIL 8, 1861.

Notwithstanding the check which the industry of Lanashire—the chief seat of the cotton manufacture—sustained, 1861 was, on the whole, a fairly prosperous year. The weather was favourable for the harvest, and the crops produced an average quantity, and of a quality seldom exceeded. The reduction of prices that followed was a great relief to the working-men. The trade with France also considerably increased, and thus in some degree balanced the falling-off in the traffic with the United States. The supply of cotton from those States entirely failed. Our manufacturers had directed their attention exclusively to that market; and instead of encouraging, had stood aloof from all others, whether in our own colonies or elsewhere. Now attention was turned to the East and West Indies, to China, to Egypt, and to Algeria; and a great impetus was given to the cultivation of the cotton-plant in those countries. But the growth of that plant was the work of time; and while cotton plantations were springing up in Jamaica, India, and other places, our factories, one after the other, were discharging their hands, and stopping their mills. Thousands of honest, industrious persons, male and female, were thrown on the poor-rates; but there were no outbreaks, no riots. The people in the suffering districts were perfectly tranquil. Attempts were made to revive the reform question, but it had little success in the north; and an address, issued on the 10th of July, calling upon the people of Great Britain and Ireland to join in "a national reform movement," for the purpose of obtaining manhood suffrage, the ballot, and an equitable redistribution of seats, met with little response at the time.—The falling-off in the trade with the United States affected the exports; their value being, for the year ending December 31st, 1861, £125,115,133. The revenue for the same period, according to the returns from the Treasury, published on the 1st of January, 1862, produced the sum of £68,603,851 7*s.* 4*d.*

The war continued in New Zealand. On the 19th of March, a number of the insurgents surrendered to the British; and, for a time, peace was restored: but hostilities were subsequently renewed.—In Australia and all our other colonies peace and tranquillity prevailed; though in the former, where extreme democratic constitutions had been established, the ministries and the legislatures were adopting measures not at all likely to promote the general prosperity.—Early in the year, the north-western provinces of India suffered severely from famine, the result of a long drought. This calamity had one good effect. The Indian government came forward liberally to the relief of the sufferers; a subscription was opened among the English at Calcutta, and others in London and Liverpool; all being well supported. From England upwards of £100,000 was transmitted to India, being the contributions of the people of Great Britain to the relief of their fellow-subjects in the East. This liberality did much to extinguish any lingering remains of the spirit that caused the mutiny. The rains of the summer produced an abundant rice crop in 1861; and the distress was removed. Apart from this visitation in the rice districts, the general prosperity of the Indian empire, under the genial government of Lord Canning, was remarkable; whilst, under the successive administration of two able financiers from England, the Indian revenue was greatly improved, and its financial equilibrium nearly restored.

The transactions in Europe with which England was connected were not important. Those in which she was most interested took place in Poland and Italy. The Emperor Alexander, of Russia, engaged in emancipating the serfs in Russia proper, was accused of wishing to establish a tyranny over the Poles. The Polish Agricultural Society, whose central place of meeting was Warsaw, had the Count Andrew Zamoyski for president. He was suspected of entertaining designs to throw off the Russian yoke, and of converting the society into an engine for promoting them. The emperor, by an imperial ukase, dissolved the society at the latter end of March—a step which gave rise to popular demonstrations in Warsaw, and led to encounters with the troops. In one of these, on the 8th of April, the soldiers fired upon the populace; and on that and subsequent days, more than 1,000 of the latter were killed and wounded. From that time, for many months, rebellion raged in Poland; the movements being directed by a secret council, whose place of meeting was never discovered. The insurgents frequently fell-in with the Russian troops, and dispersed them; but the resources of the empire were too extensive and overpowering for the old kingdom successfully to contend with; and the Poles could get no foreign aid. The people of England and France were very anxious to assist them; especially those of the former country, where a society of the "Friends of Poland" had existed for many years. A long correspondence subsequently took place between the governments of Great Britain, France, and Austria on the one side, and that of Russia on the other; the three former powers urging the latter to adopt lenient conduct and liberal measures with respect to the Poles. Russia persistently refused to recognise any foreign intervention in her domestic affairs, or between the imperial government and any parts of its subjects; and the negotiation produced no result, except a coolness between Russia and the Western powers. In the meantime the civil war continued, till the insurgents were completely crushed; and since then, the government of St. Petersburg has been gradually replacing the Polish functionaries by Russians; and, on the 12th of January, 1867, three imperial ukases were published, assimilating the civil, military, and financial administration of Poland to that of Russia. So all that Poland has gained by an insurrection, which her friends admit to have been very ill-timed, is a more stringent government, and the abolition of all her national privileges and distinctions.

In Italy we left Francis II., of Naples, shut up in Gaëta, where he was blockaded by the troops of Piedmont by land; but Napoleon, still professing a desire to carry out the treaty of Zurich, stationed a French fleet off that port, to prevent any attack by sea. This state of things did not long continue. The emperor found that he could not carry out his temporising policy; and, after an unsuccessful bombardment of Gaëta by the Piedmontese, in January, 1861, he withdrew his fleet. Still Francis held out; refused all foreign intervention, the object of which was the surrender of his rights; and only when the defences of Gaëta were found to be no longer tenable, did he consent to abandon that, his last stronghold on Neapolitan soil. On the 14th of February, he embarked, with his queen, court, and ministers, on board the French frigate Mouette, which landed them at Rome; and the same day the Piedmontese troops, under General Cialdini, took possession of Gaëta. All Italy, except Venetia, Rome, and a small papal territory surrounding that city, was then nominally subject to Victor Emmanuel, and it was supposed fighting would cease. But large bodies of the Neapolitan troops dispersed themselves over the mountainous country in the south, and long kept up a guerilla warfare, being supported in many places by the inhabitants, who were not only hostile to the Sardinian rule, but gave information of the movements of the king's troops, and supplied his opponents with provisions.—On the 1st of June Count Cavour died, and was succeeded by Baron Ricasoli; one of whose first official acts was, to announce to the Chamber of Deputies at Turin that France had recognised Victor Emmanuel as King of Italy: England had recognised his title some time before.

During the year, two European sovereigns—Frederick William IV., King of Prussia, and Abdul Medjid, Sultan of Turkey—died. Both were succeeded by their brothers—William, the Crown Prince of Prussia, and Abdul Aziz. The former ascended the throne as William I.; and he has done more to increase the power of Prussia than any sovereign since Frederick the Great. Under the latter Turkey has not retrograded; but she has not increased in strength; and it is only the jealousies of the other European sovereigns that preserve the integrity of the Turkish empire.

At the close of our résumé of the events of 1860, we noticed the differences which had arisen between the Northern and Southern States of America, and the secession of South Carolina from the union. In January, 1861, four other states followed the example; and they were joined by six others; North Carolina being the last which gave in her adhesion on the 20th of May. The eleven states were—North and South Carolina, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Texas, Virginia, Arkansas, and Tennessee. On the 9th of February, Mr. Jefferson Davis was elected president of the states which had then seceded; and as the government at Washington, supported by all the Northern States, refused to recognise the right to secede, and treated the secessionists as rebels, whom they determined to subdue by force, war was inevitable. Into the details of that war it is impossible to enter in this résumé; only those circumstances with which England was immediately connected can be noticed. The British government, supported by France and the other European powers, recognised the Southern States as belligerents, but professed a strict neutrality. On the 29th of April, Lord Wodehouse (then Under-Secretary of State for the foreign department) stated, in the House of Lords, that her majesty's government had decided not to intrude advice or counsel on the government of the United States; but that Lord Lyons, the British ambassador at Washington, had been instructed to express, on every fitting occasion, the earnest desire of her majesty's government that the differences between the North and the South might be amicably arranged. No doubt Sir E. Lyons followed his instructions; but in vain; the war continued; and the Federal government —as that at Washington was now called by foreigners; the government of the South, established first at Charleston, but subsequently at Richmond, being termed the Confederate—complained bitterly that the Southern "rebels" had been recognised as belligerents by the powers of Europe. There was no interruption, however, of the friendly intercourse between England and the States till near the close of the year; and then, for a few weeks, the prospect of a war was imminent.—On the 7th of November, the Trent West India mail-packet, on its way to England, called at the Havannah, where she took on board, as passengers, two Southern gentlemen—Mr. Mason and Mr. Slidell; the former as commissioner to England, the latter to France. Each was accompanied by a secretary.—On the 8th, the packet was boarded by a large party of armed marines, commanded by a lieutenant from the San Jacinto, a federal man-of-war, commanded by Captain Wilkes. This party forcibly carried off the commissioners and their secretaries; the commander of the Trent protesting against the outrage, which he had no power to resist. The four gentlemen thus seized, contrary to all international law, were taken to New York, and put in prison. Information of the seizure reached England on the 27th of November. A cabinet council was summoned for the 29th; and, on the proposition of Lord Palmerston, it resolved to instruct Lord Lyons peremptorily to demand the liberation of the captives. Earl Russell forwarded the instructions to the British ambassador on the 30th; and immediate preparations were made for war, should the demand be refused; several bodies of troops being sent to Canada between the 13th and the 27th of December; the British fleet in the American waters was also strengthened. Captain Wilkes, on his arrival at New York, was promoted to the rank of commodore; on visiting public meetings he was praised and eulogised; and the House of Representatives, on the 4th of December, passed a vote of thanks to him. When, however, Lord Lyons, on the 23rd of December, communicated Earl Russell's despatch to Mr. Seward, the American minister, and the chief adviser of the president, it was deemed best to liberate the prisoners. They were, on the 28th, delivered to Lord Lyons, who at once despatched them to England. They landed in this country on the 29th of January, 1862; and thus the apprehended outbreak of hostilities was prevented.

The year 1861 appeared likely to close favourably and pleasantly for England; as all her relations with foreign powers were satisfactory; her foreign trade, except with the United States, prosperous; her internal industry, except that branch already alluded to, progressing rapidly; and her people tranquil and contented; for even in Ireland—where turbulent spirits are always to be found ready to create dissatisfaction, and, if they can, to raise a disturbance—a calm prevailed. Preparations were actively going on in London, under the auspices of the Prince Consort, for the second International Exhibition, which would have been held in 1861; but the war raging in Italy in 1859, caused it to be postponed. Great expectations were entertained as to the result of that exhibition, which there was every reason to believe would, in the number of exhibitors, and the variety and excellence of their contributions, exceed the first. All bright prospects were obscured, however, by the death, on the 14th of December, of his royal highness the Prince Consort. He had been indisposed for more than a fortnight previous, with a cold, attended with fever: but the public were not aware of it till the 9th of December, when it was announced, that a party to be held at Windsor Castle had been countermanded, on account of his royal highness's illness; five days after, he was no more. He died in the same room, in Windsor Castle, where George IV. and William IV. expired; and on the 23rd, was buried in the royal vault, in the Chapel Royal, of St. George's.—The Queen had a splendid mausoleum erected at Frogmore, to which the royal corpse has been removed.

His royal highness's character was truly estimable in all the relations of life. He was a dutiful son, a firm friend, an affectionate husband, and a kind and loving father, setting before his children the conduct they should pursue by precept and example.—To the Queen he was invaluable as a counsellor and an adviser; and her majesty has never ceased to lament his loss. Her residence has, since that event, been divided between Windsor, Osborne, and Balmoral; with occasional short visits to Belgium and Germany; but she has not yet resumed her royal state at Buckingham Palace, to the great regret of her subjects; and only on very few occasions has taken part in public proceedings. All the other duties of royalty her majesty, however, continues assiduously to discharge; and her subjects hope yet to see her once more resume her proud position, which no one ever filled better, or with greater propriety.

Soon after the year 1862 opened, on the 16th of January, a shocking accident at the New Hartley Colliery, near Newcastle, excited the sympathy of the entire nation. An explosion shattered the shaft which gave access to the colliery, and killed 204 men and boys, besides injuring many others. The terrible accident was caused by the breaking of the beam which overhung the shaft, and formed part of the pumping machinery. Numerous families were left destitute, and a subscription was opened for their relief, to which the Queen—perhaps sympathising with the widows and the fatherless more deeply from her own bereavement—was the first to send a large contribution.—In a few weeks, upwards of £70,000 was collected, by which the material wants of the sufferers were greatly alleviated; but the loss of relatives no money could supply.

Parliament was opened, by commission, on the 6th of February, the Lord Chancellor, Baron Westbury, reading her majesty's message, in which the following allusion was made to her recent loss:—

"We are commanded, by her majesty, to assure you, that her majesty is persuaded that you will deeply participate in the affliction by which her majesty has been overwhelmed, by the calamitous, untimely, and irreparable loss of her beloved consort, who had been her comfort and support. It has been, however, soothing to her majesty, while suffering most acutely under this awful dispensation of Providence, to receive from all classes of her subjects the most cordial assurances of their sympathy with her sorrow, as well as of their appreciation of the noble character of him, the greatness of whose loss, to her majesty and to the nation, is so justly and so universally felt and lamented."

These sentiments were echoed in the addresses from both Houses; the movers and seconders—Lords Dufferin and Shelburne in the uper House; Mr. Portman and Mr. Western Wood in the lower—and the leaders of both parties, warmly eulogising the character of the late Prince Consort in their speeches.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer made his financial statement on the 3rd of April. Two days previously, Mr. Sheridan had, by a majority of 127 to 116 against the government, obtained leave to bring in a bill to reduce the duty on fire insurance, at once, from 3*s.* to 2*s.* per cent., and at the end of five years to 1*s.* per cent. Mr. Gladstone, however, took no notice of this vote in his budget. He estimated the revenue for the financial year at £70,190,000; the expenditure at £70,040,000: and he proposed to reduce the wine duties from four scales to two; to abolish the hop duties, substituting a licence to brewers for that tax; and to reduce the duty on playing-cards to 3*d.* per pack; the seller of such cards, if the maker, to pay 2*s.* 6*d.* for a licence, to be taken out annually; and, if not a maker, £1. The brewers' licences were to vary from 12*s.* 6*d.* if the quantity brewed did not exceed twenty barrels, to £2 for any quantity not exceeding fifty barrels; after that amount, 15*s.* for every fifty barrels, should the entire number not exceed 1,000; 14*s.* for every fifty from 1,000 to 50,000; and 12*s.* 6*d.* for every fifty barrels beyond that number.—Each brewer also to take out a yearly licence, at 12*s.* 6*d.*—Mr. Gladstone carried all his propositions; and Mr. Sheridan's bill for the reduction of the duty on fire insurances was not proceeded with.

One of the first acts passed in the session of 1862, was to enable the Queen to issue commissions to the officers of her majesty's land forces and the royal marines, and to adjutants and quartermasters of the militia and volunteer forces, without affixing her royal signature. This relieved her majesty from one of her active duties; and as she had ceased to reside in London, contributed to the convenience of her ministers. The practice continues; and although the act does not affect her majesty's right to sign commissions, it is probable that the royal sign-manual has not appeared to any issued since it passed. Commissions of officers in the army are now signed by the general commanding-in-chief, and one of the principal Secretaries of State; for the royal marines, by the lords commissioners of the Admiralty; for military chaplains, commissariat and store officers, and for militia and volunteer adjutants and quartermasters, by one of the principal Secretaries of State.—Acts were also passed to prevent the employment of women, young persons, and children, in the operations of bleaching, dyeing, or finishing yarn or cloth of cotton, silk, wool, or flax, between the hours of 8 P.M. and 6 A.M.; to enable poor-law guardians to send poor children to school, if they are orphans, or with the consent of their parents, if they are not, at an expense not exceeding that which would be incurred for their maintenance, clothing, and education in a workhouse; also to prohibit the opening of any new coal mine, and, after the 1st of January, 1865, the working of any old ones, with a single shaft.—The parliament was closed, by commission, on the 7th of August.

The event of the year was the International Exhibition, held in a building erected for the purpose in South Kensington, upon the estate purchased with the surplus left from the exhibition of 1851. The building was very inferior, in external appearance, to the Crystal Palace in Hyde Park; but choice and rare as was the collection of articles at the first exhibition, the second far exceeded it; presenting, "altogether a sight that had never before been equalled in the variety and the excellence of the things exhibited." Three bodies had been concerned in getting up this display; the royal commissioners of 1851, constituted by patent a permanent body, of which the late Earl of Derby was chairman; the royal commissioners of 1862, at the head of whom was Lord Granville; and the council of the Society of Arts. The arrangement of the building was, in many respects, more eligible than that of the Crystal Palace; and the vast crowds which attended the opening on the 1st of May, were loud in their expressions of admiration both at the really magnificent collection of works of art and industry, and at the excellent arrangement by which the beautiful and the useful were so tastefully displayed. As the Queen could not take the prominent part in the opening ceremony which she had done in 1851, her majesty appointed the Duke of Cambridge, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Derby, Lord Sydney (Lord Chamberlain), Lord Palmerston, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, to be her special commissioners for the purpose; and there was a very long procession of officials and others in the building.—The exhibition continued open for six months and a fortnight; that fortnight was an extension of the time, to enable the exhibitors to dispose of their goods; and 2*s.* 6*d.* was charged for admission. The number of visitors, during the six months, was 6,130,450; and the receipts were near £500,000. But the expenses were heavier than in 1851; and instead of a magnificent surplus, there was a small deficiency.

An immense number of foreigners visited London during the exhibition. The most important personages were the Viceroy of Egypt, Prince Napoleon, and the Japanese ambassadors. Though, unhappily, there could be no royal receptions, and no balls or banquets at Buckingham Palace, civic hospitality was profusely displayed to the visitors. The corporation of London gave a concert and ball to 3,000 persons at Guildhall; and the dinners at the Mansion-house, given by the Lord Mayor, Mr. Alderman W. Cubitt, were frequent and sumptuous: the French exhibitors also gave a banquet to Prince Napoleon and the various national commissioners. The French minister of commerce, M. Rouher, and M. Michel Chevalier, who had been the principal negotiator, with Mr. Cobden, of the treaty of commerce, were entertained at a public dinner; and the numerous foreign workmen who visited the exhibition were not overlooked. On the 5th of August, an international banquet was given to those workmen at Freemasons' Hall; and on the 26th, one in special honour of the French workmen was given in the British refreshment-rooms at the exhibition building.

The royal family, of course, could take no part in any of these demonstrations, the death of the Prince Consort having been so recent. The Prince of Wales was abroad the greater part of the year, visiting Germany, France, and Turkey; and Prince Alfred went to Sweden and Russia.. Both princes were heartily welcomed and cordially greeted at every place they visited; though they did not court publicity.—On the 1st of July, the marriage of the Princess Alice with Prince Louis of Hesse took place at Osborne. The Queen was present, but wore deep mourning; and there were no nuptial festivities. The Archbishop of York performed the ceremony.—On the 4th of November, the London Gazette announced, that her majesty, in council, had given her consent to the marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Princess Alexandra, daughter to Prince Christian, who was, at that time, heir-presumptive to the crown of Denmark, to which he subsequently succeeded. The prince had married, in 1842, the Princess Louisa, daughter of the Landgrave, William of Hesse. The Princess Alexandra was born on the 1st of December, 1844, and was not quite eighteen years of age. The Prince of Wales completed his majority on the 9th of November; and as that day fell on a Sunday in 1862, his birthday was celebrated, with great rejoicings, on the 10th in London and many other places, the toast to his health being accompanied with wishes for his happiness in the married state; of which there was little doubt, as the union was not one of political convenience, but of mutual affection. The princess—to whom his royal highness was introduced by his sister the Princess Royal, after she became Crown Princess of Prussia—was held in the highest estimation by her relatives, and all who knew her on the continent, for her truly amiable character and conduct.

There was very little political excitement in England during the year; and trade and industry prospered, the cotton districts being still an exception; their distress was widely spread. In April, the number of persons receiving out-door relief, in the twenty-four poor-law unions of those districts, was 105,000. On the 8th of September it had increased to 140,165; and before November closed, to 270,000. Still the applications continued to become more numerous; and it would have been impossible for the rate-payers to have raised the sum required for the moderate relief a board of guardians affords. But a committee was formed in London, with the Lord Mayor at its head, and others in various parts of England, to raise subscriptions in aid of the rates. A central committee, to receive and dispose of these contributions, sat at Manchester, of which the Earl of Derby was chairman; and his lordship, who headed the Lancashire subscription with £1,000, gave up his time—disregarding all other calls upon it—to the arduous duties which his office of chairman imposed upon him. As soon as the subscriptions opened, Sir C. B. Phipps, in the name of the Queen, wrote to Lord Derby, saying that her majesty, as Duchess of Lancaster, "gladly associated herself with those suffering districts; and was pleased to find herself thus entitled to send her aid to those for whom she had long felt deep compassion." Her majesty's contribution to the fund was £2,000. Before the year closed, the central committee had received £407,830; and that sitting at the Mansion-house, London, £236,926. Throughout the keen pressure of distress the greatest tranquillity continued to prevail; and the conduct of the unemployed cannot be too highly praised. Notwithstanding the almost complete suspension of operations in the cotton manufacture, the amount of the revenue for the year ending December 31st, 1862—£70,996,428 16*s.* 6*d.*—exceeded that of the previous twelve months by something more than £2,000,000: the value of the exports—£124,137,812—was very little short of that for 1861.

No event of great interest occurred, during the year, connected with the colonies. There were ministerial disputes and crises in both Australia and Canada; but the people of England took little interest in them.—In India, Lord Elgin succeeded Earl Canning as governor-general. His lordship arrived at Calcutta on the 1st of March, and was installed into office on the 12th. Lord Canning left Calcutta on the 18th of March, and arrived in England on the 26th of April. He did not long survive his return to his native land. He died on the 16th of June, and his remains were interred in Westminster Abbey on the 21st. He left no issue, and the titld is extinct.

The foreign events of the year, except in America, were very unimportant. In the United States the civil war continued; and though the fighting was generally to the advantage of the South, the friends of the secessionists had little hope of their success unaided—so superior were the forces, so overwhelming the resources of the Federal States. It was like the Poles contending with the Russians. The relations of the United Kingdom with the Federal and Confederate States underwent no change during the year, which was distinguished by an act of unexampled benevolence on the part of an American gentleman to the poor of London. Mr. George Peabody had resided some years in the British metropolis as a banker. His business was prosperous; he made a large fortune; and in June, 1862, he placed £150,000 in the hands of trustees—of whom the ambassador from the United States for the time being is always to be one—for the benefit of the London poor. On the 29th of January, 1866, previous to his leaving England for his native country, this truly beneficent man placed £100,000 more in the hands of his trustees, who have built several fine blocks of houses with part of the quarter of a million thus munificently devoted to the benefit of the poor of the metropolis, with a view of affording them convenient, clean, and comfortable dwellings at a low rental. As he was a citizen of the Union, the Queen could confer no honour upon Mr. Peabody; but her majesty sent him her portrait, which he highly prized, and intended, he said, to make it a heirloom in his family; and the corporation of London admitted him to the freedom of the city.—Every honour to his name!

In Italy, the guerilla war continued, and became, on the part of the friends of Francis II., a species of brigandage, which the forces of Victor Emmanuel were unable to suppress. There was a strong party in Italy—followers of Garibaldi and Mazzini—who were very much dissatisfied with the continuance of the Austrians in Venetia, and of the pope at Rome. They called for Italy, one and undivided, with Rome for its capital. Mazzini kept aloof, and out of the way of danger; but he encouraged the discontented by his letters, as Garibaldi did both by words and deeds. On the 5th of January, 1862, the latter accepted the presidency of the Rifle Association of Genoa; and on that day wrote to the members, advising them to "hasten to prepare themselves to take up arms; for the moment was approaching when they would have to give fresh proofs of their valour." Soon after he left Caprera for the continent; and landing at Genoa, he gathered followers round him, at whose head he marched to Milan, entering that city on the 21st of March, where he was received with enthusiasm, the people shouting, "To Rome and Venice!" The government discountenanced the movement; and as Garibaldi persisted, troops were sent against him. He retreated to Sicily, where he landed in August, and took possession of Catania on the 21st. The island was immediately declared in a state of siege, and Garibaldi left for Calabria, where he landed on the 25th of August. On the 29th he was attacked by the king's forces, and his followers dispersed, he being wounded and taken prisoner. After a short confinement he was liberated, and returned to Caprera, where he remained quiet for some time. "The friends of Italy," in England, were very indignant at Victor Emmanuel for not letting the chief have his own way. On the 17th of October, they held a meeting at the City of London Tavern, in the metropolis; at which resolutions expressive of sympathy with Garibaldi, and of disapprobation at the French occupation of Rome, were adopted.

In Greece, a peaceful revolution took place in October. King Otho quitted the kingdom on the 24th, and a provisional government was appointed; which offered the crown to Prince Alfred, the second son of Queen Victoria. As the British government would not sanction his acceptance of it, it was, after some delay, offered to the second son of Prince Christian, brother to the Princess Alexandra; who ultimately became King of Greece, and now reigns at Athens, over a people neither very orderly nor contented, as George I.

CHAPTER CXX.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1863, 1864.

WITH the exception to which we have so frequently alluded, the United Kingdom was, when 1863 opened, prosperous and happy. The people appeared to be thinking more about the approaching marriage of the Prince of Wales, than of political or religious differences; and there has seldom been a period when greater social equanimity prevailed. The session of parliament was opened by commission, on Thursday, the 5th of February. The royal speech was read by the Lord Chancellor. It commenced by announcing that her majesty had declared her consent to the marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Princess Alexandra of Denmark; and that she doubted not, parliament would enable her to make provision for such an establishment as would be suitable to the rank and dignity of the heir-apparent to the crown of these realms. The offer of the crown of Greece to Prince Alfred, and its refusal, from diplomatic engagements and other weighty considerations, were mentioned; also the intention of resigning the protectorate of the Ionian Isles, should the people of those islands express a wish to be united to the kingdom of Greece. Her majesty then alluded to the state of the cotton districts; expressing the heartfelt grief with which she witnessed the severe distress and suffering of the people of those districts, and which had "been borne by them with noble fortitude, and with exemplary resignation." The determination to maintain a neutral position with respect to the civil war waging in America, the favourable result of the treaty of commerce concluded with France, and the conclusion of a similar treaty with Belgium, were also subjects touched upon in the document; which concluded as follows:—

"It has been gratifying to her majesty to observe the spirit of order which happily prevails throughout her dominions, and which is so essential an element in the well-being and prosperity of nations. Various measures of public usefulness and improvement will be submitted for your consideration; and her majesty fervently prays that, in all your deliberations, the blessing of Almighty God may guide your counsels to the promotion of the welfare and happiness of her people."

The address was carried without a division being taken; though both Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli questioned the soundness of the policy announced with respect to the Ionian Islands. When the Houses proceeded to business, one of the first measures introduced by the government was the bill to provide an establishment for the Prince of Wales. It was proposed to make a grant of £40,000 per annum to the prince, and of £10,000 to the princess, from the consolidated fund; and to settle £30,000 a year on the latter in the event of the premature death of the prince. This bill, introduced on the 19th of February, passed rapidly through both Houses, and received the royal assent on the 5th of March.—On the 24th of March, Mr. Hubbard, one of the members for Buckinghamshire, brought formally before the House of Commons a question which had been often agitated since the imposition of the income-tax—viz., Should permanent and temporary incomes be subjected to the same rate of assessment?—In 1861, a committee had, on the motion of the same gentleman, been appointed to consider this question, and had reported against introducing any distinction between the two classes of incomes.—Mr. Hubbard was not satisfied with this decision; and, on the day above-named, he moved a resolution, to the effect that the tax should fall upon net incomes; and that the net amount of industrial earnings should, before assessment, be so reduced, as "equitably to adjust the burden thrown upon intelligence and skill, as compared with property." This plan, which appears to be perfectly just and equitable, the Chancellor of the Exchequer declared to be impracticable; and the resolution was negatived by 118 votes to 70.

Mr. Gladstone made his financial statement on the 16th of April; and he took a most favourable view of the state of our finances, and of the prospects for the future. The revenue for the financial year had been £563,000 more, the expenditure £806,000 less, than the estimate. The expenditure for 1863-'64 he estimated at £67,749,000; whilst the revenue might be expected to produce £71,490,000: leaving a surplus of £3,741,000. He proposed an equalisation of the duty on chicory and coffee; to equalise certain duties on licences; to make clubs liable to the duty on wines and spirits consumed in those establishments; and to extend the income-tax to charitable trusts. These taxes would produce, he calculated, £133,000 per annum, making the surplus to be disposed of, £3,874,000. This he proposed to deal with by repealing petty charges upon mercantile transactions, including the stamp upon bills of lading; by reducing the income-tax 2*d.* in the pound, allowing persons having incomes of between £100 and £200 per annum to deduct £60 from their taxable incomes; reducing the duty on tea to 1*s.* per pound; and leaving the sugar duty to be dealt with another year.—The right honourable gentleman had to abandon his proposals to extend the licence duty to clubs, and the income-tax to charities: the other parts of his budget were adopted.

There were several debates this session on religious questions; but no constitutional changes or reforms were proposed, unless the bill for the abolition of church-rates is placed in that class. Sir J. Trelawney, as usual, introduced that measure; but, on the 29th of April, when it was moved that the bill should be read a second time, it was negatived; the ayes being 275, the noes 285.—The state of the cotton districts was brought before the House, and ample justice was done to the unemployed for their good conduct, and to the public for its liberality. The act of the previous session, allowing the Lancashire unions to borrow money on the security of their rates, for the execution of public works, was renewed; and the time for repayment extended to fourteen years.—There were also several discussions on the American question. Whilst the government professed neutrality in the contest between North and South, it was alleged by the Federal minister, Mr. Seward, that it connived at the fitting-out ships of war for the Confederates to prey upon the commerce of the North. Two ships, the Alabama and the Alexandra, had been built, it was alleged, for the service of the Confederate government. Information was given to the authorities in London, but not acted upon till it was too late with respect to the first. The second was prevented from leaving the Mersey; and an action brought against the government by the builders, for its illegal detention, was decided in favour of the latter. The Alabama made numerous captures; and for the losses thus inflicted upon the Federal merchants, the government at Washington declared that it held England to be responsible. A long correspondence ensued on the subject between Lord John Russell and Mr. Adams, in which his lordship maintained that England had faithfully fulfilled all her duties as a neutral; and the attorney and solicitor-general took the same view of the question when it was brought before the House of Commons.

During the session the following acts were added to the statute-book:—An Act "to give to the Inmates of Prisons, not being Members of the Established Church, the Benefit of the Attendance of Ministers of their own Religious Persuasions;" and an Act "to Consolidate and Amend the Acts relating to the Volunteer Force of Great Britain;" by which the crown was authorised to accept the services of any persons desirous of forming themselves into a volunteer corps; giving directions for the regulation of such corps; providing for the payment of the members, if called into actual service; and exempting them from service in the militia while they continue enrolled. Numerous other acts were passed; but it is not necessary particularly to mention any of them in these pages. The session came to a close on the 28th of July.

The event of 1863—as the Exhibition was of 1862—was the marriage of the Prince of Wales. Great preparations were made to receive the princess, who arrived at the Nore on the 6th of March, and landed at Gravesend on the 7th. She was accompanied by her royal parents, her brothers Princes Frederick and William, and her sisters the Princesses Dagmar and Thyra; and received by the prince, who went on board the yacht as soon as it reached the shore. Gravesend, from the display of banners, &c., bore the appearance of a grand fête day. The corporation presented addresses to the prince and his intended bride. Mrs. Sams, the wife of the mayor, gave to the latter a rich bouquet-holder, filled with choice flowers; and a number of young ladies, uniformly dressed in white tarlatan skirts, red burnous cloaks, and straw hats garlanded with oak-leaves and acorns, strewed her path with flowers from the shore to the carriages which were to convey the party to the railway station. They proceeded to London by rail; and at the Bricklayers' Arms Station, in the Old Kent Road, were received by the Duke of Cambridge, the Prince of Prussia, the Count of Flanders, Sir George Grey, the Lord Mayor, and other gentlemen. Having entered the carriages prepared for them, the cortége proceeded by London Bridge, King William Street, Cheapside, Fleet Street, the Strand, Piccadilly, and Hyde Park, to the Great Western Station, where they took the rail for Windsor. A triumphal arch had been erected at the city end of London Bridge, which was superbly decorated; and along the entire route, the houses displayed banners, garlands, and loyal mottoes; every window being filled with eager faces, looking for the fair bride; whilst thousands of persons of both sexes, and all ages, thronged the streets, whose hearty cheers greeted the party, and conveyed to the princess the assurance of a cordial welcome to her new home.

On the 10th, the marriage took place in the Chapel Royal, at Windsor Castle: and a right royal company was present, consisting of the following personages:—

The Princesses Helena, Louise, and Beatrice; the Princes Arthur and Leopold; the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia, Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duchess and the Princess Mary of Cambridge, the Prince and Princess Christian of Denmark (the father and mother of the bride), Princes Frederick, William, and Waldemar, and the Princesses Dagmar and Thyra of Denmark; Prince William of Prussia, the reigning Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, Prince Augustus of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, the Prince of Leiningen, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Prince Frederick of Hesse-Cassel, the Duke of Holstein-Glucksberg, the Duchess of Brabant, the Count of Flanders, and the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh.

The lords and ladies of the Queen's household, and those in attendance on the different royal personages, swelled the procession as it passed through the chapel. The Queen was also present in the royal closet: her majesty was dressed in widow's weeds, and appeared merely as an interested spectator, taking no part in the ceremony; which was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Bishops of London and Chester, and the Dean of Windsor.—After the ceremony, the wedding breakfast was served in the dining-room at the castle to the royal guests; and a déjeuner was given in St. George's Hall, to the diplomatic corps, the lords and ladies in waiting, and the numerous company present at the ceremony, numbering nearly 400 persons.—In the afternoon, the newly-married pair proceeded to Osborne; the demonstrations on the route being of the most loyal description.—In the metropolis, and all over the kingdom, the wedding-day was observed as a holiday; and at night the illuminations were very brilliant, and almost, if not entirely, universal from John-o'-Groat's house to the Land's End. The wedding presents to the princess were very numerous, and most magnificent.

In April, on the 5th, the Princess Louis of Hesse (Princess Alice) gave birth to her first child at Windsor, which was another source of rejoicing to the royal family.—Soon after, the Prince and Princess of Wales arrived at Marlborough House, to the great joy of the metropolitans. On the 8th of June, the prince took up his freedom as a citizen of London, by birth; and the corporation gave a grand ball, on the occasion, in the evening. It took place in the noble Guildhall; but so numerous was the company, that, we are told, "it was not so much a ball as a grand assembly—a fête occasionally varied with dancing."—At twelve o'clock the royal guests were conducted to supper in the council-chamber; and on their return, being taken through the Aldermen's Court, the attention of the princess was drawn to one part of the room, where a pleasant surprise awaited her.

In a large, deep recess, occupying nearly one side of the court, was a moonlight scene of a palace, with a broad-spreading lawn reaching down in the foreground, to where real plants and ferns had been artistically arranged so as to make them seem almost a continuation of the picture. This picture, which, lit from behind, made an exquisite moonlight scene, was a view of Prince Christian's palace at Bernstorff, where the Princess Alexandra was born; and, standing in the centre of the lawn, was a figure of the princess herself, as if in the act of moving forward towards the entrance to the mansion. Regarded only as a most effective scene by moonlight, the picture would have been worth a visit; but it was evidently dearly welcome to the princess, as the picture of what was once her home.

Two days after, on the 10th of June, the prince and princess presided at the inauguration of a fine statue of the late Prince Albert, erected as a memorial to his royal highness, in the Royal Horticultural Gardens at South Kensington. It had been privately visited by the Queen the previous day; and her majesty expressed her entire satisfaction with the workmanship. On the 10th, all the members of the royal family, and a brilliant assembly, were present; and the proceedings were very impressive.—A flourish of trumpets and a salute from a battery of artillery, placed in Hyde Park, announced the uncovering of the statue, which commemorates his late royal highness as the great patron of the Exhibition of 1851.

On the 16th of June, commemoration day, the Prince and Princess of Wales went to Oxford, and the degree of D.C.L. was, on this occasion, conferred on his royal highness. The royal couple remained till the 18th; and the three days were one continued scene of rejoicing. —On the 24th, their royal highnesses were present at the inauguration of a new building at Slough, for the British Orphan Asylum; of which the Queen is patroness, and the names of the prince and princess were enrolled as vice-patron and vice-patroness. It was one of those graceful ceremonials which have a peculiar interest attached to them as being connected with beneficent objects; and the prince and princess are always ready to join in such demonstrations. In August, the prince went to Halifax, to open a new town-hall, just completed in that town. He went alone, the princess being unable to accompany him from temporary indisposition. His royal highness arrived on the 3rd, and the ceremony took place on the 4th. An address was presented to his royal highness, to which he made a very appropriate response; observing, at its close, that, "Conscious of the duties he had been so impressively reminded of, he felt that he could not better perform them than by following the bright example of the Queen and his beloved father."

The distress still prevailed in the cotton districts to a considerable extent; but some mills had resumed work; a few of the factory men had emigrated; more were employed on public works of various kinds, by means of the loans obtained by the guardians of the different unions. This caused the number of persons receiving relief from the rates, and the subscriptions to which the public so munificently contributed, regularly to decrease. In January, it was estimated that 456,786 individuals were thus relieved. In June the number was 256,230; and it continued gradually to grow less and less, being, on the 30th of September, returned at 184,265. The sum raised by the Central Relief Committee at Manchester; the Mansion-house Committee, London; and the committees in various localities, amounted to £2,055,000; and £680,000 was advanced by the Poor-Law Board, in aid of the rates.—It is right to remark that the rich inhabitants of the county of Lancaster were not behind-hand in liberality; for £1,400,000 of the total sum subscribed, was advanced by them.—The workpeople, with one exception, continued their good and orderly conduct.—In March, the local committee at Staleybridge resolved to pay the adult operatives with tickets instead of money, the tradesmen furnishing them with necessaries for the tickets when presented. This led to riots at that town, Ashton, and Dukinfield; and whilst several shops were plundered at Staleybridge, the relief committee's clothing stores were broken into, and the clothes which they contained were thrown into the streets, and carried off. The riots extended over three days; they were suppressed by the military and the police; and a number of prisoners were committed for trial at the Chester assizes. Forty-two were found guilty of rioting, and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, from one to six months.—This was a solitary instance of misconduct. At the Liverpool spring assizes, Mr. Baron Martin reminded the grand jury that there was not a single case in the criminal calendar which could be traced to the existing distress. And Commissioner Farnell, who was sent to the central committee by the Poor-Law Board, assured the benevolent people of England, that the rioters at Staleybridge did not represent the operatives of the cotton districts.—In fact, most of the rioters were not factory men at all. They were labourers of different kinds, the majority being Irish.

The country continued prosperous; the revenue for the year, notwithstanding the reduction of taxation, amounting to £70,433,620 5s. 9d. The value of the exports was £146,489,768.

There were no important events in Ireland during the year; and our colonies were peaceful, except New Zealand. There the Waikatoes, a tribe of Maories dwelling near Auckland, on the 15th of July, murdered two settlers.—On the 17th, General Cameron, with 500 men, fell-in with a large force of these natives, which he defeated, though they fought desperately. The same day, another party of natives attacked a convoy conveying stores, which was obliged to retreat; but the exultation at this small success was soon dispersed. On the 22nd, General Cameron's troops made a descent upon the native settlement of Kiri-Kiri; defeated the Maories who defended it; and took possession of the territory. From that time the natives would not meet the British troops in the field; but their armed men, estimated at about 7,000, kept up a guerilla warfare. The colonists formed themselves into corps of volunteers and militia; and soon about 4,000 men were organised in Auckland and the neighbourhood. By them the natives were held in check; and, early in August, 1864, they made an almost unconditional submission.—In Australia, the last month of the year was marked with a most destructive flood at Melbourne, continuing from the 14th to the 24th. The river Yarra rose forty feet above its usual level, laying nearly the whole city under water. The gas-lamps could not be lighted; the navigation of the river and the traffic on the railway were suspended; and vast quantities of property were carried down the river to the bay. The loss was estimated at £250,000. No lives, providentially, were sacrificed.

Europe, except the revolutionary war in Poland, was at peace; but there was an under-current in motion, which threatened disturbance at no distant period. The illness of Ferdinand VII., King of Denmark, threatened to bring the Schleswig-Holstein question—which had led to a war with Prussia in 1848—again before the public. There was a strife between the King of Prussia, his ministers, and the Chamber of Deputies, which held out fears of internal convulsions.—Austria was dissatisfied with the Federal Bund, or Constitution of Germany, and summoned a congress of the German princes at Frankfort, to consider of a plan to improve it. The congress was opened on the 17th of August, but Prussia refused to attend; and although the majority of princes agreed to the propositions of Austria, no result followed. Italy was still devastated in the south by the brigands; and the demand for the annexation of Rome and Venetia to the kingdom was not silenced. Under these circumstances, the Emperor Napoleon, on the 4th of November, addressed a circular letter to all the European governments, proposing, as "the treaties of Vienna, upon almost all points, were destroyed, modified, misunderstood, or menaced," and thence arose "duties without rule, rights without title, and pretensions without restraint," that a congress should be held, "to regulate the present, and secure the future."—Soon after this circular was issued, the position became more complicated, in one respect, by the death, on the 15th of November, of the King of Denmark. He was succeeded by Prince Christian; and, on the 17th, the states of Holstein declared their intention of refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the new sovereign; and the Duke of Augustenburg announced his claim to the duchy, though, in 1852, he had solemnly renounced that claim, receiving an ample compensation for so doing; and the great powers, by a treaty signed on the 8th of May in that year, had guaranteed the succession of all the dominions of Ferdinand VII. to Prince Christian. Under these circumstances, to assemble a congress appears to have been a reasonable suggestion. Lord John Russell, however, was of opinion it would lead to no practically good result, but only give occasion to useless debate. It was therefore decided that England should not join in it; and the congress never assembled. The conduct of our Foreign Secretary caused a coolness to arise between the governments of England and France, which continued for some time.

England was engaged in a little war during the year. In September, 1862, Mr. Richardson, who was attached to the English consulate in Japan, was murdered by the adherents of the Japanese Prince of Satsuma. Application was made to the rulers of Japan for the punishment of the murderers, without avail; and a British squadron was sent, under Admiral Kupe, to attack the prince's fortified town of Kagosima. The fleet arrived in the Japanese waters in August, and, on the 15th, commenced the bombardment of the town. The forts kept up a vigorous fire upon the ships, but on that and the next day the town was reduced to a mass of ruins. This ended the actual hostilities; but, as might be expected, a very unfavourable opinion against the English prevailed.

The civil war continued in the American states; and in the adjoining country on the south (Mexico), disturbances had for years prevailed, which occasioned great losses to European merchants and residents—losses that the republican government could not redress, weakened as it was by the contests of various chiefs; Santa Anna, Juarez, and Ortega being the most prominent. A joint expedition of English, French, and Spanish forces was despatched to Vera Cruz, to enforce justice to the merchants of those countries who had been despoiled of their property. It was soon found that the French had another design—to establish an empire in Mexico; and the English and Spanish forces were withdrawn. Under the influence of France, the Assembly of Notables at Mexico, on the 20th of July, 1863, proclaimed the country to be an empire. They declared Maximilian, Archduke of Austria, to be their choice as emperor, and appointed a deputation to wait upon him, and offer him the crown. He did not accept it immediately; but on the 28th of May, 1864, a proclamation appeared, announcing his compliance with the wish of the notables; and he called upon the Mexicans "to unite to obtain their common object; to forget the past; to bury in oblivion party animosities; and peace and happiness would dawn resplendent on the new empire." From that time, till the commencement of 1867, a French force aided to keep Maximilian on the throne. Then the foreign troops were withdrawn. During the time he had been in Mexico, the republicans had been in arms, under the rival chiefs Juarez and Ortega—the government of the United States siding with the former, eager to prevent an empire from being established, and to carry out the Monroe doctrine, excluding Europeans from interfering with the American continent, except where they are already settled. The result, as is well known, was of the most melancholy nature so far as regards Maximilian, and France was severely reprobated for the part she had taken in the affair.

On the 8th of January, 1864, the Princess of Wales gave birth to a son Her royal highness and the prince were then at Frogmore, which became, for several days, a scene of great excitement, every train bringing cabinet ministers, and other distinguished personages, to offer their congratulations to the prince. Royal salutes were fired at Windsor and London; and there were general rejoicings throughout the kingdom. When parliament was opened, on the 4th of February, the Queen, in her royal speech or message, expressed her gratitude to Almighty God, in which she felt confident the two Houses would join, at the birth of a son to the Prince of Wales—"an event which had called forth, from her faithful people, renewed demonstrations of devoted loyalty and attachment to her person and family." The address was carried in both Houses without a division: but there were several exciting debates during the session. One was on the question of the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and the causes of the emigration from that country. It originated in some remarks of Mr. Whiteside, when the report upon the address was brought up, on the absence, in the royal speech, of all reference to the state of the sister country. Mr. Whiteside, Mr. Bentinck, and several other members, attributed the increase in the number of emigrants to the modern financial legislation, which had been completed in 1846, and which was most injurious to Irish industry. Mr. Maguire, Sir Patrick O'Brien, and other Irish members, on the contrary, contended that emigration was caused by the oppression under which the tenantry laboured; and maintained that a modification of the law relating to the tenure of land was necessary. Mr. P. Hennessy moved resolutions, regretting the emigration, and expressing the "trust" of the House that her majesty's government would turn its attention to the subject, "with a view of devising some means by which the Irish agricultural population might be induced to devote their capital and labour to reproductive employment at home."—After a long debate, in the course of which Lord Palmerston pressed Mr. Hennessy to withdraw his resolutions—which he declined to do—the House decided, by 80 to 52 votes, that they should not be put.

The next debate, in which the different parties of the state took a deep interest, arose out of a recent occurrence in France, where some Italians had concerted a plot against the Emperor of the French. The evidence given on the trial of the conspirators who were arrested, had shown that Mazzini, whose name was notoriously connected with the conspiracies against royalty in Italy, was also one of those who plotted against the life of the emperor; and that letters addressed to a Mr. Flowers (said to be Mazzini), had been received at No. 35, Thurloe Square, Brompton, the residence of Mr. Stansfeld, one of the lords of the Admiralty. After the reports of the trial had been made public, on the 14th of March, when the navy estimates were before the House, Mr. Cox, one of the members for Finsbury, alluded to the subject; and as the residence mentioned was that of the member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), he called upon him for an explanation; the procureur-general, at the trial, having intimated that a paper had been found on one of the prisoners, directing him to write for money to a Mr. Flowers, at No. 35, Thurloe Square. Mr. Stansfeld said he felt surprise and indignation at the statement of the procureur-general; admitted that he had been intimate with Mazzini for eighteen years, but maintained that no man had been more cruelly or wrongfully maligned than the signor; and, with respect to his having incited to assassination, he believed that no baser libel could be pronounced. To other questions Mr. Stansfeld replied, that he did live at No. 35, Thurloe Square; but denied all knowledge of a letter being addressed there to a Mr. Flowers; and said he had no knowledge whether Mr. Flowers was M. Mazzini or not. Mr. W. L. Forster expressed his belief that Mazzini had nothing to do with the plot.—The subject dropped for that night; but, on the 17th of March, Sir H. Stracey moved the following resolution:—"That the statement of the procureur-general, on the trial of Greco, implicating a member of the House, and of her majesty's government, in the plot for the assassination of our ally, the Emperor of the French, deserved the serious consideration of the House."

Mr. Stansfeld, on this occasion, repeated some of his former denials. His name had been connected with the revolutionary designs of Orsini; and bank-notes had been passed with his name on them. He asserted, that it was the first time he had ever heard that his name was associated with the revolutionary designs of Orsini or others; he admitted that it was inscribed on bank-notes, which he believed would have been used, not in the interests of the assassins, but to aid in the establishment of a free and united Italy; he had now, acting on the advice of his friends, withdrawn his name from the notes. He also now admitted that he had, in common with other English friends of Signor Mazzini, allowed the Italian to have letters addressed to his house, not in his own name, but to M. Flori (or Flowers, in the English language). None would be addressed there in the future, Mazzini having taken steps to prevent it. Lord Palmerston, and some friends of the government, deemed Mr. Stansfeld's explanation satisfactory; and Mr. P. A. Taylor said, he, as well as other of Signor Mazzini's friends, knowing that any letters addressed to him from Italy could never be expected to be delivered to him in London, had placed his (Mr. Taylor's) address at the signor's disposal. Mr. Disraeli, and other members on both sides of the House, thought the conduct of Mr. Stansfeld must implicate us with the French emperor; but when a division was taken on the resolution, it was rejected by a majority of ten—161 "ayes" to 171 "noes." The next day Mr. Stansfeld tendered his resignation to the premier. Lord Palmerston wished him to retain office; but he thought that doing so would only embarrass the government, and he persisted in retiring. His intention was not announced to the House till after the Easter recess. When parliament reassembled, on the 4th of April, Mr. Stansfeld stated that he was no longer a member of the administration. Mr. Childers, member for Pontefract, was appointed to succeed him as a junior lord of the Admiralty.

On the 12th of April, another question was brought forward in the House of Commons, which also caused the resignation of a member of the government. It appeared that the reports of the inspectors of the national schools were frequently materially altered, as to their tendency, by the exclusion of certain passages; and it was asserted that this was done by, or at the suggestion of, Mr. Robert Lowe, the vice-president of the committee of council on education; the parts and passages eliminated being those which were opposed to that right honourable gentleman's views and opinions. On the 12th of April, Lord Robert Cecil stated what was known and reported on this question, and moved—"That, in the opinion of this House, the mutilation of the reports of her majesty's inspectors of schools, and the exclusion from them of statements and opinions adverse to the educational views entertained by the committee of council, while matters favourable to them are admitted, are violations of the understanding under which the appointment of inspectors was originally sanctioned by parliament, and tend entirely to destroy the value of their reports."

Mr. Lowe denied that the reports were garbled; but when the inspectors diverged into discussion, gave arguments instead of reporting facts, then they were returned to them for correction. Mr. Walter and several other members took part in the debate, asserting that passages in the reports were marked and expunged—a practice they condemned; whilst Sir George Grey maintained that it was absolutely necessary that the heads of departments should exercise some control over the reports of their inspectors. On this occasion the government was defeated, the resolution being carried by 101 votes to 93.—On the 18th of April, Lord Granville referred to the resolution, and defended the council of education. His lordship said, as president of the council, he was the person morally and officially responsible; and denied, as Mr. Lowe had done, that the reports of the inspectors had been violated. On the 18th of April, Mr. Lowe announced that he had resigned his office. It seems that some of the reports had been handed about amongst the members, in which passages were marked. He said, the subordinates in the educational department, who had placed those reports in the hands of members, had betrayed their trust, and he severely reprobated their conduct. Those marks ought never to have been made; they had not been made by the order or with the knowledge of Earl Granville or himself; or for the purpose of influencing the inspectors as to the passages they were to omit; but in consequence of a mistaken and erroneous practice which prevailed till 1862, when he forbade it. What he did with the reports, when they were not in accordance with the minute of council, drawn up in 1861, was, to send them back to the inspectors, that they might correct them in accordance with the rules and principles laid down by the council. Lord Robert Cecil declared that his resolution was not directed personally against Mr. Lowe, but against an objectionable and censurable practice. If the explanation the House had just heard, had been given on the 12th, it was probable that his resolution would not have been pressed to a division. Mr. Lowe persisted in his resignation; Mr. Henry Austin Bruce, the member for Merthyr-Tydvil, was appointed vice-president of the committee of council in his place; and a select committee was nominated, to inquire into the practice of the committee of council on education, with respect to the reports of the inspectors. The report of the committee exculpated Mr. Lowe from the charge of improperly altering or mutilating the inspectors' reports; and a resolution moved by Lord Palmerston, to rescind that passed on the 12th of April, was carried nem con.

Before the session closed, the foreign policy of the government, especially with respect to Denmark (then at war with Austria and Prussia), was made the subject of a motion in both Houses. In the Commons, on the 4th of July, Mr. Disraeli moved an address to her majesty, expressing the concern of the House that the conference recently held in London, with respect to the Danish and German question, "had been brought to a close without accomplishing the important purpose for which it was convened:" and its regret that the course pursued by the government, while it had not maintained its avowed policy of upholding the integrity and independence of Denmark, had "lowered the just influence of this country in the councils of Europe, and thereby diminished the securities for peace. Mr. Kinglake moved, as an amendment to this address, a resolution, expressing the satisfaction of the House that "her majesty had been advised to abstain from armed interference in the war." After four nights' debate, the amendment was, on the 8th of July, carried by 313 votes to 295. The same night, in the Lords, the Earl of Malmesbury moved an address to the Queen, identical with that which Mr. Disraeli had brought forward in the lower House; and it was carried by 177 "contents" to 168 "non-contents." It was considered, that notwithstanding this adverse vote, the position of the ministers was improved by the decision of the Commons, and that Lord Palmerston's tenure of office was strengthened.

It was very well known that the prime minister had no wish to meddle with the question of parliamentary reform; and there was no excitement out of doors on the subject. The three members, however, who had their peculiar crotchets on that question—Mr. Locke King, Mr. Baines, and Mr. H. Berkeley—made their annual motions only to encounter defeat. On the 23rd of February, the last-named member obtained leave to bring in a bill for extending the franchise, in counties, to £10 householders: but, when the motion for the second reading came before the House, on the 13th of April, it was negatived by 254 to 227 votes. Mr. Baines' bill for extending the borough franchise to £6 householders shared the same fate. It was read a first time without opposition: on the 11th of May he moved the second reading, and was supported by the votes of only 216 members, against 272 who went into the opposite lobby.—On the 21st of June, Mr. H. Berkeley moved, that it would be expedient, at the next general election, "that a fair trial should be given to the vote by ballot." Lord Palmerston opposed the motion, as secret voting was inconsistent with the character of Englishmen; and 212 members voted against the ballot, which had only 123 supporters. The debates on the first and last of these motions were quite unimportant; and so would that on the second have been but for an unexpected declaration on the part of Mr. Gladstone, who then made his first public advance towards the extreme Liberal party, which soon looked upon him as its leader, in connection with Mr. Bright. The right honourable gentleman spoke in favour of Mr. Baines' bill; expressed his opinion that the upper portion of the working classes was not inferior to the lowest portion of the middle; and declared, "that every man who is not presumably incapacitated by some consideration of personal unfitness, or political danger, is morally entitled to come within the pale of the constitution;" that is, to be admitted to the exercise of the franchise—for the extreme reformers contend that those who have no votes are really excluded from their rights, and do not participate in the benefits the constitution confers. Some people consider this a fallacy, and maintain that every person is "within the pale of the constitution," which protects high and low, poor and rich, alike in their persons and their property, and permits every man to follow the dictates of his own inclination, provided they do not lead him into crime, and stimulate him, by word or deed, to injure and annoy his neighbour.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced his budget, this year, on the 7th of April, when the House of Commons was densely filled in every part, seats and standing-places being alike occupied, so great was the anxiety to hear the right honourable gentleman make his financial statement.—After entering into details of the past, to show the increased and increasing prosperity of the country—and having reviewed the effects of recent fiscal legislation upon particular articles, including paper, spirits, wine, tobacco, and tea, all of which had been favourable—he entered upon the prospects of the financial year 1864-'65. Estimating the expenditure at £66,890,000, and the revenue at £69,460,000, he calculated upon possessing a surplus of £2,570,000. Instead of applying this surplus to the public service, he proposed to apply it to the reduction of taxation. First dealing with the sugar duties, he proposed to reduce the duty, in each of the four classes, to 12*s.* 10*d.*, 11*s.* 8*d.*, 10*s.* 6*d.*, and 9*s.* 4*d.* per cwt. He further proposed to add a new class of inferior sugars at 8*s.* 2*d.* The amount of these reductions he estimated at £1,330,000. He also proposed to reduce the income-tax 1*d.* in the pound; and that on policies for fire-insurances, from 3*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.* per cent., as far as stock-in-trade was concerned; estimating the loss to the revenue, by the first measure, at £1,200,000; and, by the second, at £283,000.—These proposals were favourably received by the majority of the House; though several members declared their opinion to be in favour of the repeal of the malt-tax; and Mr. Sheridan contended for a further reduction of the duty on fireinsurances.—On the 21st of April, in a committee of ways and means, that gentleman moved, that instead of a reduction to 1s. 6*d*. per cent. on stock-in-trade, the reduction should be to 1s. upon all descriptions of property insured. This motion was negatived by 170 to 117 votes.—When the alteration of the sugar duties was under consideration, Colonel Barttelot moved that it should be postponed till the House "had had the opportunity of deciding upon the expediency of the reduction of the duty on malt." This motion was negatived, the "ayes" being 99; "noes," 247.—A motion, made by Mr. Morritt, "that, in case of any modification of the indirect taxation of this country, the excise on malt requires consideration," shared the same fate; 118 votes being given for, to 166 against it.—All the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were carried.

Amongst the acts passed in the session of 1864, was one to allow farmers and others, on taking out licences as maltsters, to make and use malt free of duty, for the feeding of animals, if mixed with linseed cake, linseed meal, or such other substance as may be hereafter described by the commissioners of the inland revenue. —Another act prohibits the employment of children, under ten years of age, in the business of a chimney-sweeper, except in the house or yard of the employer; and no chimney-sweeper is to take with him, when going to sweep a chimney, extinguish a fire, &c., any person under the age of sixteen.—A third extends the provisions of the Factory Acts to the manufacture of earthenware, except bricks and tiles, not being ornamental tiles; of lucifer-matches, percussion-caps, cartridges, paper-staining, and fustian-cutting.—A fourth renders "permissive" the use of weights and measures upon the metric system; but, eagerly as that system has been advocated and defended, we do not hear of this act having been brought into operation.—Parliament was prorogued on the 29th of July.

Next to the birth of the young prince, Albert Victor, the most important event to the royal family, during the year, was the christening of the royal infant, which took place on the 10th of March, in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. The King of the Belgians came to England to be present at the ceremony, which was attended by her majesty and the members of the royal family in England. The names given to the young heir to England's throne, were Albert Victor Christian Edward. In June, the prince and princess visited Cambridge; in September, their royal highnesses went to the continent; and, after a long visit to the courts of Denmark and Sweden, returned to England on the 7th of November.

The most notable event in England, during 1864, was the visit of Garibaldi. On the 7th of January he resigned his seat in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, and he then resolved to come to this country—with what object, perhaps, will never be accurately ascertained. That he intended coming to see his English friends was announced in March, and great preparations were made for his reception. He was accompanied by his sons, Menotti and Ricotti; Dr. Guerzoni, his private secretary, and a member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies; and Signor Basso, who had been his constant companion and friend for fifteen years. A passage was taken for the party on board the Peninsula and Oriental Company's steamer, the Ripon. They were to land at Southampton; and were expected on the 1st or 2nd of April, but the steamer did not reach the coast till after twelve at noon on Sunday, the 3rd. The vessel had been seen off Hurst Castle three hours before she arrived in the harbour; and the Duke of Sutherland, with Mr. Seeley, M.P., and some other gentlemen, immediately went on board. Four Italian gentlemen accompanied them, to whom, after a few words had passed between them, Garibaldi gave a note, containing the following words:—"Dear friends, I desire to have no political demonstration; above all, not to excite any tumults." This wish of Garibaldi's those gentlemen were to communicate to their countrymen in England. When the Ripon entered the harbour, she carried the Italian flag at the main, and the company's at the foremast. For several hours previously, the quays, and every place from whence a sight of the vessel could be obtained, had been covered with crowds of eager gazers—the population and visitants of Southampton and its neighbourhood; by whom the Italian chief, as the vessel approached the shore, was hailed with a succession of cheers, such as only Englishmen can give. He wore grey trousers, and the red Garibaldi tunic, which, strange to say, for some time after, set a fashion to the ladies of England. Over that was a grey cloak, lined with scarlet, and buttoned across the breast, and that was surmounted by a crimson silk handkerchief, thrown over his shoulders, and tied loosely round the neck, with a sailor's knot. In compliance with repeated calls from the shore, Garibaldi took up his station on the paddle-box; and there he was joined by the mayor of Southampton, who went on board, and in the names of himself, the corporation, and the town, invited the chief to be his guest while he remained at that port. Garibaldi replied—"Mayor, I thank you; I accept the invitation." The crowd rendered landing difficult, and access to the mayor's house still more so. It was, however, reached at last. Garibaldi remained his worship's guest till the Tuesday; then he accompanied Mr. Seeley to his residence in the Isle of Wight where he stayed till Monday, the 11th of April; "receiving honours and hospitalities from the municipal authorities of Southampton. On the day named, he was taken in the morning from Cowes, by the Medina steamer, to Southampton. The mayor's carriage was in waiting to conduct him to the railway station; which was profusely decorated with gay banners, some of them bearing appropriate mottoes; wreaths of laurel, and flowers. Crowds lined the streets, the balconies and windows were filled with ladies and gentlemen (many more of the former than the latter), and the waving of handkerchiefs was incessant. The chief and his friends left Southampton in a special train of ten carriages. At every station on the line, to the Nine Elms, as many persons as could get near eagerly cheered the train. At Nine Elms crowds were also collected; and along the entire route from that spot to Stafford House, St. James's, the town residence of the Duke of Sutherland—which was Garibaldi's destination—there was the same display; numerous banners floating in the air, bearing the mottoes, "Welcome, King of Men;" "Long live Garibaldi;" "Welcome the true Patriot;" "The Man of the People;" "The Hero of Italy," and other inscriptions of the same tendency. A procession of the trades' unions, and others, was formed on the Wandsworth Road; but, before he could join it, Garibaldi had to receive several addresses, to which he briefly replied; and then entered an open carriage, drawn by four horses, which was prepared for him. It was with great difficulty the procession—in which the Odd Fellows, the Druids, the Temperance, and the Cordwainers' Societies, joined the trades' unions—made its way. As the long cortége proceeded by Pall-Mall, to Stafford House, the club-houses were all brilliantly lit up; every window and balcony was crowded with fashionably-dressed spectators, who waved their handkerchiefs, and threw rosettes to the chieftain as he passed; and the cheering from the crowds in the streets never ceased. About half-past seven, the leaders of the procession halted at Stafford House; where Garibaldi, on entering, was received and cordially welcomed by the Duchess and the Duchess-dowager of Sutherland.—He remained in London from the 11th to the 22nd of April; every day being devoted to festivities or excursions; and wherever Garibaldi appeared, he was hailed with the same enthusiasm. In London, he received, from the resident Italians, a sword; and the lord mayor and corporation presented him with the freedom of the city, in a valuable gold box. Whilst in the metropolis, he accepted numerous invitations to different parts of England; and arrangements were making, at the places where he was expected, to receive him with due honours. Whilst the interest he had excited was at its height, suddenly, on the 22nd of April, he left London, on his return to Caprera, to the great surprise of the public. On his departure, he issued an address to the people of England, in which he said, he could not fulfil all the engagements pressed upon him; and as he could not draw the line where he could and where he could not go, he, for the present, said farewell; "still, he hoped, at no distant time, to return to see his friends in the domestic life of England." On leaving London, he visited the Dowager-duchess of Sutherland, at her residence, Cliefden, Berkshire; he also went to Windsor, and Eton College. On the 25th, he embarked on board the Duke of Sutherland's yacht, the Undine, at Fowey; and, accompanied by the duke and duchess, and the dowager-duchess, he returned to Caprera.—There were various rumours as to the cause of his unexpected departure. It was officially stated, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer supported that statement in the House of Commons, that his health was enfeebled, and that he could not have kept his numerous engagements without great danger. The multitude attributed his departure to political causes; and it was asserted, that he had received an intimation from the government, that it was necessary he should leave England, as his presence here was embarrassing to them: that intimation, it was asserted and believed, was conveyed to him by Mr. Gladstone. This was the popular version of the cause of his departure; and most people think it was the true one.

This April, the 300th anniversary of Shakspeare's birth was celebrated, on the 23rd of the month, at Stratford-on-Avon, in London, and in many other places, with every demonstration of respect and veneration for our great national dramatist. In London, it had been intended to commemorate the day by laying the first stone of a national monument to the bard. But though the Right Hon. William Cowper, First Commissioner of Works, and son-in-law to the premier, was at the head of this movement, it was so ill-managed that it fell through.—On the 24th of May, the anniversary of her majesty's birth was celebrated, for the first time since the death of the late Prince Consort, with all the old observances. The usual salutes were fired from the Park and Tower guns; all the shipping in the river, and all the public buildings, were decorated with flags; the morning was ushered in with peals from the joy-bells of the churches of St. Margaret's Westminster, St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and Kensington, which were continued during the day; and at night there were dinners and illuminations. Everywhere the day appears to have been kept as a great holiday; and our gracious Queen must have been highly pleased with this display of loyal affection on the part of her subjects.

During the year there were several fearful accidents: a few deserve mentioning in this résumé. On the 15th of January, at half-past 7 P.M., a fire broke out on board a vessel, called the Slottie Sleigh, lying in the river Mersey, off Tranmere. She was loaded with eleven tons of gunpowder, which exploded with a terrific effect upon the inhabitants of Liverpool and Birkenhead. In both these ports the gas in the streets and shops was extinguished, numerous windows were blown in, and much property destroyed. No person was killed.—On the 11th of March, at nearly midnight, the walls of the Bradfield reservoir, near Sheffield, burst with a loud report, and the water rushed like a cataract over the villages, into and through Sheffield, and down the vale of the Don to Doncaster. Houses and their inhabitants, furniture, domestic animals and those in the fields, trees, stacks of wheat and hay — everything which arrested its progress was swept away with the rushing stream. Entire rows of cottages, with the different families, most of them at the moment wrapt in slumber, were wrecked by the flood. At least 270 persons lost their lives by this calamity—nearly all, certainly, and probably every individual of the number, being in bed at the time. The property destroyed could not be wholly replaced even by the expenditure of more than £1,000,000; and many sufferers were reduced to poverty, besides having to mourn the loss of relatives and friends. The survivors were houseless, and 200 beds were appropriated for their use. A subscription was also opened for their relief, and a very large sum was raised.—On the 7th of July, soon after 2 o'clock P.M., a fire (occasioned, it is said, by the carelessness of the workmen employed there) was discovered in the old Royal Chapel of the Savoy, in the Strand. This edifice, described as "one of the most interesting monuments of historical antiquity in London," was all that remained of the old Hospital of St. John the Baptist, and it stood upon the site of the palace of Peter de Savoy, which Henry, the first Duke of Lancaster, rebuilt. The fire left nothing remaining of the chapel but the bare walls; and the Queen has had it rebuilt at her own expense. Another great loss to London—many things being destroyed which can never be replaced—was the destruction by fire, on the 13th of September, of Haberdashers' Hall, and some fine new buildings in Gresham Street. The money loss was estimated at half a million; but that did not include many valuable paintings, and other historical relics of the Haberdashers' Company, upon which no money value could be placed.

We have had little to say, latterly, of either Scotland or Ireland, apart from England; the historical incidents of the latter affecting the United Kingdom. But in 1864 there was much rioting at Belfast, arising out of the old cause—religious differences. On the 8th of August, a statue of Daniel O'Connell, erected as a memorial of that once celebrated man, was inaugurated at Dublin. There was a grand procession and a public dinner, the Lord Mayor of Dublin presiding at the latter: but there was nothing at either that ought to have annoyed the Protestants so far as to call forth any counter-demonstration. At Belfast such a demonstration was, however, made. An effigy of O'Connell was constructed; the hands were placed in a begging attitude, and a large wallet by the side of the figure indicated a readiness to receive that "rent" which was so liberally contributed to O'Connell for the last years of his life. This figure was carried through the town, followed by several thousands of the working classes, and accompanied by bands of drums and fifes. In the evening it was burned amid the cheers of the populace; and the ashes being placed in a coffin, were paraded through the town, then burned, and the embers scattered. For this insult to their departed leader, the Roman Catholics determined to be revenged. The next day they broke the windows of two meeting-houses, and of the dwellings of several Protestants; and this was the commencement of riots and outrages which extended to the 24th before Belfast could be declared tranquil, though, for several days, there had been 3,000 soldiers and 1,000 police in the town. At that time Belfast presented the appearance of a city which a hostile force had devastated. Rows of houses were seen, with the doors and windows destroyed, and the furniture broken and rendered useless; all the public buildings, and most of the places of worship, were more or less injured; and heaps of ruins were seen in every direction. Nine persons were killed in the riots, and 176 wounded were taken to the General Hospital. Many were attended to in their own houses, the number of whom was not ascertained. There were riots at Dundalk (where the Roman Catholics burned the effigy of William III., and broke the windows of the Protestants), and at Longford, Cork, and some other places; but in none did they reach the violence displayed in Belfast. Before the year closed, the government appointed a commission of inquiry to investigate the causes which had led to the disturbances at Belfast; and this caused a change in the police system of that town, and some other arrangements, which, if the unhappy feud between Protestants and Roman Catholics is not abated, has, at all events, done much to preserve the peace. About the time of the Belfast riots, the Earl of Carlisle resigned the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland on account of ill-health. He was succeeded by Lord Wodehouse. The noble earl died on the 5th of December.

Our colonial history was distinguished, in 1864, by the commencement of a movement in North America, in which the government at home concurred; the object being to effect the federation of the British colonies in that quarter—Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and Prince Edward's Island. Delegates from all those colonies met at Quebec, and, on the 10th of October, passed resolutions, declaring, that the best interests, and present and future prosperity of British North America, would be promoted by a Federal Union, under the crown of Great Britain, provided such union could be effected on principles just to the several provinces;" and containing the outlines of a scheme of federation. That union is now accomplished; and there is every reason to believe that its results will be greatly for the benefit of the respective colonies.

Our other colonies were all tranquil and progressing; but, in October, Calcutta was visited by one of the most destructive hurricanes, or cyclones, ever experienced. Out of a population of 8,500 persons, 7,000 were drowned. Great damage was done to the vessels in the river, and few buildings in Calcutta escaped injury, some being totally wrecked.—Masulipatam, a district of the Madras presidency, stretching along the coast of the Bay of Bengal, suffered even more than Calcutta and its neighbourhood. The number of lives lost is said to have been from 60,000 to 70,000.

In Europe, the greatest interest was excited by the attack of Austria and Prussia upon Denmark, to deprive Christian IX. of Schleswig and Holstein; though both those powers were parties to the treaty of 1852, which guaranteed them to the successor of Frederick VII. Of course, Denmark could not withstand the forces of the two powers. Her troops fought well in several engagements; but they were driven out of the duchies. Soon after hostilities commenced, a conference was held in London, at the instance of Earl Russell, for the purpose of attempting to settle the points in dispute. It was attended by plenipotentiaries from France, Prussia, Austria, the German Diet, Denmark, and Russia. Several meetings were held, hostilities being suspended from the 12th of May to the 12th of June. Earl Russell submitted various propositions, which the neutral powers supported, but to which the belligerents would not assent, and the conference, which had assembled on the 25th of April, broke up on the 22nd of June, having produced no result. Hostilities were renewed, and continued till the close of July. On the 1st of August preliminaries of peace were signed; and on the 1st of October, at Vienna, a treaty, founded upon those preliminaries, was concluded. By that treaty the King of Denmark renounced his rights to the duchies of Schleswig, Holstein, and Lauenburg: the Danish forces were withdrawn from them, and they were occupied by Austrian and Prussian troops; a Federal army, which had been sent to Holstein, being withdrawn.

The only other events on the continent which it is necessary to mention are, the conclusion of a convention between the Emperor of France and the King of Italy, and the vote of the Italian legislature for transferring the seat of government from Turin to Florence, and declaring the latter city the capital of Italy. The convention was signed on the 15th of September: by it France agreed to withdraw her troops from Rome within two years; Italy engaging not to violate the present territory of the pope, and "to prevent, even by force, any attack upon that territory coming from without;" to raise no protest against the organisation of a papal army, even if composed of foreign [Roman] Catholic volunteers; and to enter into an arrangement to take upon her a proportionate part of the debt of the former States of the Church.—The bill to change the seat of government to Florence was introduced into the Italian Chamber of Deputies immediately after the convention was signed. It was strongly opposed; but was ultimately adopted by a majority of 134 to 47; and Victor Emmanuel, on the 11th of December, issued a decree, announcing that, within six months, the capital of the kingdom would be transferred to Florence.

Two European sovereigns died in 1864:—Maximilian, King of Bavaria, on the 10th of March, in his fifty-fourth year; and was succeeded by Ludwig, who was born on the 25th of August, 1845.—On the 25th of June, William Frederick Charles, King of Wurtemberg, died. He was born in 1781, and was, at the time of his death, the oldest reigning sovereign in Europe.

The civil war in America continued; and it was evident that the North must finally triumph.—On the 20th of June, the Federal war-steamer, the Kearsage, fell-in with the Alabama off Cherbourg, and sunk. A formal demand was subsequently made upon England for adequate compensation for the losses inflicted upon the Federal commerce through the captures made by the Alabama.—On the 6th of December, Abraham Lincoln (for whom a majority of the Electoral College had voted as president a second time) sent his message to congress. It announced a determination to continue the war with the South, and did not hold out the slightest indications of peace.

CHAPTER CXXI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1865.

THE state of the United Kingdom was favourable at the period of the opening of parliament in 1865. Friendly relations were existing, and, it was hoped, would be maintained with foreign states; and only one distant corner of her colonial possessions gave employment to a military force. This was at New Zealand. There a desultory contest with the natives had, for some time, been carried on; insuring a certain amount of loss to Great Britain, without the slightest return of either honour or advantage to compensate it. Allowing for this drawback, the country might be considered in a highly favourable condition. Its internal state was tranquil and prosperous, and the continued increase of the national wealth was perfectly visible on all sides. Trade was in a healthy condition; the revenue exhibited a degree of buoyancy equivalent to what it had maintained for several years past; and there was an entire absence of political agitation, or other symptoms of popular dissatisfaction. The great calamity of the cotton famine, so disastrous during the two preceding years, had now been effectually checked, and the manufacturing districts of Lancashire evinced signs of a rapidly resuscitating industry, accompanied with an evident increase of comfort. All this formed matter of consolation. The long-protracted contest in the United States seemed, after four years of unmitigated severity, to give signs of coming soon to a close. Exhaustion on the side of the Confederate States became obvious; and the end of a struggle which, on both sides, had been maintained with extraordinary persistency, did not appear to be distant. Up to this period, the policy of England had been to maintain an independent neutrality throughout the contest; and to this policy she still adhered; whilst the administration of Lord Palmerston did not seem to have lost the strong hold which it had hitherto preserved upon the general mind of the nation.

Parliament was summoned to meet on the 7th of February; and the duty of opening it, on that day, was performed by commission. The address of her majesty elicited little opposition in the debates which followed it: the Earl of Derby, leader of the opposition, closing his speech with the remark, that he had no intention to oppose the address, and hoped that it would have the unanimous assent of the Lords.

In the Commons, a debate took place upon the condition of Ireland, elicited by a passage in the royal speech, which said, that "Ireland, during the past year, had had its share in the advantage of a good harvest; and that trade and manufactures were gradually extending in that part of the kingdom." This was protested against by Mr. Scully, who said, that the general condition of Ireland could not be regarded as either prosperous or satisfactory, as multitudes of the inhabitants continued to emigrate to foreign countries, from the lack of remunerative employment in their native land. This was opposed by the government; and was the means of bringing on a more general discussion, shortly after the commencement of the session, upon the condition of the sister island. That discussion was introduced by a resolution, moved by Mr. Pope Henessey, which led to an adjourned debate, in which several of the leading members of the House took part. In concluding the discussion, Lord Palmerston, in a conciliatory and judicious speech, said—

"A few years ago, the great evil of Ireland was represented to be a redundant population; and the chief remedy, which was then universally recommended, was an extensive emigration. It is, undoubtedly, painful to contemplate the causes which lead to emigration; but emigration in itself is no evil. If those who emigrate find in another country a better condition than they enjoyed in their own, they become happier; their welfare is increased; and, besides that, the condition of those who stay behind is improved by the circumstance that a smaller number of persons are left to enjoy the advantages which their native country may possess. That which we lament with regard to the emigration is, that, unfortunately, the condition of Ireland is such, that the people are able to find, elsewhere, a better state of things than exists at home. Various reasons have been assigned for this. I believe that one great and almost paramount reason is, the peculiarity of the climate. Ireland is said by many to be a most fertile country. No doubt, there are in it great tracts of very fertile land—far more fertile than any other parts of either England or Scotland. I know land on which it is said that grain-crops have been raised for sixteen years in succession, which cannot be said of any part of Great Britain. But there are also, in Ireland, great quantities of land which are wholly unproductive—bog and mountain—and that ought to be taken into consideration when you calculate the population which the superficial area of the island is able to support. You cannot expect that any artificial remedies which legislators can invent, can counteract the laws of nature, and keep, in one country, a population which finds it to its advantage to emigrate to another. Things will find their level; and until, by some means or other, there shall be provided in Ireland the same remuneration for labour, and the same inducements to remain which are provided by other countries, you cannot, by any laws which you can devise, prevent the people from seeking elsewhere a better condition of things than exists in their own country. We are told that tenant-right, and a great many other things, will do it; but none of these things will, in regard to this matter, have the slightest effect. As to tenant-right, I may be allowed to say that, I think, it is equivalent to landlords'-wrong. As I understand it to be proposed, tenant-right would be little short of confiscation; and although that might cause the landlords to emigrate, it certainly would not keep the tenants at home. The real question is, how can you create in Ireland that demand and reward for labour, which would render its people willing to stay at home, instead of emigrating to England or Scotland on the one hand, or to the North American States on the other? Nothing can do this except the influx of capital. Ireland has many advantages for the employment of capital; but, hitherto, manufacturing industries have taken but very little root there."

Considering from whom these observations came, they are characterised by much candour and good sense: but what was the cause of this absence of capital? One great cause was a prevalent opinion that there was not the same security for property in that country that was to be found elsewhere. Hitherto the political and religious feuds which prevailed among the Irish, engendered an almost continual feeling of distrust and alarm. Could English and Scotch capitalists be convinced that they were perfectly safe in embarking speculative capital in Ireland, where they would possess the advantages of cheap labour and power for working their machinery, nothing would prevent capital, which seeks employment for itself in the most distant regions of the earth, from finding its way into Ireland. Agricultural improvements could not prevent emigration, but, if judiciously adopted, they might afford increased employment for labour; and it might be well worth considering whether, by means of monetary advances, to be within a certain number of years repaid, landowners might not at once improve the value of their property, and afford an increase of wages to the population. Whatever suggestions were made by the different speakers who took part in this interesting debate, they were generally negatived by the government; and Lord Palmerston concluded with the following observations:—

"I can only say that the government fully share the feeling of deep interest and sympathy that has been expressed towards Ireland by all who have spoken in this debate. It is impossible for any man to know anything of the Irish people without wishing them every happiness which can be conferred upon them. They are a light-hearted and a warm-hearted race; they are, also, most industrious wherever they can see the prospect that by industry they will get the reward to which industry entitles men. It is quite a mistake to suppose that the Irish are an idle race, unwilling to labour, and not prepared to make great exertions for the sake of accomplishing any legitimate object. They are a people for whom every man who knows them must entertain the utmost sympathy, and must feel the strongest desire that they should enjoy every advantage which can be conferred upon them by legislation, or by any artificial arrangements which it is in the power of the government or parliament to make." Notwithstanding the friendly professions shadowed forth by Lord Palmerston, a division took place upon the resolution, which was negatived by a majority; the numbers being 107 to 31.

The question as to the agricultural and social condition of Ireland came again under discussion, in the House of Commons, on the 31st of March. The subject was brought forward by Mr. Maguire, who made a motion for a select committee to inquire into the laws regulating the relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland, with a view to their more equitable adjustment. To meet the question, Lord Palmerston suggested the appointment of a committee, with the limited object of inquiry into the tenure and improvement of land in Ireland, under the Act 23 & 24 Victoria. This was accepted by Mr. Maguire, when another motion was made by Mr. Dilwyn, on the Irish church establishment. He proposed the adoption of the following resolution:—"That the present position of the Irish church establishment is unsatisfactory, and calls for the early attention of her majesty's government." The debate on this great question was adjourned; and, notwithstanding its importance, it was not again resumed during the session. It may, however, be observed that, viewing the Protestant establishment in Ireland in the light of a missionary church, the results were not favourable to the preservation of its position. Upon this point Mr. Gladstone said—

"In the latter part of the 17th century, an estimate was made by Sir W. Petty of the relative strength of Protestants to Roman Catholics in Ireland. I now take all classes of Protestants together for the purpose of more convenient comparison, and I find the result he arrived at was—Roman Catholics, 800,000; Protestants, 300,000. The date of that estimate was followed by a century of application of most rigid penal laws. There is not, I apprehend, the least doubt, that as regards particular classes of society, those penal laws, to a certain extent, did their work; yet they failed to impress the mass of the population. And now we come to the year 1834, the first year of any trustworthy and accurate religious enumeration of the people of Ireland, and we find that those who were represented, in the time of Sir W. Petty, by 800,000 and 300,000, had come to be respectively 6,400,000 of Roman Catholics, 1,500,000 of Protestants of various denominations. If the proportion between Roman Catholics and Protestants, that existed in the time of Sir W. Petty, had been maintained, the Protestants of 1834 ought not to have been 1,500,000, but ought to have been 2,400,000. So far, therefore, under the operation of the system of law then established, although aided by the severest pressure of the power of the civil government—so far were we from making progress in the direction in which, upon every religious ground, we might desire, that much ground had actually been lost, and the proportion of Protestants to Roman Catholics was more unfavourable than it had been 150 years before."

On the 27th of April, Mr. Gladstone made his financial statement to the House of Commons. In the royal speech, it had been stated that the receipts of the revenue realised the estimated amount, although this was, in reality, an under-statement of the fact. The successful results of the finances had, in fact, exceeded the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Some remissions of taxes, therefore, were expected to be made, and public feeling was naturally excited by anticipating the probabilities involved in the Chancellor's statement. When the 27th day of April came, Mr. Gladstone presented, to a very crowded House, the accounts of the past, with the calculations and plans for the ensuing year. "The financial history of parliament," he said, "has been a remarkable one. It has raised a larger revenue than, I believe, at any period, whether of peace or war, was raised by taxation. After taking into account the changes in the value of money within an equal time, the expenditure of the parliament has been upon a scale that has never before been reached in time of peace." The truth of this statement he then elucidated and proved. Amongst his equalisations and reductions of the taxes of the country, was his remission of a portion of the duty on tea. "It is the intention of the government now to propose a reduction of indirect taxation by a partial remission of 6*d.* per lb. on the tea duty." This boon was well received by the public at large, as were most of the other propositions of the Chancellor. Indeed, most of the reductions made were anticipated by public conjecture. Accordingly, the budget was accepted with general satisfaction, and hardly any manifestation of opposition to the general statement. The reduction of the tea duty was especially hailed as a wise relief to all classes of the community, and, by the poorer classes, was more particularly estimated as a great boon. The diminution in the income-tax was also received as a popular measure. Those who had felt the weight of 7*d.*, and even for a time had 14*d.*, pressing upon them, experienced a lively sense of relief in being now subjected only to a deduction of 4*d.* in the pound from their incomes, instead of 7*d.* The different fiscal alterations comprised in the budget, being incorporated in a bill, passed through the House of Commons with little delay.

On the 2nd of April, Richard Cobden, the most prominent public advocate for a repeal of the corn-laws, died at his lodgings in Suffolk Street, London. For several years he had been a sufferer from ill health, but had, about three weeks before his death, arrived in the metropolis for the purpose of taking part in the debate in parliament on the question of Canadian defences. As a public man, he was earnest in all that he undertook, and his private moral character was spotless. On the 29th of June, 1846, in the House of Commons, Sir Robert Peel said—"In proposing our measures of commercial policy I had no wish to rob others of the credit due to them. The name which ought to be, and will be associated with these measures, is not the name of the noble lord, the organ of the party of which he is the leader, nor is it mine. The name which ought to be, and will be, associated with those measures, is that of one who, acting as I believe from pure and disinterested motives, has, with untiring energy, made appeals to our reason, and has enforced these appeals with an eloquence the more to be admired because it was unaffected and unadorned. The name which ought to be chiefly associated with those measures is that of Richard Cobden."

The unexpected, and somewhat premature close of Mr. Cobden's life, elicited an almost unanimous expression of deep regret from his countrymen, who, notwithstanding the angry passions once excited by the controversy on the corn-laws, could not help respecting the genuine probity and disinterested features of his character, and acknowledging that few popular leaders had ever maintained so high a standard of moderation and self-respect, or shown themselves so completely superior to the mean, selfish arts and motives of the mere demagogue. It was on this account that the general public, on hearing of his death, was struck with a deep sense of sorrow; and that the legislature had lost an able man, and a public-spirited citizen, well deserving to claim place among the benefactors of his country. The honour paid to his memory, however, was not confined to Britain. In France the name and character of Richard Cobden were held in high estimation. The Emperor Napoleon III. addressed a letter to his widow, expressing, in warm terms, the respect in which he had held the deceased; whilst other parts of the continent were not slow in testifying their regret at his loss. The United States of America, also, bore testimony to the merits of the great free-trader, and offered flattering tributes to his memory. Nowhere, however, was sorrow more sincerely expressed than in the British House of Commons, where he had so often taken the foremost place in debate, and where his personal character was so fully appreciated by men of all parties. Lord Palmerston, after paying a high and honourable tribute to his memory, said—"The country has sustained a loss which it will be difficult to repair. Mr. Cobden's name will be for ever engraved on the most interesting pages of the history of his country; and I am sure there is not a man in this House who does not feel the greatest regret that the House has lost one of its brightest ornaments, and that the country has lost one of its most useful servants." After referring to the public career of the deceased, Mr. Disraeli said—"There is something mournful in the history of this parliament. When we remember how many of our most eminent and valuable public men we have lost, I cannot refer to the history of any parliament which will bear to posterity so fatal a record. But, Sir, there is this consolation to us, when we remember those unequalled and irreparable losses, that those great men are not altogether lost to us—that their words will be often quoted in this House; that their example will often be referred and appealed to; and that even their expressions will form part of our discussions and debates. There are, indeed, some members of parliament who, though they may not be present, are still members of this House, who are independent of dissolutions, of the caprices of constituencies, and even of the course of time. I think, Sir, that Mr. Cobden was one of those men; and I believe, that when the verdict of posterity shall be recorded upon his life and conduct, it will be said of him that, looking to his expressions and deeds, he was, without doubt, the greatest political character that the pure middle class of this country has yet produced: that he was an ornament to the House of Commons, and an honour to England." Such were the tributes paid by the two great leaders of opposing parties in the House of Commons, to the merits, private and public, of Richard Cobden, the champion of free trade in corn, and, consequently, of cheap bread for the British people.

A few weeks after the death of Cobden, the president of the United States was assassinated. The excitement which this event caused, even in Britain, was extreme, and might be accepted as an instance of the powerful sympathy with which the common heart of nations is moved towards each other in the present state of improved intelligence at which collective socialities have arrived. As the character of the president, Mr. Lincoln, had become better known on the British side of the Atlantic, his name had risen so far as to be regarded with general respect; and the singular history and personal peculiarities of the man, had increased the feeling of admiration for the rough but manly simplicity of his nature. The indignation and horror at the crime which had struck down the ruler of the great republic, were, in the minds of the British people, mingled with a deep and wide-spread regret at his untimely loss. In no way in which the national feeling could evince this sentiment was it neglected; her majesty, the Queen, even with her own hand, writing a touching letter of condolence to the bereaved wife of the late president. The corporation of London, followed by a large number of the other municipal and public bodies throughout the kingdom, expressed, in public meetings, their sorrow for the fate of the American whose extraordinary career had become a subject of both surprise and interest. At the first meeting of the House of Commons, after the news had arrived of the assassination of President Lincoln, Sir George Grey, Secretary of State for the Home Department, rose in his place and said—"In order to give the House an opportunity of expressing the feelings which I am sure it entertains, and which, I may add, pervade the whole country in reference to the assassination of the President of the United States, my noble friend at the head of the government will move a humble address to her majesty, expressing the sentiments of sorrow and indignation with which the House regards the perpetration of this atrocious crime, and sympathy with the government and people of the United States, humbly praying her majesty, in communicating to the government of that country her condolence on this matter, to convey, at the same time, an expression of the feeling entertained in the House." A similar notice had been given in the House of Lords; and on the same day (May 1), the subject was brought before the two Houses by the ministerial leaders. The addresses in both of them were unanimously adopted, Mr. Disraeli observing that, in the midst of the prevailing sorrow, it was consolatory to reflect that assassination had never changed the history of the world. In olden times, even the costly assassination of a Cæsar did not propitiate the inevitable destiny of his country; and, in more modern days, Henry IV. of France and the Prince of Orange were conspicuous illustrations of this truth. Therefore, whilst he seconded the address to the crown, and expressed feelings of unaffected and profound sympathy with the citizens of the United States in the untimely death of their elected chief, he would not sanction any sentiment of depression. He would rather avail himself of that opportunity to express his fervent hope, that from these awful years of trial, the various populations of North America might come out elevated and chastened, rich with that accumulated wisdom, and strong in that disciplined energy which a young nation only could acquire in a protracted and perilous struggle." Her majesty received the addresses, and gave directions to her minister at Washington, to make known to the government of America, the feelings entertained by the British parliament, in common with herself and her people, with regard to the deplorable event.

During this session a question arose in parliament which created much public interest, and which seemed to reflect discreditably upon some of the relatives of Lord Westbury, Lord Chancellor of England. On the 7th of March, the Lord Chancellor announced the resignation of Mr. Edmunds as Clerk of the Patents, Clerk of the Commissioners of Patents, and Reading Clerk of the House of Lords. The case of Mr. Edmunds led to an investigation, during which it transpired that the Lord Chancellor had appointed his eldest son, the Honourable Richard Bethell, to be Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, London. This appointment, as circumstances connected with it turned out, should never have been made, as the new registrar shortly afterwards became insolvent, and was compelled to resign his office. This, however, was not all. During the investigation, it further transpired, that a Mr. Welsh, having had some money transactions with the Honourable Richard Bethell, and having advanced £1,500 to him, received the appointment of Registrar of the Leeds Court of Bankruptcy from Lord Westbury. This did not look well; and on Mr. Bethell becoming insolvent, he became an outlaw. It was now said that there was an agreement by which Mr. Welsh was to resign his office in favour of Mr. Bethell when his term of outlawry had expired. As these transactions had a suspicious appearance, a committee was appointed to investigate them; and such was the scandal they created, that although no imputation of corruption rested upon the Lord Chancellor, he felt it necessary to retire from office, in which he was succeeded by Lord Cranworth. This was the last event of public interest in connection with this parliament; its dissolution being at hand, and a general election about to take place.

The general election of 1865 eventuated under circumstances of as little excitement as possibly might be expected in a great country rousing itself to choose candidates for its representation in its national assembly. This election was not, in the ordinary sense, an "appeal" to the various constituencies of the country, for there was no prominent question upon which the voters were called upon to give their decision; or, in other words, no definite issue to be tried, or electioneering "cry" to stimulate party zeal. The recent parliament had died a natural death; and a new House was required to be chosen in accordance with the canons of the constitution. This, however, was a duty which might be performed without stirring the slumbering embers of political animosities, or even disturbing the general surface of public tranquillity. The late government was not without certain claims to support. It might, with a fair amount of confidence, make its appeal to the country from the successful efforts it had made, and in which it had succeeded, in preserving peace with other nations, whilst pointing to the prosperous results of its commercial and financial policy. Yet, however favourable these might be, antagonistic politicians, no doubt, thought and believed that, had they been in power, they would have exhibited still more favourable results, and the country, in general, would consequently have been in a far more flourishing condition. Be this as it may, however, a considerable change in the composition of the House, though not in the relative strength of parties, was expected; the long interval which had elapsed since the last election having produced the usual effects of inducing many members to seek retirement, and many constituencies to desire a change of men to represent them. But whatever might have been the general feeling, the chief interest of the election concentrated itself upon two points—the anticipated contest for Oxford University and for the metropolitan seats. In the former, Mr. Gladstone, late Chancellor of the Exchequer, was threatened with a formidable opposition in Mr. Gathorne Hardy; for the latter, there appeared several new candidates, among whom were men of considerable eminence. The general result of the Irish elections was also looked upon with considerable interest.

The celerity with which political elections are now happily conducted, reduces the period of suspense within a very short space of time. The new writs had been despatched almost immediately after the late parliament had ceased to exist; and within a week, most of the borough contests in England and Wales had been decided. The metropolitan elections were first ended. For the City of London, the contest was rather formal than otherwise. The four Liberal candidates outnumbered, by majorities of upwards of 2,000, their two Conservative opponents, Mr. Goschen occupying the head of the poll. For Westminster, however, there was a struggle of considerable interest, on account of the ancient city being contested, on the Liberal side, by an eminent philosophical writer. This was Mr. J. Stuart

Mill. He was opposed by a gentleman both of character and influence in the other political school; but the result was so far favourable to Mr. Mill, that he was brought in second upon the poll. He had a majority of several hundreds over the Conservative. Mr. Thomas Hughes, a gentleman of some literary celebrity, and who had much identified himself with the working classes, was returned at the top of the poll for Lambeth. In other parts of the country, men distinguished in literature and science were, for the first time, returned by popular constituencies; but the most exciting contest was at Oxford. According to an act passed in the last parliament, the election for the universities was authorised to be made by means of voting papers, transmitted through the post, or otherwise, to the vice-chancellors, and a period of five days was allowed for keeping open the poll. The respective friends of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Hardy, his opponent, made great exertions, and a most active canvass was set on foot throughout the country; but it was generally expected that the paper-voting system would prove effectual against the interests of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The polling commenced on the 13th of July, and the result of the first day was to place Mr. Gladstone in a small minority to Mr. Hardy, and in the third place on the poll; the late representative, Sir W. Heathcote, holding the first. During the other four days, the relative positions of the candidates continued unchanged; and at the close of the poll on the 18th, Mr. Gladstone was defeated, Mr. Hardy having a majority over him of 180. Such was the result of this remarkable contest, at which no fewer than 3,850 voters polled—a number nearly double of that which polled on any former occasion. The following valedictory address is not without a touch of feeling, such as might be expected from one closing a career of faithful service, comprising so many years of an active political life:—

"Gentlemen,—After an arduous connexion of eighteen years, I bid you respectfully farewell. My earnest purpose to serve you, my many faults and shortcomings, the incidents of the political relation between the university and myself, established in 1847, so often questioned in vain, and now, at length, finally dissolved, I leave to the judgment of the future. It is one imperative duty, and one alone, which induces me to trouble you with these few parting words—the duty of expressing my profound and lasting gratitude for indulgence as generous, and for support as warm and enthusiastic in itself, and as honourable from the character and distinctions of those who have given it, as has, in my belief, ever been accorded by any constituency to any representative.—W. E. GLADSTONE."

Rejected by the university of Oxford, as Sir Robert had been before him, Mr. Gladstone at once appealed to another, and a very different constituency, to return him to parliament. This was that of South Lancashire, for which he was one of the Liberal members returned. This result was generally to Liberal politicians satisfactory; for although, on personal grounds, the friends of Mr. Gladstone, especially his academical supporters, regretted his severance from Oxford University, yet many of the Liberal party, who now looked up to him as their future political leader, regarded the circumstance with gratification, believing that he would henceforward be relieved from a tie which had fettered and constrained his independence, and would be free to follow the course of policy to which his own convictions directed him. The general result of the elections in the three kingdoms was favourable to the Liberal side, and an addition to the strength of ministers was made in the House of Commons. All the members of the cabinet, and the leading official persons in the lower House, regained their seats; but on both sides some prominent members had been discomfited, and were consequently, on the reassembling of parliament, missing.

A few weeks after the elections, and when comparative quiet had succeeded to the usual degree of excitement which attends a general contest for seats in parliament, Lord Palmerston died. For several months it had become evident that his health had been giving way, and on the 18th of October, he expired at Brockett Hall, within a couple of days of completing his eighty-first year. He had been a man of extraordinary mental, as well as physical, activity, indefatigable in business, yet entering freely into all the pleasures of society with a zest which seemed to intimate that he had no other demands upon his time. A contemporary writer says that his social qualities were more than usually great. "A jovial, jocular, and genial man, who is always in good temper with himself and those around him, cannot fail to be popular among his friends and acquaintances. And if any one was genial to the last, it was Lord Palmerston. Nothing put him out of temper; no failure could disturb the serenity of his disposition. He had no very strong views to fight for; no stern and rugged line of unswerving policy did he ever propose to himself; but he always took care to seize the tide at the flood, and to swim down along with it—to lay hold of every event as it rose, and to make it subservient to his turn. Hence, without ever actually changing his political creed, he served and fought under various chiefs of opposite politics and principles, so that few can remember the day when his lordship had no official connexion with Downing Street. But it must be borne in mind, that even when ultra-Toryism was in the ascendant, Lord Palmerston was in 'advance of his age;' and that even then he might have been noticed ranging himself among the Grants and Huskissons, and other pioneers of a more liberal and enlightened policy. Like Peel, if he was, from early impressions, Conservative, he was, in his deepest convictions, always liberal. In the Foreign Office he was, from first to last, the consistent opponent of absolutism; and wherever a struggle arose for constitutional rights, those engaged in it were certain of his sympathy, if not his support."

The funeral of Lord Palmerston took place in Westminster Abbey, and was accompanied with every mark of respect and honour which a premier so popular merited from all classes of the English metropolis. The arrangements made for supplying the vacancies and changes in the cabinet, caused by his death, were simple and, for the greater part, convenient. The most experienced and prominent member of the government was Earl Russell, who had once before filled the office of premier, and who was now summoned by her majesty the Queen to assume that post. The Earl of Clarendon, then Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, became Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; and Mr. Chichester Fortescue became Secretary for Ireland, in the stead of Sir Robert Peel. For this arrangement Mr. Fortescue vacated the office of Under-Secretary for the Colonies, which was conferred on Mr. Forster, member for Bradford. Mr. Hutt resigned the Vice-Presidency of the Board of Trade, in which he was succeeded by Mr. Goschen, one of the members of the City of London, whose brief career in the House of Commons had already brought him distinction. The vacancy in the Duchy of Lancaster was not filled up for several weeks; but subsequently Mr. Goschen was transferred from the Board of Trade to that office, and at the same time was chosen a member of the cabinet. The important office of leader of the government in the House of Commons devolved upon Mr. Gladstone, bringing him into a somewhat new sphere of action. He was the most eloquent and, generally speaking, the most gifted member in the House, possessed of intellectual qualities perhaps of the very highest order. But these are not all that are needed to be a successful leader in the lower House of Parliament. The humbler attributes of tact, adroitness, and knowledge both of men and things, which Palmerston eminently possessed, were thought to be wanting in Mr. Gladstone; but whether or not, he assumed the post which he was destined to fill with no inconsiderable amount of success.

As both the political and financial conditions of a country are, in no small measure, influenced by the agricultural prospects and returns, those of 1865, though not in the highest degree favourable, were still of average proportions. The summer and autumn had been unusually warm and dry; and the scarcity of rain in some districts had a deteriorating effect upon the crops; but the cereal produce throughout the kingdom at large, was, both in point of quantity and quality, deemed sufficiently favourable. Looking, also, at the revenue returns, it was evident that the productive powers of the country had not fallen short of the wants of the increasing population. With all these favourable circumstances, however, there were two events which, to a considerable extent, not only disturbed the general tranquillity, but detracted from the prosperity which it was supposed to enjoy. These were the cattle disease, called the Rinderpest; and the Irish Fenian conspiracy.

The government, responding to the general anxiety excited by the progress of the cattle disease, issued, about the close of the month of September, a commission from the crown, authorising an immediate investigation of its origin and nature; and to report upon the mode of treatment best adapted for curing infected animals; besides suggestions and regulations, not only to prevent the further spreading of the disease, but, if possible, its recurrence. All this was accordingly done; and, in the report of the commissioners, it is observed that the disease was first recognised in Great Britain towards the close of the month of June, in 1865. Two English cows had been purchased, on the 19th of that month, in the Metropolitan Cattle-market, by a cowkeeper residing in Islington, in whose sheds they were, when, on the 27th of the same month, the disease attracted the notice of the veterinary surgeon in charge of the place. Similar symptoms of the pest were observed on the 28th by the same surgeon, in an animal in Hackney, which had been purchased in the same place and on the same day. Two Dutch cows in a Lambeth shed were attacked on the 24th, and they had been bought in the same market but a few days before. Immediately afterwards, the distemper made its appearance in many dairies, spreading with great rapidity, and destroying large numbers of animals. The Islington cow-keeper lost a whole herd of ninety-three. Subsequently more cows were purchased by the same person, and these died also; the whole amounting to 106 or 107. An inspector, who had charge of a great part of the north and north-eastern districts of the metropolis, states that four-fifths of the animals coming under his immediate notice, either died or had to be slaughtered; and the general average within the boundaries of the English metropolis, was, at least, as high. Very early in the month of July, the distemper made its appearance in Norfolk; a little later, in Suffolk and Shropshire; then in one county after another; and, before the termination of the same month, it had invaded Scotland. In all the earlier cases, it appears to have been directly traceable to the metropolitan market; but Norwich Hill and other country markets were not long, in their respective districts, of becoming subordinate centres of infection. By the 14th of October, it had extended to twenty-nine counties in England, two in Wales, and sixteen in Scotland; and was still advancing. From the metropolitan market the disease seems to have crossed to Holland, with some Dutch oxen which had been shipped from Rotterdam to London, and had been exposed during three successive market-days, and not finding a sale at an adequate profit, had been reshipped from London to Rotterdam. In Britain, however, the prompt and energetic measures which had been taken, not only to check, but to endeavour to stamp out the distemper, were finally effectual; but not until many cattle had succumbed to its virulence, wide alarm spread throughout the country, and careful precautions adopted against a recurrence of the same or a similar calamity.

Turning attention from Britain to the condition of Ireland, the discovery of a new kind of conspiracy, commonly recognised as that of the "Fenian," excites some alarm. It seems to have been only another development of that deeply-rooted enmity and disaffection which the people of that unfortunate country appear to cherish against England, without the support of which it would really be impossible for them to maintain their much-talked-of freedom and independence among the powers of Europe for a single month. The nature of this conspiracy is best expressed in the language of Mr. Justice Keogh, who, in describing it, says, that "the object of its leaders was to extend it through all classes of the people, but especially the artisans in towns, and the cultivators of the soil. Its ramifications existed, not only in this country, but in the States of America. Supplies of money and of arms for the purpose of a general insurrection were being collected, not only here, but on the other side of the Atlantic; and, finally, the object of this confederation, was the overthrow of the Queen's authority, the separation of Ireland from Great Britain, the destruction of our present constitution, the establishment of some democratic or military despotism, and the general division of every description of property, as the result of a successful civil war."

Such is the description of some of the objects of the conspiracy, as given by Mr. Justice Keogh. It was, however, checked before it arrived at such a state of maturity as would have justified an open rising. For the name by which it was characterised, different explanations have been assigned; but the one which, perhaps, is nearest the truth, is that which is derived from Fionn, a celebrated chieftain, who flourished before the Irish were converted to Christianity, and who is the same that figures in the broken, but often sublime, bursts of poetical ideality which mark the effusions of Ossian. By the modern Irish this hero is styled Finn MacCool, and the Fenians were the men of Finn. They formed, in days of old, a sort of standing militia, or warlike caste, whose duty it was to protect the country from aggression, and support the authority of the kings; in return for which service they received a certain allotment of land, and other privileges. The leaders of the modern movement, doubtless, perceived a probable advantage in connecting their scheme with the historical and traditionary glories of Ireland. But whatever may be the origin of the name, the association itself was simply a scheme of rebellion against the British government, organised in the United States of America, having its centre of rule and administration there, and intended to unite the vast body of Irish settlers in that country against England. These fanatics in hate desired to throw off what they called the British yoke, and to take into their own wise guidance the whole power and property of their native island. This was, no doubt, in their eyes a very happy conception; but, unfortunately for them, it miscarried in the execution.

When the organisation of the Fenian Society was unfolded to view, it appeared to have some strong reason to encourage hopes of success. It had its chiefs, its officers, both civil and military, its common funds and financial agencies, its secret oaths, pass-words and emblems, its laws and penalties, its stores of concealed arms and weapons, its nightly drills and training of men, its correspondents and agents in various quarters, its accredited journals, and even its popular songs and ballads—all designed to extend its influence, and to win adherents, not even excepting the soldiers in the British army and the warders in the gaols. It was evident that a plot, so widely spread, and so desperate in its objects, should not be lightly dealt with. It was but the result of that long-standing disease which, for centuries, had been praying upon the vitals of Irish industry and prosperity, and which was evidently in as morbid a state as it ever was, notwithstanding those sanguine dreams in which English statesmen had been indulging, when they believed that conciliation and equity, and a discriminating policy, were gradually welding the peoples of the two islands into a compact and harmonious whole. These, however, seem to have been nothing more than the fond illusions of self-satisfied minds. Ireland was as discontented as ever; and the Fenian conspiracy seems to have been disclosed to prove it. This was destined very soon to occur. It was allowed to be carried on until the time arrived when it should be necessary to check and to crush it. This took place on the 15th of September, when, by a well-devised plan, numerous arrests were made, and the English public surprised to hear that several of the chief conspirators were in the hands of the government. In making these arrests, the plan had been conducted so secretly, that, until the proper moment arrived, not the slightest intimation had even been given to the police. At about nine o'clock on the night they were made, a large force, accompanied by several detectives, marched from the castle at Dublin into Parliament Street, hard by, and, possession of each end of the thoroughfare having been taken, the detectives knocked at the door of the office of the People newspaper. Although there were lights in the upper windows of the building, no reply was given. The building being, as well as possible, immediately invested, the door of the office was forced, and Mr. O'Donovan Rosa, registered proprietor of the Irish People and several others, were arrested. Among them was a Mr. James Murphy, who described himself as "a citizen of Boston;" and who, being such, protested against his arrest, said he would bring that fact before the attention of Mr. Seward, the American Secretary of State, but who, nevertheless, found British authority too strong for him. These, with several others, were conveyed to the police-station, where they were severally charged with having "feloniously and treasonably conspired and combined, with divers other evil-disposed persons belonging to a certain secret society, called the Fenian Brotherhood, having for their object the levying of war in Ireland against the Queen, and separating it from the United Kingdom."

Of all the arrests that were made, however, in connection with this misguided "Brotherhood," the most important was a person of the name of Stephens, who was known by several other names, but who was among the foremost leaders of the movement. He was designated the "Head Centre" of the Fenians in Ireland, and was second in rank only to the Head Centre in the United States, who was a Mr. John O'Mahoney. A clue having been given by an informer of the quarters where Stephens was probably to be found, the police were enabled to capture him when unprepared to defend himself. He was known in the "Brotherhood" by the alias of Power; and when the police arrived at the house in which he lived, they scaled the walls of the garden, and knocked at the back-door. Almost immediately Stephens came, and inquired, "Who was there?" The constables announced themselves as police-officers, authorised by warrant to enter and to search the house. Stephens hesitated to open the door, saying that he was undressed. The police required immediate admission, promising to resort to no violence if he complied; but this not being done, they forced the door, and apprehended the "Centre." The house was then searched, and, in the adjoining bedrooms, were arrested three of the brethren, who were all in bed at the time. Pistols and balls were lying about the rooms, and large quantities of stored provisions were found. The house in which the arrests were made was called Fairfield House, and had been occupied by Stephens and his family for some time, under the assumed name of James Herbert. It was handsomely furnished, and bore ample evidence of the "Head Centre," being supplied with the means of making himself comfortable.

On the prisoners being committed, they were confined in Richmond goal, where, unfortunately, an event occurred which, while it baffled the course of justice, no doubt, afforded great encouragement to the Fenians. Stephens made his escape from prison. This took place on the 24th of November; and whatever vigilance might have been used by the police to discover his retreat, it was unsuccessful. The government offered £1,000 as a reward for his apprehension, besides £300 to any person who should give information that might lead to his arrest, with a free pardon to any person concerned in his escape, who should supply such information. This, however, was of no avail. He had escaped, and was concealed, but no one either could or would tell where.

Making allowance for the Rinderpest and the conspiracy just described, the public history of the United Kingdom, during the year 1865, exhibited the features of a tranquil prosperity and steady progress. The principal elements of the national strength —its agriculture, manufactures, and commerce—were well sustained, and held out the cheering promise of still further development. The public finances were entirely satisfactory; commercial transactions with foreign countries were large, and no doubt yielding remunerative profits; but though trade increased, and the revenue was immense, they seemed to produce little effect in narrowing the vast gulf, which continued unfilled, between enormous wealth and luxury on the one side, and appalling poverty and destitution on the other. For this there must be other causes than such as are described as springing from mere improvidence; and whatever they may be, they still form the essence of the grand problem yet waiting for satisfactory solution by the statesmen of Great Britain.

CHAPTER CXXII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1866.

PREVIOUS to the assembling of the parliament of 1866, the domestic politics of the country gave little promise of possessing those elements of certainty, so necessary to impart stability to the public mind in carrying on the general business of a great country. The Liberal administration which had, in some measure, been reconstructed after the demise of Lord Palmerston, was now headed by Earl Russell, and had Mr. Gladstone for its first minister in the House of Commons. Though it appeared strong in numbers, having a numerical majority of seventy in the lower House, still it presented some elements of weakness sufficiently marked to forebode unsteadiness in the prosecution of great measures. It was generally felt that the cabinet had no longer a claim to the confidence or forbearance of the Conservative party, to whose proclivities the late premier was believed to have some decided leanings. Nor was the personal popularity of the new chief at all to be compared to that of the late dexterous leader, who, in his place in the House of Commons, seemed to shed a geniality of feeling around him so true, that he managed affairs with apparently very little trouble, and in the best of humour. The accomplishments and qualities requisite for a task of this kind, it was feared, were not possessed by his successor. Mr. Gladstone had great eloquence and great abilities, but there were some reasons to doubt the possession, by him, of the peculiar qualities demanded by the arduous situation to which he had been promoted. However, it was only time now that could prove his suitability for his new post.

Amid all the uncertainties which accompany the expectations of the country on the assembling of a new parliament after a general election, there was one circumstance which gave great gratification to the people, and which was to mark the inauguration of the new legislature. This was the announced intention of her majesty being present on that occasion. Since the lamented death of the noble Prince Consort, her majesty had not yet set foot within the walls of her palace of Westminster; therefore the announcement of such an intention was as pleasing to her subjects as it was a judicious act in herself. The day on which the formal opening of parliament was to take place was the 6th of February; but, previous to that day, some preliminary matters had to be arranged and settled. Accordingly, for this purpose the Houses met on the 1st of the month, when for the office of Speaker Mr. Evelyn Denison, who had occupied the chair in the two preceding parliaments, was re-elected with the usual complimentary tributes which are paid to that officer on such an occasion. The right honourable gentleman was then led to the chair by the mover and seconder of his election, and proceeded to return thanks to the House. On performing this duty, he added, that on looking round, he missed one who had been long the leader of that assembly, and who, by a remarkable combination of qualities, had, in no ordinary degree, obtained the confidence of the House. He then passed a high eulogium on the late Lord Palmerston, dictated, he said, entirely by feelings of respect and esteem. Both Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli did something similar, and the preliminary business being formally disposed of, both Houses of Parliament were ready to receive the Queen.

The first session of the seventh parliament of the reign of Queen Victoria was now to be opened by her majesty in person, and considerable interest was manifested on the occasion, especially by the loyal lieges of the English metropolis. The Prince Consort died in the month of December, 1861; and since that event her majesty had assisted at no state ceremony. Accordingly, the desire to receive her in a manner becoming her rank, and indicative of the esteem in which she was held, was a beautiful impulse of feeling eagerly seeking for benevolent gratification. Consulting the records of the day, it is stated that the interior of the House of Peers was not opened until twelve o'clock, at which hour an uninterrupted line of carriages stretched down Parliament Street, as far as Old Palace Yard, even to the rear of Westminster Abbey, and all of them occupied almost exclusively by ladies. At twelve o'clock the living stream poured along the corridors to the various positions and places allotted to those who were in possession of the different degrees of tickets which had been issued for their admission. Within the magnificent hall, the most conspicuous object was the throne, over which, in ample folds, were spread the royal state robes. On either side, the front row of crimson cloth-covered benches were retained for the peers; but all the rows in the rear of these were kept for ladies, except such as were behind the bench of bishops, which were railed off, and placed at the service of the diplomatic corps. The side galleries, and the great one at the end of the building, were likewise appropriated to ladies, by whose presence the splendour of the scene was immensely heightened. The peers, arrayed in red cloaks and ermine, attended in numbers unusually large; whilst the prelates also mustered numerously to show respect for their sovereign. Amongst the foreign ministers present, were the French, Austrian, and Prussian ambassadors, the Italian, and other ministers. A considerable number of the judges also attended, so that the scene was one of the most gorgeous of its kind that could greet the human vision. The Queen did not arrive at the House in her principal state carriage, but entered by the peers' entrance, and not by the royal passage commencing at Victoria Tower. She was not arrayed in her state robes. These were merely laid upon the throne; and the royal speech, in obedience to her majesty's command, was read by the Lord Chancellor.

At twenty-minutes past one o'clock, all arrangements being completed, the Lord Chancellor entered the House. The Duke of Cambridge took his seat at the head of the ducal bench. Soon afterwards the Prince and Princess of Wales entered, and the whole House rose in honour of the illustrious visitors. The prince took his seat immediately above the Duke of Cambridge, and the princess was escorted by the state officers in attendance to the woolsack, on which she sat facing the throne, and with her back to the Lord Chancellor. Prince Christian of Augustenburg was also present, and sat near the end of one of the ambassador's benches.

"At two o'clock the Lord Chancellor left the House, accompanied by the Usher of the Black Rod, for the purpose of being in readiness, at the peers' entrance, to receive her majesty; and twelve minutes afterwards the royal procession made its appearance. First came a number of heralds and pursuivants, followed by the great officers of state, when her majesty advanced in person. She was accompanied by the Princess Helena and Louisa, who, on passing the Princess of Wales, kissed her royal highness. Her majesty seated herself on the throne, and the Prince of Wales passed to his chair of state on her right. On her left stood the Princesses Helena and Louisa, Earl Granville bearing the sword of state; the Duke of Argyll, in his capacity of Lord Privy Seal; and the Earl of Besborough, the new Lord Chamberlain. Behind her, to the right, were placed the Duchess of Wellington, the Mistress of the Robes, and another lady-in-waiting. A little way in front of her, on the same side, stood the Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Lansdowne bearing the crown on a cushion, and the Marquis of Winchester bearing the cap of maintenance."

Such was the scene and the general disposition of the high personages who appeared in this royal spectacle, the principal figure in which wore a dark purple dress, with a border of white ermine. Her majesty, also, carried a tiara of diamonds; and behind her, falling gracefully from her head, was a white gauze veil. The assembly, which had risen on the entrance of the royal procession, were now, by command of her majesty, desired by the Lord Chancellor to resume their seats, when the Usher of the Black Rod proceeded to the House of Commons to summon its members to make their appearance at the bar of the House of Lords, to hear read the royal speech. This declared her majesty's consent to a marriage between her daughter, Princess Helena, and Prince Christian, of Schleswig-Holstein Sonderbourg-Augustenburg; noted the death of her uncle, Leopold, King of the Belgians, and the satisfactory condition of the country in its relations with foreign powers. It also mentioned the termination of the internecine war in the United States; the abolition of slavery there, as well as the reduction of the slave-trade on the west coast of Africa, within such limits as to give a prospect of its ultimate extinction. It likewise noticed, with regret, an insurrection which had occurred in the island of Jamaica, and the ravages which had been made by the cattle disease; with the disaffection among the Irish. These were the chief features in the royal speech, the address on which was, in the House of Lords, moved by the Marquis of Normanby, and seconded by the Earl of Morley.

In the debate in the House of Lords, on the address, the Earl of Derby took strong exception to the conduct of the government, in the manner in which they had acted towards Governor Eyre in his suppression of the Jamaica insurrection. The circumstances connected with this affair were these:—In the August of the year immediately preceding, the negroes in the parish of St. Thomas-in-the-East, near Morant Bay, in Jamaica, broke out in open insurrection. This event was accompanied by several murders, and the burning and the plundering of many houses. To check the rising with all the promptitude possible, and to keep it from spreading, Governor Eyre proclaimed martial law; and the military, assisted by seamen from the shipping then in the port, were enabled, in a comparatively brief space of time, to suppress the revolt. In doing this, however, it was alleged that great cruelty had been exercised. In England, the question was taken up by the friends of the negro, and the government felt it their duty to supersede Governor Eyre, and accordingly commissioned Sir Henry Stokes, and despatched him to Jamaica to take the place of Eyre. A commission, also, was appointed to investigate the circumstances. These, although marked with some degree of subsequent harshness, were, in the opinion of the commissioners, such as to justify the promptitude and energy employed to suppress the insurrection, and on that account awarded praise to Governor Eyre. Notwithstanding this, however, a number of gentlemen formed themselves into what received the name of the "Jamaica Committee," and raised subscriptions in order to enter upon a prosecution of the late governor. To meet this, an Eyre Defence Committee was formed for the purpose of collecting funds to defend him; but no action was, for a considerable time, taken in the matter.

In speaking on the address in the House of Lords, the Earl of Derby contended that the conduct of the government towards Mr. Eyre, was not only in the highest degree unjust and ungenerous, but imprudent in regard to the colony, both in regard to its white and its black population. "Such a course would never have been pursued by Lord Palmerston had he been alive. If that great statesman had an error, it was an error on the nobler and the bolder side of defending his subordinates to the very last. What the government had now done was to send out a running commission, that had no real power beyond that of picking up the gossip of the island, and collecting irresponsible evidence on which Mr. Eyre might be tried for his life." Such was the opinion expressed by Earl Derby on the conduct of the government: many persons, both in and out of the House, sympathised with his remarks. Earl Russell, however, vindicated the conduct of his government in reference to what it had done in regard to the Jamaica insurrection; observing, that the question was not, whether Governor Eyre was right in repressing the rebellion, but whether he was right in adopting the means which he did in suppressing it. Upon this point opinions differed, and the matter dropped, when the address was agreed to without a division.

In the House of Commons, the cattle disease formed a very prominent subject of discussion, and fully occupied the first evening of the debate on the address. Then came the consideration of the state of Ireland, in which the Irish member, known as "The O'Donoghue," observed that the language in the Queen's speech, referring to Ireland, was not consistent with facts. It assumed that the legislation pursued for improving the condition of Ireland, had been all that should be desired. This, however, he denied. On the contrary, he said that the wide-spread disaffection which prevailed in that country, was to be attributed to centuries of misrule, and was not at all connected with Fenianism, but was to be ascribed to other causes. He recommended that an inquiry should be made, and that grievances should be redressed; that any surplus of Irish income should be expended on public works, and that heavy penalties should be imposed on absentees; that the ascendancy of one church over another should at once be abolished; that the poor-law and educational systems should be made similar to those in England; and that a measure should be passed which should secure to tenants the value of permanent improvements. He implored the House, before it was too late—before blood had been shed, and passion had taken the place of reason—before love was banished, and hate engendered in the hearts of a loyal and devoted people—to take some steps to investigate their case and redress their grievances. Immediately after this outburst of humane and patriotic feeling, he moved an amendment to the passage in the address having relation to Ireland, humbly expressive of deep regret that wide-spread disaffection existed in that country, and "to represent to her majesty that such is the result of grave causes which it is the duty of her majesty's ministers to examine into and remove." This was moved to be added to the passage which, in the Queen's speech, drew it forth; but it was rejected by a majority of 321. The result of this division enabled the address to the crown to be carried.

The approaching marriage of the Princess Helena with Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderbourg, gave occasion, early in the session, to the crown to transmit to both Houses of Parliament, messages asking them to concur in making a provision for the princess, and also for Prince Alfred on his coming of age. Propositions for these objects were made in the House of Commons by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, on introducing the subject, observed that, with respect to the Princess Helena, her position was peculiar. She was the eldest unmarried princess of the royal family when the most crushing calamity that can befal humanity descended upon her majesty; and that, during that trial, all the prominent qualities in the character of the princess—her strength, her wisdom, and her tenderness—were put to the test. Her royal highness was then, and had been since, the stay and solace of her illustrious mother; and the proposition which the Chancellor had to make to the House was, that on her approaching marriage she should have an annuity for life of £6,000, in addition to a dower of £30,000. With regard to Prince Alfred, the proposal made was, that he should be granted an annuity of £15,000 during his life, to commence on the day on which he attained his majority, and to be settled on his royal highness in such a manner as her majesty should think proper. With reference to his royal highness, there were several contingencies which hereafter might render a further application to parliament necessary. Among these might be the circumstance of his royal highness entering into the bonds of wedlock. If such should be the case, it would be the duty of the government to call upon the House to make such further provision as the necessities of the case might require. These family arrangements having been completed in the House of Commons, were received with cordial concurrence by the House of Lords, and the bills for giving effect to them passed speedily into law.

At the same time that the above votes were proposed in the House of Commons, another was submitted to the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to testify the estimation in which the late prime minister was held by his countrymen. Accordingly, the Chancellor moved an address, praying that the Queen would give directions for erecting a monument in the abbey church of Westminster to the memory of Lord Palmerston. Whilst moving this address, the Chancellor made the observation, that it was his desire to make the proposal, not as the tribute of a party, but one of parliament and the nation at large, and passed a temperate eulogy upon the character of the deceased statesman. Amongst the compliments which he passed upon his conduct, was one upon his disposition. "He had a nature that was utterly incapable of bearing anger, or a sentiment of animosity." This was, indeed, a noble nature, and may, perhaps, largely account for the great popularity he so widely and so long enjoyed. Mr. Disraeli, in speaking on the subject, said that, although he did not enjoy the private friendship, or share in the political sentiments of Lord Palmerston, he was anxious to express, on the part of the opposition, their cordial approvement of the proposition of the government. Whatever difference of opinion might exist upon political questions, sixty years in the arena of politics, always distinguished, and sometimes illustrious, could not be permitted only to be cherished by the admiring and, perhaps, grateful feeling of the country. He therefore concurred in the proposition; whilst Mr. Beresford Hope cautioned the House against producing another of those monumental horrors which already studded our cathedrals, and expressed a hope that the memorial to Lord Palmerston might be alike worthy of the man and the country. This proposition was agreed to amid loud cheers.

These matters, being of very subordinate consideration compared with the great affairs of the country, were rapidly disposed of, when the condition of Ireland came prominently into notice. The Fenian conspiracy was far from being crushed, so that it fully occupied the attention of the executive of the sister island. Many arrests and seizures of arms were made in different parts of the country, so that the military was kept in constant readiness against any rising that might occur; whilst much alarm was felt in certain districts by the owners of property, and the more peaceable and loyal portion of the community. A special commission had, for some time, been engaged in disposing of a heavy list of prisoners arraigned before it; yet neither the penalties of the law, nor the demonstrations made of the force at the disposal of the executive, appeared capable of inspiring with fear those insurrectionists who threatened the peace of the land. Under such circumstances, the government was compelled to ask the House for such powers as would enable it to meet with success the emergency. Little surprise, therefore, was felt when, on the 16th of February, Earl Russell announced that the government proposed to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, and that measures should be taken to carry a bill, with that object, through all its stages in both Houses, on the next day (Saturday), and to obtain the royal assent at once, so that the measure would be in operation in Ireland on Monday morning, the 19th day of the month.

The Houses of Parliament accordingly met on the 16th, and the House of Commons was unusually thronged, both with members and strangers. Sir George Grey, then rising in his place, proposed to bring in a bill to suspend, for a limited period, the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. He described the steps which had been taken by the government in despatching reinforcements, and spreading detachments throughout the country, and read letters from the lord-lieutenant, to show that this measure had by him been contemplated for some weeks previously. The communication which Sir George Grey had received, and which induced the government to adopt the present step, was read by him; and as it unfolds some interesting particulars respecting the Fenian movement, it will bear transcription into these pages. It is from Lord Wodehouse, and is dated the 14th of February, 1866. His lordship says—

"I have come to the conclusion, after most careful consideration, that the time has arrived when it is indispensable, for the safety of this country, that the Habeas Corpus Act should be suspended. * * * The state of affairs is very serious. The conspirators, undeterred by the punishment of so many of their leaders, are actually organising an outbreak, with a view to destroy the Queen's authority. Sir Hugh Rose details the plans they have in contemplation, and he draws no exaggerated picture. There are scattered over the country a number of agents, who are swearing in members, and who are prepared to take the command when the moment arrives. These men are of the most dangerous class. They are Irishmen, imbued with American notions, thoroughly reckless, and possessed of considerable military experience, acquired on a field of warfare (the civil war in America); admirably adapted to train them for conducting an insurrection here." After detailing the number of conspirators in Dublin under suspicion and known to the police, his lordship goes on to say, that any one might observe these men loitering about the streets. "As to arms, we have found no less than three manufactories of pikes, bullets, and cartridges in Dublin. The police believe that several more exist. Of course, bullets are not made unless there are rifles to put them in. The disaffection of the population in certain counties, such as Cork, Tipperary, Waterford, and Dublin, is alarming; and it is, day by day, spreading more and more through every part of the country. But the most dangerous feature of the present movement is the attempt to seduce the troops. Are we to allow these agents to go on instilling their poison into our armed force, upon which our security mainly depends? I feel confident that the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act will have a most salutary effect." His lordship then hopes that the government will not think him an alarmist. Indeed, there was little reason to think him this, when there were no fewer than three known regular manufactories of pikes, bullets, and cartridges to supply the conspirators with the means of effectually carrying into practice their insane and destructive views.

The immediate result of this note was the calling together of the cabinet, who felt it to be their duty to lay the intelligence at once before the House of Commons, and ask for the power which the lord-lieutenant of Ireland required; as they themselves deemed it absolutely essential for the safety of the country. In recounting what he himself thought on receipt of the intelligence, Sir George Grey said, that there was one feature satisfactory about the conspiracy; and that was, that within its sphere, there were embraced no persons who, from character and position, were entitled to exercise a just influence in the country. "I think," observed Sir George, "the paragraph in the Queen's speech most justly described the conspiracy. It said, that it was not for any legislative change—not for the repeal of the connexion of Ireland with the British crown—but that its avowed object was to wrest Ireland from the British crown, and transfer it to a foreign power. It also justly described it as a conspiracy against authority, against property, and against religion; and as one—I will not say discountenanced—but repudiated by any man in the country who has anything to lose, or who, of whatever creed or political opinion, naturally feels alarmed at objects such as these." Having made these remarks, Sir George further explained, that the duration of the bill would be limited to the 1st of September next; and he impressed the necessity of the bill becoming law without the delaying of a single day. The consequence was, that the debate on the bill was short; and, on a division being taken, leave to introduce it was given by 364 votes to 6; and, without further discussion, it subsequently was passed through all its stages.

Having passed the House of Commons, the bill was forthwith carried to the House of Lords, which was then sitting. It was immediately read a first time, when Earl Russell moved the suspension of the standing orders, in order that the bill might pass through all its stages at that sitting. The standing orders were accordingly suspended; and upon the motion for reading the bill a second time, Lord Derby admitted that this was not a time to enter upon a general discussion of the state of Ireland. The bill was then read a second time, and subsequently passed through all its stages. It had not yet, however, become law. For this, it required the royal assent, and her majesty was at Osborne. But no sooner had the bill passed the House of Lords, than a telegram was sent to Earl Granville, who was at Osborne, announcing what had been done. Upon the receipt of this, her majesty's signature was obtained to the document authorising the commissioners to give the Queen's assent to the bill. In order to allow time for bringing this document to London, the sittings of the Houses were suspended till 11 o'clock P.M., by which time it was calculated that a special train would arrive in the English metropolis. Time, however, seemed to roll swiftly away. The midnight hour struck, then the quarter-past, then the half-hour, when a clerk, bearing a despatch-box, entered the assembly. The Chancellor opened it, and brought forth the anxiously-waited-for document. In another quarter of an hour, the Lord Chancellor directed the Usher of the Black Rod to summon the Commons to hear read the royal assent given to the bill; and, shortly after, the Speaker, accompanied by about fifty members of the Commons' House, appeared at the bar of the Peers'. To them the Lord Chancellor, now seated on a bench in front of the throne, with the Duke of Somerset and the Earl of Besborough, announced the commands of her majesty; and at twenty minutes to one o'clock on the Sunday morning, the bill became law. It may be remarked, that probably no statute was passed through its different stages and became law so rapidly as this—the first act of the new parliament.

Earl Grey now invited the upper House to a comprehensive review of the troubles and grievances of the Irish people; and made a formal motion that their lordships would, at an early day, resolve themselves into a committee, to take into consideration the condition of the sister island. His arguments were marked by much ability whilst embracing the remedial measures which he considered essential to the settlement of the country. He also read a number of resolutions which he proposed to move, should the House go into committee. The whole subject, however, was unpalatable, especially at a time when repressive measures had so recently been adopted and put in force against Ireland. The motion was, therefore, negatived without a division.

Several other bills were introduced, but they came to nothing; when, on the 2nd of August, the Earl of Derby's administration came into power. The Marquis of Abercorn, being now lord-lieutenant of Ireland, the government arrived at the conclusion, that the act for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus could not, under existing circumstances, be allowed to expire at the time limited by that act (September 1st); accordingly the bill was renewed. This bill, having the support of both the leading parties, passed without difficulty; and the events of the following autumn only too well justified its enactment. Again it was announced, through the Fenian organs of the press, that the Irish were about to rise in arms; that Stephens, the escaped "Head Centre," was about to take command of the national force; and that the green flag would speedily be unfurled, under which the patriot forces would march to victory. Of course, in all this there was a great deal of bluster. Nevertheless, the executive felt it to be their duty to adopt the most energetic masures for the prevention of the threatened rising. A reward of £2,000 was offered for the apprehension of Stephens, and fresh regiments were sent to Ireland to guard suspected points; while a large consignment of breech-loading rifles was despatched to Dublin for distribution among the constabulary. Notwithstanding all the violent threats of Fenian indignation, however, the usual business of both Great Britain and Ireland seemed to move in its usual track, without even the semblance of confusion or irregularity. The day preceding Christmas Day had been assigned, by rumour, as that on which something alarming was to happen; but it passed off, like most other days, without the occurrence of any incident of the smallest importance whatever. Such being the case, the year ended without any attempts being made to realise the confident vaunts which had, from time to time, been heard, disturbing the moral atmosphere of the peaceable; and the great conflict which was to take place between the Fenian brethren on the one side, and the English oppressors on the other, was still in the womb of the future, and had yet to manifest itself to the wondering eyes of nations.

The flourishing condition of the public revenue, under the management of Mr. Gladstone, had, for several years past, been so familiar a feature, that it had come to be expected almost as a natural occurrence. Since the full development of the policy of free trade had taken place, an annual surplus was anticipated, notwithstanding the reductions which had been made in taxation; and the public looked forward to the financial statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in hardly any other light than as splendid exhibitions of financial skill and oratorical ability. On the 3rd of May, Mr. Gladstone made his annual statement to the House, announcing that he had a smaller surplus revenue than he had exhibited, successively, in the last three years. In these years, he had asked the House to make arrangements to dispose of sums averaging three millions and a-half of money; but this year he had to move within more contracted limits. The total revenue of the past year had been estimated at £67,812,000, and the estimated expenditure had been £65,914,000, leaving a surplus revenue of £1,898,000, which, however, was reduced, by various items for which provision had not otherwise been made, to £1,338,000. He had estimated the loss from the reduction of the duty upon tea at £1,868,000; but the actual loss amounted to £1,871,000. After entering into his statement, the Chancellor said, "I have now but to give the sum of all the operations which I have detailed; and they are as follows:—The amount of the surplus is £1,350,000. The remissions, as they stand, are,—On wood, £307,000; on wine, £58,000; on pepper, £112,000; and on stage carriages and race-horse duty, £85,000; making a total of £562,000. The loss on the conversion of debt for the present year is £502,000; making £1,064,000, and leaving a surplus, for the present year, of £286,000."

Having made his statement, the Chancellor closed with remarking that, "in the following year, there will be a further change in regard to commercial charges, and a further charge, as I have said, on the debt: the joint result will be, that the income of the year will be burdened to the extent of a quarter of a million. That, however, is an amount of burden on which I have no scruples of conscience whatever, because there has been no year in the growth of the national revenue, even when there has been a bad harvest, in which it has not amounted to a very much larger sum." He further said, that, "although the proper business of the finance of the year is to make arrangements for the year only, yet that we should, on suitable and sufficient cause, cast our glance forward into the future, and endeavour, in some degree, to meet this demand; so that when we ourselves cease to ply our arduous task of conducting public affairs—and by 'we,' I do not mean the government, I mean the House—and pass away from active life, those who come after us may have reason to see, that in the provision made for our own wants, we have also taken some thought for them, and may find no ground either to regret or to condemn." The greater proportion of Mr. Gladstone's financial proposals was ratified by the House of Commons almost without discussion.

After the debates on the estimates had been furnished, a bill for the abolition of church-rates was brought in by Mr. Hardcastle, when the Chancellor of the Exchequer undertook to bring in a bill to abolish compulsory payment of these rates. A change of ministry, however, took place; and although Mr. Gladstone's bill was subsequently debated and read a second time, it was no further proceeded with. Various other measures were brought before the House; but they were of comparative minor importance as compared with one on parliamentary reform, which was looming in the distance. The public mind was already thoroughly awakened to the expectation of a measure of this kind, and the political history of the year may almost be said to have been wholly absorbed by it. At the opening of the session, a passage in her majesty's speech announced the intention of laying a measure of this kind before parliament, and the chiefs of administration had made no secret of their intention, not only to introduce a bill, but to stake upon its success their official existence. This was somewhat impolitic, as the result proved. The Liberal majority in the House of Commons, however, was strong, and seemed likely to carry through a well-considered measure of reform, no matter how vigorous might be the Conservative opposition. The duty devolved upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer of introducing and conducting the measure through the House. Meanwhile a bill for extending the elective franchise on a novel basis was introduced by Mr. Clay, a Liberal member, and one of the representatives of Hull. This bill proposed to create an educational qualification, and provided, that every man of full age should have the right of submitting himself to be examined before the civil service commissioners; and upon such examination (if satisfactory), should receive a certificate which should entitle him to the exercise of the franchise. The subjects of examination were to be reading, writing, spelling and the four rules of arithmetic. Upon the motion for the second reading of this bill, which did not take place till the ministerial measure of reform had for some time been before the House, a full and somewhat important debate took place; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer declared the scheme impracticable, and both Mr. Goschen and the Attorney-General spoke against it. On the other side, however, it was supported by several leading members of the opposition. This led to an adjournment; but the debate was never resumed; and at a late period of the session, the bill was withdrawn by the member who introduced it.

On the 12th of March, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward the bill of the government, before a House crowded both with members and strangers. The portion of the Queen's speech which referred to the subject of the improved representation of the people having been read by the clerk at the table, the Chancellor rose, and, after referring to the difficulties, commenced his task. It would appear that, by no less than five administrations and no fewer than six Queen's speeches before the present year, the sovereign, advised by her ministers, had informed the Commons that, in their judgment, the time had come when the representation of the people ought to undergo revision. Although this statement had so frequently been made, the real time had not actually arrived till now, when the bill was found to be confined entirely to an extension of the franchise. It proposed to confer the suffrage, in counties, on occupiers of houses, whether with or without land, of £14 rent per annum; in boroughs, on householders paying a rent of £7 per annum, and on lodgers paying £10 per annum. Holders of £50 in a savings-bank for two years before making the claim, were likewise to be entitled to the franchise: the dockyard labourers were to be disfranchised;—a bill which, on the whole, was little satisfactory to the House collectively, save to Mr. Bright and such reformers as held his opinions.

It might have been anticipated that the Conservatives would receive such proposals as the bill enunciated with little favour. Accordingly, they urged that the qualification for voters was too low for both the counties and the boroughs; whilst most of the independent Liberals and Whigs held similar opinions, though they were averse to evince direct opposition to the government on such a point. Nevertheless, there was an almost universal objection to restricting the bill only to the franchise, and leaving the distribution of seats to a future opportunity. Consequently, the Earl Grosvenor, eldest son of the Marquis of Westminster, and then member for Chester, gave notice, on the 20th of March, of his intention, when the bill was before the House for second reading, to move, as an amendment, that it was inexpedient to proceed with the measure till the complete scheme of representative reform was before the House. As this amendment was considered by the government as a want of confidence, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that it would be opposed; but when the bill was being read a second time, the measures relating to Scotland and Ireland, as well as to the redistribution of seats, would be laid before the House, though it was not the design of the government to proceed with them further this session. The debate began on the 12th, and continued to the 27th of the month. On this day the second reading was carried by the very narrow majority of 5; the numbers being, 308 for the bill, and 303 against it.

The slight disparity between the numbers of the parties voting upon this Reform Bill, induced ministers to reconsider their determination; and the conclusion at which they arrived was, to proceed with the Redistribution of Seats Bill, which was introduced on the 7th of May, and, on the 14th of the same month, read a second time. On the 28th, the House went into committee on the Franchise Bill, when it was moved that the two measures should be considered together. To this the Chancellor agreed. It was then moved by Sir R. Knightly, that it should be an instruction to the committee, to make provision for the better prevention of bribery and corruption at elections. This resolution was carried against the government by a majority of 10; the numbers being 248 to 238 votes. Three nights were occupied in debating a resolution moved by Captain Hayter, member for Wells, describing the Redistribution Bill as neither convenient nor equitable, and the entire measure as being immaturely considered. This resolution was, on the 4th of June, withdrawn. Several other amendments were proposed during the progress of the bill in committee; but on the 18th of June, Lord Dunkellin, eldest son of the Marquis of Clanricarde, and member for Galway, moved as an amendment, that the franchise of £7 in boroughs should be a rating, and not a rental value. Lord Dunkellin was, in politics, a Liberal, and his amendment was carried by 315 votes to 304. On the following day the House adjourned to the 25th, when Earl Russell in the upper, and Mr. Gladstone in the lower House, announced the resignation of the government. Her majesty sent for Lord Derby, who undertook the reconstruction of an administration. His lordship took the office of First Lord of the Treasury, and Mr. Disraeli that of Chancellor of the Exchequer; while the rest of the government offices were conferred on leading Conservatives.—On the 7th of June, the Princess Mary of Cambridge had her annuity increased from £3,000 to £6,000, on her marriage with the Prince of Teck.

Obtaining office at so late a period of the session, it was not to be expected that the new government should initiate any measures of importance, or do more than complete those routine matters of legislation which absolute necessity annually demands of parliament. All questions not coming within this category were necessarily postponed to the following year. The financial arrangements of the session having already been completed, in so far as the home policy of the country was concerned, the finances of India only had to be brought under the consideration of the House. This duty devolved upon the newly-appointed Secretary for India, Viscount Cranborne. Although so recently raised to such an onerous position, the noble lord discharged his task to the satisfaction of the House of Commons, and in such a manner as even to impress the opposition with a high opinion of his ability. After the performance of this duty the session may be said to have virtually terminated, and on the 10th of August parliament was prorogued, the royal speech having been read by the Lord Chancellor.

Turning attention from the political affairs of the country, and fixing it upon those general events which always, more or less, indicate the progress of enlightened intelligence, the laying of the Atlantic cable for telegraphic communication between the two hemispheres of the globe, is one which operates with singular force upon the human mind. It marks so signally the intelligence, ingenuity, and enterprise of the 19th century, that it well deserves a place in the historical records of any commercial country, but especially in those of the two great nations which it has, if possible, connected more closely than they were before. On the 30th of June, the Great Eastern steamboat, with the "cable," left the river Medway under her own steam, and was accompanied by her majesty's steamer Adder past the Nore. She proceeded direct to Berehaven, in Ireland, and on the 27th of July, at about 5 o'clock, English time, the cable was completed between Europe and America. Conversations had been carried on throughout the day, until a splice had to be made with the shore end of the cable at Trinity Bay. When it was completed to the United States, communications immediately passed between her majesty, Queen Victoria, and Andrew Johnson, president of the United States—the reply of the latter occupying only one hour and nine minutes in its transit from Newfoundland to Osborne in the Isle of Wight. The cable met with an accident, and communication was for a time interrupted; but it was not of long duration; and now, without let or hindrance, the electric fluid continues to transmit information, beneath the waves of the wide Atlantic, from one end of a year to that of another, disclosing a work of such ingenuity and power as to place man upon a pedestal of intelligence almost inconceivably high—above all other intelligences of animal creation.

During the year there had been going on a war between Austria, Prussia, and Italy; but as it did not affect either the interests or the honour of Great Britain, the usual business of the nation was uninterruptedly pursued. The subject had been debated in the Houses of Parliament; but shortly afterwards a brief armistice had been agreed upon by the contending powers, and preliminaries of peace arranged by Austria and Prussia. Soon afterwards Italy accepted proposed conditions, and the war terminated.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1867.

AT the close of the last year, there were several circumstances which had a tendency to depress, rather than otherwise, the public feeling of the country. These were, principally, a financial crisis, which produced great distress throughout the country, and consequent embarrassment in all departments of trade: also the Rhinderpest, which was by no means arrested, although considerably mitigated in the severity of its progress. Besides these, there were the Fenian conspiracy, some disturbances occasioned by the reform agitation, riots in Hyde Park, and popular demonstrations, which, in different parts of the country, tended to promote a feeling of insecurity and distrust. Superadded to these, were the effects of a deficient harvest, together with the general depression caused by the high prices of provisions, especially animal food: there was, likewise, the unsettled state of the reform question;—all of which, combined, presented an aggregate of adverse circumstances upon which the new government could hardly be expected to turn its attention with very hopeful feelings. It was, therefore, with sentiments of considerable uncertainty, as well as of anxiety, that the public looked forward to the opening of the parliamentary session, for those revelations of ministerial policy which it usually evolves. The legislature assembled on the 5th of February, when her majesty again, to the great gratification of her loyal subjects, made her appearance to open parliament in person. The Lord Chancellor delivered the royal speech, in which the passage which said that attention would again be called to the state of the representation of the people in parliament, excited the greatest interest. The debates which occurred on the address, in both Houses, were rather tame than otherwise, and in the upper House was agreed to without a dissentient vote. In the lower House, Mr. Gladstone supported the address, at the same time declaring it as his conviction, that the interests of the country demanded a speedy settlement of the question of reform. The address was then unanimously adopted.

Several measures of smaller moment having been discussed, on the 11th of February the Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced his new measure of reform, with an elaborate disquisition on the past history of the subject, by no means calculated to awaken agreeable recollections in the minds of many of his auditory. Considerable disappointment was therefore felt at this mode of initiating the question; and this unfavourable impression was rather increased than subdued, when the resolutions themselves made their appearance on the following morning in the usual organs of public intelligence. The plan of Mr. Disraeli was embodied in thirteen resolutions, which, when submitted to his colleagues, were not received with that unanimous accord which might have been accepted as a proof of the inherent strength in the political elements of which the government was composed. Lords Carnarvon and Cranborne, with General Peel, dissented and resigned their seats; and the Dukes of Richmond and Marlborough, and H. T. Corry, entered the cabinet. Notwithstanding these changes, the Chancellor carried his resolutions; and the bill based upon them passed both Houses, not, however, without long and sometimes angry discussion. By its provisions, the franchise was conferred on all householders who were rated for the relief of the poor, with certain restrictions; on lodgers who paid a rental of £10 per annum; also, on copyholders, and the owners of lands or tenements of the clear yearly value of £5. Three members were given to Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Leeds; twelve counties were divided, each division to return two members; thirty-eight boroughs, returning two representatives, but the population of which was below 10,000, were each deprived of one member; ten new boroughs, to return two members each, were created; and the Tower Hamlets were divided into two parliamentary districts, each to return two members. The boroughs of Totness, Reigate, Great Yarmouth, and Lancaster, were disfranchised, on account of the bribery and corruption prevalent at the elections. This measure may be said to have been almost forced upon the government by the active agitation of a body of politicians, banded together under the name of the Reform League. Its agitation was loud, active, and persistent while it lasted; but after the bill had passed, the League was dissolved; and a Mr. Beales—who had been deprived of his office of revising barrister for the part he performed in the agitation—was appointed judge of a county court in Kent.

Of the acts passed, two of them—one for the Extension of the Factory Act, the other for the Establishment of Equitable Councils of Conciliation, to adjust differences between masters and workmen—were afterwards proved to work beneficially for those in whose behalf they had been passed.

While the Reform Bill was under consideration, Mr.

Disraeli, on the 3rd of May, introduced his budget. The income for the financial year of 1866-'67, he estimated at £67,575,000; and the expenditure at £66,225,000. This would leave a surplus of £1,350,000. He proposed to modify the duties on wines, to repeal those on pepper and timber, and to reduce the duty on stage-carriages, omnibuses, cabs, and post-horses, from one penny to one farthing per mile. These reductions would take from the revenue £562,000, leaving £788,000 still to be disposed of. This sum he proposed to apply to the reduction of the national debt. All these proposals were accepted by the House.

From the fact of the mind of the country being mostly concentrated upon the reform question, there was, in the Houses of Parliament, few of those topics debated which, on previous occasions, had demanded notice. The still unsettled condition of Ireland; however, with the failure of many of the legislative experiments which had been made for its amelioration, had produced a discouraging effect, not only upon all the efforts which had been made, but upon others which might yet be in prospect, to bring that country into a state of anything like rational contentment. Every effort of statesmanship to achieve this, seemed to fall short of its aim; and now the government tried to unravel the tangled web of the land tenure question; whilst other men, besides the ministers, essayed their endeavours in the same direction. All failed, however, and the Protestant church establishment became, once more, the topic of trouble. A warm debate of two or three nights upon this question, resulted only in strengthening oppositional animosities, and in not advancing a single step nearer to its settlement. Among the general profitless results of legislative debate, however, there was one measure again introduced, and again vigorously passed into law. This was a renewed suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It had been hoped that, from the commencement of the present year, peace and order might be preserved and secured by the ordinary process of legal authority. But this was not destined to be realised. Public sentiment in Ireland still indicated the most decided aversion to English rule: and Fenianism, the embers of which were still burning, occasionally displayed itself in desultory eruptions. It was well known that emissaries of the insurgent brotherhood in the United States, were scattered over various districts of the country, and labouring to inoculate the peasantry with their principles of disloyalty. These circumstances, taken in conjunction with the excitable and insecure disposition of certain classes of the Irish community, forced the government to ask from parliament a renewal of those extraordinary powers, through which alone they would be enabled to meet and frustrate the designs of those secret agents of rebellion, and insure to the loyal portion of the population that peace and security which they did not wish to see disturbed. When the government assumed office, there were 336 suspected Fenians in custody; and, by the 1st of September, they had become 100 less. On the 24th of November they had been yet further reduced; but at that date there were still close upon 100 in custody. In December, ninety-seven fresh warrants were issued; in January seventeen, and in February nine; when the circumstance ocurred at Chester which disclosed the fact that Fenian activity was far from being extinct. The powers sought for were immediately granted, and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act again took place. The other measures of parliament, before its prorogation, were of little general interest. It appears that there were reasons sufficiently substantial to justify a renewal of the suspension of the Habeus Corpus Act, as not only Ireland, but some parts of England were fast becoming subject to Fenian influence. In connection with the movement in New York, a band of fifty of the brotherhood had been organised, and deputed to proceed forthwith both to England and Ireland, and there stimulate the expiring patriotism of those noble brethren who, in the United States, had perhaps been supposed to have fallen into the arms of Morpheus in regard to the burning theme of Irish "liberty," which could never be achieved while Saxon "tyranny" was suffered to exist. Accordingly, the patriotic band was understood to have made their appearance in England. Fifteen of them had already planted themselves in London, where they formed a Directory. Information is not given as to the qualifications requisite to form a director in this associated brotherhood. Probably, blustering talk and ill-regulated force, sustained by wills more wild than wise, would be the most prominent qualifications necessary for a director in a scheme which, on the very front of it, had written the word "folly." However, eight of these directors were ex-officers of the American army. There were, also, Directories at Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, and Glasgow, in Scotland. For some time past, these Directories had been making arrangements to concentrate their forces upon some place: but what place was not disclosed till the time should arrive for such an act. It appears, however, that, at a meeting held at Liverpool on Sunday, the 10th of February, it was resolved to make an attack next day on Chester Castle, seize the arms therein deposited, cut the telegraph wires, tear up the rails, and effect their escape to Holyhead, where they were to find their way to Ireland in the best way they could. Here was a scheme, for the success of which, it is evident, chance was to have a large share of the responsibility. What arrangements were made for the reception of this portion of the brethren in the "Emerald Isle," did not transpire; but it was understood that they were to attack and rob the banks and jewellers' shops in Chester. Reasons were also freely given, at the meeting, why Chester Castle should be the first place chosen to be attacked; and these seem to have been such as might have justified cooler brains than those usually possessed by a Directory of Irishmen. They were the following:—

Up to midnight on the Sunday on which the meeting was held at Liverpool, the city of Chester did not have more than half-a-dozen soldiers on guard at the castle, and not more than twice that number of armed policemen in the whole of the town. Now, without admitting into consideration the property and lives of the population, what was there else that this armed body of men had to protect? The reply cannot do otherwise than excite amazement. Under their protection were no less than 9,000 stand of arms—a few weeks before there were 30,000, but the bulk of these had been removed to be converted into breech-loaders—4,000 swords, and 9,000 rounds of ammunition, in addition to powder in bulk. In another part of the castle, there were also stored 900 stand of arms belonging to the militia; and in a small building in the city, were 200 stand of arms belonging to the volunteers. In the castle itself, there was one company of the 54th regiment; and it is stated that they were disaffected.

The authorities in Chester had been informed of the intended attack. An ex-officer of the American army, who produced a commission of his being an officer in the Fenian service, had revealed the whole plot to them, when preparations were made to meet the circumstances. The volunteers of the town were sworn-in as special constables, and, with the help of the Liverpool and Manchester police, the authorities at Chester were kept duly informed of the departure of suspected bodies of men from those great centres of population. At about three o'clock on the 11th of February, it had been ascertained that upwards of 500 Fenians had arrived, and that a number of their officers had taken up their quarters in Chester on the previous night. Further in the afternoon these strangers assumed a bolder appearance; but fortunately, at about four o'clock the 54th regiment itself arrived from Manchester. About the same time, a train from Manchester and Staleybridge brought an additional force of 400 Fenians; and later, forty more arrived from Halifax, and seventy from Leeds. Shortly after five o'clock, it was ascertained that the Fenians in Chester numbered 1,400 or 1,500.

Appearances were now both threatening and alarming. Spies and scouts had, early in the day, been scattered among the Fenians; but these were so extremely reticent that no clue whatever could be obtained as to their real purpose. At six in the evening, some of the scouts brought information that the men were forming in column in Liverpool Road and other similar highways. The chief constable, Captain Smith, had drafted a body of the county constabulary into the castle, to strengthen the military force, whilst telegrams were, from time to time, despatched to the Secretary of State. An anonymous letter sent to Major Grey, chief of the Liverpool police, and communicated by him to the authority at Chester, coincided almost exactly with the information already in his possession. It recalls the memorable letter which raised suspicion in the timid mind of James I., and which led to the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot. The missive ran thus:—"Dear Sir,—You could do your country much service, as, at present, there are 600 men in Chester, to be increased by night to 700, to take the arms and ammunition of the garrison; and as the garrison is disaffected, it is supposed they will do it with little loss. They are to leave Birkenhead by every train, from the first in the morning, all to be there by seven at the latest. They leave in numbers of from thirty to sixty in every train."

Preparations had been so promptly made to preserve the castle from disastrous results, should an attack be made upon it, that it may reasonably be surmised that the leaders of the Fenian raid began to be afraid. The mayor had convened a public meeting, to be held at night, when over 500 citizens were sworn-in as special constables, who, in large bodies, paraded the town. The yeomanry was about to be called out, and the commander-in-chief of the army in London, telegraphed that he had ordered a battalion of Guards by special train to Chester. Of these proceedings, no doubt, the Fenians were apprised, and prudently deemed it wisdom to desist from their enterprise. Accordingly, as the night advanced, parties of them, in tens and twenties, were seen leaving on foot for Warrington and other neighbouring towns, doubtless with their heroic ardour not quite so hot as it had been but a few hours before. Within a few days the ancient city of Chester had resumed its usual quiet.

In the month of September following, some Fenians in Manchester endeavoured to rescue two of their number, known as Colonel Kelly and Captain Deasey, whilst being taken to gaol in a police-van. On this occasion some danger was apprehended. Accordingly, when the vehicle drove off, seven police-constables accompanied it, whilst four more officers followed it in a cab. None of these, however, were armed, save a police-sergeant of the name of Brett, who had a cutlass. On its way to the gaol, the van had to pass a railway arch, near to which there is an hotel, where, throughout the day, several military-looking men were noticed loitering about without an apparent object in view. Towards the afternoon—the 18th of September—the number of these men increased to as many as fifty, apparently directed by one taller than the rest, wearing a black coat and cap. This person was subsequently identified as William O'Meara Allen. The moment the prison-van approached the arch, this person stepped into the roadway, and, presenting a revolver at the driver, commanded him to stop. This was accompanied with a volley of pistol-shots, which frightened the horses so much that they became extremely restive, and, in the confusion, gave the Fenians the opportunity of at once becoming masters of the situation. One of the horses was shot, and the driver knocked from his seat by means of a large stone. The second horse was then shot, when occurred a scene at once animated and exciting; and thus described by the chronicler of the period :—

"One of the leaders climbed to the top of the van, and, at a signal from him, about twenty labourers, who had been hiding in a clay-field, clambered up after him. The armed men formed a circle round the van, and menaced every one that approached with their pistols. Shots were fired in quick succession, some of which took effect." Those on the roof now laboured to smash it in; but it resisted their efforts, when Allen directed men with hatchets and iron bars to break open the door of the van. The constables now united themselves together, and, being joined by numbers of men whom the shots had attracted to the spot, rushed upon the Fenians; but these, with their arms, successfully resisted them, and again and again drove them back from the van. Meanwhile some women prisoners, locked up in the vehicle, were screaming with the utmost vehemence, so that the whole scene was of the most startling description. A Sergeant Brett had the keys of the van in his pocket, and kept them there while he sat within the van. The men on the roof saw him, and, in answer to their demands, would not deliver up the keys. He was pelted with stones from above; he was beaten on the head, and wounded on the face, but he still refused to betray his trust. The panel of the door was smashed, and Allen presented a pistol at his head, but Brett would not give up the keys. Allen then put the mouth of his revolver to the lock and blew it open, when the keys were once more demanded from Brett. Still did the constable refuse, when Allen fired, and Brett, mortally wounded, rolled from the van into the road. The keys were then taken from him, the inner compartments of the prison-van unlocked, and the prisoners released.

Among the prisoners were Deasey and Kelly. The whole of the armed mob now dispersed as quickly as possible, the greater part of them running across the neighbouring clay-fields, and taking the direction of the Ashton Road. The wounded were taken to the infirmary, and Brett died within a couple of hours after he was shot. As the Fenians were making their escape, Allen was heard to say to the colonel, "Kelly, I will die for you;" but, notwithstanding, endeavoured to escape capture with as much speed as he could command. On this occasion, however, he was doomed to be caught. A powerful young man who had been a by-stander, and had witnessed the part played by Allen, pursued him and run him down. Allen, on being laid hold of, presented his revolver at his captor, who immediately wrested it from him, and secured him. Others were made prisoners; but Kelly and Deasey were subsequently seen going into a cottage, near a place called Clayton Bridge, about a couple of miles from the sc .e of the outrage. They were handcuffed at that time; but when they came forth from the cottage their hands were free. Connected with the rescue of the prisoners, there were twenty-nine persons brought before the magistrates on the following day, and five of these were committed for trial for the murder of Brett. In consequence of the serious character of the outrage, a special commission was appointed by government for the trial of the prisoners at Manchester. The trial took place in October, and a capital sentence was pronounced against three of them for the murder of Brett. One of these was Allen. On the following month the three together paid the penalty of their crime, without receiving much general sympathy.

From Liverpool, Chester, and Manchester, Fenianism now found its way to London. In the following month of September, in the afternoon of the 13th of that month, an attempt was made to blow up the outer walls of the House of Detention at Clerkenwell. Confined in the building, there were at that time two prisoners, named Burke and Casey, charged with being implicated in the Fenian conspiracy; and it had been resolved that these "brethren" should forcibly be set free. The attempt was as daring as it was atrocious in regard to those who might be its victims. At about a quarter to four o'clock, a boy, who gave an account of the transaction, accidentally saw a man leave a large barrel by the wall of the prison, and then cross the road. Shortly afterwards this man returned with a long squib in each hand, giving one of these to some boys who were playing in the street, and thrusting the other into the barrel. The man remained there until he saw the squib begin to burn, when he ran away. One of the boys had been smoking, and it was he who gave the man a light. When the man ran away, a policeman followed him; but the barrel then exploded, and the boy was covered with bricks and mortar, a large portion of the prison wall having been blown down, and several houses in the neighbourhood shattered.

The results of this explosion were most disastrous to the inmates of the dwelling-houses in the immediate vicinity. Upwards of forty innocent people—men, women, and children—were, more or less, injured most severely; whilst one was killed on the spot, and several afterwards died from the effects of the injuries they had sustained. A reward of £400 was promptly offered by the government, together with her majesty's pardon to any one, not being the actual perpetrator of the crime, and who should furnish information which should lead to the conviction of the offenders. Six men and one woman were apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in the plot, and underwent examination before Sir Thomas Henry, the chief police magistrate at Bow Street, on the charge of treason-felony. Many remands took place for the purpose of enabling the crown to produce fresh evidence, which, from time to time, was brought to light by the police. Eventually, the persons who were proved to be connected with the transaction were committed for trial in the Central Criminal Court, and the guilty suffered according to their deserts. After this, Fenianism, as an insurrectionary movement, gradually died out, and, in a comparatively brief space of time, nothing was heard of it but the name.

Turning from the wild and extravagant deeds of misnamed Irish patriots, with their attendant evils and sorrows, England had this year an opportunity of displaying the warmth, as well as the grandeur, of her hospitality to several crowned heads who honoured her with a visit. The first of these who arrived was the Viceroy of Egypt. On his arrival in London, his highness did not create much excitement; but he received such attentions as were due to his distinguished rank. His visit extended to about a fortnight, most of the time of which was filled up with banqueting, entertainments, and seeing objects of interest in and around the metropolis. He visited the Queen at Windsor Castle, where he dined and slept a night. After occupying his time as agreeably, and it is to be hoped, as profitably as the brevity of his visit would permit, he took his departure for France on the 18th of July, leaving behind him, in England, a most favourable impression upon every one with whom he had been brought in contact.

Another great visitor was Sultan Abdul Azziz, the chief of the Mussulman race, the first "Father of the Faithful" who had set foot on native British ground. He was in London during a portion of the time of the viceroy's visit, and naturally took the highest place in popular attention; but there was no lack of courtesy shown to both, so that neither should have the slightest cause of complaint. The sultan had previously passed a few days in Paris, on a visit to the Emperor Napoleon III.; and while there, was present at the awarding of the prizes at the International Exhibition. Preparations of a more than usual kind were made in England to receive this imperial son of Islam with due honour, and the general public awaited his arrival with more than ordinary interest and curiosity. From Boulogne he, on the 12th of July, crossed to Dover, where, on the morning of the same day, his royal highness the Prince of Wales was in waiting to receive his majesty. His highness the Viceroy of Egypt, and a numerous staff, and the Duke of Cambridge, were also present. Besides these, were Viscount Sydney, as lord-lieutenant of Kent, the Duke of Sutherland, and other noble personages, with his excellency M. Musurus, the Turkish ambassador, and the whole of the personnel of the embassy—all waiting to receive the illustrious sovereign about to set his foot on the free, fair, and fertile soil of happy England.

Shortly after eight o'clock in the morning, a telegram was received, announcing that the Reine Hortense had left Boulogne, carrying the sultan; and the fact was announced by the firing of a gun from one of the castle forts. Dover was immediately astir; all who could, making for the Admiralty Pier, where the debarkation would take place. The channel squadron, including several other naval ships, was drawn up in the bay, and, at the approach of the imperial yacht at a quarter-past ten, fired a salute, the crews at the same time manning the yards. The tremendous roll of sound was taken up by the forts at the castle and the heights, and answered with an effect which seemed to shake the very earth. The Reine Hortense was accompanied by a French squadron of iron-clads, and also by a couple of English frigates, and was soon alongside the Admiralty Pier. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, and other illustrious personages, then went on board to pay respect to the sultan, a military band playing the national anthem at the same time. Almost immediately a train of state carriages conducted and accompanied his imperial highness along the pier to the Lord Warden Hotel, amid the cheering and loud huzzas of an immense multitude of spectators.

The etiquette necessary to be shown on welcoming the sultan on a visit to Western nations, is different from that which is usually evinced among the sovereigns of these peoples themselves. When the Prince of Wales, with the Duke of Cambridge, went on board the Reine Hortense, then only did the sultan come forth from his state cabin. He then advanced along the deck, and, with much deference, greeted his visitors. Neither the prince nor the duke offered to shake hands with him. Had they done so, it would have been a violation of the rules of Turkish etiquette. What they did was simply to uncover when he touched his fez, and they remained standing, bareheaded, behind him. His imperial highness wore a dark-blue surtout, richly embroidered with bullion lace upon the breast and half-way up the sleeves. His head-dress was a plain red fez, and he wore, hanging by his side, a scimitar, the scabbard of which was shagreen. The ribbon of Medjidie adorned his breast, which was also decorated with the stars of several orders. His personal appearance was below the middle stature, and somewhat portly, though not heavy. The expression of his countenance conveyed the idea of indifference, rather than of want of intelligence or incapacity to appreciate the features of the scene with which he was surrounded. His suite consisted of no fewer than fifty-nine persons, among whom were some of great official dignity. One of these especially attracted attention. This was Hairoullah Effendi, his majesty's chief almoner, wearing an ample cloak and a large turban. His garments were of the colour of green, thereby suggesting that he had either performed the pilgrimage to Mecca, or was a descendant of the prophet. The great respect shown to him by all the others was a sufficient indication of his importance in their estimation. Conspicuous, also, was the grand vizier, Fuad Pasha, an elderly, thoughtful-looking man, who seemed to pay but slight attention to the scene passing around him, engaging himself mostly in conversing with the young Prince Izzedin Effendi, heir-apparent to the Ottoman empire. This prince was no more, in point of appearance, than a mere lad, and, unlike most of the Turks of high rank, was almost as dark as a Spaniard. His resemblance to his father was remarkably striking, which was, perhaps, rendered more effective from their both being dressed as nearly as possible alike, and wearing similar uniform, ribands, and orders. Indeed, Prince Izzedin seemed the sultan in miniature. Near him stood the sons of the late sultan, and the nephews of Murad Effendi and Hamil Effendi; but the uniforms of these were of a less showy and, apparently, costly description than those of many of the others present. There were Arab chiefs, Circassian nobles, and Albanian magnates, clad in velvet jackets, exquisitely embroidered; although none of these chiefs might be equal to many of the others in point of rank, notwithstanding that they far surpassed them in the splendour of their costume.

When his majesty and suite arrived in the metropolis, he was received with the warmest acclamations, and reached Buckingham Palace at about three o'clock. Here he was received by a guard of honour formed by the Grenadier Guards, and greeted with a royal salute; the band of the regiment in the court-yard playing the Turkish National Hymn. The rooms set apart for his majesty were those generally designated the Belgian suite; and now that he has at last arrived at a place of rest, and been received by the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, the Master of the Household, and other principal officers of the Queen's town residence, he may safely be left to the enjoyments of his pipe, his peace, and his repose.

When England undertakes to dispense her hospitality to an illustrious stranger, all that wealth can produce, that art can exhibit, and that pleasure can bestow, is laid under contribution, to mark her high sense of the honour conferred upon her. That this was the case in respect to the visit of the sultan, none felt it to be so more than he himself did; and for a period of twelve days, Orientalism was fêted in every possible form in the great city of London. Spectacles and entertainments succeeded each other, day after day, with the same certainty that hour follows hour, until the strength of both the sultan and his suite was exhausted by the northern energy of the English people. On the 23rd, his majesty took farewell of Buckingham Palace, where he had resided twelve days, and whence he took his departure for Dover. On the morning of his leaving London, her majesty the Queen telegraphed from Osborne the following expression of kindness and hope, which he duly received:—"Osborne, July 23rd, 9 A.M.—I offer to the sultan my best wishes for his safe return home, and every good wish for his welfare and happiness."—Abdul Azziz Khan at once telegraphed an acknowledgment in French, and in which he stated, that he should "bear in eternal remembrance the agreeable days which he had passed on the hospitable soil of England.'

On the day immediately preceding that on which the sultan took his departure, the French imperial steam-yacht, Reine Hortense, with her majesty the Empress of the French on board, arrived at Portsmouth. She had left Havre early in the morning, and, after a pleasant passage of eight hours, anchored in the vicinity of the Spit Buoy. A party of ladies and gentlemen from the yacht, including, it was supposed, the empress, landed at Southsea in the morning, and spent some time on the esplanade and common, partaking of luncheon at the Pier Hotel. Shortly before two o'clock, the Reine Hortense again weighed anchor, and steamed slowly past the fleet at Spithead for Osborne, where the empress arrived on a visit to her majesty the Queen, soon after 3 P.M. As the empress was incognito, the yacht hoisted no standard.

Amongst all these visits, personal and otherwise, there was another of a very different character, but still important, as having reference to a military movement, which the country at large looked upon with a considerable degree of pride and gratification. The same month of July which brought the Viceroy of Egypt and the Sultan of Turkey to the shores of England, also brought a large party of Belgian volunteers, who had, on this occasion, been invited, in recognition of the liberal and magnificent reception extended to a body of the English volunteer force, at Brussels, during the preceding year. Still, appreciating and recollecting the extraordinary kindness with which the English had been received in the Belgian capital, they were naturally desirous of making a return to their brethren in arms, in some degree commensurate with the favours conferred upon themselves. Accordingly, the Prince of Wales stepped forward to lend his countenance to the object in view; and, under his patronage, a programme of entertainments and celebrations was drawn up in such a manner as was deemed the most likely to amuse and gratify the continental visitors. They arrived in London on the 11th of the month, her majesty's Indian troop-ship, Serapis, bringing them from Warden Channel, about twenty miles below Antwerp. On reaching Gravesend, they were received by the members of the reception committee, and brought up the Thames to quarters prepared for them in the great metropolis. After enjoying themselves to the full, and receiving every attention which their English brethren in arms could bestow upon them, they took their departure on the 22nd. They proceeded on board eight steam-vessels at Westminster Bridge, passing down the river amidst the vociferous acclamations of vast multitudes of people who crowded both the bridges and such streets as, in some measure, overlook the Thames. Arrived at Gravesend, they re-embarked in the transport-ship, Serapis, which conveyed them safely to Antwerp.

The "murder," as it was termed, of the Emperor Maximilian in Mexico, arising out of the ill-judged intervention of the French in the affairs of that country, was noticed in the House of Lords; and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe gave notice of a motion for an address to the Queen, expressing condolence and indignation at the violence done to humanity by the execution of the prince, who had been shot by the opposite party in the political struggle in Mexico. The motion, however, was withdrawn, on account of its being likely to draw on a discussion on the whole of the Mexican question—a circumstance, in the existing state of political feeling, not to be desired.

A case, however, which touched more nearly the sensibilities of the British people, was that of several of their countrymen in Abyssinia; held in durance by the semi-barbarous sovereign of that country, King Theodore, upon whom no negotiations which had yet taken place seemed to have produced the slightest effect in forcing even the appearance of their being released. Inquiries had, from time to time, been addressed to the government by various members of the House, respecting the efforts which had been made to effect the deliverance of the captives; but the answers returned were far from satisfactory. Therefore, a short time before the close of the session, Mr. H. D. Seymour called attention to the condition of the Abyssinian captives; and moved an address, praying her majesty to take steps to have them set free, by force of arms if necessary. He discussed, at length, the various objections to the sending of an expedition for the purpose of enforcing their enlargement; contending that the proper course was to forward an ultimatum, demanding their release within a certain time; and following it up, if unsuccessful, by despatching an armed force, which, it was his belief would, with very little difficulty, reach the vital point of Theodore's power. Until certain inquiries were made, however, the government declined to give any pledge as to what were its intentions.

On the 15th of July, Sir Stafford Northcote said, in answer to a question put by Colonel Sykes, that no troops had been told-off at Bombay, with the view of despatching them to Abyssinia; but that government had entered into a correspondence, which it was hoped would lead to the release of the captives. No measures of force were contemplated. On the 8th of August following, just before the close of the session, Lord Stanley said, that the last information he had received respecting the Abyssinian prisoners, was dated on the 20th of July; and it was to the effect that a rebel army was in sight of King Theodore's camp; and that communication between the camp and the place where the prisoners were confined was cut off; but it was premature to assume that the prisoners had obtained their freedom.

On the 15th of August, the royal assent was given to the Reform Bill; and the rest of the business of the session having, in a few days afterwards, been brought to a close, the time had arrived when the members of the legislature looked to be relieved from their duties in parliament. Accordingly, on the 21st, the House was, by commission, prorogued, the Lord Chancellor reading the following royal speech, which may be viewed as a résumé of the principal work of the session:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—I am happy to be able to release you from the labours of a long and more than usually eventful session; and to offer you my acknowledgments for the successful diligence with which you have applied yourselves to your parliamentary duties.

"My relations with foreign countries continue on a friendly footing.

"At the commencement of the present year, great fears were entertained that differences which had arisen between France and Prussia might have led to a war, of which it was impossible to foresee the ultimate result. Happily, the advice tendered by my government, and by those of the other neutral states, aided by the moderation of the two powers chiefly interested, sufficed to avert the threatened calamity; and I trust that no ground, at present, exists for apprehending any disturbance of the general peace.

"The communications which I have made to the reigning monarch of Abyssinia, with a view to obtain the release of the British subjects whom he detains in his dominions, have, I regret to say, thus far proved ineffectual. I have, therefore, found it necessary to address to him a peremptory demand for their immediate liberation, and to take measures for supporting that demand, should it be necessary to resort to force.

"The treasonable conspiracy in Ireland broke out, in the early part of the present year, in a futile attempt at insurrection. That it was suppressed almost without bloodshed, is due not more to the disciplined valour of my troops, and to the admirable conduct of the police, than to the general loyalty of the population, and the absence of any token of sympathy with the insurgents on the part of any considerable portion of my subjects. I rejoice that the supremacy of the law was vindicated without imposing on me the painful necessity of sacrificing a single life.

"The bill for the abolition of certain local exemptions from taxation, enabled me to avail myself of a liberal concession made, in anticipation, by the Emperor of the French, whereby several taxes were removed which pressed heavily upon British shipping.

"I have concluded a postal convention with the United States of America, whereby the rate of postage between the two countries will be diminished by one-half; and further arrangements are in progress for increasing the intercourse between this country and the continent of North America.

"The act for the union of the British North American provinces, is the final accomplishment of a scheme long contemplated, whereby those colonies, now combined in one dominion, may be expected not only to gain additional strength for the purpose of defence against external aggression, but may be united among themselves by fresh ties of mutual interest, and attached to the mother country by the only bonds which can effectually secure such important dependencies—those of loyalty to the crown and attachment to British connexion."

After thanking the gentlemen of the House of Commons for the liberal supplies they had voted for the public service, parliament was prorogued to November, and many of the members visited their constituencies.

CHAPTER CXXIV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1867—1869.

ON the prorogation of the Houses of Parliament in the latter part of August, there was no anticipation of their being again summoned to meet before the usual period in the following year. Time, however, develops necessities in the conduct of human affairs. Accordingly, the public were somewhat surprised when it became known that an autumnal session had been resolved upon, in order that government might be provided with the means of carrying into immediate effect the resolution which the persistent refusal of King Theodore, of Abyssinia, to set free his British captives, had forced them to adopt. Although the proposed expedition to Abyssinia was really the only question which at this time required promptly to be disposed of, the ministers deemed it the best course to make the present meeting the commencement of the session, notwithstanding that it necessitated a somewhat premature statement of measures in the opening speech from the throne. On the 19th of November the two Houses were summoned to meet. Accordingly, on that day, the session of 1867-'68 was opened by commission. In the royal speech, the following passage relative to the Abyssinian question occurred:—

"The sovereign of Abyssinia, in violation of all international law, continues to hold in captivity several of my subjects, some of whom have been specially accredited to him by myself; and his persistent disregard of friendly representations has left me no alternative but that of making a peremptory demand for the liberation of my subjects, and supporting it by an adequate force. I have accordingly directed an expedition to be sent for that purpose alone, and I confidently rely upon the support and co-operation of my parliament in my endeavour at once to relieve their countrymen from an unjust imprisonment, and to vindicate the honour of my crown."

Here, then, was intimated the chief cause of the assembling of parliament; and papers upon the subject were forthwith directed to be laid before the House. In both Houses of Parliament, the debate which took place upon her majesty's speech was marked by great unanimity, and an entire absence of all party feeling on the subject of the Abyssinian expedition. Some notice was taken of a convention which had been effected between France and Italy; regarding which, Earl Russell observed that he considered intervention in the internal affairs of other countries injurious to the interests of Europe; and the Earl of Derby did not think it necessary for his government to express any opinion on the matter whatever. "Those countries alone were concerned with it; nor would the government intimate any opinion with regard to the French expedition to Rome, though it was open to them to express a hope, that all chance of a misunderstanding between those countries might be prevented by the withdrawal of those troops."

On the 26th of November, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a committee of the whole House, moved a vote of credit of £2,000,000 for the Abyssinian expedition. In performing this duty, he assumed that its object would be attained by the end of April in the following year, which would be at the termination of the healthy season; and then roughly calculated the cost of the expedition at £3,500,000, with, perhaps, an additional sum of £300,000, if it should be necessary to replace in India the Indian troops which were already in Abyssinia. This, then, would bring the estimate to £4,000,000; £2,000,000 of which were asked for now, because only that sum could be spent within the present financial year, and because, if King Theodore should surrender the captives without war actually taking place, that sum would about represent the cost of placing Sir R. Napier at the head of a sufficient force in Abyssinia. The vote was agreed to; but there was this next consideration—how was the sum to be raised?

At this period, Mr. Disraeli, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was, by illness, confined to his house, and the duty of laying the propositions of the government before the House, devolved upon the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ward Hunt. In a committee of ways and means, this gentleman stated the views of the government as to what was deemed the best mode of raising the sum required. Accordingly, after making a statement, he concluded by moving a resolution imposing an additional income-tax of one penny in the pound for the year ending April 1st, 1868. After a somewhat desultory discussion the resolution was adopted. Sir Stafford Northcote then moved a resolution for charging on the Indian revenues the ordinary pay of the Indian troops and shipping employed in the expedition, with the proviso, that the expense of replacing them, if necessary, should be borne by the British treasury. This was also debated and protested against by Colonel Sykes; but, on a division, it was carried by a majority of 175.

As the expedition to Abyssinia had now not only been determined upon, but provided for; and as it had been declared by the Earl of Derby, that "it was the firm intention of her majesty's government that nothing further than the release of the prisoners should be attempted, and when that was accomplished, that the force would at once return from Abyssinia," the events connected with the short war may very briefly be summarised. It has been shown that the liberation of the captives had in vain been demanded, and that Theodore obstinately detained them in custody, though a rebellion had broken out in his own dominions. At the close of 1867, an army of 11,770 men, under General Napier, was, from Bombay, despatched against him. On the 3rd of January, in the following year, this force landed in Annerley Bay. A march of 400 miles had to be performed, through rocky defiles and over steep and precipitous ranges of mountains. This was accomplished. Interposing difficulties were either pushed aside or overcome, and on the 10th of April, the Abyssinians were encountered and defeated at a place near Magdala. King Theodore now liberated his prisoners, but would come to no specific terms with the invading power. His capital, Magdala, was besieged, taken, and destroyed, while he himself blew out his own brains with a pistol. The object being accomplished, the invading force evacuated Abyssinia.

On the 25th of February (1868), Lord Malmesbury in the House of Lords, and Lord Stanley in the House of Commons, announced that, in consequence of failing health, the Earl of Derby was obliged to tender his resignation to her majesty. As it had been accepted, parliament agreed to adjourn till the 28th; when, however, another adjournment took place to give time for a reconstruction of the ministry. When this was accomplished a new era had arrived in English politics. Lord Derby had ceased to be premier, and Mr. Disraeli reigned in his stead. The retirement of Lord Derby from office, dissolved, in substance as well as in form, the administration of which he was the head, notwithstanding that the members of the new cabinet, with the exception of the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Walpole, were the same as the members of the preceding cabinet. Lord Stanley was still Foreign Secretary, while Mr. Hardy continued to direct the internal administration; Sir Stafford Northcote continued to instruct and guide the governor-general of India, but under Disraeli instead of Derby.

"In Lord Derby," observes a writer in one of the leading Reviews of the period, "the Tory government has lost the advantage of a great historical name and a brilliant parliamentary reputation. Had he been born in a humble station of life, his abilities must have raised him to eminence. Endowed with the twofold capacity of rapid acquisition and well-regulated diligence, Lord Derby could not have failed to make his way into parliament, where his unsurpassed power of debating would have secured for him the distinction which the possession of wealth and rank has not prevented him from earning. But in addition to signal intellectual endowments, Lord Derby was fortunate in possessing the highest advantages of station. Heir to the second earldom in the realm, he was superior to the seductions of a loftier dignity. Heir, too, to a princely estate, he was placed far above the sordid attractions of official emoluments. From every point of view he was qualified to play a conspicuous and elevated part in the government of the country. Nor were those qualities wanting which, though they are not indispensable, are still highly useful to a leader of men. There have been some men more eloquent as orators than Lord Derby, though none have been more effective as debaters; and there have been many men with cooler and calmer judgment than he could boast of. But few statesmen of our era have been more gifted with that ease and playfulness which wins at once the affection and the homage of parliamentary adherents."

As resignation of office is not necessarily deprivation of life, it is not yet the time to discuss the character of Lord Derby; therefore, leaving the late political peer for the new literary premier, the same writer thus discusses his qualifications for the office to which he has just been elevated.

"The literary member of parliament has for many years led the Conservative party in the House of Commons. He has been thrice Chancellor of the Exchequer, and is now first minister of the English crown. What are the prospects of the country under his administration? What is to be the issue of the great political questions of the day in his hands? The answer to these questions is not difficult. The simple fact is, that the whole of Mr. Disraeli's antecedent history is fatal to the presumption of Mr. Disraeli's ministerial success. The character of a great minister is as different as possible from that of a great orator. It is most widely different from an orator whose special gifts are those of sarcasm and invective. * * * Mr. Disraeli reminded the House the other day, that he had spent nearly half his life within its walls; and undoubtedly, both as a tactician and an orator, he has played a prominent part there. But we question whether another example can be produced of a man of equal eminence, having thrice filled a great office, and long led a large party, whose influence on the practical legislation of the country has been so small. We are not aware that Mr. Disraeli ever brought any bill into parliament, whether in or out of office, with the smallest pretensions to originality or public utility, of which he can be regarded as the author. He has improved none of our institutions. He has, in fact, left the whole complex machinery of government untouched, except in as far as it served the party purpose he was pursuing in the House of Commons. The bearing of a question upon his party and parliamentary interests is the only aspect of it which ever appears to cross his mind. Of political conceptions reduced to the form of useful laws, his whole career affords no rudiments, and, therefore, no vestige of them."

The severity with which the new premier was handled by many of the public journals, who had recollected the sharpness of his own sarcastic sallies, was not calculated to surround his position with a halo of joy or satisfaction. His legislative achievements, as well as his administrative services, were both held and spoken of, as having been very deficient in practical benefit to the country. Indeed, he had not had the training necessary to fill successfully the great and responsible position to which he had been raised. "Ministers like Lord Russell, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Palmerston, and even Lord Derby, had the advantage of an immense amount of official and administrative experience in every branch of public affairs, which rendered them the fittest persons in the kingdom to form a correct judgment on the innumerable questions of detail daily arising around them." Of all this, Mr. Disraeli never had experience. He never filled any of the secondary administrative offices. "On his entry into the cabinet he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, with indifferent financial success, until he hit upon the judicious expedient of following in the footsteps of his predecessor. But, on every other subject, his knowledge is necessarily second-hand. Foreign affairs, colonial affairs, Ireland, law-reform, military and naval armaments, India, trade, education—these are, all and each, subjects which a statesman knows thoroughly by no other means than by constant application to them, and, above all, by handling them himself." With special details of all or most of these questions, it was presumed that Mr. Disraeli was not very well acquainted; and as the world could not be governed by rhetoric, in which he had some excellence, or a difficult problem of administration be solved by sarcasm, in which he was notably keen, he was not deemed a very suitable person for the premiership. A short time, however, would solve the problem of his suitability or otherwise.

Parliament had been prorogued from the 19th of November (1867), and again on the 31st of July (1868) to the 8th of October; and thence to the 26th of November. During this period there were many acts passed, of both a public and a private nature; and, among the former, there were two giving an extended parliamentary reform to Scotland, as well as to the sister island. A third abolished compulsory church-rates—a measure which conferred upon rate-payers the power of fixing the rating for themselves. On the 11th of November, a dissolution of parliament took place; and, at the general election, the Conservatives returned showed such a weakness in the party, that Mr. Disraeli determined to resign. "Never in our history—certainly not within the history of living man—has there been an occasion on which the issue raised at a general election was more intelligibly and distinctly raised, than when the late House of Commons, condemned by the government of the day, was summoned to the bar of popular opinion, there to receive its final acquittal or condemnation. Every man who had to give his suffrage, throughout the country, knew for or against what that suffrage was to be given; and, if the issue was distinct, the verdict has also been distinct; for upon no occasion has the nation made its meaning more clearly known, or laid down—alike for those who are the objects of its preference, and for those whose opinions it was disposed to put aside—with greater clearness, the lines of public policy and of action." Such was the language used by Mr. Gladstone, on the first public occasion that he had an opportunity of speaking after he succeeded to the position of Mr. Disraeli, as the new minister. The language was exultant; but not more so than was justified by the occasion.

Before entering upon the political work of 1869, it may be observed that, up to the 12th of May of the preceding year, the Queen may be considered to have still kept herself almost entirely secluded from the public view. On the above date, however, she came forth and laid the first stone of the new hospital of St. Thomas, erected on the south bank of the Thames, opposite the Houses of Parliament. In the following month of August, under the title of the Duchess of Kent, she left England for Lucerne, for the improvement of her health. After an absence of about a month, she returned to Windsor Castle. In the spring of the same year, the Duke of Edinburgh was cruising off Australia; and taking the opportunity of landing on that southern territory, he was enthusiastically received by the colonists. Whilst being publicly entertained at Clontarf, near Sydney, he was shot in the back by an Irishman. The wound, though serious, did not prove mortal; and his royal highness was conveyed on board his ship, which soon after took her departure for Great Britain. He arrived in England in the month of June, where he remained until his recovery became complete. In April, the Prince and Princess of Wales paid a visit to Ireland, where they were warmly received by the people; and after sojourning for nearly a fortnight, and receiving the most open-hearted attentions of every description, they returned, well-pleased with their visit.

On Mr. Disraeli's resignation of office, the Queen wished him to accept of a seat in the House of Peers; but this he declined: and, on the 28th of November, her majesty created Mrs. Disraeli Viscountess Beaconsfield, of Beaconsfield, Buckinghamshire.

The preliminary proceedings usually necessary in constituting a new parliament, such as the election of a Speaker, swearing-in of the members, and moving new writs to fill vacancies produced by the acceptance of offices, had been accomplished immediately before the close of the preceding year. The new House of Commons might, therefore, already be considered as in a state of working order, but was, for the despatch of business, adjourned until the 16th of February (1869), the recent accession to power of the new ministers necessitating a short interval for the preparation of such measures as they wished to bring before the country. It was on the 16th, therefore, that the practical opening of the session took place by commission, the Lord Chancellor, as usual, reading the royal speech. It noticed the condition of Ireland; recommended an inquiry into the modes of conducting parliamentary and municipal elections; and invited attention to bills for the extension and improvement of education in Scotland. In reference to Irish ecclesiastical arrangements, it was observed, that legislation would be necessary, and would make large demands upon the wisdom of the House. "I am persuaded that, in the prosecution of the work, you will bear a careful regard to every legitimate interest which it may involve; and that you will be governed by the constant aim to promote the welfare of religion through the principles of equal justice; to secure the action of the undivided feeling and opinion of Ireland on the side of loyalty and law; to efface the memory of former contentions; and to cherish the sympathies of an affectionate people." These were the terms in which legislation upon the Irish church were expressed—of the most general description, no doubt, from a laudable desire to avoid even the appearance of conveying a challenge to the opponents of the new government. In the upper House, the address was agreed to without a division; but in the lower House, previous to its being moved, Mr. Gladstone gave notice that, "on the 1st of March, he should move that the acts relating to the Irish church establishment, and to the grant to Maynooth College, and, also, the resolution of the House of Commons in 1868, be read; and that the House should then resolve itself into a committee, to consider the said acts and resolutions." After this, the address was debated, and ultimately agreed to. It was proposed by the premier, and concurred in by the House, that her majesty should, on account of the recent electoral political changes which had taken place, receive the address in person; but the serious illness of Prince Leopold was the cause of its being abandoned. Accordingly, the address was presented in the ordinary way, and answered by her majesty in the usual terms.

A plan for facilitating public legislation excited a little interest, but resulted in no measure of consequence; when further securities against the spread of contagious diseases among cattle came before the House. Upon this subject there were two rival propositions made—one by Lord R. Montagu; the other, proposed on the part of the government, by Mr. Forster, which ultimately became law. Lord Montagu's measure was rejected by a considerable majority. A government bill for the repression of crime was next debated, and read a second time.

The political path being now cleared for the debate on the great question of the session of 1869—namely, "The disestablishment of the Irish church"—the 1st of March had arrived, and the work was about to commence. On that day Mr. Gladstone rose in his place, before a crowded assembly, the very avenues being thronged by the many who were anxious to hear the accents of the premier on this exciting occasion. Having moved that the titles of the acts relating to the Irish church and to Maynooth College, and the resolution of the House in 1868, be read, he next moved, that the House do immediately resolve itself into a committee to consider the same. This being done, the minister proceeded to unfold his plan; and for three hours he kept the House hanging upon his lips. A more masterly or luminous statement of a highly complicated scheme has rarely been made within the walls of the House of Commons. After prefacing his subject by an exordium, in which he rapidly reviewed the previous history of the question, he answered by anticipation some of the objections to his measure. Recalling the pledges which had been given by those who had undertaken to deal with the subject, he prescribed, as conditions essential to his scheme, that an immediate end should be put to the establishment and the public endowment of the Irish church; that it should be complete, yet, at the same time, liberal, though still prompt in its operation, and final in every respect. He divided his description of the bill into three parts—its immediate effect; its effect at a certain time, fixed (but not unalterably) at January 1, 1871; and its operation; when, what he called the "process of winding-up" the affairs of the Irish church was brought to a close. Briefly, it may be noticed, that on the first head, the bill provided that the present ecclesiastical commission should at once be wound up, and a commission appointed for ten years, in which the property of the Irish church, subject to life interests, would be vested from the time of the passing of the bill. So that, technically as well as legally, there would be an immediate disendowment of the Irish church. Disestablishment would be postponed until the 1st of January, 1871. At that date the union between the churches of England and Ireland would be dissolved; all ecclesiastical corporations would be abolished; the ecclesiastical courts would cease; and the ecclesiastical laws would no longer be binding, as laws, except that they would be understood to exist as the terms of the voluntary contract between clergy and laity, until they were altered by the governing body of the disestablished church.

Such were the principal general features of the bill, the details of which were necessarily extremely elaborate and complicated, but, nevertheless, evolved by Mr. Gladstone with a perspicuity and precision which displayed at once both the capacity of his intellect and the power of his eloquence. His arrangement was so skilful, and the order of the different topics so admirably disposed, that the clearness of his scheme was not only at once recognised without effort, but felt, so that the acclamations with which it was received by his supporters were both loud and long. Mr. Disraeli, now acting as leader of the opposition, rose at its conclusion, and after passing a warm eulogy on the speech, in which, he said, "not one word could be spared," said that his own opinion, as well as that of those who acted with him, remained unchanged; that disestablishment was a political error, and disendowment—especially when accompanied by secularisation—mere and sheer confiscation. He did not, however, offer to oppose the introduction of the bill; although he would have done so, had circumstances been different from what they were: but looking to the verdict of the country at the late general election, which he interpreted to mean that the new premier should have an opportunity of dealing with the question of the Irish church; and, also, taking into consideration the action of the late government on that verdict, he thought that, in fairness, Mr. Gladstone ought not to be opposed in submitting his policy to the House. He advised, therefore, that no opposition on his side should be given to the motion, although he pressed for a delay of three weeks before the second reading. To this the prime minister objected; but, after a brief discussion, it was agreed that the 18th of March should be fixed for the second reading.

Before the day fixed upon for the second reading of the bill, a notice was given in the House, that Mr. Disraeli would move an amendment, negativing, in the usual form, the further progress of the measure. Nevertheless, the debate on the second reading commenced on the 18th, and by successive adjournments was continued to the 23rd, the day on which it had been proposed that an adjournment for the Easter holidays should take place. During the four evenings occupied in debating the measure, many powerful and brilliant speeches were delivered, and signally displayed the intellectual character of the House of Commons when any great question involving high interests is brought before it. The speech of Sir Roundell Palmer was listened to with the greatest interest, on account both of his character and position. This eminent lawyer, though politically attached to the Liberal party and its chief, was not prepared to give consent to their plan of entirely disestablishing the Irish church, and had made considerable sacrifices for the sake of his own convictions on the question. It was generally understood that, on its account, he had declined promotion to the highest prize in his profession. Yet it was known that he was willing to consent to a very extensive change and reduction in the establishment, although not inclined to go all the length of the government; still he possessed no sympathy with the Conservatives in opposing the proposed reform. Under these circumstances, his opinions were listened to with deep interest, when, after delivering them, in opening the third night of the debate, he concluded by urging the Irish church to reject the advice which Mr. Disraeli had given, to hold themselves back from co-operating in its organisation. After several others had spoken, Mr. Gladstone made his final reply, when a division, amidst great excitement, took place, and showed a majority of 118 for the second reading of the bill. After the Easter recess, the bill was again, clause by clause, discussed in committee; and on the third reading, the debate was closed by a division, which gave a majority of 114. Thus was the bill passed in the House of Commons, and afterwards sent up to the House of Lords, there to await its destiny.

On the 14th of June, the House of Lords was a scene of great excitement and attraction, for on that day the second reading of the Irish Church Bill was to be moved by Earl Granville. The galleries of the House were thronged with the wives and daughters of peers; the steps of the throne were crowded with their eldest sons and with privy councillors; at the bar was collected a vast body of members of the House of Commons, and the corridors and approaches to the House were filled with strangers, testifying the greatest eagerness for admission to the assembly. All human appearances bore evidence of the general feeling pervading the community, that an event which should make a memorable passage in the subsequent history of the country was about to take place, and a great constitutional question on the eve of receiving its final settlement. In this scene Earl Granville moved the second reading of the bill, on which the debate began. This was distinguished by much ability; and no peer was listened to with more interest than the Earl of Derby, who, on this occasion made his last great appearance in parliament. The noble earl spoke with much of his usual energy and force; but his power had evidently waned. The glow of freshness and fire which distinguished the eloquence of former years had passed away, and the brilliancy of his manner was gone. He was an orator no more. Time, which makes its inroads upon the powers of all men, had impaired those of the Earl of Derby, and his recent severe sufferings were apparent in his physical infirmity. In closing his observations on the bill, he uttered a few pathetic words, which disclaimed any title, on his part, to be viewed as leading the Conservative party, but intimated his own fixed determination to vote against the second reading of the bill, which he stigmatised as alike impolitic and immoral. On the division at the close of the debate, there was a majority of 33 for the second reading of the bill.

After amendments had been discussed, and the bill declared passed, the following protest was signed by Lord Derby and forty-three temporal and two spiritual peers against the third reading:—

"Dissentient—1. Because this bill, for the first time since the foundation of the British monarchy, introduces, so far as Ireland is concerned, the principle, unrecognised in any other country in Europe, of an entire severance of the state from the support of any and every form of religious worship.

"2. Because the adoption of this principle, with regard to Ireland, cannot but give great encouragement to the designs of those who desire its extension to every part of the United Kingdom.

"3. Because it is a violent stretch of the power of parliament to resume a grant made by itself in perpetuity; still more to confiscate property held by long prescription, and by a title independent of parliament.

"4. Because, if this principle be well founded, as regards private property, it is still more so with regard to that which has been solemnly set apart for the purposes of religion and the service of Almighty God.

"5. Because the legislation attempted in this bill tends to shake confidence in all property, and especially in that which rests upon a parliamentary title, heretofore considered as the most unassailable of all.

"6. Because it is impossible to place a church, dis-established and disendowed, and bound together only by the tie of a voluntary association, on a footing of equality with the perfect organisation of the church of Rome, whereby, especially in Ireland, the laity are made completely subservient to the priesthood, the priests to the bishops, and the bishops themselves are subject to the uncontrolled authority of a foreign potentate.

"7. Because this bill will be felt as a grievous injustice by the Protestants of Ireland, who, through their Irish parliament, surrendered their political independence by a treaty, the fundamental condition of which was the greater security of the Protestant establishment.

"8. Because, while this measure will tend to alienate those who have hitherto been the firmest supporters of the British throne and British connexion, so far from conciliating—much less satisfying—it will only stimulate to fresh demands that large portion of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland which looks forward to ulterior and very different objects; and, above all, to ultimate emancipation from the control of the British legislature."

Some of the amendments proposed and carried in the House of Lords, bore so strongly upon the main principles of the bill, that it appeared to many politicians that a split between the two Houses of Parliament might not improbably occur. Accordingly, when the 15th of July arrived, the day on which the Lords' amendments to the Irish Church Bill stood as the order of the day in the House of Commons, expectation was at its height to know what was then to be said. Therefore, when Mr. Gladstone rose in his place to move that these amendments might be considered, he was greeted with a burst of cheers by his supporters. His tone was calm, but firm and decided, as he proposed—

To disagree with the amendment in the preamble; with the alteration in the date of disestablishment; with the abolition in the deduction on account of the tax to the ecclesiastical commissioners; with the building charges amendments; the Ulster glebes amendment; the deduction of the poor-rate from the tithe-rent purchase; the "concurrent endowment;" and the postponement of the disposal of the residuary property. The fourteen years' commutation, and the amendments affecting curates, would also be disagreed with, but with modifications in the original clauses. The only amendments to be agreed to, were the half million to be given for private endowments, and another one, on clause 20, for the protection of annuitants.

Mr. Disraeli could not help expressing his regret at hearing that the government proposed the rejection of the Lords' amendments en masse, and exhorted the House to moderation and fairness; pointing out that there was nothing of defiance or antagonism in the attitude which the Lords had assumed. This sentiment, however, drew forth some expressions of dissent, and Mr. Gladstone briefly reviewed the effect of the amendments of the Lords on the disendowment scheme. The difference or disagreement between the two Houses now seemed to be widening; but, after mutual explanations, a compromise was effected, when the bill passed, and on the 26th of July it received the royal assent.

Thus were the debates and disputes in reference to the Irish Church Bill of 1869 brought to a termination. The principle of the measure was a subject of the keenest controversy, giving rise to differences of opinion, maintained on each side with intense ardour. As to the construction of the bill, all parties seem to have been agreed upon the fact of its having been constructed with extraordinary skill. Originally it was presented to parliament in a well-digested form, and was singularly brief in its enactments, these being so elaborated as to provide against almost every contingency, and to meet all the varieties of cases involved in the bill. It was carried through its various stages in the face of a united and powerful opposition, chiefly by the resolute will and unflinching energy of the prime minister, who, throughout the trying discussions, in which he took the most prominent part, displayed, in an eminent degree, those qualities of acuteness, dialectic power, and thorough possession of the whole scope of the subject, for which he had long been conspicuous, but which he never more signally exhibited than on this occasion. In forming an ultimate estimate of the character of the bill, whatever may be the differences of opinion upon its merits or demerits, it can hardly be disputed that the act for disestablishing the Irish Church, introduced and carried into law within the period of five months, is the most remarkable legislative achievement which the 19th century has, up to this time, produced.

Now that the Irish church had been dismissed, the question of finance came before the House; and, as Mr. Lowe had become Chancellor of the Exchequer, curiosity was, to a considerable extent, aroused to see his statement. From his character, every one expected that his plans would bear the stamp of originality; and that it would not be unlikely he would strike out some new way by which the tax-payer would not only be enlightened but relieved. Circumstances, however, were against him; the chief of which was the inheritance, from his immediate predecessor, of a heavy deficiency caused by the Abyssinian campaign; whilst the revenue, which had so long been buoyant, began to evince symptoms of a sinking tendency. Nothing daunted, however, Mr. Lowe developed his budget, and, after leading his hearers to the brink of despair, he, as unexpectedly as suddenly, gave them a sort of dramatic surprise by showing them a way out of all their financial difficulties; so that when they were wound up to expect an increase of their burthens, he disclosed a means by which they would obtain substantial relief. This result was presented in the shape of a valuable administrative reform, which should not only simplify and render more convenient the collection of the imposts, but should effect a permanent diminution in their amount.

It was not to be expected that the results desired by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to be obtained without something being paid for them; and an equivalent for his reforms was proposed to be raised by requiring, in anticipation, the payment of certain taxes heretofore made payable at a later date. By collecting these at the commencement of the year, and so bringing the produce within the current financial year, instead of the following year, the Chancellor calculated that he would obtain a surplus revenue for the twelve months between April, 1869, and April, 1870, when otherwise there would have been a deficit. "The effect was similar to that which an individual—for example, a landowner—would experience, who, having been accustomed to receive, within each year, an income compounded by the rents of the latter half of the preceding year, and of the former half of the current year, should induce his tenants to agree to a new mode of collection, under which the whole of the rents of each year would be paid within that period; the back rent of the previous year being, at the commencement of the new system, paid, as well as its own proper rent, within the first year after the change. He would then, for the first year—but, of course, for that year only—receive three half-years' rents in twelve months. In a similar manner the Chancellor proposed dealing with the taxpayer, tempting him, by the offer of sundry remissions and reductions in his burdens, to consent to pay up, in the course of the year 1870, assessed and other taxes which would otherwise have been spread over a period of eighteen months." Various strictures, as a matter of course, were made upon the budget; but the entire scheme of Mr. Lowe, almost unaltered from the shape in which it was produced, received the sanction of parliament.

Various miscellaneous measures now occupied the time of the House; and among them a bill for raising the sum required for the purchase of the telegraphs by the government. There were several protests made against this measure, but it was finally agreed to. A bill for marriage with a deceased wife's sister was introduced, and carried by a large majority on the second reading; but, after being repeatedly postponed, it was ultimately withdrawn. These measures, with some others of less general interest, brought the session to a close; when, on the 11th of August, parliament was prorogued by commission.

His highness Ismael Pasha, Viceroy of Egypt, paid a second visit to England, his first having taken place in 1867; and, during a brief stay of eight days, had his time completely occupied with fêtes, reviews, and banquets.—Another visitor was the King of the Belgians, who, accompanied by his daughter, the Princess Stephanie, arrived in the month of November, and received all the attention due to their rank. The king was presented with an address by the Lord Mayor of London, who said that it was a truly national one, from the fact of its being signed by no fewer than three hundred mayors, lords-lieutenant, and high sheriffs of counties, and other representative men. There was but one omission of a mayor's signature from the document, and that was caused by the absence from England of the mayor of Manchester, who had gone to Egypt to view the opening of the Suez Canal. He also received an address from the volunteers of the country, signed by a vast number of the officers commanding throughout the land. Other public features of his visit were marked by an equal display of the popular good-will towards King Leopold, who, at an entertainment given by the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, was toasted as "the only European sovereign who had visited India; and who knew more about that portion of the British empire than most of the British people themselves did." On the 29th, the king and his daughter proceeded by train to Dover, and thence departed for Belgium.

If the death of a statesman, long prominent before the eyes of his country, can add anything to the memorable character of the year 1869, it may here be recorded, that Edward Geoffrey Smith Stanley, fourteenth Earl of Derby, died at his residence at Knowsley, near Liverpool, on the 23rd of October. He was born at Knowsley, on March 29, 1799, being the eldest son of the thirteenth earl—then only called Lord Stanley. In the history of his country the name appears as a statesman; but it is to the columns of the current "press" of his period that the annalist must turn for notices of his private actions. It was not the statesman so much as the man—ever brilliant and impulsive—that must win the admiration of his countrymen. "He was," says the Times, "a splendid specimen of an Englishman." To this it may be added, not only of an Englishman, but an English nobleman. In many respects he was a typical representative of that character, and an honour to his order. In great emergencies, as in the Lancashire cotton famine, his generous public spirit and munificence were fully displayed. He filled most of the leading offices of state with honour, and played a conspicuous part in all the great political controversies which occurred during his half century of public life. He was three times called upon to assume the highest position to which a citizen of his country can aspire—prime minister of the crown; and his brilliant gifts, his powerful eloquence, and his intrepid spirit, gave force and fire to almost everything he said. He will long live in memory as one of the most remarkable men of his time.

The commercial features of the year could hardly be regarded with gratification. Although upwards of three years had elapsed since the general shock of 1866, as yet, there was, in reality, no healthy revival of trade. The cotton manufacture was restricted by an insufficient, as well as a dear supply, of the raw material, which necessarily enhanced the prices of manufactured fabrics, and checked a demand for them by the consumers. This state of trade was the cause of producing controversies between the employer and the workmen, on account of the fluctuations which took place in the rate of wages. Trades' unions employed the agencies at their command to sustain and endeavour to increase the price of labour; and masters loudly complained of the impediments thrown in the way of production by the vexatious proceedings of these societies. General complaints of the stagnation of trade grew more and more prevalent as winter approached. The labouring classes suffered from a scarcity of employment; and the increase of pauperism which had begun to manifest itself, especially in the English metropolis and its eastern suburbs, occasioned serious anxiety to those deputed to watch over the welfare of the people. These conditions, to some extent, led the way to a partial revival, in a few of the northern and midland towns, of the old cry for protection—disguised, however, under the more specious name of reciprocity. But whatever might have been the drawbacks upon the year, as a whole, at its termination a more hopeful feeling as to the future began to be entertained An overflowing quantity of bullion in the money-markets, both of England and France; the absence of disturbing political events; the impetus given to international commerce by the working of the Pacific Railway, and by the opening of the Suez Canal; the rapid extension of submarine telegraphy; and the improvement of railway property by the closing of capital accounts and the increase of traffic receipts, with other causes, contributed to impart a more confident tone to the commercial community, and to enlarge the field of profitable investment. The new bankruptcy law afforded further ground for confidence, from the promise which it gave of clearing the atmosphere of commerce from some of its corrupting elements. Other propitious circumstances were the unusually large supplies of foreign grain, all of which had already been paid for; and the indications of a buoyant state of the revenue, which, taken in conjunction with the retrenchment of expenditure in the public departments, seemed, in the mass, to point hopefully to a diminution of the public burdens, accompanied with a wider prosperity and more general content among the people.

CHAPTER CXXV.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1870.

AT the opening of the year 1870, the condition of Ireland, to the exclusion of all other topics, save the education of the people, occupied the minds of statesmen as well as those of the general public; and the subject was certainly one of great importance. The despatch of additional troops to that island, at the termination of 1869, had in some degree helped the people to suppress their seditious sentiments; but it was felt that quiet was not likely to last long, and that the discontented would, probably, be more violent than before when they did break forth in contempt of the powers that endeavoured to repress them. Whatever was to be hoped or feared from the ultimate results of the one great measure which had already been accomplished, and the other which, it was hoped, was about to be accomplished, there was little doubt that events had recently proved, and were further proving, that any display of gratitude on the part of the Irish people was not to be expected. Disestablishment, without apparently appeasing the Romanists, had irritated the Protestant party; and the promise of the Irish Land Bill naturally roused the tenant-farmers to make demands, which soon grew to be so large as to be beyond all reasonable bounds. Treason and disaffection seemed to be at their height; but it was evident that the government had resolved not to waver in its conciliatory policy; and with its large majority, the prospect was, that when parliament met, it would be as likely to carry the land measure, as it had carried the act of disestablishment.

In the coming event of the legislation which was especially to affect Ireland, it was to be expected that much excitement would prevail among the people of that island; and, in the expectation of an effective Educational Bill, the people of England were stirred from one end of the kingdom to the other. One of those crises in her domestic history seemed to have arrived, when it was felt that action must take the place of mere talk, upon a question which, for some years past, had been exceedingly fertile in the produce of speech. Men of all views, and of opposite parties, appeared determined to establish, if possible, an efficient system of national elementary education; although, in reference to the best means to be adopted for this purpose, there was much disagreement in opinion. Broadly speaking, the two plans of the Manchester Union and the Birmingham League, represented the separate main branches of public sentiment on the question; the former being most favourably received in the rural or country districts, and the latter, advocating unsectarian education, in the towns and cities. So universally prevalent was the expression of a settled desire upon this matter, that it was felt the coming session of parliament must deal with it in such a way as to allay the ferment which the question had excited. Accordingly, great dissatisfaction was expressed when Mr. Bright, speaking at Birmingham, about the commencement of January, more than hinted that the country must be contented if the Irish Land Bill was successfully passed, without even indulging the expectation of any other important act of legislation during the session. "You cannot," he said, with great truth, but little elegance, "easily drive six omnibuses abreast through Temple Bar;" to which Mr. Forster replied, at Bradford, that when the Irish land omnibus had passed through, "Lord de Grey and himself would drive their education omnibus in afterwards."

Such were the principal questions agitating the country when the 8th of February arrived, and when the parliamentary session was to be opened by commission. Lord Cairns was now the Conservative leader of his party in the House of Lords—that place having been vacated by the death of the Earl of Derby. Lord Cairns had been leader before; but the general opinion was, that he was too much of the lawyer and too little of the lord; his subtlety being rather that of the forum than the senate. Nevertheless, as there was no other at the time so suitable, it was absolutely necessary that he should be maintained in the situation. Lord Salisbury might have been eligible, but some differences which had arisen between him and Mr. Disraeli had, to some extent, separated him from his party; more especially from its acknowledged chief in the other House. Lord Cairns, however, being in a state of ill-health, was almost immediately forced to abdicate his functions for a time, and it fell to the Duke of Richmond to take his place.

Regarding the two great questions—the land and the education bills—which had been, and were now, as greatly as ever, agitating the country, they were thus spoken of in the speech from the throne:—"It will be proposed to amend the laws respecting the occupation and acquisition of land in Ireland, in a manner adapted to the peculiar circumstances of that country; and calculated, as her majesty believes, to bring about improved relations between the several classes concerned in Irish agriculture, which collectively constitute the great bulk of the people. These provisions, when matured by your impartiality and wisdom, as her majesty trusts, will tend to inspire among persons with whom such sentiments may still be wanting, that steady confidence in the law, and that desire to render assistance in its effective administration, which mark her subjects in general; and thus will aid in consolidating the fabric of the empire." After this, it was noticed in the next paragraph, that a bill was prepared, "for the enlargement, on a comprehensive scale, of the means of national education." The speech had cut out plenty of work for the session. It recommended for consideration no fewer than ten different measures, all of the gravest importance; but the two already named had taken such prominence in the public mind, that the rest were entirely thrown into the shade.

The address in both Houses was agreed to, when, on the 15th of February, before a large attendance, the premier, Mr. Gladstone, introduced the Irish Land Bill. This measure, the Irish Landlord and Tenant Act for 1870, is divided into five parts; the first regulating the "law of compensation to tenants," respecting which the principal changes effected are these:—1. The Ulster tenant-right custom, and similar customs in other parts of Ireland, receive a legal status.—2. New rights are conferred on tenants with reference to compensation for disturbance by the act of the landlord.—3. Compensation is given for improvements, and the rights and liabilities of landlord and tenant defined. The second part regulates "sale of the lands to tenants." The third part regulates the "advances by, and powers of, the Board of Works." The fourth part regulates "legal proceedings at court." The fifth part contains miscellaneous clauses referring to tenancies created after the passing of the Act.

This, then, is the Act, or Irish Land Bill, pronounced to be one of the most remarkable, and original pieces of legislation in the statute-book, and much debated, both in the Commons' House and that of the Lords. On the 1st of August it received the royal assent; yet was the temper of the Irish very little softened by it. However, after it had passed, the premier felt himself justified in granting an amnesty to the Fenian prisoners still under detention at Portland—coupled, however, with the condition of banishment from the United Kingdom for life, without distinction of persons—"a limitation which, in the opinion of some, was a very wise and righteous measure;" but, in the opinion of others, an ungenerous mistake, which deprived the amnesty both of grace and wisdom, looking especially to the probability of these men, dangerous to England, being thereby introduced into the United States at such a time. Be this as it may, however, it was only events in the womb of the future that could disclose whether the Amnesty Act had been passed for good or for evil.

There was now freedom to direct attention to the Education Bill, which was introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Forster, member for Bradford, on the 17th of February, just two days after the Irish Land Bill. The provisions of this bill did not extend either to Ireland or Scotland, but were designed to secure, throughout England and Wales, the provisions of accommodation and appliances for the elementary education of the people, adequate both in quantity and quality; an object which it proposed to secure, partly by the voluntary schools already in existence, or yet to be established, and partly by the establishment of rate-supported schools under public School Boards. Such was the design of the measure. It did not aim at destroying, but at modifying and developing the system as it had previously existed, taking, to a large extent, the lines of the old foundations for their guides. On introducing his measure, Mr. Forster thus described what he, no doubt, felt to be its difficulties. He said—

"The first problem to be solved was, 'How can we cover the country with good schools?' Now, in trying to solve that problem, there are certain conditions, which I think honourable members on both sides of the House will acknowledge we must abide by. First of all, we must not forget the duty of the parents. Then we must not forget our duty to our constituencies, our duty to the tax-payers. Though our constituencies, almost, I believe, to a man, would spend money, and large sums of money, rather than not do the work; still we must remember that it is upon them that the burden will fall. Thirdly, we must take care not to destroy in building up—not to destroy the existing system in introducing a new one. In solving this problem, there must be, consistently with the attainment of our object, the least possible expenditure of public money, the utmost endeavour not to injure existing and efficient schools, and the most careful absence of all encouragement to parents to neglect their children. Our object is to complete the present voluntary system, to fill up gaps, sparing the public money where it can be done without, procuring, as much as we rightly can, the assistance of the parents, and welcoming, as much as we rightly can, the co-operation and aid of those benevolent men who desire to assist their neighbours."

After the bill had passed the House of Commons, it was received with general favour by the House of Lords, although the introduction of the ballot was much canvassed in both the lower and the upper House. The Duke of Richmond moved an amendment, to the effect, that the election by ballot should be confined to the metropolis, but that in all other districts the election should be conducted in the same manner as that of poor-law guardians. This was, on a division, carried and agreed to by the Commons. With no other alteration the Elementary Education Bill became the law of the country—a measure, the results of which cannot, for years to come, be fully estimated, although its importance can hardly be over-rated. It was, however, reserved for the constituency of Bradford to give the first striking proof, in connection with it, of the estimation in which the voters of that town held the labours of their representative in a national cause. The fact is here recorded, on account of its almost incredibility—that Mr. Forster was rewarded by his constituents, on his meeting them a few months afterwards, with a vote of censure

In connection with the Education Act, it may be stated, that the first election of a metropolitan School Board took place at the close of the year, and naturally excited both great and general interest. This chiefly arose, not only from its own intrinsic importance, but from its being the occasion for what were, practically, the first English experiments of the ballot in cumulative voting; and, above all, in woman-suffrage and woman-candidature. The mode of proceeding in this trial of public strength, in the cause of education, is described as follows:—

"For the purposes of the election, the metropolitan district was formed into ten divisions; the city of London returning four members; the city of Westminster, five; Marylebone, seven; Finsbury, six; Hackney, the Tower Hamlets, and Lambeth, five each; Southwark, Chelsea, and Greenwich, four each: making a total of fifty-nine members. In the first of these divisions only was the voting performed openly. In the other divisions, each voter had to go to one of the polling-places, and to receive a voting-paper printed with the names of the candidates proposed; and was to record upon the paper those for whom he chose to vote, but not to sign it with his name. There were nearly three hundred polling-places altogether throughout the whole of London, open from eight o'clock in the morning till eight in the evening; and the number of voters was fully as great as at a central election for members of parliament. There was, however, no disorder; and the female voters were in strong force. The arrangements were similar in most of the polling-places. At a table sat a president and two inspectors, attended by a rate-collector with his books; and each voter had to identify himself, and establish his right of suffrage, before the voting-paper was handed to him. In a quiet part of each room, writing-places, in each of which one man could write conveniently, were fitted up; and to one of these each elector retired, and indicated the names of the candidates of his or her choice. In another part of the room was the ballot-box, into which they dropped the voting-paper folded."

Such were the arrangements for the electing of candidates to serve in the great cause of popular education. In London alone, there were about 150 candidates for seats at the Board; and the result of the elections was, on the whole, considered satisfactory, both in point of the variety of interest secured, and the qualifications of the members. At Marylebone the proceedings excited an especial degree of interest, from the fact of the district returning, at the head of the poll, Miss Elizabeth Garrett, a lady-physician, and a well-known advocate of woman's rights. She received 20,000 votes more than any other candidate in any part of London; the number recorded for her being upwards of 45,000. The provincial cities and large towns placed under the act, at the same period, elected their respective Boards; so that this scheme for the education of the people may be said to have fairly been brought into operation, leaving it to the progression of time to develop the results.

On introducing his statement shortly afterwards, Mr. Lowe, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, observed, that the original estimate of the revenue of the year 1869-'70 was £72,855,000, which, by the alteration that had taken place in the mode of collecting the taxes, was increased to £76,505,000. The expenditure was £68,223,000, leaving a surplus of £7,982,000. Of this amount, £4,600,000, applied to the discharge of obligations incurred by the Abyssinian war, and £2,940,000 to the reduction of taxation, left a nett surplus of £442,000. The final estimate of the revenue, after the agreed reduction of taxation, was £73,515,000: the actual receipts were £75,334,000—the largest revenue ever raised in this country, with the exception of the three last years of the French war; and one which exceeded that of the year immediately preceding by £2,742,000. The expenditure for the year 1869-'70 was estimated at £68,408,000.

An event now occurred which excited an outcry for vengeance throughout England. This was the Greek massacres. In the month of April, a party of English tourists, residents, proceeded from Athens on an excursion of pleasure to pay a visit to the battle-field of Marathon. The Greek government had reported Attica safe, but granted them an escort of six soldiers; and they were, en route, joined by another party, numbering about twenty-five, who, to that extent, of course, increased the strength of the previous party. At about half-past four in the afternoon, whilst traversing a strip of forest, they were attacked by brigands, who carried the party up to Pentelicus, and ordered them to send one of their number to Athens to obtain a ransom. As there were some persons of rank among the party, the ransom was set down at £50,000; but, subsequently, reduced to one-half. At the same time, threats were held out, that in the event of pursuit being attempted, or any military operations being undertaken against them, the lives of their prisoners would be forfeited. By some mismanagement these conditions were broken; the consequence was, that the whole of the party in the hands of the brigands were massacred one by one. When the news of this cold-blooded event reached England, a burst of grief and rage rose from one end of the kingdom to the other; and all sorts of possible demands were made, both in the country and the House of Parliament, for vengeance, not only on the brigands, but on the Greek government and nation. But the indignation and the sorrow professed in Greece were equally loud with those of England; and its youthful king went so far as to make the chivalrous, though unpractical offer, to become himself a hostage for the captives; whilst his government afterwards proffered large compensation to their families. The first fever of indignation had in a measure subsided, when the matter came before the Houses of Parliament; but in neither was any practical conclusion as to the course to be pursued by England arrived at. By the end of the year, however, seven of the Greek brigands had been executed; and the band that had been implicated in the massacre nearly extirpated. With this the country gradually became appeased; and other matters, of perhaps greater moment, occupied public attention.

The events now which mostly occupied the mind of Europe were those of war. On the 15th of July, almost immediately after Lord Granville had entered upon the duties of foreign minister, with the assurance of the permanent Under-Secretary of the department that the world had never been so profoundly at peace, or the diplomatic atmosphere more serene, it might have been said that already the sound of the cannon's thunder might be heard on the confines of France and Prussia. Into the reasons for this it is unnecessary here to enter; but the news had no sooner been received in England, than general disapprobation was expressed at the precipitance with which France seemed to have drawn her sword. As the policy of England was that of peace, she did all that lay in her power to effect a reconciliation of the differences which had now arisen between two of the greatest powers of Europe, but without success; and although it appeared that France was foremost in the development of hostility, still there were many, skilled in the arts of diplomacy, who believed that Prussia and Count Bismarck were the forces that really put the wheels of the war-chariot into motion. When France, on a former occasion, complained of the nomination of the Prince of Hohenzollern for the Spanish throne, the British government intimated to Prussia, that it thought the nomination should be withdrawn. This view seems to have been coincided in by Prussia, and the nomination was accordingly withdrawn. Subsequently it was suggested to France, that she would not be justified in exacting from Prussia the engagement she required for the future; and to Prussia, that King William should, "visibly and responsibly," associate himself with the withdrawal of the nomination. To this Prussia again agreed; but France, acting under the influence of some reported insults to M. Benedetti, her representative at Ems, refused. The next step on the part of England was to make an appeal to the protocol of Paris; but this was rejected by France as irrelevant, and was received by Prussia with the declaration, that as France had taken the initiative in the war, Prussia could not take the initiative in recommending mediation. This was deemed definitive, and the British government issued a formal proclamation of neutrality. On that same day the declaration of war by France was delivered at Berlin, and the North German parliament opened by King William. He delivered a speech which was, by those who heard it, received in such a manner as to evince the determined sentiment of Germany in regard to the coming struggle. There was no weakness, no wavering of the will, but an evident resolution that death or conquest should be the result on the Prussian side.

At the outbreak of the war, considerable apprehension for the safety of Belgium was felt by the people of England. The publication, in the Times newspaper, of a draft treaty between Count Bismarck and M. Benedetti, the French minister in Prussia, increased this excitement to an extraordinary extent. "The authenticity of this treaty, which took the government by surprise as much as the country, was at first widely disbelieved, but afterwards clearly established. Although this document was, in form, a proposed compact between France and Prussia, it was nothing less than a direct menace to England by the former power, relating, as it chiefly did, to the proposed acquisition of Belgium by her. Up to this time it had been kept secret by Count Bismarck evincing, on his part, little favour towards England; while, on the part of Napoleon III., it revealed perfidy almost unexampled. The whole matter was, after a short time, suffered to pass from the general mind of England; but subsequently, it appeared that the treaty had, by Count Bismarck himself, been communicated to the Times, from an obvious anticipation that its publication would enlist both England and Belgium on his side, perhaps, even as the active allies of Germany. There is a history attached to this document, arising from the manner in which it originated, not undeserving a place here. Its origin appears, as far as it might be possible to judge, to have been derived from the period immediately following on the signature of a document guaranteeing Luxembourg. In 1867, M. Benedetti, a Corsican by birth, and a devoted adherent of the French emperor, was employed by him to demand from Count Bismarck the fulfilment of certain vague promises made at Biarritz. The Chancellor (Bismarck), who had made these promises under a belief that France would, at the end of the war, hold the balance of power between Berlin and Vienna, finding his country strong enough to stand alone, and aware that an attempt to concede anything would undo the moral effect of Sadowa, peremptorily refused to relinquish a single foot of Prussian soil. Upon this, some "pourparlers" about indemnifying France by the coveted possession of Belgium, seem to have followed, which resulted in Benedetti being induced to embody his propositions on paper, which he accordingly did in the draft treaty. By a successful piece of diplomacy on the part of Count Bismarck, he got possession of this manuscript; and while absolutely rejecting the proposals it contained, remarked that the proposed treaty would be of no value to Prussia unless she got hold of Holland, as it did not extend her power beyond what she had otherwise obtained. From this moment it must have been apparent, on both sides, that war was imminent and unavoidable. Accordingly, the preparations which were destined to prove so complete on the one side, and so inadequate on that of the other, were pushed forward with rapidity. Once more, on the very eve of declaring war, if not on the very day of its declaration, the proposal was submitted to the Prussian government, as the only arrangement which could, at present, secure peace with a certain prospect for the future. Prussia, however, once more rejected the proposition, and the next step of Bismarck was to publish the treaty, that all Europe might have an opportunity of seeing it.

In the House of Commons, when asked to throw some light upon this obscure project of treaty, Mr. Gladstone said that the government had been as greatly surprised by its publication as had been every one else; observing, at the same time, that the gravity of the matter "had not been in the slightest degree over-stated." In the House of Lords, Earl Russell called upon the government to declare their intentions with regard to Belgium, to which country, he said, that it would be impossible to "conceive a more specific and defined obligation than ours." He concluded an effective speech by stating that, "the main thing is, how we can best assure Belgium, assure Europe, and assure the world, that we mean to be true and faithful—that the great name which we have acquired in the world, by the constant observance of truth and justice, and by fidelity to our engagements, will not be departed from, and that we shall in the future be what we have been in the past. The great thing of all is, that the members of the government of this country should declare, openly and explicitly, that they mean to be true to our treaties, and faithful to our engagements, and will not sully the fair name of England." In reply, Earl Granville satisfied the House, that a scrupulous adherence would be maintained, by the government, to those principles of right which had already been adopted. The war between France and Germany was now commenced, and carried on with results of almost unvarying disaster to the former country: but our attention must now be directed to other affairs more directly connected with the interests of England.

Surveying the general aspect of the colonial empire of Great Britain, the past year had witnessed a considerable degree of excitement among colonial politicians in England, who, on the durability of the tie which connects the mother country with her dependencies, were persistently argumentative. During a long series of years that tie had been becoming less and less stringent, whilst upon the larger colonies representative institutions had been conferred. The next step, after this, was to establish what was termed "responsible" government, and so on, step by step, until British statesmen were led to the conviction, that the maintenance, at British expense, of troops in the colonies was, with certain exceptions, not to be justly imposed on the British tax-payer, while it was, at the same time, injurious to the defensive energies of the colonists. This course of policy had been gradually developing itself; and at the end of 1869, the last regiment was removed from New Zealand. The general policy of the government, however, as to the withdrawal of troops from all the colonies, was, to a certain extent, checked, as regards Canada, by some Fenian insurrectionary attempts in that colony; but these were soon suppressed, and order re-established. Besides the Fenian movement, another cause of trouble in Canada arose from what was called a "rebellion" on the Red River. It proved, however, of little consequence. The British force sent to suppress it did not lose a single man, owing in a great measure to the foresight and sagacity which had, in conducting it, been employed. "It had," says an eye-witness, "to advance from its point of disembarkation on Lake Superior, for more than six hundred miles, through a wilderness of water, rocks, and forests, where no supplies were to be had, and where every pound weight of provisions and stores had, for miles, to be transported on the backs of soldiers. * * * The total expense was under £100,000, of which one quarter only was to be paid by England." The result of this expedition was, that the province of Manitobah was added to Canada. These events brought on the prorogation of parliament, and the close of the political history of a memorable year for Europe. Speaking of the period, a contemporary says, that in reference to the war, public opinion in England was largely in favour of Germany till after the battle of Sedan, when it unmistakably changed. Notwithstanding this, however, she still preserved her attitude of neutrality, and domestic tranquillity continued undisturbed.

In the autumn of this year, her majesty in council gave her consent to the marriage of the Princess Louise to the Marquis of Lorne, abolishing thereby an exclusive landmark of royalty. Other events of a pleasing description marked the progress of the year. The Prince and Princess of Wales, with the three youngest of their children, paid a visit to Denmark; and M. de Lesseps, the enterprising and successful engineer in carrying out the plan of the Suez Canal, visited England, and was hospitably entertained and fêted at the Crystal Palace by its directors.

On the 13th of July, the Thames embankment was, in behalf of her majesty, opened by the Prince of Wales and the Princess Louise. This great work was commenced in 1864; and the river-side foot-way, between Westminster Bridge and the Temple, was opened to the public a couple of years before; but at that time the completion of the carriage-way was prevented by the unfinished state of the Metropolitan District Railway—an obstacle which had now been removed. The popularity of this event was strongly evinced by the enthusiasm with which it was generally hailed by the assembled thousands of the citizens of the metropolis. Indeed, it may be considered to have formed the principal local event of the year 1870 in the English metropolis.

CHAPTER CXXVI.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1871, 1872.

ITH the opening of the year 1871, the Franco-German war naturally took the foremost place in public thought. Day after day brought the most thrilling narratives of German successes and French defeats in the various districts of France in which the foes encountered each other, so that the mind was kept almost continually on the stretch of expectation, to know what event more extraordinary than the one just past would next come to the front in the dubious and changeful field of war. Domestic affairs were almost forgotten; yet the state of England, in a commercial point of view, was prosperous. The public revenue was sufficiently elastic, and both the money and the discount markets were in an easy condition. The former was in far greater supply than was the demand for it, and rates which, shortly before, were quoted for three months' bills at 2½ per cent., had receded to 2¼ and 2⅜ per cent., even previous to the disbursement of the public dividends, which began at the close of the first week of the year. One of the chief causes of the abundant supplies was considered to be clearly ascribed to the continental war. Before this broke forth, Paris was yearly becoming more and more a commercial centre, where foreign loans were negotiated, on terms more favourable to the borrowers than such as could be obtained in England or Germany. On this account, different countries were gradually becoming, as it were, tributary to the French capitalists, while the interest upon such debts regularly and punctually found its way to Paris. Turkey, Egypt, and Spain were the principal, though not the only tributaries; but whilst the gates of the French capital continued to be closed by the adverse events of the war, money could find its way neither into nor out of it. From this circumstance, the dividend distributions on foreign loans, which were wont to be made in Paris, were changed to London, which, as a matter of course, had the effect of increasing the immediate supplies of the English capital. Estimating probabilities by appearances, too, it was anticipated that several years might elapse before the business again would return to Paris.

Whatever might be the difficulties with which the political position of the government might be surrounded, the ministerial majority seemed as firm and unshaken as it had hitherto been. Some of the members of the cabinet, however, had, by their personal rudeness, earned a most unenviable species of popularity. Among these was Mr. Ayrton, whose administration of the Board of Works had become so pre-eminently offensive to his own constituents, that they proceeded so far as to pass a resolution at a large meeting, to the effect, that "his rude, coarse demeanour, both in and out of parliament, had made the borough of the Tower Hamlets a by-word throughout the United Kingdom." Both Mr. Lowe and Mr. Bruce, likewise, shared in much of the general feeling of disapproval; while Mr. Gladstone himself was "invited to retire" by a considerable body of the Greenwich electors. Still the Liberal majority in the House remained firm, though some ministerial changes took place. Mr. Bright, from illness, being forced to retire from the Board of Trade, Mr. Chichester Fortescue took the place of President, the Marquis of Hartington succeeding Mr. Fortescue as Secretary for Ireland; Mr. Monsell, M.P. for Limerick, accepted Lord Hartington's vacated office, without a seat in the cabinet. Some other changes among less important offices occurred, the most important of which was the retirement of Mr. Childers from the Admiralty, Though this did not actually take place till a somewhat later period, yet at this time it might be considered to have really occurred from the uncertain state of his health.

Shortly before the opening of parliament, the question of army reorganisation came prominently to the front. Sir William Mansfield, raised, during the session, to the peerage under the title of Lord Sandhurst, delivered a remarkable speech upon the subject in Westminster Hall. He there addressed a body of volunteers, who, he said, might be taken as the representatives of 150,000 men then in arms. The vital difficulty which stood in the way of a proper voluntary military organisation in England, was the many conflicting interests which interfered with its accomplishment. "What is it that causes that conflict of interests?" he asked; and answered, "It arises from the fact, that every one of those bodies relies for its existence merely on the voluntary principle. As regards bodies such as I am now addressing, consisting of men who stand forward as volunteers, willing to give up to the state such time as they can spare from their vocations pressing upon them, it would be absurd to expect that any principle or organisation, other than the voluntary principle, could apply to them; and as regards the line, I may say that, from whatever point of view we in England may contemplate what is going on upon the continent; however we may be moved by the spectacle of two great military nations struggling, and with whatever feelings we may see these countries placing their whole population under arms, not merely embodying them for purposes of defence, but sending them across the frontiers as well, I do not believe there is any one who would like to see such an organisation adopted and applied to England." In this respect, Sir William spoke no more than the general sentiment of the country at large.

The excitement caused by the army question brought out the opinions of many eminent men upon the subject. Among these Earl Russell appeared. This nobleman addressed a letter to the Times newspaper, laying down certain objects to be secured in the reorganisation of the national defences. "The United Kingdom," he said "ought to be defended against invasion. The colonies and dependencies of the United Kingdom ought to be protected by our naval and military forces against a foreign enemy. The engagements of the crown and of our country with foreign powers ought to be fulfilled. Let us add to these three objects, that when our honour or our interests are deeply involved in some national dispute, they ought to be firmly maintained." Those propositions, it is evident, are such as belong, not to a day, but to all time; and in order to secure these objects, Lord Russell, borrowing from Sir John Burgoyne, Sir William Mansfield, and other distinguished officers, and adding some proposals drawn from his own civil experience, made the following suggestions:—

1. That not less than 200,000 men, consisting of regular army and embodied militia, should be kept up within the United Kingdom.

2. Army.—That the system of purchase of commissions in the army should be abolished, either immediately or gradually.

3. That to the commander-in-chief should be assigned, as at present, the duties of maintaining discipline in the army, and of recommending officers for promotion.

4. That the field artillery should be largely increased, according to the example of Prussia.

5. That a sufficient store of powder should be provided both for artillery and infantry.

6. That the recruiting of privates for the artillery should be stimulated by bounty.

7. That the term of service, both for infantry and cavalry, should be for seven years, and for artillery, for ten years.

8. That a service of twenty-one years should entitle the soldier to a pension of 9*d.*, and of twenty-four years, of 1*s.* a day.

9. Militia.—That the militia should be raised by ballot, according to the old militia laws, for service in the United Kingdom only.

10. That in the first week of May in each year, every regiment of militia should be called together, and the number willing to volunteer for the army should be registered. That the services of not more than two-thirds of the men willing to volunteer for the army should be accepted. The places of those accepted to be filled up by ballot in the month of October succeeding.

11. The commissions of subalterns in the militia to be given, as at present, by the lord-lieutenant; but all promotions to commissions of captain, major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel, to be granted by the commander-in-chief of the army.

12. Volunteers.—Every volunteer who wishes to be entitled to a grant of money, clothes, or arms from the Treasury, to sign an engagement to attend —— days in the year, the meeting of his corps, or in default to pay a fine for absence.

Such were some of his lordship's suggestions, drawn forth by the state of public feeling, having reference to the war raging on the continent. There were many more important propositions made upon the same subject; but they had all, more or less, a similar stamp. There is, however, one fact worth placing on record, as showing what was felt by the people, at least in one largely populated district, in reference to the purchase system in the army. The circumstance occurred in the large town of Birmingham. Mr. Muntz, its representative in parliament, had been one of the commissioners appointed to inquire into that system; and while entirely condemning the system, he, at the same time, informed his constituents, that it would cost no less than £7,000,000 to abolish it in an equitable manner. How this was to be, he explained with great clearness; and, with some authority, asked them to tell him candidly whether they were prepared to pay such an enormous sum? The question was, in the most formal manner, put to the meeting, and elicited a vote absolutely unanimous. Though the pecuniary difficulty had, both most clearly and most forcibly been explained, not a single hand in the assembly was raised in opposition.

While these matters, in union with the Franco-German war, were almost entirely absorbing the attention of the country, the parliamentary session was, on the 19th of February, opened by her majesty the Queen. The Lord Chancellor read the royal speech, the Queen sitting with downcast eyes during the whole time of its delivery, and perfectly still, except a slight movement made of her fan. The speech observed, that the war between France and Germany broke out in the month of July; and that, until within the last few days, it had raged without intermission: whilst, after a few days more, its ravages might be renewed. However, the sphere of the war had not extended beyond the two countries originally engaged; and her majesty had succeeded in placing the representatives, both of France and Germany, in confidential communication; but, until famine should force Paris to surrender, no further result could be obtained. It was further stated, that "the armistice, now being employed for the convocation of an assembly in France, has brought about a pause in the constant accumulation, on both sides, of human suffering, and has rekindled the hope of a complete accommodation." It was hoped that this would result in peace. The speech also noticed the acceptance of the title of Emperor of Germany by the King of Prussia, and stated that her majesty had offered her congratulations on the event, which bore testimony to the solidity and independence of Germany, and which, it was hoped, might be found conducive to the stability of the European system. It further noticed that there were several unsettled questions existing between Great Britain and the United States, amongst which were the American claims, growing out of the circumstances of the late Transatlantic war. Two or three other matters, less closely connected with the affairs of Britain, were spoken of, and the speech closed.

In the debates on the address, in answer to the speech, there is little to call for notice, and the work of the session for 1871 commenced. A mere rehearsal of its labours will be sufficient to show the amount of legislation which it accomplished, and which was quite equal to the achievements of the two sessions immediately preceding. A writer in one of the leading quarterly reviews, thus comprehensively sums up the work of the session at its close:—

"The huge monopoly of purchase in the army, with its rank growth of vested interests, and all the traditions of caste and wealth in its favour, has been swept away; the privilege of nominating officers to the militia and the volunteers has been removed from the private patronage of great nobles, and vested in the crown, and the ground has been otherwise cleared for army reform. The universities have been compelled to surrender; their gates have been opened wide, and the doors, even of the colleges, unbarred. The Trades' Union Act, and the act amending the criminal law in respect to violence, threats, and molestation, offer a remedy for difficulties of long standing, on terms equitable to the employers and the employed. The Westmeath Act, as it is commonly termed, had unearthed the Ribbon Society from its lair, and sped a home-thrust at its power. The Local Government Board Act is a considerable measure of administrative reform, and opens the way for much-needed improvements in the conduct of local affairs, and a comprehensive system of sanitary regulations. The Ecclesiastical Titles' Act has happily disposed of a protracted controversy between rival churches, in a manner agreeable to the privileges of religious equality, yet without impairing the position or wounding the susceptibilities of the Protestant establishment. The Local Government Act for Ireland has supplied a want long felt, extending to municipalities and other local authorities in the sister island—legislative facilities corresponding to those enjoyed by similar authorities both in England and Scotland. The principle of secret ballot has been so decidedly affirmed, and the machinery for giving effect to it so thoroughly canvassed by the House of Commons, that its way through that assembly is made plain, and its acceptance, at no distant date, by the other House insured. Amid the pressure of domestic legislation, the state of affairs abroad, and our own relations with foreign countries, have been of a character to impose a heavy strain upon the government of the day, and to demand the continued exercise of vigilance and of judgment on the part of parliament. The firmness and tact of the Foreign Office successfully and honourably maintained our position as neutrals in the war between France and Germany—a task rendered one of singular difficulty and delicacy by the danger of Belgium, our immediate vicinity to the countries engaged, and the irritating question of the supply of materials of war by a neutral to a belligerent. The termination of the Black Sea dispute by a settlement which obtained the concurrence of all the parties concerned, met with the unmistakable approval of parliament. Still more did the treaty of Washington, a monument of diplomatic skill and industry, which has not only removed existing and future sources of danger to friendly intercourse between this country and the United States, but, in giving the sanction of both countries to the principle that nations should not be the judges in their own cause, has set an example worthy of imitation by all civilised powers."

These results are sufficient to show that the session was far from being a barren one; whilst minor measures of utility were not wanting to supplement these national transactions, which more especially take a place in the record of nations.

In the month of March, the town of Dover was witness of an incident which has few parallels in the history of those whose destinies it has been to be invested with all the insignia of royalty. The incident alluded to was, after a separation extending to eight months, the meeting of the Emperor Napoleon, the Empress Eugénie, and the Prince Imperial. The day was unusually fine, and many thousands of people had assembled to witness the arrival of the illustrious exile. The empress, with the prince imperial, and a limited suite, arrived at Dover from Chiselhurst, and waited there till the boat which bore the fallen emperor was sighted. When the vessel which carried him got to her moorings, cheer after cheer burst from the assembled multitude; and when the emperor stepped on shore, the mayor went up to him, saying, "I received your majesty on the occasion of your visit to England fifteen years ago, and I now repeat my salutations." Smiling and making some agreeable remark, Napoleon began to walk slowly towards the railway terminus; but he had proceeded but a few yards, when the Empress Eugénie clasped him in her arms, and several times passionately kissed him. Tears rolled from her eyes as she placed both her hands on his arm, while the young prince had seized both hands of his father, and on each cheek saluted him. The scene was such as greatly to affect the crowds of people who beheld it, and who cheered vociferously. The royal party then proceeded on their way to the Lord Warden Hotel, amid the waving of hats and handkerchiefs, and shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!" and "Vive Imperatrice!" Shortly afterwards they left for their English home.

On the day after the arrival of the Emperor Napoleon in England, the marriage of the Princess Louise took place. She was the fourth daughter of her majesty the Queen, and was united to John George Campbell, Marquis of Lorne, eldest son of the Duke of Argyll. The ceremony was, with great pomp, celebrated in St. George's Chapel, Windsor.

One of the most extraordinary causes célebrès was, before the Court of Common Pleas, called on the 10th day of May, and after judge, counsel, and witnesses were present, and the pannel called, it was found that only three jurymen, out of twenty-two summoned, answered to their names. The hearing was, therefore, deferred until next day, when only nine gentlemen answered to their names. Two others having been procured, the counsel on each side agreed to proceed although still short of a juryman. The case accordingly was begun. Referring to the non-appearance of the persons summoned on the jury, the Lord Chief Justice said that he should enforce a fine of £10 on those who had not attended on the first day, £20 for the second day, and, if necessary, he should double the fine day by day until it reached £500. This trial was, from various causes, interrupted from time to time, but at last was continued through many weeks, every day developing some new cause of interest till its termination. The "Claimant" for the Tichborne estates, as the prisoner was called, was ultimately found guilty, and sentenced to a period of fourteen years' imprisonment.

In November, the Prince of Wales was suddenly attacked with typhoid fever, which, without any alarming complications, continued to run its course down to and through the first week of December. On the 8th of that month, however, a serious relapse occurred, and for some days the life of his royal highness was in imminent danger. Several of the members of the royal family were summoned to Sandringham, where the prince was lying, and the excitement in the English metropolis became intense. Crowds of eager inquiries gathered round the various newspaper offices, anxious for the latest information. It is recorded that, at Marlborough House, "the telegrams were watched for by a large number of persons, who remained standing on the pavement and out in the street, regardless of the piercing cold, and anxious only to learn the latest intelligence as speedily as possible." Equal anxiety was manifested all over the country. At length the danger passed, and the Queen made public the following letter, by which she personally both accepted and answered the sympathy shown by her people :—

"Windsor Castle, December 26, 1871.

"The Queen is very anxious to express her deep sense of the touching sympathy of the whole nation, on the occasion of the alarming illness of her dear son, the Prince of Wales. The universal feeling shown by her people during those painful, terrible days, and the sympathy evinced by them, with herself and her beloved daughter the Princess of Wales, as well as the general joy at the improvement in the Prince of Wales's state, have made a deep and lasting impression on her heart, which can never be effaced. It was, indeed, nothing new to her, for the Queen had met with the same sympathy when, just ten years ago, a similar illness removed from her side the mainstay of her life—the best, wisest, and kindest of husbands.

"The Queen wishes to express, at the same time, on the part of the Princess of Wales, her feelings of heartfelt gratitude, for she has been as deeply touched as the Queen, by the great and universal manifestation of loyalty and sympathy.

"The Queen cannot conclude without expressing her hope that her faithful subjects will continue their prayers to God for the complete recovery of her son to health and strength."

With this missive the year of 1871 may be said to have closed.

At the commencement of the year 1872, it was announced that the progress of the prince towards a state of convalescence continued to be both rapid and satisfactory. Both the local pains with which he had been afflicted and the fever had subsided, so that it soon became evident that all danger for the present was past. This fortunate state of things continued; and, in the month of February, his complete recovery was commemorated by a celebration, which assumed the proportions of a national festival. The day set apart for this national event was the 27th, when a general thanksgiving for the recovery of the prince took place, and the day was kept as a national holiday. The weather was all that could be desired, and the streets of London were crowded to a degree more dense than had been the case on any previous occasion. The public bodies of the city proper, and every householder, seemed to vie with one another in doing honour to the occasion; whilst the vast throng of persons in the streets seemed, by their countenances, to be animated but with one spirit of joy. The following is a brief description of what may be considered as the principal feature of the celebration :—

"Soon after twelve o'clock, the band in the inner court of Buckingham Palace struck up, 'God save the Queen;' and, at the same instant, the coach of the Speaker of the House of Commons was driven out to the semicircle in front of the palace, and placed in position to lead the procession. The carriage of the Lord Chancellor followed, and in a few minutes the order to proceed was given. As the first of the royal carriages emerged from the central gate, the centre window of the state-room over the portico was opened, and the Emperor Napoleon and the Empress Eugénie stepped out on the balcony. When the carriage conveying the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales came out from the court-yard, the emperor took off his hat, and both he and the empress bowed more than once to her majesty and their royal highnesses. As the procession reached the Mall, the masses on either side of the line raised a cheer, which was instantly taken up by those who, as yet, could not get even a distant glimpse of the Queen and the prince. Without the interval of a second the cheering continued, and grew in strength till the illustrious personages entered St. Paul's. The conduct of the people was excellent. From every inch of standing-room came incessant cheering, and cries of 'God bless the Queen!' 'God bless the Prince of Wales!' But there was no rushing, and, without a halt, the procession turned from the Mall out to the front of St. James's Palace. The route thence was by Pall Mall, the Strand, and through Temple Bar to St. Paul's, and thence back by Ludgate Hill, the Holborn Viaduct, Oxford Street, Hyde Park, and Constitution Hill. The service held in St. Paul's was simple, but singularly striking; and a magnificent illumination closed the day."

Before the assembling of parliament, the government of Mr. Gladstone had become so unpopular, that penetrating politicians already began to predict its certain downfall before many months. Much of this feeling had arisen from a desire to humiliate Mr. Gladstone, whose tone had become somewhat too dictatorial to be relished even by many of those who had hitherto been his supporters. Parliament met, however, on the 6th of February, and the occasion derived a pleasing interest from the appointment of a new Speaker. John Evelyn Denison, who had filled the chair for fifteen years, retired to the House of Lords as Viscount Ossington, and was succeeded by Henry William Bouverie Brand, who entered upon his new duties to the general satisfaction of the House. He had entered parliament in 1852 as member for Lewes, and though he had never acquired much notice as a speaker, he had displayed an intimate acquaintance with the rules and usages of the House, whilst he was personally well acquainted with its older members, having long served as "whip" to the Liberal party.

Parliament was opened by royal commission, and the Queen's speech, read by the Lord Chancellor, contained nothing of such moment as to provoke long debate upon the address; but there had been an appointment of Sir Robert Collier to a seat on the judicial bench in the Court of Common Pleas. This, it was considered by other judges, to be contrary to the statute, and created much dissatisfaction. The matter was, in the upper House, debated early in the session; but, in the end, public feeling was satisfied by a formal parliamentary condonation, deemed equivalent to a moderate expression of disapproval. The popularity of the government was now fast falling, and, on the question of local taxation, it was defeated by a majority of 100, the numbers being 259 to 159. The Ballot Bill, however, was the principal feature of the session; and in the House of Lords it passed by a majority of 19 in favour of the government. The claims set forth by the United States upon England, having reference to the deeds of the ship Alabama, and other acts, were amicably arranged. In criticising the proceedings of the arbitrators on these points, Mr. Lowe, Chancellor of the Exchequer, observed that he considered it the duty of this country to obey the Geneva award without cavil or comment, although he regretted that the arbitrators should have felt it necessary to deviate from the practice of ordinary arbitrators, and give reasons for their judgment. Such expressions, however, were now of little avail. The proceedings had been brought to a termination under the arbitration clause of the treaty of Washington, and it was the first time that disputed points between nations had been submitted to a tribunal of learned men specially named for the purpose, and with the form and method of a public legal controversy.

Intelligence had arrived in England that, on the 8th of February, Lord Mayo, Viceroy of India, had been assassinated. Returning from a visit of inspection at Ross Island, his lordship was assassinated by a native who had been watching his opportunity. "The native, who has," says an eye-witness, "either been crouching amidst a heap of stones hard by, or insidiously mingled with the following, at those last moments hustles aside the nearest guard, leaps upon the viceroy from behind, throwing his left arm round him, and stabs him twice. It is the work of one brief moment. Colonel Jervois sees the blow struck; Lieutenant Hawkins half draws his sword upon the striker; a convict chuprassi seizes the assassin red-handed, who is instantly, amidst shouts of 'Kill him! kill him!' (Maro! Maro!) pinned to the earth. He would be torn to pieces but for the multitude of his struggling assailants, and, in the tumult, the torches are almost wholly extinguished. The viceroy staggers beneath the force of the blow, down the sloping side of the jetty into the shallow water below, and then, with a little help, totters, faint and bleeding, to a truck on the other side of the pier, saying to the secretary, 'They've hit me, Burne.' We gather round him bewildered, and for the moment utterly unnerved, and strive in vain to stanch the only wound visible. He sits, supported for one or two minutes, quite unconscious, gasps a few half-articulate words, falls rigidly backwards, swoons and dies." The assassin was tried, and, without implicating any one else in his crime, paid the penalty of the law. The body of Lord Mayo was brought to Ireland, and interred in Johnstown churchyard on the 26th of April.

On the 29th of the same month, her majesty the Queen was taking a drive in the park, and having returned to the entrance of Buckingham Palace, where her majesty usually alights, a lad suddenly rushed forward upon her with a paper in one hand and a pistol in the other. The lad was immediately seized and disarmed. On examination, the weapon was found to be unloaded; but the lad was taken to the police-office at Westminster, and was, on the following day, committed for trial. This event supplied her majesty with the opportunity for carrying into practice an idea which, for some time previous, she had entertained. This was, to institute a medal as a reward for long and faithful service among her own domestics. One of these, on this occasion, happened to be a Highlander of the name of John Brown, the Queen's personal attendant, who received a medal in gold, with an annuity of £25 attached to it, as a mark of her appreciation of his presence of mind and of his devotion, exhibited on this attack made upon her majesty.

On the 23rd of July, intelligence was received that Mr. Stanley, a young correspondent of the New York Herald newspaper, after having discovered Dr. Livingstone, the long-lost African explorer, had arrived in Europe, and landed at Marseilles. In the previous year, the editor of the Herald telegraphed to Mr. Stanley, then at Madrid, making the proposition for him to go to Africa and find Livingstone, offering a carte blanche in the way of expenses. On the 3rd of November, 1871, he unexpectedly came upon the lost traveller at Ujiji, and his despatches graphically describe their meeting. Making as great a display of his power as his means would allow, Mr. Stanley entered the town of Ujiji, and observed a group of Arabs, in the centre of whom was a pale-looking, grey-bearded, white man, whose fair skin contrasted strongly with the bronzed visages of those by whom he was surrounded. He was clad in a red woollen jacket, and wore upon his head a naval cap, with a faded gilt band round it. This was Livingstone. Stanley was about to testify his joy at having found him; but recollecting that he was in the presence of Arabs in the habit of concealing their feelings, and likely to judge of a man by the manner in which he commanded his own, he made no sign of rejoicing. Slowly advancing towards the traveller, he bowed, and said, "Dr. Livingstone, I presume?" to which the latter, being quite equal to the occasion, simply replied, "Yes." It was not till several hours afterwards, when alone together, seated on a goat-skin, that the two white men exchanged such congratulations as it might be anticipated they were very desirous to express; and recounted to each other their respective hair-breadth escapes, difficulties, dangers, and adventures. Dr. Livingstone was in good health, quite undismayed by what he had already gone through, and eager only to accomplish his voluntary, self-imposed task. Having for several years been almost entirely shut out from the civilised world, the traveller was naturally thirsting for intelligence as to what had been going on during his absence from those lands, of which, every morning, some information is easily obtained by those inhabiting them. Mr. Stanley, accordingly, had to constitute himself a sort of newspaper, and enter into details of numerous transactions.

"When we were alone," he says, "I handed to him a packet of letters from home, and said that, after he had finished reading them, he should next be told all the news from the civilised world, so far as I myself knew them. 'No, no,' said Livingstone; 'for three years I have been waiting for letters from home; I can afford to wait a few hours longer. Give me the news of the world!' So I reported to him all I could think of: the striking events of the Franco-German war, the capture of Napoleon, the flight of the empress, and the declaration of the republic; the fall of Queen Isabella of Spain, the election of General Grant in America, the opening of the Pacific railroad, and whatever else I thought likely to be interesting to one who had lived so long at such remoteness from the movements of civilisation. One of the very first questions which he put, with a view to supplementing my budget of intelligence, was about the welfare of his 'dear old friend,' Sir Roderick Murchison: I answered that, at my latest advices, he was quite well; for it was only on my return to the coast that I learnt of his death, which I since knew had happened only about three weeks before I saw the traveller in whose eventual safety the veteran president (of the Royal Geographical Society) so staunchly believed. Although Dr. Livingstone had been absent from his native country so long, he spoke English perfectly, both in phrase and accent. After I had told Livingstone everything, he narrated to me, in return, all that had happened to himself; first recounting the latest, and in some ways the most important facts, and afterwards going back over the whole period of his voluntary and toilsome banishment, to give a complete and connected history of his wanderings from the time he quitted Zanzibar in the fall of 1865. This narrative was not the occupation of a single evening, as it lasted, with the explanations and amplifications necessary for one who had not been among the scenes themselves, during all the four months I remained with Livingstone, from November 10th, 1871, to March 14th, 1872."

The success of Mr. Stanley's mission to find Dr. Livingstone was a subject of great satisfaction to the British community at large; and that it might receive due acknowledgment from the highest quarters, her majesty the Queen, in the August of the year 1872, forwarded, through Earl Granville, a message of thanks to Mr. Stanley, accompanied with a gold snuff-box, set with diamonds. The letter ran thus:—

"Sir,—I have great satisfaction in conveying to you, by command of the Queen, her majesty's high appreciation of the prudence and zeal which you have displayed in opening a communication with Dr. Livingstone, and relieving her majesty from the anxiety which, in common with her subjects, she had felt in regard to the fate of that distinguished traveller. The Queen desires me to express her thanks for the service you have thus rendered, together with her majesty's congratulations on your having so successfully carried out the mission which you so fearlessly undertook. Her majesty also desires me to request your acceptance of the memorial which accompanies this letter."

As Africa was now occupying a large place in the public mind, Sir Bartle Frere, vice-president of the Royal Geographical Society, accepted a mission to the east coast of that continent, with a view of suppressing the slave-trade. Previous to his departure, he was, in November, entertained by a large company interested in the mission; and hopes were expressed that he, also, might fall-in with Dr. Livingstone: but this was beyond his own expectation.

CHAPTER CXXVII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1873, 1874.

THE year of 1873 was ushered in with ominous appearances to all the interests of those establishments which employed coal in the product of their manufactures. First came a strike among the iron-workers of South Wales. It arose from the iron-masters giving notice of a 10 per cent. reduction of wages, which was to have taken place on the 1st of December in the year preceding. The reason assigned for this was, that the iron trade had become so bad, that they could not book orders, except at such a great reduction in price as absolutely compelled them to retrench the wages of their work-people.' Attempts were made at arbitration, but they failed. Accordingly, the masters suggested that the men should go to work, and continue at the reduction, till the 1st of March, to await the result of the spring demand for iron, when it was believed that there would be such an improvement as to enable employers to return the 10 per cent., possibly with an addition. The reason given for this proposition, was to enable the present difficulty to be tided over till then. At a meeting at Merthyr, however, the workmen decisively rejected the proposal, at the same time insisting either upon old prices or arbitration; but when arbitration had been declared before, the men insisted upon 5 per cent. more than had been awarded, which the masters were forced to give, or close their works.

The difficulty in the iron trade was further complicated by the action of the coal-owners. These, in the district, bound themselves to rise or fall with the pits of the iron-masters. A few days after these had issued their notices, the steam coal-owners followed with a notice of reduction, and they were, immediately afterwards, followed by the house coal-owners with theirs. The angry attitude of the colliers led to the withdrawal of the notices at almost all the pits, of these classes, leaving the iron-masters alone in antagonism with their men. Things continued in this unsettled state till the end of March, when, after many futile attempts at arrangement and negotiation, the strike was brought to a close. Meanwhile the effect upon the supply and price of coals throughout the country was so serious as to become alarming, and no sign of any material improvement or reduction of prices succeeded the termination of the strike. Meetings, in some instances of great violence, were held in many parts of the kingdom, and the effect upon some branches of trade was extremely depressing. Even the railway and great steamship companies, although protected by large contracts, were unable to get their orders executed. In the month of February, coals in London rose to £2 10*s*. a ton; but though prices continued to be exorbitantly high, the country became quiet as the year advanced. In other respects, the year of 1873 was singularly uneventful in so far as England was concerned.

On the 9th of January, the death of the Emperor Napoleon was publicly announced. He died at Camden House, Chiselhurst, after having twice undergone the operation of lithotrity while under the influence of chloroform. When it was apparent that the last moments of the emperor were fast approaching, the Empress Eugénie and suite were summoned to the sick chamber. In the meantime, the Prince Imperial was sent for from the Royal Academy at Woolwich, where he was found engaged at drill. He was too late, however, to be present at the death of his father. This gave him much sorrow, and appeared greatly to augment the grief of the empress. Towards the close of the emperor's life, there were but slight indications of consciousness, although he twice addressed some words to the empress in a low and feeble tone of voice. When the body was laid out in state, it was visited by the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh, besides from twenty to thirty thousand other persons. A large proportion of these were French. The body was buried on the 15th of the month, in a mortuary chapel within St. Mary's church. So died in exile, as did his great uncle, Napoleon III.

In Paris, the news of the late emperor's death was received with the greatest possible indifference, and not a single shop was closed on the day of the funeral. In the Journal Officiel of the French republic, the following are the terms in which his death was announced:—"Napoleon III. est mort hier, 9 Janvier, à Chiselhurst." This was all; and it did not appear till January 11th, no notice of the event having previously been taken by the official organ. The Paris correspondent of the Times newspaper, writing on that date, says—"One wandered about bewildered by the absence of any sign to denote that impressionable Paris was in possession of any fresh topic of common interest and talk. There could scarcely have been less sensation, if it had been the Emperor of China whose death was just reported, instead of a sovereign whose name, for good or evil, had been, during twenty years, ever in the mouths of these very Parisians, and whose goings in and out among them they had watched daily with eager eyes."

Parliament met on the 6th of February; and the royal speech was the precursor of an extremely dull and barren session. It was evident to those who were learned in political indications, that Mr. Gladstone, the premier, had miscalculated the strength of his supporters. As much as he had of this, however, he used it in a hopeless attempt to please the various parties in Ireland, and consequently failed. The Irish University Bill occupied a conspicuous place in the Queen's speech; and a week after the assembling of parliament, the prime minister explained a measure which, if not in its language, in its details as well as in its conception, was entirely his own. His opening statement was considered, by all who heard it, a masterpiece of lucid exposition; and few such genuine tributes have ever been paid to oratorical ability, than the apparently assenting silence with which the bill, which afterwards produced universal dissatisfaction, was, on the first flush of its explanation, received. But its elaborate provisions were not such as to be at once comprehended as they fell from the lips of the minister. They required careful study and deliberate weighing; and after they had obtained this, the general opinion was extremely adverse to the measure.

On the second reading of the bill, Professor Fawcett distinguished himself by a singularly powerful, but remarkably bitter speech. He asserted that the bill would reduce the condition of university education in Ireland to a much more unsatisfactory state than that in which it was, and would rather create than obviate evils with which it was designed to deal. There was not a single principle in it consistently carried out. Indeed, it was nothing more than a compromise, intended to please everybody, but which would please nobody. Travelling over the principal points of the measure, Mr. Fawcett took exception to the governing body, and asked on what principle the selection of its members was to be made—was the qualification to be academical distinction, or a balance of religious opinions? Of the degrading censorship of professorial teaching involved in the bill, Mr. Fawcett spoke with great severity; and, as a Cambridge professor himself, he said, that if such clauses were introduced into the English universities, he would not submit to them. The measure, he thought, could lead to no other conclusion than the disestablishment of denominational education in Ireland. It did not satisfy a single class, and he hoped the House would reject it on its merits, without reference to the collateral issue of a ministerial crisis.

Mr. Fawcett was followed by many of the younger Liberal members, who denounced the humiliating precautions of the bill against proselytism, and an alleged inclination in the government to conciliate the priesthood. Other members vehemently opposed the measure; and the debate was closed by Mr. Disraeli and Mr. Gladstone. The former, in closing a powerful speech, said, "No one wishes to disturb the right honourable gentleman in his place. If the right honourable gentleman intends to carry out a great policy—that of confiscation—I wish, at least, that he shall not be able to say that he has not had a fair trial for that policy. I wish the House and the country fully to comprehend all the bearings of that policy of the right honourable gentleman. But although I have not wished to make this a party question—although I have no wish to disturb the right honourable gentleman in his seat—although I have no communication with any section or with any party in this House—I may say, with any individual of my own immediate colleagues, I must do my duty when I am asked. 'Do you or do you not approve this measure?' I must vote against a measure which I believe to be monstrous in its general principles, pernicious in many of its details, and utterly futile as a measure of practical legislation."

Mr. Gladstone made his reply; remarking, that two-thirds of the speech which had just been heard, had no connection whatever with the bill. What he wanted was, to mete out to Ireland as large a measure of justice as he could. "Having put our hand to the plough," he said, "let us not turn back. Let not what we think the fault or the perverseness of those whom we are attempting to assist, have the slightest effect in turning us from the path on which we have entered. As we have begun, so let us go through; and with firm and resolute hand, let us efface from the law and the practice of the country, the last—I believe it is the last—of the religious and social grievances of Ireland." The House now divided on the question, that the bill be read a second time. Against this there were 287 votes, and for it, 284; giving a majority of three against the government.

As Mr. Gladstone had declared that his ministry would stand or fall by the result of this division, he immediately placed his resignation in the hands of the Queen, to the great surprise of the country at large, as the people generally had troubled themselves very little about this measure, perhaps as much from lack of comprehension respecting its details, as from anything else. However, the ministerial crisis proved to be of little consequence, as Mr. Disraeli declined to accept of office with a minority, especially when a dissolution of parliament must soon take place. Whatever were the reasons or the difficulties in the way, however, on the 20th of March, ministers resumed their places on the Treasury bench.

The Judicature Bill, which originated in the House of Lords, was the only measure of the first class passed this session. Its objects were the consolidation of the law courts, and a more judicious simplification of the administration of justice. Under this act, the Supreme Court of Appeal consists of the Lord Chancellor, the Chief Justices, the Chief Baron, the Master of the Rolls, the peers who have held judicial office, and the permanent members of the judicial committee of the privy council. By one of the most doubtful provisions of the bill, intermediate appeals are abolished; and the Supreme Court exercises exclusive appellate jurisdiction in all English, Indian, and colonial cases. This measure certainly redeems from insignificance the legislative performances of the government.

The budget of the year, though not of a very ambitious character, met with a considerable amount of opposition. A proposition being made to borrow money to pay the Alabama indemnity when there was a surplus revenue in hand, was denounced by Professor Fawcett as a "cowardly policy." Neither did he think the remission of the sugar duties the most effective way of relieving consumers, as it only amounted to a farthing in the pound. In reference to this duty, a resolution was moved that, before deciding further on the reduction of indirect taxation, the government ought to be put in possession of its effect on the maintenance and adjustment of direct taxation, local and imperial. The motion was negatived without a division; but the propositions in the budget were, on the whole, unsatisfactory.

An interesting episode of the session was the announcement of the intended marriage of the Duke of Edinburgh and the only daughter of the Czar of Russia. It entered into the duties of Mr. Gladstone to propose an annual grant of £10,000, to be settled on the Duke and Grand Duchess Maria Alexandrovna of Russia, during the life of his royal highness, with a provision of £6,000 a-year to the grand duchess in the event of her surviving her husband. As parliament voted an annuity to the Duke of Edinburgh on his coming of age, the new grant raised the amount of his allowance to £25,000 a-year—a provision which, said Mr. Gladstone, "while it does not err on the side of parsimony, certainly does not err on the side of excess." The grant was allowed. With this the session may be considered to have closed; and immediately afterwards the public were startled by the intelligence of ministerial changes of a most unusual description. So great were these, that they almost amounted to an entire reconstruction of the cabinet. Open differences of opinion existed between Mr. Lowe and Mr. Ayrton, and Mr. Baxter resigned the secretaryship of the Treasury, in consequence of difficulties with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Their disputes required settlement and readjustment; but this seemed difficult of accomplishment. The country, too, showed, by repeated Conservative victories at elections, that some new arrangement was necessary. Accordingly, the first step was to remove Mr. Lowe from the Exchequer, and instal him at the Home Office; and Mr. Gladstone attached the duties of the office to himself, uniting in his own person the offices of Premier and Chancellor of the Exchequer. History furnished him with precedents for this. Mr. Childers retired, leaving a vacancy for Mr. Bright, who re-entered the cabinet, and took the Duchy of Lancaster. Mr. Bruce received a peerage, and became Lord Ripon's successor as President of the Council. Other changes of a minor nature took place; but the most popular was the return of Mr. Bright to office, his long illness having excited a general sympathy in his behalf. Whilst these changes were being effected in high quarters, the elections throughout the country were proving, in general, adverse to the Liberal government.

In the course of the summer of 1873, the general tranquillity of our colonial possessions was interrupted by the breaking out of hostilities between the administrators of our possessions and dependencies on the Gold Coast, and the King of Ashantee, or "Shantee." Sir Garnet Wolseley, an officer of ability and energy, was despatched to the scene of war with a force deemed sufficient to conquer the enemy. On the 12th of September of this year he left Liverpool, and on October 4th addressed a body of native chiefs, or so-called kings, on the African Gold Coast. These kings, however, were of very small proportions, as regarded their wealth. In proof of this, sixteen of them figure in the estimates of a proposed Fantee confederacy, at £50 a-piece, or in all, £800 a-year. It is stated in a contemporary work, that, "on the 5th and 6th of November, the Ashantees attacked a British position at Abrakrampa in considerable force, but were repulsed. On this, as on all occasions of conflict, it was, in the first place, evident that these warlike savages had in no degree degenerated from those of a former generation, who had terrified the whole coast into submission. In the next place, that our black allies were cowardly and worthless, except some of the Houssas; while these were almost useless from their aversion to discipline. Lastly, that, notwithstanding these unfortunate circumstances on our side, it was impossible for the enemy to withstand the arms of precision wielded by our men. But the cost of this unhappy warfare—inglorious but for the patriotic self-devotion with which its dangers were encountered—was such as to cause much unavailing regret. Among many Englishmen and officers who were sacrificed, the death of Captain Eardley Wilmot, who fell in action with the Ashantees, and Lieutenant Charteris, eldest son of Lord Elcho, who succumbed to the deadly character of the climate, caused profound regret. The season for active operations in this country is from December to March, when the unhealthy season sets in. The war ran into 1874, when it was Sir Garnet Wolesley's good fortune to bring it to an end. Coomassie, the capital town of King Koffee Calcalli, was reduced to ruins, and its sovereign forced to sign a treaty, in which he "stipulated to renounce all rights of protectorate over the petty monarchs in alliance with the British Queen, and formerly tributary to the kingdom of Ashantee; also any of the tribes formerly connected with the Dutch government on the Gold Coast: that free trade should be permitted between Ashantee and the British ports; that the road between Coomassie and the river Prah should always be kept open; that the king should use his best efforts to check the practice of human sacrifice; and that he should pay, in instalments, a war indemnity of 50,000 ounces of approved gold, beginning with 4,000 ounces forthwith." The cost of this war to the British government was estimated at £900,000. To Sir Garnet Wolseley, who declined all titular honours, a sum of £25,000 was awarded in recognition of his services.

Turning from politics and war to matters of domestic interest, it may be recorded that, in the month of June, the Imperial Grand Duke of Russia, accompanied by his consort, the Princess Dagmar of Denmark, and their two children, arrived on a private visit to the Prince and Princess of Wales. This, however, was an event of little moment to the general public; but on the 18th of the same month, the Shah of Persia arrived; and for a fortnight previously, all England had been in a state of great excitement in anticipation of the event. Starting from the Belgian capital on Wednesday morning, the 18th, at which hour King Leopold took leave of him at the Brussels railway station, the Persian monarch reached Ostend by a special train before half-past seven. He was accompanied by Sir Henry Rawlinson and other Englishmen. In the port of Ostend were three despatch-boats of the British government, for the conveyance of his majesty and attendants across the channel. The Shah and Persian princes went on board the Vigilant, a paddle-wheel steam-yacht of 800 tons burthen. At a distance of several miles from the shore, lay three British ships of war—the new turret-ship Devastation, of 9,500 tons; the Audacious, and the Vanguard, each of 6,000 tons and fourteen guns, both iron-clads. These were to be the escort from Ostend, and they started at eight o'clock. At noon they came in sight of the channel fleet, which had been sent to meet the Shah, and convey him to Dover. There were eight of these monster ships, independent of the three just named; so that eleven iron-clads were united in one squadron, under Admiral Hornby, to accompany the Shah on his short voyage. Arrived at the pier, the Duke of Edinburgh and Prince Arthur were the first to welcome him. Coming out of the deck saloon of the Vigilant, the Shah showed himself on the quarter-deck, amidst a group of Persian grandees, in dresses adorned with gold lace, green ribbons, and brilliantly flashing stars. He wore a cloak, with a tall black fur cap, in front of which was his diamond aigrette, and he wore spectacles. As the multitude cheered him, he raised his hand to his cap once or twice, and then re-entered the deck saloon and changed his dress. He now appeared in a blue military frock-coat, faced with rows of diamonds and large rubies. His belt and the scabbard of his scimitar were likewise bright with jewels, as likewise was his cap. By about four o'clock, accompanied by the British princes, he started by a special train of the South-eastern Railway for London. At the Charing Cross station he was received by the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge, and, in a short time afterwards, found himself safely domiciled in Buckingham Palace.

Amongst the duties which take a prominent place in the lives of sovereigns, perhaps not the least fatiguing is the being necessitated to receive, with propriety, elegance, and, at least, an external cordiality, the ceremonious hospitality of a great and an hospitable nation. From this there is no means of escape. Even illness is an apology hardly acceptable by a nation when it is in an exceedingly generous humour. Accordingly, if the Shah felt weary on his arrival at Buckingham Palace, and would have been thankful for a day's quiet, he was not doomed to have it; for, on the day immediately succeeding that on which he stepped upon English ground, he had to receive the corps diplomatique and her majesty's ministers, then proceed to Marlborough House, and dine with the Prince and Princess of Wales, and afterwards attend a ball given by the Duchess of Sutherland at Stafford House. The next day he was received by the Queen in state, at Windsor Castle; and in the evening of the same day, was present at a magnificent entertainment, given in his honour by the Lord Mayor, in the Guildhall, London. On this occasion, no fewer than 3,000 guests had been invited to meet him.

Having had each of his days fully occupied in London and its vicinity, the Shah, on Thursday, the 26th, set out on a visit to the north of England; and at Liverpool, Manchester, and other parts, met with a like reception to that which had greeted him in the metropolis. The Duke of Sutherland introduced him to English rural life at Trentham, where he stayed until Saturday, the 28th, when he returned to London. On the afternoon of that day, he was entertained at a garden party, given by the Prince and Princess of Wales at the beautiful villa so famous at Chiswick. At this entertainment, the company was so numerous, that a mere list of their names filled nearly three columns of the Times newspaper. Her majesty the Queen was present. On the following Monday he inspected the men and engines of the metropolitan fire brigade, in the gardens of Buckingham Palace; and in the afternoon of the same day, went, in company of nearly the whole of the English princes and princesses, to a special entertainment at the Crystal Palace. The Shah was so much pleased with what he saw there, that, instead of taking his departure from England on the 3rd of July, as he had intended, he revisited the Crystal Palace, going without his diamonds, mingling with the common crowd of the people as one of themselves. He wore a simple tunic, which covered even his sword-belt; not a jewel was to be seen about him; and his companions, with the exception of one or two Persian officers in uniform, were as plainly dressed. He said to the chairman and secretary of the palace, in tolerable French—"C'était la plus heureuse soirée que j'ai goutée en Europe." On the 5th of July he took his departure.

During his visit the Shah was made a Knight of the Garter, her majesty presenting him with the badge and collar set in diamonds. He presented, both to the Queen and the Prince of Wales, photographs of himself set in diamonds. To the Duke of Cambridge, at the Windsor review, he gave a diamond-hilted sword; and to Earl Granville he offered his jewelled portrait. The Foreign Secretary, however, evinced a touch of generous dexterity on the occasion. He gracefully and skilfully took the photograph from the midst of its costly setting, and would only accept of his majesty's likeness—a compliment which values the precious stones at naught.

At the opening of the year 1874, the government of Mr. Gladstone, though still strong, was far from being popular. He himself had some slight difficulty about his seat at Greenwich. When the recent ministerial changes took place, and when he added to his duties of Premier those of Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had not again challenged the votes of his constituents. This was, by his adversaries, deemed an unconstitutional omission; and it was generally surmised that, when parliament met, he would be subjected to an inquiry which might endanger his position. It was generally known, that among the ranks of the government there was much discontent, little cordiality among some of the members, and even a feeling of coldness towards the chief himself. No violent immediate crisis, however, was apprehended; and the assembling of parliament on the 5th of February, for its sixth and last natural session, was expected to take place as one o the usual current events of the year.

About the middle of January, the premier was confined to his bed with a bronchial attack; but he soon recovered, when, on the 24th of January, a long manifesto made its appearance in the public prints, signed by the prime minister, and addressed to his constituents at Greenwich. This manifesto announced the startling intelligence that the present parliament would be dissolved, and a new one summoned to meet without delay. Among his reasons assigned for this act, the premier noted the fact of the government being defeated in their effort to settle the long-disputed question of the higher education in Ireland, "if not by a combined, yet by a concurrent effort of the leader of the opposition and of the Roman Catholic prelacy of Ireland." Other measures operating similarly against the government, evidenced such a diminution of strength, that it was deemed best to test, by a general election, whether ministers should retain or abandon office.

The new elections took place without delay, and were over by the middle of February. It was the first general election that had taken place in England under the conditions of the ballot; and the nation thus called upon to carry out its desires in secret, and without open responsibility, returned a majority of fifty for the Conservative party. This result caused Mr. Disraeli to be summoned to the royal presence, with orders to form a new administration. When the negotiations were completed, the twelve members of the Conservative Cabinet stood in the following order:—

Mr. Disraeli	First Lord of the Treasury.
Duke of Richmond	Lord President of the Council.
Earl of Malmesbury	Lord Privy Seal.
Earl of Derby	Foreign Secretary.
The Marquis of Salisbury	Secretary for India.
The Earl of Carnarvon	Colonial Secretary.
Mr. Gathorne Hardy	Secretary for War.
Mr. R. A. Cross	Home Department.
Mr. Ward Hunt	First Lord of the Admiralty.
Sir Stafford Northcote	Chancellor of the Exchequer.
Lord John Manners	Postmaster-General.

The only new name on the list was that of Mr. Cross, a Lancashire magistrate, and a friend of Lord Derby's. The penetration of Mr. Disraeli led him to the belief that he had discovered in him the true materials of a statesman.

When all the arrangements necessary on the assembling together of a new parliament were made, business was entered upon a month later than usual. It was not, therefore, expected that much business would be done during the session. Indeed, Mr. Disraeli thought that the mind of the country required repose after the "harassing" kind of legislation which it had been forced to endure from the late government. Accordingly, after the Bengal famine had been discussed, and several minor matters, Sir Stafford Northcote announced to the House, that the calculations respecting revenue, which had been just made and reported by Mr. Gladstone, his immediate predecessor, proved to be perfectly correct, and that there was a surplus which amounted to five millions and a-half.

Later in the session, Mr. Cross brought forward the Licensing Bill, which led to a great consumption of time by the almost interminable, uninteresting discussions which its clauses involved. It was, however, the only one of the government bills announced in the Queen's speech which reached maturity. Some were set aside for want of time, and others introduced and carried by the government, although they had not, in the programme, been foreshadowed at all. Questions of a religious or ecclesiastical character were those which occupied the greater part of the session; and among them was the Scotch Church Patronage Bill, introduced into the House of Lords by the Duke of Richmond. Its object was to abolish the system of lay patronage in the established kirk, and vest it in the congregations. The measure was, after thorough discussion in both Houses, carried. The "Public Worship Bill," and the "Endowed Schools Act Amendment Bill," also occupied much of the time of the session; and after several alterations and amendments, both were ultimately passed.

In relation to the royal family, parliament was, during this session, called upon to deal with some matters. Prince Arthur, introduced by his brothers the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh, took his seat as Duke of Connaught among the peers of the realm. The Queen, in conferring this title upon her third son, t appears, selected it with the evident desire of gratifying her Irish subjects. The prince himself was popular; having, in his profession, gained the esteem of all those with whom he had been brought into contact.

The next matter was a proposal for an allowance to be made to the fourth and youngest son of the Queen. This duty fell to the Duke of Richmond in the House of Lords, where it was unanimously carried, the sum voted being £15,000 annually. In the House of Commons the subject was introduced by Mr. Disraeli, and was there also carried unanimously.

Leaving the arena of parliamentary politics and debate, the imposing state entry of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh into the British metropolis, forms a popular scene of attraction. It took place on the 12th of March. Early on that morning the frost happened to be the most severe that had occurred during the preceding winter, and, before nine o'clock, a heavy snow-storm set in, and continued till past noon.

This was, so far, unfortunate for the sight-seers; but it did not prevent the Queen, with her new daughter, Prince Alfred, and several other members of the royal family leaving Windsor Castle at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and proceeding to London. Arrived in the metropolis, although snow was falling, the royal party, in open carriages, were driven from the Great Western station, amid the cheers of large crowds already assembled in the streets. For some hours together the people had been gathering, notwithstanding the persistency of the snow-fall, which, by the help of a little ingenuity in the application, might be considered a not inappropriate Russian welcome to the Muscovite lady. The Queen and the royal couple evinced their heedlessness of the weather by braving the snow in an open landau, drawn by six bay horses, with postilions in scarlet and gold liveries. Her majesty was dressed in half-mourning, and looked remarkably well whilst smiling and bowing her acknowledgments of the hearty cheers with which she was greeted. By her side sat the grand duchess, attired in a purple velvet mantle, edged with fur, a pale blue silk dress, and white bonnet. The frank, ingenuous expression of her fresh comely features seemed to make a most favourable impression upon the hearts of the people. The Princess Beatrice sat facing the grand duchess; and by the side of the princess was her brother, the Duke of Edinburgh, in captain's uniform, constantly raising his cocked hat in acknowledgment of the acclamations of the crowds which lined the streets, and thronged the windows, balconies, and even the house-tops. The welcome was of the heartiest description, and in the evening there were brilliant illuminated displays in the principal thoroughfares of the metropolis.

About the end of January, when it might be considered to have been little expected, a telegram was received from Aden, announcing the death of the great African traveller, Dr. Livingstone. He died of dysentery while travelling from Lake Bemhe to Unyanyembe. His body had been embalmed and preserved in salt by his Nassick boys, who were on their way conveying it to Zanzibar, en route for England. This was the substance of the telegram received; but our most eminent geographers long entertained doubts of the authenticity of the intelligence, though it eventually proved to be true. In July, 1869, Dr. Livingstone resolved to strike westward from his head-quarters at Ujiji, on the Tanganyika Lake, in order to trace out a series of water-basins lying in that direction, and which he had hoped would eventually have turned out to be the true sources of the Nile. After penetrating as far west as Bainbarre and Lake Kamalondo, stopping short of Bagenya, about four degrees to the west of his starting point, he returned; and when, in the winter of 1870-'71, he was found by Mr. Stanley—recorded in our last chapter—he was once more in the neighbourhood of his old haunts. His resolution still continued fixed—bent on discovering certain "fountains on the hills," which he had hoped would enable him to prove that they were the veritable sources of the Nile, and to have the glory of discovering them alone. This was a noble ambition, and, as he himself said, that no one might come after him and cut him out with a fresh batch of sources.

Mr. Stanley, the American, supplied him with new stores of necessaries, as Livingstone refused to return to England until his grand object was accomplished. Accordingly, he pursued his way, accompanied by none save the African natives, by whom he was surrounded, until May 4th, 1873, when he died. He had attempted to cross Lake Bemhe from the north; but failing in this, he had doubled back and rounded the lake, crossing the Chambize and the other rivers which flow into it. He then crossed the Lurpula, and after having passed through a marshy country, with the water, for three hours at a time, above his waist, he finished his earthly career at Lobisa. His body arrived in England in the middle of April, 1874, and when conveyed to London, was received at the rooms of the Royal Geographical Society. Here it was examined by Sir William Fergusson, its identification being placed beyond doubt by the trace of a fracture caused by the bite of a lion upwards of thirty years previously. On the 18th of the month his remains were deposited in Westminster Abbey. The coffin, which was of English oak, was almost without ornament, and bore this brief inscription :—

DAVID LIVINGSTONE:
Born at Blantyre, Lanarkshire, Scotland, March 19, 1813.
Died at Llala, Central Africa, May 4, 1873

Thus does the dust of this humble, but brave Scotchman, rest in the great national sanctuary of England, under the same roof with that of the noblest in the land—an honour merited by the almost sublime martyrdom of his life. Requiescat in pace—May he rest in peace!

CHAPTER CXXVIII.

CONTINUATION OF THE REIGN OF QUEEN VICTORIA.—A.D. 1875.

THE interest of the parliamentary session of this year was almost entirely absorbed by other events, in the contemplation of which, the public at large seemed to receive a certain amount of agreeable excitement. On the evening of the 23rd of July, however, there occurred, in the House of Commons, a scene so rare in these days of calm and discreet legislation, that it seems almost to throw the people back upon the stormy senatorial days of Charles I. and Oliver Cromwell. The occurrence is so unusual, and was so unexpected, and, withal, so dramatic, that it merits especial notice, as showing what may happen, even in the nineteenth century, in the national assembly of Great Britain, supposed to be composed of gentlemen, who, as a whole, are said to be possessed of a greater amount of discretion and wisdom than is to be found in any other assembly in the world. Mr. Disraeli, being asked whether he could afford facilities for the third reading of the "Infanticide Bill," in time to enable the House of Lords to consider it this session, rose, and thus represented the state of public business and the intentions of the government:—

"Perhaps the House will allow me, at this moment, to make a general statement in regard to the conduct of public business. The government were anxious to pass the Merchant Shipping Bill during this session of parliament. It had been pointed out to me, that if we could have got through the committee on the Agricultural Holdings Bill this week, we might have succeeded in passing the bill, and not have detained the House to an unreasonable period. In that matter, however, we have been disappointed, and, therefore, I am compelled to say, with unfeigned regret, that it is impossible for her majesty's government to entertain a hope that they will be able to pass the Merchant Shipping Bill this session. It has been submitted to me that we might pass a measure in a limited form, and that even in that form it might not be without benefit; but on consideration, I am not disposed to deal with the question in a fragmentary way. I have, therefore, declined to adopt that course; but I may say, if I am in the position next session which I now occupy, I and my colleagues will take the earliest opportunity of re-introducing the bill, and pushing it to a safe conclusion. I now intend to proceed with the Agricultural Holdings Bill until the committee is finished, and after that I propose to take supply; and when supply is concluded, I propose we should put the finishing strokes to the Land Transfer and Titles and the Judicature Bills. I calculate, by this programme, we may conclude the business on the 10th or 12th of August; though if the whole time is placed at our disposal, even an earlier date may be fixed upon; that, however, will entirely depend upon the House. The result which I wish to convey to the House is, that, unfortunately, we must give up the Merchant Shipping Bill; that we shall proceed with the Agricultural Holdings Bill, then with supply, and then with the two legal bills.

Mr. Goschen, as representing a shipping community, expressed his deep sense of regret that the Merchant Shipping Bill was not to be proceeded with. "It is clear," he said, "and I hope I may say it without offence, that the Merchant Shipping Bill is sacrificed to the Agricultural Holdings Bill; and, considering the urgency of the case, the human life which is at stake, and the uncertain state in which the shipping interest is being kept on this subject, I must say that there is some reason for complaint, not that the bill is withdrawn now, but that the arrangements of the government have been such as to render its withdrawal a necessity." On this, Mr. E. Smith rose to address the House, when the Speaker pointed out that the proper time to continue the discussion would be when the motion was made to withdraw the Merchant Shipping Bill.

Mr. Plimsoll, who was sitting at the end of the House, on the opposition side, and who appeared to be labouring under great excitement, then rose and said—"I beg to move the adjournment of the House. I earnestly entreat the right hon. gentleman, the prime minister, not to consign some thousands of living men to an undeserved and sudden death. I believe, and do not hesitate to say, without charging the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Charles Adderley) with a breach of faith or trickery, that after the first thirty clauses of the bill, which merely related to matters of slight alteration in the law, the rest of the bill was so drawn as to afford the greatest facilities for death-dealing and for hostile amendments. I adhere still to that opinion. I want the House to understand the position of this question. Since 1862, the Board of Trade have allowed matters to get worse and worse; and, with the aid of ship-owners of murderous tendencies outside this House, but who are amply represented inside the House, they have frustrated and talked to death every effort to procure a remedy for this state of things. (Cries of "Name.") I will give names presently. I ask hon. members if they have seen in the papers Lord Gifford's judgment respecting the ship Bard of Avon. If not, I advise them to read it. (Cries of "Order.") I must and will speak out. A friend of mine has told me that he does not know of a single ship which has been broken up voluntarily by the owners, because she was worn out, for thirty years. These ships gradually pass from hand to hand until they are bought by some needy and reckless speculator, by whom they are sent to sea with precious human lives on board. I have had a list carefully prepared from 15,000 vessels classed at Lloyd's. No fewer than 2,654 vessels have gone off their class and forfeited their position. And what is the consequence of this? It is that hundreds and hundreds of brave men are continually being sent to death, and their wives are made widows and their children orphans, so that a few speculative scoundrels, in whose breasts there is neither the love of God nor the fear of God, may make unhallowed gains. ("Hear, hear," and "Oh.") There are ship-owners in this country who have never either built a ship or bought a new one, but are simply what are called 'ship-knackers;' and accidentally I overheard a member of this House described by an ex-Secretary to the Treasury as a ship-knacker." (Cries of "Oh," and "Order.")

Here the Speaker rose, and pointed out to the hon. member that his speech—or the greater part of his observations—had reference to a bill which was set down for consideration that very day. His observations would be quite in order if made on the order that that bill be discharged; but he was not at liberty to discuss, on a motion for adjournment, the merits of any bill which was before the House.

Mr. Plimsoll: "Then, Sir, I give notice that, on Tuesday next, I will put the following question to the President of the Board of Trade. I will ask the hon. gentleman whether he will inform the House as to the following ships: the Thetis, the Melbourne, the Norah Grey, all lost in 1874, with eighty-seven lives; and the Foundling and the Sydney Dacre, abandoned in the early part of this year; and if he will tell the House whether the registered owner of these ships is Edward Bates, the member for Plymouth, or some other person of the same name—(loud cries of "Order")—and, Sir, I will ask some questions about members on this side of the House also. I am determined to unmask the villains who send to death and destruction"—— Here Mr. Plimsoll was interrupted by loud cries of "Order," in the midst of which he left his seat, and walking up to the table, stood in the middle of the floor, and, facing the Speaker, shook his clenched hand first at the one and then at the other side of the House. There was naturally great uproar; and when it had subsided, and the hon. gentleman had sat down, the Speaker rose and said: "I presume it is not intended that that expression is to be applied to any member of this House."

Mr. Plimsoll: "I beg pardon?"

The Speaker: "The hon. member made use of the word 'villain.' I trust he did not mean to apply it to any member of this House."

Mr. Plimsoll, again advancing to the middle of the floor, and waving his arms excitedly: "I did, Sir, and I don't mean to withdraw it." (Cries of "Order," "Withdraw," and general excitement.) "No, no, I won't withdraw." (Renewed cries of "Order," and excitement.)

The Speaker (who meanwhile had been standing and trying to restore order): "The observations of the hon. member are altogether unparliamentary; and I must call upon him to withdraw them." (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Plimsoll: "And I must again decline." (Loud cries of "Order.")

The Speaker: "Does the hon. member withdraw that expression?"

Mr. Plimsoll: "No, I don't—I don't." (Sensation.)

The Speaker: "I must again call upon the hon. member to withdraw it." (Loud cries of "Withdraw.")

Mr. Plimsoll: "I won't; and I must be allowed to say"——

The Speaker: "If the hon. member does not, I must submit his conduct to the judgment of the House." (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Plimsoll: "I shall be happy to submit to the judgment of the House, and this is my protest."

The hon. gentleman then advanced and threw a document on the table, immediately afterwards retiring, and taking a seat below the gangway on the opposition side of the House. Great excitement followed, and in the midst of it Mr. Dodson moved towards the hon. member, and addressed some words to him, apparently with the view of appeasing his excitement.

Meanwhile Mr. Disraeli rose and was received with cheers. He said: "I rise, I confess, with great pain, and I have no doubt a similar feeling will be experienced by every member of this House—that a brother member should have conducted himself in a manner almost unparalleled."

Mr. Plimsoll (excitedly): "And so has the government." (Cries of "Order," and excitement.)

"It is my duty," continued Mr. Disraeli, "to maintain, so far as I can, the dignity of the chair, and the honour of the House and all its members; and I think the conduct of the hon. member cannot be passed unnoticed. It is of the most violent and offensive kind; and, although I do it with great reluctance, I feel I am only expressing the sense of the whole House when I month, but had not been permitted to finish his task. On the second attempt, however, he swam to Calais, reaching there at about half-past ten o'clock on the following morning, after being nearly twenty-two hours in the water. The exploit was performed with no eye to reaping pecuniary benefit by it. Nevertheless, it was considered so daring, and so extraordinary, that a large amount was, throughout the country, subscribed and presented to him in testimony of the general admiration which his courage and endurance had called forth. Previously, an American had crossed the channel in a life-saving apparatus; but the feat of Captain Webb was accomplished with no artificial means of aid whatever—a stout heart, sound lungs, and a strong physical construction of frame, being the only means—wholly supplied by nature—which he brought to his task.

Africa, which has for nearly a century taken a firm hold on the minds of enterprising geographers and ethnologists, did, this year especially, excite a deep interest in the mind of the British public. Exploration was daily lifting from it the veil with which it had for centuries been covered, and new lights were being thrown upon it in all directions. Mr. H. M. Stanley, the discoverer of Dr. Livingstone, was commissioned by the newspaper proprietors of the New York Herald and the London Daily Telegraph, to explore the central portion of that continent, and he transmitted despatches of the most interesting description. He literally unveiled much of the hidden land. He passed through a wide tract of perfectly new country, in which he endured much suffering; and in fighting with the natives, lost twenty-one of his followers. These people were called the Waiura. To counterbalance this, he succeeded in making a complete survey of the famous lake Victoria Nyanza, the banks of which may, at no very distant day, be settled and cultivated by English, Irish, and Scotch. This is by no means a poetical dream. King Mtesa, the ruler of Uganda, through Mr. Stanley, invited to his kingdom—one of the fairest and largest of equatorial Africa—persons from England to come and instruct him and his people in moral and religious truth, and help him to civilise and develop the resources of his country. This invitation was at once met by a response from the London Church Missionary Society, and the means provided to carry out the wishes of this enlightened African monarch, who, if he himself is brought under the banner of Christ instead of that of Mahomet, may be a great means of lifting his land out of the deep darkness in which it has so long been enveloped.

In the month of July, Seyyid Burghash, sovereign of Zanzibar, arrived in England, and took up his abode at the Alexandra Hotel, London. He was found to be both a polite and an agreeable Arabian gentleman, attended in this country by Dr. Badger, whose perfect command of Arabic was a great advantage, not only to Seyyid himself, but to all who desired to converse with him. During his stay, he was, as a matter of course, much fêted, and shown, without reserve, all that might be supposed to interest a stranger, whose good-will was wished to be cultivated, if for no other reason, for that of aiding in the suppression of the slave-trade in Eastern Africa. While in London, the Alexandra Hotel was quite a little section of equatorial Africa, his highness, his suite, and their attendants—faces wholly new in England, but familiar enough to such as knew the Somali and Arabian coasts, and the Gulf-Arabs of Western India. The "tobe" and the "abbas" went wandering up and down; and on entering the hotel, one saw a countenance which re-called Africa, pure and simple, wide-nosed, prognathous, full-lipped, and yellow eyed—another, of the high Omânli type, having the hue of coffee well milked; oval, with the soft desert-bred eyes and dark curled beard: anon the pensive visage of a Hindoo merchant passed, and a glimpse was caught of the high-dried saffron forehead of the old Zanzibar Arab. These strangers did not easily lose the feeling of wonder which almost everything around them was calculated to inspire; but they took the new sights very quietly, as is the nature of their breed, and chattered African comments, one with another, over the comings and goings of a London hotel in full swing of the season. The prince was highly pleased with his reception. The marvellous commercial activity of the river—its endless fringes of warehouses, and quays, and buildings—its boats and bridges, but, above all, the wilderness of great and small vessels in the Pool—deeply astonished the Seyyid and his attendants; for neither Bombay nor Lisbon had prepared them at all for such a spectacle. "These ships seem to grow along your shores as the mangroves do with us," the Arab lord remarked as he came near London Bridge. He and his suite left London on the 15th of July for Folkestone, and embarked there for Paris, whence, after a short stay, he was to proceed to Marseilles on his return to Zanzibar.

Near the close of September, this year, the fiftieth anniversary of an important event was celebrated at Darlington and its immediate neighbourhood in the north of England. This was a "Railway Jubilee," held at the invitation of the North-Eastern Company, to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of the railway-system in the very locality where it occurred. For a moment let the following statistics be pondered, as an evidence of only the partial results of railway-travelling, now almost universal in the civilised parts of the globe. They have been compiled with the greatest care from official sources, and exhibit the growth—the gradual growth—of railway enterprise in the United Kingdom, from the year 1843 to the end of 1874. Commencing with 1843, they are given for that year; also for 1851, 1861, 1871, 1873, and 1874; and they are arranged in such a manner as to show the principal facts, not only for the United Kingdom as a whole, but also separately for England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland. The advantage of introducing the year 1873 is, that its returns show the immediate effect of the greater facilities afforded for third-class passenger traffic by the chief railway companies in 1872; and the year 1874 brings down the facts as nearly as possible to the present time. Each of the tables is, in a great measure, independent of those which follow or precede it.

In 1804 George Stephenson was a poor man labouring for his daily bread. His son Robert happened to be lying in his cradle, while he himself was cobbling shoes by his side. At that period, the stage-coach performed its journeys at the rate of five miles an hour, and a letter posted in Edinburgh might, by some fortuitous circumstance, be so successful as to reach its destination within the course of seven or eight days. Twenty years after the above humble scene, George Stephenson said to his son, "I tell thee what I think, my lad, and it is, that you will live to see the day, though I may not live so long, when railroads will supersede almost all other modes of conveyance of our native country; when mail-coaches will go by railway, and railways become the great highway for the king and his subjects. The time is coming when it will be cheaper for a working-man to travel by railway than to walk on foot." This was a bold, but nevertheless a true prophecy; and both father and son lived to see it fulfilled. But who brought about this extraordinary revolution? George Stephenson and his illustrious son, with the aid of Brunel, his son, and Joseph Locke!

On an occasion of such importance, marking, as it does, the celebration of an event, transcending, in the extent of its intelligent development, the grandest dreams of antiquity, it was to be expected that it would be accompanied, at Darlington, with all the usual concomitants of a generous festivity. Accordingly, in spite of the chilling dr[illegible] and rain, decorations were abundant, and festoons, and flowers, and flags, were lavishly displayed, to signalise an event so memorable. This, to the local mind, no doubt, appeared so grand, that both the travelling and mercantile communities ought to have felt a grateful glow of sympathy with it in all parts of the civilised globe. Perhaps the most attractive feature of the day was a Locomotive Exhibition, showing the changes and improvements which had, from time to time, been effected during the half-century which had just passed over the trial of the railway system. This was held in what is called the North Road Engine Works, the principal place for the erection of locomotives between the Ouse and the Tyne, and where the bulk of the engines for the Darlington section of the North-Eastern Railway are built. These works were, in 1863, commenced with about fifty workmen, but now they employ about a thousand; and, on the day of the jubilee, offered to view twenty-four engines, all of different types and construction. A slight description of these, as developing the progress of locomotive engineering skill, cannot fail to be interesting as witnessed on an occasion of this kind.

The engines shown included "Locomotive," the first engine used on a public railway, built by Stephenson in Newcastle, in 1825. It was shown in motion, steam being conveyed to the cylinders by a pipe from the boiler of the works. "No. 1" contrasted vividly with its upright works exposed, its cylinders placed vertically on the top of the boiler, and its single flue, with its neighbour, a splendid passenger engine, built at the works this year (1875), weighing exactly four times the weight of "Locomotive," and intended to run the express from Saltburn to Leeds. By the side of "No. 1," was shown also one of the original fish-bellied malleable iron rails, and the engine itself was placed on rails similarly attached to stone sleepers of the olden type. Next was one of the engines built by Timothy Hackworth, and since remodelled; then one named "Invicta," dating from 1830, built by Robert Stephenson, and notable as that on which the present locomotive principal of the North-Eastern—Mr. Fletcher—began his career. Then came three other old engines, the sloping cylinders, single tube, and double tender of the first, marking it as of ancient date; whilst the others, and the two adjoining, presented varied stages of progression in design and compactness. Next (No. 273), was an engine constructed on the principle of Crampton's patent, having no driving-wheel; and this completed the series of the most noticeable old engines.

There was a greater variety of the new engines shown —the Stockton and Darlington section, the North-Eastern, the Midland, the Glasgow and South-Western, the London and North-Western, and the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Companies, having contributed some of the finest locomotives running on their lines. The Midland sent one built by Kitson of Leeds, neatly finished. The London and North-Western were represented by the "Penrith Beacon," built at their great Crewe works, also new, and distinguished from all others by having a "scoop" for gathering water whilst travelling at a rapid speed. The Great Northern sent a compact engine (No. 47), [con]spicuous by its large driving-wheel, about eight feet, [and] by the absence of a steam dome. The Glasgow and South-Western exhibited a massive representative, fitted with steam reverser gear; and the London, Brighton, and South Coast sent a powerful engine, to which a speed indicator was attached. The North-Eastern Railway proper sent the express passenger engine used for the "Flying Scotchman," which had the vacuum brake, and successfully competed at the Newark brake trials; also a six-coupled goods engine, and a heavy eight-wheeled tank engine; whilst the Stockton and Darlington section had several admirable engines, including the passenger engine we have named as next to No. 1, which received merited praise for the admirably-equalised disposition of the weight upon the wheels, and its general adaptability. Besides these were a handsome "bogie" engine, and several others. Altogether the collection was happily illustrative of the progress in locomotion during fifty years; and this effect was heightened by models of Blenkinsop's and other [ea]rly-railway engines with cogged wheels, &c., by the exhibition of the old "dandy-cart" once used on the line, and by models of the working of the block system, as well as by the exhibition of the engine-lifting apparatus.

It was observed by Mr. H. Pease, during the exhibition, that the common workmen had rendered great assistance in the development of the locomotive, not only by manipulative skill, but by ingenious suggestion. He also said that engines had, in price, increased from £500 to £3,000, and in weight from seven to thirty tons or more.

One of the principal events of this great day for Darlington was the presentation of a statue of the late Joseph Pease, Esq., to the corporation of his native town. This work is of bronze, placed on a pedestal of Scotch granite. Mr. G. A. Lawson was the sculptor; Messrs. Cox and Sons, of Thames Ditton, the founders; and the pedestal had been prepared by Messrs. Priest and Son, of Darlington. The features of Mr. Pease were considered well delineated; the attitude characteristic, and the difficulty of representing the dress of the first Quaker member well overcome. On the sides of the pedestal are four bronze panels in basso-relievo, illustrative of four phases in Mr. Pease's life. Politically, he is represented as one of a group engaged in discussing the reform question, of some forty years previously. A second panel pictures one of the early engines; the mills and forges that the first railway called into being; the hills of Cleveland forming the background. The educational labours of Mr. Pease are hinted at in a third panel, and the fourth suggests the aid he rendered in the abolition of slavery. On the south side of the pedestal is the simple inscription, "Joseph Pease." The statue, including the portrait of Mr. Pease, also presented to the town, cost about £3,000. The portrait was painted by Mr. James Macbeth, and is placed in the council chamber. The inscription is, "Joseph Pease, born 22nd June, 1799; died 8th February, 1872. Presented by subscription to the corporation of Darlington, his native town; 1875. It was unveiled by the Duke of Cleveland, who, in an appropriate speech, did justice to the merits of the late Joseph Pease, both as a man of business, a parliamentary representative of the people, and a philanthropist in all the relations of life. The festivities of the day were wound up with a sumptuous banquet held in a pavilion on the cricket-ground, the whole of the proceedings being such as are likely to be long remembered in and around the locality in which they took place.

Turning away from local festivity in England, our attention is drawn to the far East, even beyond that sea where

Sabean odours from the spicy and where the Prince of Wales now is, holding festivity in the Indian land. On the 11th of October the heir to the British crown and its dependencies left England for India. Proceeding by way of Paris to Brindisi, he there joined the steam-ship Serapis, which had been specially prepared for his reception. Visiting his brother-in-law, the King of Greece, at Athens, he thence sailed to Egypt, then down the Red Sea, and across the Arabian Sea, to Bombay. Here, shortly after daybreak on Monday, the 8th of November, the booming of guns intimated to the inhabitants that the great event which had been the subject of conversation with every Hindoo, Mussulman, Parsee, and European for some months previously, had at length taken place—the Prince of Wales had realised the dream of his life, and had arrived in India. Let us, for a moment, pause, and conceive for ourselves the mingled feelings of wonder and delight which he must have experienced when the morning sun beamed upon the scene, which formed, at least, one of the many tangible pictures of which he had dreamt, and which was now arrayed before him with all the splendour of an Orient sky. There, through the palms of Malabar Hill, appeared numbers of white houses, shining among the groves of a tropical vegetation, the beautiful promontory of Colaba, adorned with a perfect heap of picturesque dwellings, with the tall spire of the church commemorative of the officers and men of the British army who fell in Afghanistan thirty-five years ago. The Fort, with its irregular clusters of curious houses, in which the two most prominent objects, the black and aged square tower of the cathedral, and the new tower of the university buildings, form a suggestive contrast of what Bombay once was and now is; and the beautiful arc of Back Bay, the shelving shore of which is adorned by green meadows and magnificent buildings,—all now appeared before him in no visionary form, but in palpable and striking reality.

This is not the place for a description of all those minute and tasteful particulars of etiquette which largely entered into the reception of the Prince of Wales: but all the arrangements had been made with the greatest care, and the strictest attention to good taste. The princes and chiefs, and the principal European and native inhabitants of Bombay, had been invited to the dockyard, where he was to be received; it is impossible to [illegible]agine a more attractive picture [illegible] [illegible]acious [illegible] gaily decorated [illegible] chivalry, the rank [illegible]aited the approach after his return to his native land, from which his progress is watched with an interest even beyond what may be his own warmest expectations or conceptions. Meanwhile, it may be stated that his tour in the Madras Presidency was announced as follows:—On the 22nd of November, at Beypore. The 23rd, 24th, 25th, and 26th were to be devoted to shooting; 27th, at Coimbatore; 28th and 29th, at Ootacamund; 30th and 31st, at Mysore; 2nd and 3rd December, at Bangalore; 4th to 7th, at Madras; 8th, Trichinopoly; 9th, Madura; 10th, Tuticorin. On the morning of the 13th December he arrived at Madras from Trichinopoly, and was received with the usual salutes. His reception was most brilliant. The governor, commander-in-chief, chief justice, the chiefs of Travancore, Cochin, and Vizianagram, and Prince Arcot, awaited his arrival at the railway station, with a large assembly of Europeans and natives. In reply to an address from the municipal authorities, his royal highness expressed th[illegible] gratification he felt at the reception. All along [illegible] route to the government-house there were two d[illegible] lines of natives, who received him with every mar[illegible] cordiality and respect. and his reception was magnificent, the inhabitants receiving his royal highness with every mark of respect and cordial enthusiasm. Down to the last day of December, 1875, his royal highness was in Calcutta, both receiving and reciprocating compliments.

Whilst the prince was being fêted and enjoying himself in India, the Princess of Wales was visited at home by the King and Queen of Denmark and her sister, the Princess Thyra. As the visit was private rather than otherwise, no special public demonstration was made, and the royal party passed their time in pursuing such quiet enjoyments as were in conformity with their tastes. On the 29th of November, the Queen and Princess Thyra, with her royal highness the Princess of Wales and her children, paid a visit to Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle; and shortly after, the Danish family returned to Denmark, the king having previously taken his departure. On the 15th of December, the infant daughter—born 29th October—the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh was christened the private chapel of Windsor Castle. On this ion the Princess of Wales was present, and on the afternoon left London with her family for Paris, te for Denmark, there to spend their Christmas. day afterwards (the 16th) the Duke of Edin- the foundation stone of the New National se, on the Thames Embankment, London.

Accordingly, events of the ance to the welfare of the country may without the interference of princes, e forms of the constitution may have he proper administration of public f this, it was announced, on the 26th the Bank of England had received a eir principal office at Alexandria, tian government had sold to the its shares in the Suez Canal for This announcement was variously states, some being favourable and llor Von Scherzer, an Austrian writer, says, so recently as but a few days before the close of the year 1875, that the effect of the purchase by England of the Suez Canal shares on the interests of Austria, "can only be favourable and advantageous. It may justly be asserted," he proceeds, "that the Suez Canal means Egypt, and that, therefore, the influence of England, from a politico-economical point of view, will not be confined to the canal, but be extended to the whole of Egypt and to its financial and political development. With a well-regulated administration, and under a wise and economical government, Egypt, which, with its adjacent territories, covers an area of 32,000 geographical square miles, has a total population of 7,500,000 souls, and already possesses a trade of nearly 700,000,000f. a year, will develop itself into a most important centre both of production and of consumption."

Herr von Scherzer believes that England, in the interest of her own trade, will, above all, strive to effect a considerable reduction in the canal dues, which will, of course, bring a considerable advantage to the shipping trade of other nations. If, on the other hand, the canal had remained principally in the possession of French shareholders, it would have been made entirely subservient to private interests. In order, however, to give Austria the full benefit of the change, Herr von Scherzer thinks that the railway, which is to establish a direct and cheap communication between Trieste and Central Europe, should be completed as soon as possible; that the Austro-Hungarian Lloyd should organise new lines of packet-ships to Egypt and the islands of the Indian Archipelago; that Austrian manufacturers should study the requirements of the people of Egypt with more attention than heretofore; and that Austrian traders should open offices and warehouses in the most important Egyptian ports. These suggestions, made to Austria, might be taken by England, and applied in such a way as to redound to her interest.

Having thus, for the present, finished this eventful history, the progress of the pen must stop, until coming events, yet in the womb of futurity, call it again into action to shadow forth the further greatness and glory of England.

THE END.
